(4) A paper (S/C.3/SC.3/26) containing general United States views on the nature and scope of "industrial safeguards" (safeguards through industrial information). The paper suggested that military safeguards might be supplemented by a limited type of industrial safeguards which would provide accurate information on important industrial tendencies in certain strategic industries.

During discussions in the Committee the representative of Egypt stated that it was premature to discuss safeguards, since certain external conditions for such safeguards had not yet been fulfilled. The question of safeguards, he maintained, could not fruitfully be discussed separately from the practical measures necessary for the regulation and reduction of armaments and armed forces. Any such discussion, he maintained, must take into account the necessity of putting into effect the military agreements provided for in Article 43 of the Charter and the establishment of the control of atomic energy. Conventional armaments, he stated, had lost much of their importance.

The representative, of Norway considered that the discussion on the question of safeguards, in the absence of the representative of the USSR, should be of a purely technical nature which would raise no controversial issues.

The representative of the United States, on the other hand, said that even in the absence of the USSR representative it was possible and useful to study in detail the question of safeguards, as this study was at the planning rather than the "action" stage.

The United Kingdom representative stated that the Committee's ability to achieve real progress at the present time was limited owing to the refusal of the USSR to participate in its work, but that the study of safeguards formed a vital element in the Committee's work. He considered that one principle must be established as underlying any system of safeguards, namely that it was essential to achieve some measure of improvement in international relations and to create an atmosphere of mutual confidence among the States. If disarmament was not to be universal at the outset, he said, all States possessing major military resources must adhere to the international control system before the entry into force of a convention on the regulation and reduction of armaments. The representatives of China and France also held that it was necessary to establish an international control system before the entry into force of a convention on the regulation and reduction of armaments.

The international control organ, the representative of the United Kingdom stated, should have very close organizational ties with the Security Council. It should be established within the framework of the Security Council, but it should not be too rigidly subordinated to it.

The progress report of the Working Committee (S/C.3/43) containing as an internal part, the summary records of its meetings and the working papers submitted to it was transmitted to the Commission on 9 August 1950.

In its report (S/1690) to the Security Council covering the period between 27 April and 9 August 1950, the Commission stated the circumstances in which the representative of the USSR had withdrawn from the Commission's work. It transmitted to the Council the progress report of the Working Committee (S/C.3/43) together with the summary records of its own proceedings.

The Security Council took no action on the report of the Commission during 1950.

¹⁴⁰ Item 3 of the Commission's plan of work related to the question of practical and effective safeguards, by means of an international control system operating through special organs and by other means to protect complying states against the hazards of violations and

Q. REPRESENTATION OF MEMBER STATES IN THE UNITED NATIONS

1. The Question of the Representation of China

a. CONSIDERATION BY THE SECURITY COUNCIL

In a cablegram dated 18 November 1949 (A/1123) to the President of the General Assembly, the Foreign Minister of the Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China stated that his Government repudiated the legal status of the delegation under Mr. T. F. Tsiang and held that it could not represent China and had no right to speak on behalf of the Chinese people in the United Nations.

At the 458th meeting of the Security Council, on 29 December, the representative of the USSR endorsed the position taken up by the Government of the People's Republic of China and stated that he would not regard the representative of the Kuomintang group as representing China, or as being empowered to represent the Chinese people in the Security Council. The representative of the USSR was supported by the representative of the Ukrainian SSR who made a similar statement.

The representative of China stated that, if a minority in the Council could arbitrarily deny the authority of any of the other delegations, the Organization would be reduced to anarchy or to the dictation of one or two delegations.

As to the nature of his Government, he said that the Government which he represented was based on a Constitution freely accepted by the People's representatives in a National Assembly.

The President then pointed out that the matter under discussion had not been included in the provisional agenda for that meeting and that the Council should pass on to other business.

In a cablegram dated 8 January 1950, the Foreign Minister of the Government of the People's Republic of China informed the Governments of States represented on the Security Council that his Government considered that the presence of the Kuomintang delegation in the Council was illegal. His Government's position was that the Kuomintang delegates should be expelled from the Council.

At the 459th meeting of the Council on 10 January 1950, the representative of the USSR expressed his support for the position taken by the People's Republic of China in its communication of 8 January, and he insisted that the representative of the Kuomintang group should be excluded from the Council. If the Council did not take appropriate measures, the USSR delegation, he stated, would not take part in the work of the Council until the Kuomintang representative was excluded. He submitted a draft resolution (S/1443), by which the Council would decide not to recognize the credentials of the representative referred to in the statement by the Central People's Government of the Chinese People's Republic and to exclude him from the Security Council.

The Council considered the USSR draft resolution at its 460th and 461st meetings on 12 and 13 January. The following views were expressed:

The representative of Yugoslavia stated that many Governments, including his own, had recognized the new Government of China. It had been argued that the USSR proposal was premature since five members of the Security Council continued to recognize the old regime. However, the number of Governments according diplomatic recognition to the new Government was growing because it had become patent that the sovereign will of the Chinese people had been expressed in the establishment of the Government of Mao Tse-tung. He argued that recognition or non-recognition by individual Governments of Member States did not imply an analogous position in respect of representation in the Security Council. Considerations of a domestic or ideological character and other factors determining the attitude of individual States on the question of recognition should not be the basis of the Council's attitude. The Council could not continue to work effectively if the world's largest nation were represented by the delegation of a Government which the overwhelming majority of that people regarded as an enemy.

The representative of France said that while the situation in China entailed problems which had not escaped the attention of the French Government, it had not, thus far, formulated its conclusions. In the circumstances, and in the absence of new instruction, the French delegation would not challenge the validity of the credentials of the representative of China and would vote against the USSR draft resolution. He considered that proposal to be a matter of procedure, and therefore held that his negative vote should not be construed as constituting a veto.

The representative of the United States noted that the USSR draft resolution was directed at unseating Mr. Tsiang on the ground that his credentials were no longer valid because they emanated from a Government which the USSR no longer recognized. However, the United States Government recognized, as the Government of China, the Government which had accredited Mr. Tsiang to the Security Council. Therefore, his delegation considered that Mr. Tsiang's credentials remained valid and would vote against the USSR draft resolution. His Government considered that the USSR proposal presented to the Council a procedural question involving the credentials of a representative of a member and his negative vote could not be considered as a veto. He wished to make it clear that his Government would accept the decision of the Council on the matter when made by an affirmative vote of seven members.

The representative of China said that, when he had taken his seat in the Council, more than two years previously, his credentials had been duly certified to the Council as adequate. They had not been challenged until the USSR draft resolution had been presented. If the question before the Council was a matter of credentials, there could be no real question at all. Although the USSR draft resolution spoke of credentials, what it called into question was really the right of his Government to be represented at all. That was not a question of mere procedure but a political question of the utmost importance, and he would treat it as such.

The representative of the USSR stated that the prestige of the Security Council and the United Nations was being undermined by the attitude of the United States and the French delegations and of some other delegations, which were transforming the Council into an organ comprising not only the official representatives of States members of the Security Council, but also private persons representing no one. The USSR delegation, because of the great significance it attached to the Security Council and because it realized the Council's responsibility in maintaining international peace and security, did not consider it possible to participate in the Council's work when the very basis of the authority and prestige not only of the Council, but of the United Nations as a whole, were being undermined. Taking note that the representative of the United States had advanced the thesis that the USSR was demanding the exclusion of the representative of the Kuomintang group because it had recognized the new Government of China and had broken off diplomatic relations with the Kuomintang group, the representative of the USSR denied that thesis. He stated that diplomatic recognition or non-recognition of a Government was not a decisive factor in determining its right to be represented on the organs of the United Nations, including the Security Council. In reality, the USSR was demanding the exclusion of the representative of the Kuomintang group from the Security Council on the ground that he represented neither China nor the Chinese people.

The USSR representative said that it was obvious that any reference to the rules of procedure in connexion with the matter under discussion was irrelevant. The point at issue was not whether the credentials of the representative of the Kuomintang group on the Council were in order, but that the latter had no credentials at all and no legal right or reason to sit in the Security Council, because the Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China had urged his exclusion from the Council on the ground that his presence there was illegal. When half the members of the Security Council had broken off relations with the Kuomintang clique, it would be abnormal for the Council to continue its work with the participation of this Kuomintang clique. The Council should bear in mind the fact that, basing their attitude on international laws, common sense and the existing political situation, six of the eleven members of the Security Council, including China, could not agree to the continued presence of the representative of the Kuomintang group in the Council.

The sole criterion which must guide the Council, the USSR representative stated, was the will of the Government which represented China and the Chinese people in international affairs. That Government was the Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China and its will was clearly expressed in the telegram from its Foreign Minister. References to the rules of procedure were intended to prolong the illegal presence of the Kuomintang agent in the Security Council.

The representative of the United Kingdom stated that his Government considered that it was premature to discuss the USSR draft resolution before even a majority of the members of the Security Council had recognized the new Government in China.

At the 461st meeting on 13 January 1950, the representative of Ecuador said that his Government would recognize the right of the Nationalist Government of China to be represented in the Security Council, so long as there was no change in the status of the relations between the two Governments.

Turning to some of the arguments which had been advanced during the debate, the representative of Ecuador examined certain aspects of the question of recognition in international law. He said that it might well be that a State or Government could exist de facto independently of recognition by other States; but if that State were to enter into international relationships, then custom and law required its recognition by other States and the establishment of diplomatic relations. Recognition was not automatic or irrevocable, and it was not enough for a Government to proclaim that it was the sole representative of its people. Other Governments must recognize it in that capacity and act accordingly. He noted that, while devoting some attention to the question of credentials, the representatives of the USSR and China both seemed to consider that the question under consideration was not, in fact, a question of credentials. However, credentials had been received for the representative of China, certified by the Secretary-General as valid and accepted by the Council. Whatever important considerations were involved and whatever motives there might be for unseating a representative, it would be absolutely indispensable first to withdraw recognition of his credentials.

The representative of Cuba considered that the USSR draft resolution bore not only upon the validity of the credentials but also upon the very representation of a Member State. He referred to resolutions 291 (IV) and 292 (IV) dealing with the situation in China which the General Assembly had adopted at its fourth session. The USSR draft resolution would lead the Security Council to resolve indirectly, or to consider as already resolved, a problem which was under consideration in another organ of the United Nations, in accordance with resolution 292 (IV). His delegation felt that it would be premature and inappropriate for the Security Council to take a decision on the status of the delegation of China. Together with a majority of the Members of the United Nations, the Cuban Government recognized the Nationalist Government of China. Therefore, the Nationalist Government was legitimately represented in the Security Council. If the Council acted differently, it would be transformed into a body whose function was to accept and legalize factual situations without even considering how those situations had come about.

At the 461st meeting, on 13 January 1950, the USSR draft resolution was put to the vote and was not adopted, having failed to obtain the affirmative votes of seven members. The vote was 6 to 3 (India, USSR, Yugoslavia) with 2 abstentions (Norway, United Kingdom).

The representative of the USSR declared that his delegation would not participate in the work of the Security Council until the representative of the Kuomintang group, who was illegally occupying a seat in that organ of the United Nations, had been removed from membership in the Council. His presence there was undermining the prestige and authority of the Security Council and of the United Nations as a whole. As a result, the Security Council was being transformed into an organ whose decisions could not be considered legal in those circumstances. Therefore, the USSR would not recognize as legal any decision of the Security Council adopted with the participation of the representative of the Kuomintang group and would not deem itself bound by such decisions. The representative of the USSR then left the Council chamber.

The representative of Yugoslavia pointed out that only five votes had favoured the continued representation of the former Government of China. In the circumstances, he questioned whether it was reasonable that the representative of China should continue to preside. He submitted the following draft resolution (S/1448/Rev.1):

The Security Council,

Considering the serious objections raised against the validity of the credentials of the present Chinese Representative to the Security Council,

Decides to suspend rule 18 of the provisional rules of procedure of the Council,

Invites the Representative of Cuba to take over the Presidency of the Council immediately, and to preside until 28 February 1950;

Decides to return to the application of rule 18 of the provisional rules of procedure of the Council on 1 March 1950.

The representative of France opposed the Yugoslav proposal, since the right to hold the Presidency was included in the rights which rule 17 preserved for representatives to whose credentials objections had been made.

The representative of the United States expressed the regret of his Government that the USSR was unwilling to abide by the Charter and that it had chosen to violate the Council's rules of procedure. He considered that the United Nations was strong enough to withstand such tactics. Calling attention to Article 28 of the Charter, he said that the absence of a permanent member in no way diminished the Council's powers or its authority to act. The absence of the USSR representative could not be permitted to prevent the Council from fulfilling its obligations under the Charter. Its strength should not be permitted to be dissipated by a gesture of contempt for its orderly processes. He noted that only one of the five States represented on the Security Council which did not recognize the Government represented by Mr. Tsiang refused to accept the decision of the Council taken in accordance with the Charter and the rules of procedure. He hoped that a decent sense of respect for the United Nations and the work before the Council would soon restore the representative of the USSR to his place.

The Acting President said that, in view of the vote on the USSR draft resolution, he felt that the Council had decided to close the matter for the consideration of which the representative of China had used his discretionary powers under rule 20 to relinquish the chair.

After the representative of China had resumed the presidency, the Council commenced its consideration of the next item on the agenda, pending circulation of the Yugoslav draft resolution (S/1448/Rev.I).

At the 462nd meeting on 17 January 1950, the representative of Yugoslavia emphasized that only five members of the Security Council had voted to maintain the present Chinese representation; he considered that the Council's authority would be impaired if the presidential powers were exercised by the Head of a delegation whose credentials had been challenged in that manner.

The representative of Cuba said that the Yugoslav proposal raised again the question of the rights enjoyed by the representative of China, following the objection to his credentials. At the 461st meeting, the USSR draft resolution on the question had been rejected; consequently, the credentials of the representative of China remained valid.

At the 462nd meeting, on 17 January 1950, the Yugoslav draft resolution (S/1448/Rev.I) was put to the vote and rejected by 6 votes to 1 (Yugoslavia), with 3 abstentions (India, Norway, United Kingdom) and one member absent (USSR).

A cablegram dated 20 January 1950, bearing the signature of the Minister of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China, informed the Secretary-General and the Members of the United Nations and the Security Council that his Government had appointed Chang Wen Tien as Chairman of its delegation to attend the meetings and to participate in the work of the United Nations, including the meetings and work of the Security Council. He asked when the Kuomintang representative would be expelled from the United Nations and from the Security Council, and when the delegation of the People's Republic of China could participate in the work of the United Nations and the Security Council. A cablegram dated 3 February 1950, bearing the signature of the Vice-Minister of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China, protested against the continued presence of the Kuomintang representative in the Security Council. At the request of the representative of Yugoslavia, the two communications were circulated as official documents of the Security Council (S/1462).

During the month of February 1950, the Secretary-General requested the preparation of a confidential memorandum on the legal aspects of the problem of the representation of States in the United Nations. Some of the representatives on the Security Council asked to see the memorandum and references to it appeared in the Press. On 8 March, the Secretary-General informed the President of the Council that he felt it appropriate that the full text be made available to all members of the Council. Accordingly, he circulated the memorandum (S/1466) to all members and released it to the Press.

The memorandum stated that the primary difficulty in the current question of the representation of Member States in the United Nations was that the question of representation had been linked up with the question of recognition by Governments of Member States. After arguing that the linkage was unfortunate from the practical standpoint, and wrong from the standpoint of legal theory, the memorandum concluded that the proper principle could be derived by analogy from Article 4 of the Charter. Article 4 required that an applicant for membership must be able and willing to carry out the obligations of membership. The obligations of membership could be carried out only by Governments which, in fact, possessed the power to do so. Where a revolutionary government presented itself as representing a State, in rivalry to an existing government, the question at issue should be which of these two governments in fact was in a position to employ the resources and direct the people of the State in the fulfilment of the obligations of membership. In essence, this meant an inquiry as to whether the new government exercised effective authority within the territory of the State and was habitually obeyed by the bulk of the population. If so, the memorandum stated, it would seem to be appropriate for the United Nations organs, through their collective action, to accord the new government the right to represent the State in the Organization, even though individual Members of the Organization refused, and might continue to refuse, to accord that government recognition as the lawful government for reasons which were valid under their national policies.

On 13 March, the representative of China lodged his Government's formal protest (S/1470) against the Secretary-General's memorandum (S/1466), which the representative of China considered to be an attack on China's United Nations front and would, in time, be recognized as an attack on the cause of freedom throughout the world. After analysing the political errors which he considered the document involved, he replied to the legal arguments it advanced and concluded that recognition and representation were based on similar considerations and that the linkage between the two was natural and inevitable. If the Secretary-General wished to institute the inquiry to which he had referred, the only possible procedure consistent with the principles of the Charter was a fair and free election. The communist regime did not have the support of the Chinese people, who regarded it as a puppet regime. The representative of China considered that the question of Chinese representation could not be held to "threaten the maintenance of international peace and security" within the meaning of Article 99 of the Charter, the only Article that assigned a sphere of political action to the Secretary-General. For these reasons, he concluded that the Secretary-General had intervened against the interests of China on the basis of bad politics and bad law.

On 27 July, the permanent representative of the USSR at the United Nations informed the Secretary-General that, in accordance with established procedure, he was assuming the Presidency of the Security Council for August 1950. At the meeting on 1 August, the President ruled that the representative of the Kuomintang group did not represent China and therefore could not participate in the Council's meetings.

The representative of the United States considered that no President had the authority to rule, by arbitrary fiat, upon the status of the representative of a country which was a Member of the United Nations. Accordingly he challenged the ruling.

After discussion during which the points of view previously expressed were maintained, the President's ruling was overruled by the Council by 8 votes to 3 (India, USSR, Yugoslavia). The representative of the USSR declared that this decision was illegal because the person concerned was the spokesman of a group which represented no one, and was not a representative of a State.

On 3 August, the Council rejected by 5 votes to 5 (China, Cuba, Ecuador, France, United States), with 1 abstention (Egypt), the proposal to include in the agenda the item "Recognition of the representative of the Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China as the representative of China" which had been placed on the Council's provisional agenda by the President (representative of the USSR).

b. CONSIDERATION BY THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY AT ITS FIFTH SESSION

In a cablegram (A/1364) dated 26 August 1950 to the Secretary-General, the Foreign Minister of the People's Republic of China recalled previous notes sent by his Government to the Secretary-General and to the General Assembly calling for the expulsion of the Kuomintang representatives from the United Nations organs. The continued toleration of those representatives by the United Nations was, it was stated, a violation of the United Nations Charter and involved disregard of the rightful claims of the People's Republic of China. He requested that the necessary arrangements should be made for the delegation of the People's Republic of China to attend the fifth session of the General Assembly.

On 5 September, the Secretary-General replied that he would promptly make a request for the entry into the United States of the delegation of the People's Republic of China, on the General Assembly's acceptance of that delegation as representing the Republic of China, or on the invitation to it by the General Assembly to attend the session.

In a cablegram dated 18 September, the Foreign Minister of the Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China repeated the statements included in his previous message and declared that, should the fifth session of the General Assembly be held without the participation of his Government's delegation, all the resolutions of the General Assembly concerning China would be illegal, null and void.

At the opening meeting (277th) of its fifth session, on 19 September 1950, the General Assembly had before it the following four draft resolutions:

(i) By India (A/1365), which noting that the Republic of China was a Member of the United Nations and of its various organs, considering that the obligations of a Member under the Charter of the United Nations could not be carried out except by a Government which, with a reasonable expectancy of permanence, actually exercises control over the territory of that Member and commands the obedience of its people, recognizing that the Central Government of the People's Republic of China is the only such Government functioning in the Republic of China as now constituted, would have the General Assembly decide that the aforesaid Central Government should be entitled to represent the Republic of China in the General Assembly; further, the draft resolution would have the Assembly recommend that the other organs of the United Nations adopt similar resolutions.

(ii) By the USSR (A/1369), which would have the General Assembly decide that the representatives of the Kuomintang group could not take part in the work of the General Assembly and its organs because they were not the representatives of China.

(iii) By the USSR (A/1370), which would have the Assembly invite the representatives of the People's Republic of China accredited by the Central People's Government to take part in the work of the General Assembly and its organs.

(iv) By Canada (A/1386), which taking note of differences of view concerning the representation of China in the United Nations, would have the Assembly establish a Special Committee consisting of the President of the Assembly and six other representatives selected by the President to consider the question of Chinese representation and to report back, with recommendations, to the present session of the General Assembly, after the Assembly should have considered item 62 of the Provisional agenda (Cuban item).¹⁴¹ The draft resolution would further have the Assembly resolve that, pending a decision by the General Assembly on the report of the Special Committee, the representative of the National Government of China shall be seated in the General Assembly with the same rights as other representatives.

The representative of Australia proposed an amendment (A/1371) to the Canadian draft resolution, by which the Special Committee would be constituted of seven Members nominated by the President and confirmed by the Assembly. This amendment was accepted by the representative of Canada.

The representative of the USSR stated that the first point which the General Assembly ought to settle in connexion with the Indian draft resolution was whether the presence in the General Assembly of the representative of the Kuomintang group purporting to represent China was proper. He maintained that only a State Member of the United Nations was entitled to appoint its representatives to the Organization and to provide them with necessary credentials. This, he stated, was clearly provided for under rule 27 of the General Assembly's rules of procedure which stated that "the credentials shall be issued either by the head of the State or Government or by the Minister of Foreign Affairs". It was inadmissible that the General Assembly should be attended by persons who did not represent their country and who belonged to the remnants of a political regime which had been overthrown in the country. However, an attempt was being made to accord representation to the Kuomintang group in China which had not the slightest political, legal or moral right to represent China. He therefore asked that the Assembly first consider his draft resolution which would recommend the exclusion of the Kuomintang representative.

Speaking in support of the Indian draft resolution, the representative of Yugoslavia stated that to recognize as the Government of China a political group which in reality did not hold power in that country was both illegal and politically inexpedient. There could hardly be any doubt that the delegation of the People's Republic of China must take its place in the United Nations. To postpone the matter or to link it with other controversial questions would, in his opinion, tend to aggravate the whole international situation.

He further said that Yugoslavia's position on this question was entirely independent of its attitude towards the foreign policy of the Government of the People's Republic of China or its policy with regard to Yugoslavia.

The representative of China stated that he represented the only legal Government in China based on a constitution passed by the representatives of the Chinese people. After briefly outlining the achievements of that Government in the political and economic fields and its efforts in resisting Japan's aggression the representative of China analysed the origin and character of the Peking regime, which he said had been brought into power by the Soviet Union. He quoted General Chu Teh, the Communist Commander-in-Chief, to the effect that the victory of the Chinese democratic revolution was inseparable from Soviet aid. Mao Tse-tung had himself defined his policy on 1 July 1949 as alliance with the Soviet Union, with the new democratic countries of Europe and with the proletariat and masses of the people in other countries to form an international united front.

Referring to the Korean issue, the representative of China said that the radio and the press under the control of the Peking regime had been trying to impose the idea that the action in Korea was a war of aggression by the United States.. The fourth report of the Unified Command in Korea, it was stated, (S/1796) showed beyond doubt that the Chinese communist regime had substantially aided North Korea. He denied that the communist regime had effective control of China, stating that even at that moment one million guerrillas were fighting the communists on the mainland. He said that it would be an endorsement of totalitarian despotism to accept the Peking regime into the United Nations as representative of 450,000,000 people.

The representative of the United States called upon the Assembly to vote at once on the Indian draft resolution and to vote it down. He said that he took his position on the sound and unanswerable ground of the need for orderly procedure and the overwhelming necessity of getting on to the organization of the Assembly and the transaction of orderly business.

Some measure of the consequences and difficulties of the question, he stated, was given by the fact that 43 States represented in the Assembly recognized the Government which it was proposed to eject and sixteen recognized the regime which it was proposed to seat. This was a step of the greatest importance to all governments because it would create precedents. Such a decision could not be taken without full consideration. During this session, he stated, there would be ample opportunity to consider the criteria which should be used in determining which of the two claimants should be seated in the United Nations.

The representative of the USSR, supported by the representatives of Poland, Czechoslovakia and the Ukrainian SSR, maintained that no one could any longer doubt the real character of the Kuomintang clique, which had arrogated to itself the right to speak on behalf of the 450,000,000 people of China who had thrown them out. The representative of the USSR cited Mr. Acheson's introduction to the United States White Paper of August 1949 and his statement of 12 January 1950. Describing the Kuomintangists, the former document stated that in the opinion of many observers, they had sold official duties and responsibilities, become corrupt and so on. In the 12 January statement, Mr. Acheson had recognized that Chinese people had deprived the Chiang Kai-shek regime of support.

The representative of the USSR then quoted—with apologies to the President for the language of the quotation—from the papers of General Stilwell, former Commander-in-Chief of United States forces in China. General Stilwell had described the Kuomintang group as a "gang of thugs whose sole purpose was to clutch power and maintain their machine in power". The leaders, General Stilwell was stated to have said, thought only of money, influence, jobs and intrigues. The USSR representative therefore urged the adoption of his draft resolution inviting the representatives of the Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China.

The representative of India stated his Government had recognized the Central Government of China toward the end of 1949 and had ever since followed the logical consequences of that recognition. India's advocacy of the claims of new China to be represented in the United Nations was antecedent to and in no way connected with the Korean conflict. India had recognized the new Government because to the best of its knowledge it was a sound and stable Government. It had followed the criteria of recognition in international law: "habitual obedience of the bulk of the population with a reasonable expectancy of permanence." As Dr. Lauterpacht put it: "The bulk of the practice of States, at least that of Great Britain and the United States . . . was based on the principle of effectiveness thus conceived."¹⁴²

Further, it seemed self-evident that the Central Government of the People's Republic of China was the only Government that could discharge China's obligations under the Charter. It was illogical and inconsistent to demand fulfilment of obligations while denying rights. There was a double fallacy, he contended, in the objection that it was impossible to seat a "puppet Communist Government." He said that according to his information, that Government was a national coalition representing all sections of the nation, including some members of the Kuomintang, pledged to work a common programme of democratic advance. In his Government's view it was an independent Government. He then quoted two articles, published in The Times of London on 28 and 29 June 1950. The writer, speaking of Chinese communism said:

It is because it is a Chinese movement, seeking to reform conditions in China, that it has gained such wide support. Few of its followers are really interested in foreign nations or their fate. The mass support of all classes which the regime enjoys is not given to theoretical communism but to the practical programme of reform and reconstruction which the party is now carrying out. The Administration, confined in the executive posts to party members is impeccably honest; the army is admirably disciplined; there is no nepotism; efficiency and drive have replaced sloth and indifference. Intellectuals and experts, non-communists in their own views, have been asked to work for the regime in order to reconstruct China, and find a congenial atmosphere in which the expert is appreciated and his advice accepted.

But, he said, even assuming that the new Government in China was a communist Government, there was room for it in the United Nations since that Organization was open to different systems of Government, with different policies and ideals. So long, he concluded, as a nation of 475,000,000 remained outside a world organization, that organization could not be regarded as fully representative. For those reasons he commended to the Assembly his draft resolution.

The representative of Syria suggested that, in order to give time for the consideration of this question, voting on the draft resolutions should be postponed and the credentials committee should be immediately appointed. The General Assembly could take a final decision after the credentials had been presented and all the representatives recognized as the presumptive representatives to participate in the session.

The representative of Australia adduced four arguments against the Indian and the USSR draft resolutions. The first was that the Indian proposal made allegations of fact which the Assembly was not in a position to determine: reasonable expectancy of permanence, control of territory, and command of the obedience of people. From the statements of the Chinese and the USSR representatives there was, obviously, a dispute on those facts and this dispute must be settled first by an appropriate body.

But, he asserted, even if the allegations were correct, the fact that a nation was controlled by a particular Government, or that it commanded obedience of its people, or that it was the only such functioning government would not be sufficient to justify admission. Hitler's regime during the war could have satisfied those criteria and so could North Korea if it had succeeded in over-running the South. It would be necessary to determine both the facts and the criteria to be applied. He therefore supported the Canadian draft resolution for a special committee with the qualification that the members of the committee should be elected by the Assembly and not appointed by the President. Finally, the representative of Australia urged the Assembly to follow the well-known juridical maxim: not only was it important that justice was done; it was equally necessary that justice should appear to be done.

The representative of Sweden stated that he would support the Indian draft resolution on the ground that the People's Republic had control over nearly all the territory of China and therefore was the only de facto government of the country. No government was obliged to recognize the situation de jure but it was an unequivocal fact that the Chinese nation was no longer represented by the Nationalist Government, now residing in Formosa.

The representative of Cuba explained that the agenda item his delegation had proposed¹⁴³ was of a general character with regard to representation. It did not refer or intend to refer specifically to China. In that case, however, it could be included within the general rules which the Assembly might adopt. As to the proposals on Chinese representation the representative of Cuba supported Syria's suggestion of appointing the credentials committee first and dealing with the draft resolutions later. At that time, he felt, it would be opportune to adopt the Canadian proposal for a special committee.

In reply to the statement made by the representative of Australia, the representative of the Ukrainian SSR stated that the United Nations included in its Membership all nations who through their joint efforts, had undertaken to fight for and to establish lasting peace. It appeared to him that the representative of Australia did not share that purpose, if, in violation of the Charter, he wanted to keep out nations whose make-up and ideologies were different from that of his country. The People's Republic of China, he stated, elected by the Chinese people and representing their vital interests, had in a very short time gone a long way on the road to economic and social reform. That was enough proof that it was a people's government. He stated further, that his Government, like the governments of other countries, could not tolerate the presence of representatives of the Kuomintang group in the Assembly. He would, therefore, support the two draft resolutions presented by the USSR.

The representative of Peru stated that the Assembly could not, as proposed by India, assume a distinct juridical competence on the matter. The basic question, in his view, was to know which Government legitimately and effectively exercised the personality of China and the answer depended upon the opinions of the government which had relations with China. Forty-three Member States still did not think that a legal change had occurred in the legal personality of China.

The various proposals were then put to the vote. The Syrian proposal to postpone a decision was rejected by 21 votes to 16, with 13 abstentions. The Indian draft resolution (A/1365) was voted upon by roll-call and rejected by 33 votes to 16, with 10 abstentions. The voting was as follows:

In favour: Afghanistan, Burma, Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, India, Israel, Netherlands, Norway, Pakistan, Poland, Sweden, Ukrainian SSR, USSR, United Kingdom and Yugoslavia

Against: Australia, Belgium, Bolivia, Chile, China, Colombia, Costa Rica, Cuba, Dominican Republic, El Salvador, Ethiopia, Greece, Haiti, Honduras, Iceland, Iran, Iraq, Liberia, Luxembourg, Mexico, New Zealand, Nicaragua, Panama, Paraguay, Peru, Philippines, Thailand, Turkey, Union of South Africa, United States, Uruguay, Venezuela

Abstaining: Argentina, Canada, Ecuador, Egypt, France, Guatemala, Lebanon, Saudi Arabia, Syria, Yemen

The Canadian draft resolution (A/1368) was voted on in two parts:

First part, as amended by Australia: adopted by 38 votes to 6, with 11 abstentions; second part, adopted by 42 votes to 8, with 6 abstentions.

USSR draft resolution (A/1369): rejected by 38 votes to 10, with 8 abstentions.

Second USSR draft resolution (A/1370): rejected by 37 votes to 11, with 8 abstentions.

The text of resolution (490(V)) adopted by the Assembly follows:

The General Assembly,

Taking note of differences of view concerning the representation of China in the United Nations,

Establishes a Special Committee consisting of seven Members nominated by the President and confirmed by the General Assembly to consider the question of Chinese representation and to report back, with recommendations, to the present session of the General Assembly, after the Assembly shall have considered item 62 of the provisional agenda (item proposed by Cuba);

Resolves that, pending a decision by the General Assembly on the report of this Special Committee, the representatives of the National Government of China shall be seated in the General Assembly with the same rights as other representatives.

c. APPOINTMENT OF THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE

On 12 December, the General Assembly, on the nomination of the President, elected by secret ballot the following States Members to serve on the Special Committee: Canada, Ecuador, India, Iraq, Mexico, the Philippines and Poland.

The Special Committee met on 15 December and elected the representative of India as its Chairman. After some discussion it decided, by 3 votes to 1, with 2 abstentions to leave the convening of the next meeting to the discretion of its Chairman. No further meeting of the Special Committee was held in 1950.

2. Recognition by the United Nations of the Representation of a Member State

By a letter (A/1292) dated 19 July 1950, Cuba requested the Secretary-General to place the question of the recognition by the United Nations of the representation of a Member State on the provisional agenda of the fifth session of the General Assembly. An explanatory memorandum (A/1308) was transmitted to the Secretary-General on 26 July.

The memorandum included a summary of the consideration of the same question by the Security Council and its Committee of Experts in January and February 1950.¹⁴⁴ The representative of Cuba had at that time stated that only the General Assembly or a subsidiary organ established by it was legally authorized to study or promote identical solutions for all organs of the United Nations concerning questions affecting the functioning of the Organization as a whole. The Committee of Experts had agreed on the desirability of establishing some uniform procedure which could be adopted by all organs of the United Nations, and the majority of its members had agreed that the question under consideration was of such a nature that it should be dealt with by the General Assembly. The item proposed, it was explained, referred not only to the formal problem of credentials, but to the question that arose concerning the legality of the representation of a Member State in the United Nations, when the latter had to decide which Government had the right to represent that State in the Organization.

On 6 September, the Secretary-General transmitted to the Members of the General Assembly, for their information, the text of a resolution (A/1344) adopted on 30 May 1950 by the fifth session of the General Conference of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization, forwarded to him on 1 June by the Director-General of that organization. The resolution expressed the wish that the United Nations should adopt general criteria to permit uniform and practical settlement of the problem of representation on United Nations organs and organizations.

a. DISCUSSION IN THE AD Hoc POLITICAL COMMITTEE

The General Assembly, at its 285th plenary meeting on 26 September, referred this question to the Ad Hoc Political Committee which considered it at its 18th to 24th meetings inclusive, and again at its 57th to 60th meetings inclusive, held on 20, 21, 23, 25 and 26 October and 27 and 28 November.

Cuba (A/AC.38/L.6) and the United Kingdom (A/AC.38/L.21) submitted draft resolutions in connexion with the item. The preamble of the Cuban proposal (A/AC.38/L.21) expressed the view:

(1) that questions regarding the representation of a Member State in the United Nations could not be definitively settled under the present rules and that there was danger that the organs of the United Nations might reach conflicting decisions;

(2) that in the interest of the proper functioning of the United Nations there should be uniformity in the procedure applied in the settlement of such questions;

(3) that by virtue of its composition, the General Assembly was the only organ of the United Nations in a position to express the general opinion of all Member States in matters affecting the functioning of the Organization as a whole. The first operative paragraph of the draft recommended that questions arising in connexion with the representation of a Member State in the United Nations should be decided in the light of the following:

(a) effective authority over the national territory; (b) the general consent of the population; (c) ability and willingness to achieve the Purpose of the Charter, to observe its Principles and to fulfill the international obligations of the State; and (d) respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms. The second operative paragraph provided that when it was necessary to take a decision regarding the legitimacy of the representation of a Member State, the matter was to be referred to the General Assembly for decision. The third operative paragraph declared that such decisions taken by the General Assembly were not to affect the direct relations of individual Member States with the State, the representation of which had been the subject of such decision. The fourth operative paragraph requested the Secretary-General to transmit the resolution to the organs and specialized agencies of the United Nations for appropriate action.

In submitting his draft resolution, the representative of Cuba explained that the problem before the United Nations was to find a criterion and a method of procedure whereby it could decide on the capacity or right of a Government to represent a Member State within the Organization. None of the rules of procedure of the Security Council indicated what was to be done when a question arose as to which was the recognized or true Government of any particular State. The Charter did not contain any provision in that connexion, nor did the rules of procedure of the main organs lay down any rules whereby such a problem could be solved. The chief purpose of the Cuban draft, he said, was to set forth the basic principles according to which the question of the legal representation of governments should be solved. The draft, he pointed out, made it clear that the decision the General Assembly might take bound only the United Nations. It would not affect diplomatic recognition by Member States.

He enumerated the conditions set forth in his draft resolution which would make possible, in his opinion, an objective decision regarding the capacity or right of a government legitimately to represent a Member State in the United Nations. The first condition, he said, concerned the government's effective authority over the national territory. That condition was complemented by the second, which was the general consent of the population. A third was the government's ability and willingness to achieve the purposes of the Charter, to observe its principles and to fulfil the international obligations of the State. Willingness to co-operate with the United Nations and to observe its principles, he asserted, was an obviously essential condition for any government claiming to represent any Member State. However, the government should also be capable of such co-operation and capable of fulfilling the State's other international obligations. The final condition was that in the exercise of its authority the State should respect human rights and fundamental freedoms. Protection of those rights, he argued, was one of the fundamental purposes of the United Nations and it had, therefore, seemed obvious that it should be taken into account when deciding the legitimacy of the representation of a Member State.

The preamble of the United Kingdom proposal (A/AC.38/L.21) stated that:

(1) There was no uniformly agreed principle for determining the right of the government of a Member State to represent it and that there was a danger that conflicting decisions on this subject might be reached by the various organs of the United Nations and in the specialized agencies;

(2) In the interest of the proper functioning of the Organization there should be uniformity in the criteria to be applied in determining whether a given government was entitled to represent a Member State or when the representation of a Member State was challenged in any organ of the United Nations;

(3) In virtue of its composition, the General Assembly was the only organ of the United Nations in which consideration could be given to the views of all Member States in matters affecting the functioning of the Organization as a whole. The first operative paragraph recommended that where the question of the representation of a Member State arose in consequence of internal processes or changes which had taken place in that State, the right of a Government to represent the Member State concerned in the United Nations should be recognized if that Government exercised effective control and authority over all or nearly all the national territory, and had the obedience of the bulk of the population of that territory, in such a way that this control, authority and obedience appeared to be of a permanent character. The second operative paragraph provided that when any question arose regarding the right of a Government to represent a Member State in the United Nations, the matter was to be referred to the General Assembly for consideration, but without thereby precluding action by any other organ of the United Nations which was called upon to take a decision on the matter during the period before the Assembly met. The third operative paragraph recommended that the view taken by the General Assembly concerning the right of a Government to represent a Member State should be acted upon by Member States in other organs of the United Nations and in the specialized agencies. The fourth operative paragraph declared that decisions taken by the General Assembly in accordance with the resolution were not of themselves to affect the direct relations of individual Member States with the State the representation of which had been the subject of such decisions. The fifth operative paragraph requested the Secretary-General to transmit the resolution to the organs and specialized agencies of the United Nations for appropriate action.

The representative of the United Kingdom explained that it was essential that some universal, factual and objective test which implied no moral or political approval of the government concerned or of the people which it controlled or of its policies or actions should be applied. In the circumstances, the most convenient and logical test was that the government to be recognized internationally as the government of the State concerned was that which controlled all or nearly all of the territory of the State and had the allegiance of the overwhelming majority of its population. That criterion, he said, was objective and coherent. It was important that the United Nations adopt some such test, since agreement was unlikely on any other basis. Sharp differences of opinion would arise on criteria such as respect for human rights, willingness to fulfil international obligations and consent of the people governed. The objective test of effective control, he asserted, would make possible almost unanimous agreement. All others were subjective in varying degrees and could lead only to divergences of view and of action. Refusal to allow a government exercising effective control to represent a State in the United Nations meant that the State was unrepresented and could not enjoy its rights as a Member. Such action, he argued, was illegal and contrary to the Charter.

Various amendments to the two proposals were submitted, mostly with a view to making the criteria to be applied more detailed. Thus, the representative of Uruguay submitted an amendment (A/AC.38/L.11) to the Cuban draft designed to add the following criterion: effective authority of a government should be acquired by means which are in accordance with international law. This provision, the representative of Uruguay explained, would preclude recognition of any government established with the illegal intervention of another State. His amendment would also make it clear that an Assembly decision would be required only in the event of disputes regarding the representation of a State.

The representative of China also submitted an amendment (A/AC.38/L.22) to the Cuban draft. This amendment, inter alia, provided for the addition of a paragraph which would make it clear that the recognition of a new representation of a Member State should not be premature and should be guided strictly by the principles and provisions of the Charter of the United Nations and the Stimson Doctrine of Non-Recognition.¹⁴⁵ Another new paragraph would make it clear that effective authority over a national territory was to be established without the intervention of any other State, and that such authority was not to be the result of foreign aggression, either direct or indirect.

The representative of Venezuela submitted an amendment (A/AC.38/L.24) to the United Kingdom draft, which provided for, among other things, the addition of a new criterion beside that of effective control over a national territory; namely, the expressed declaration of the Government concerned, to fulfil willingly its international obligations.

At the 20th meeting of the Ad Hoc Political Committee on 23 October, the representative of the Dominican Republic submitted a draft resolution (A/AC.38/L.23), calling upon the General Assembly:

(1) to request the International Law Commission to study the legal aspects of the item and to submit the results of such study in time for inclusion in the agenda

¹⁴⁵ United States Secretary of State Stimson in Jan. 1932 addressed notes to both the Government of the Chinese Republic and the Imperial Japanese Government, notifying them that the United States Government "cannot admit the legality of any situation de facto nor does it intend to recognize any treaty or agreement entered into between those Governments, or agents thereof, which may impair the treaty rights of the United States or its citizens in China, including those which relate to the sovereignty, the independence, or the territorial and administrative integrity of the Republic of China, or to the international policy relative to China, commonly known as the open door policy; and that it does not intend to recognize any situation, treaty or agreement which may be brought about by means contrary to the covenants and obligations of the Pact of Paris of August 27, 1928, to which Treaty both China and Japan, as well as the United States, are parties". This is referred to as the Stimson Doctrine of Non-Recognition. (Foreign Relations of the United States, 1932, Vol. III: The Far East, p. 8.)

of the sixth regular session of the General Assembly; and

(2) to send to the International Law Commission the records of the meetings of the Committee dealing with the subject, the draft resolutions submitted, and all other documents which might provide the International Law Commission with useful information, and to request the Secretary-General to take the necessary action on this resolution.

At the 23rd meeting on 26 October, the United Kingdom submitted a proposal (A/AC.38/L.25) to the effect that, if it should be decided to refer the matter to an outside body, the latter should be the International Court of Justice, to which (or to the International Law Commission if reference were made to that body), the following questions should be put:

(1) If, in consequence of internal changes or processes which have taken place in a State a Member of the United Nations, there is established in that State a Government which exercises effective control and authority over all or nearly all the national territory, and has the obedience of the bulk of its population, in such a manner that this control, authority and obedience appear to be of a permanent character, is there an obligation, according to the accepted principles of international law, to recognize the Government concerned as being entitled to represent that Member State?

(2) If the answer to the first question is in the negative, what are the circumstances (if any) in which such an obligation can be regarded as existing?

During the general debate, various representatives including, among others, Paraguay and the Union of South Africa, expressed doubts concerning the advisability of attempting to adopt various criteria that had been proposed. Some representatives, including those of Australia, Belgium and Thailand, held that every case should be decided on its merits; others, including those of India and the United Kingdom, declared that the only criterion universally accepted in international law was that of effective control and authority over the territory of the State concerned.

The representatives of Costa Rica, El Salvador, Honduras and Uruguay, among others, supported the Cuban draft resolution. They considered the question important, because revolutions frequently brought about changes in governments and consequent alterations in the representation of States in the various organs of the United Nations. The United Nations, they said, had not set up any machinery for dealing with such cases. On the other hand, if each organ were free to decide for itself in the matter, the Organization might find itself faced with conflicting decisions. The argument that each organ of the United Nations was free to decide upon the validity of the credentials of its members, in accordance with its rules of procedure, seemed applicable only to the process of ascertaining whether those credentials had been properly prepared. When it was a case of deciding on the representation of a Member State after a change of government, the General Assembly should take the decision. They considered the Cuban draft to be in perfect harmony with the principles of the Charter. It was in fact quite normal that, before recognizing the representatives of a new government, the United Nations should make sure that the government in question exercised effective authority over the national territory and that its authority was based, not on the obedience of the population, but upon its general consent. The ability and willingness of a government to achieve the purposes of the Charter, to observe its principles and to fulfil the international obligations of the State, they argued, must also be taken into account.

The representatives of Burma, India, Norway, Venezuela and Yugoslavia, among others, supported the United Kingdom draft resolution. They thought that any government sufficiently stable to continue to function as the permanent and established government of a country was the spokesman for that country's people and could therefore claim to represent it on outside bodies. A change of government need not break the continuity of a State. Through a stable government, the United Nations could come into contact with the people of a State and vice versa. Consequently, the problem which arose was whether the government of the State in question exercised effective authority over the territory and was obeyed by the majority of the population. In their opinion, if the prerequisites of stability and permanence existed, the question of the recognition of representation should ultimately be decided by the General Assembly. The United Kingdom draft, they argued, provided the most just and equitable solution of the problem by suggesting a realistic basis for solution of concrete cases.

Representatives of the Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, Poland, the Ukrainian SSR and the USSR criticized the Cuban draft resolution. They argued that the Cuban draft contravened the practices of the United Nations in the matter. Every organ of the United Nations, they said, was fully empowered under its rules of procedure to decide independently as to the powers of representatives appointed by the governments exercising authority in their countries. No other questions, much less any questions relating to the domestic affairs of States should be taken into account when the question of representation was under discussion. They asserted that the Cuban draft suggesting that the General Assembly should be given the right in every case to decide as to the legitimacy of the representation of Member States in the United Nations infringed the sovereign rights of people to self-determination and therefore was in contradiction with the Charter. Attempts to make representation in the United Nations contingent upon domestic conditions, they asserted, were also illegal and a violation of the Charter.

In the opinion of the representative of Yugoslavia, the Cuban draft resolution complicated the question by introducing a series of criteria likely to impede the recognition of new governments in the future and which would to some extent involve coercion, preventive sanctions and interference in the domestic affairs of States.

The representative of the USSR declared that the draft resolutions submitted by Cuba and the United Kingdom were fundamentally analogous. He said that both had the same purpose, namely to establish certain criteria—dangerous criteria—for the representation of Member States in the United Nations.

At its 24th meeting on 26 October, the Committee decided, by 29 votes to 6, with 17 abstentions, to establish a Sub-Committee to consider the item in the light of all the proposals, amendments, suggestions and views presented in the course of debate. The Sub-Committee was composed of the representatives of Australia, Belgium, China, Cuba, Denmark, the Dominican Republic, Egypt, France, India, Turkey, the United Kingdom, the United States, Uruguay and Venezuela. It held nine meetings between 27 October and 15 November and agreed on a draft resolution which it adopted by 8 votes to 4, with 2 abstentions.

The draft resolution adopted by the Sub-Committee for consideration by the Ad Hoc Political Committee recommended that whenever more than one authority claimed to be the government entitled to represent a Member State in the United Nations and that question became the subject of controversy in the United Nations, the question should be considered in the light of the Principles and Purposes of the Charter and the circumstances of each case. The following factors were to be taken into consideration in determining any such question: (1) the extent to which the new authority exercised effective control over the territory of the Member State concerned and was generally accepted by the population; (2) the willingness of that authority to accept responsibility for the carrying out by the Member State of its obligations under the Charter; and

(3) the extent to which that authority had been established through internal processes in the Member State. When any such question arose, it should be considered by the General Assembly, or by its Interim Committee if the Assembly were not in session.

At the 57th meeting of the Ad Hoc Political Committee on 27 November, the Rapporteur of the Sub-Committee presented its report (A/AC.38/L.45) and the draft resolution adopted by it. The report was considered by the Committee at its 57th-60th meetings, held on 27 and 28 November.

Various amendments were submitted during the discussion of the Sub-Committee's draft resolution, including one submitted by Egypt (A/AC.38/L.54), proposing the deletion of the factors enumerated in the proposal.

Belgium submitted an amendment (A/AC.38/L.50) calling for: (1) the deletion of paragraph 2 of the Sub-Committee's draft, which related to the consideration by the General Assembly, or by the Interim Committee, of the question regarding representation; and (2) the removal of any reference to "decisions" of the General Assembly or the Interim Committee in paragraphs 3 and 4 of the draft. The representative of Belgium explained that paragraph 2 of the draft was superfluous because its general intention was already covered by paragraph 3, which allowed the General Assembly, or, failing that, the Interim Committee, to take up the matter in case of need. He also declared that as the General Assembly or the Interim Committee could not judge except for themselves, their conclusions — when considered in relation to other United Nations organs — did not have the force of decisions. It was therefore better at that point to speak of the "attitude" or "position" of the General Assembly or the Interim Committee.

The USSR submitted an oral amendment calling for the deletion of the reference to the Interim Committee.

Mexico (A/AC.38/L.53) and Argentina (A/AC.38/L.56) also submitted amendments to the Committee's draft but later withdrew them.

The representatives of Bolivia, Canada, Chile, China and the United States, among others, supported the draft resolution submitted by the Sub-Committee. They thought that the draft resolution defined a body of guiding principles and remedied an important omission, while following the principles of the Charter and of international law. It was an objective proposal made at a time when the problem of the representation of a Member State had to be solved. It in no way implied either an intervention in the domestic affairs of a State or a violation of Article 7 with regard to the competence of the various organs of the United Nations in connexion with representation, as it was confined to a recommendation to be submitted to those organs for study. The United Nations, they said, ought to be as representative as possible; hence, it ought to see that governments which effectively represented the populations of the Member States took their seats on it. Under the draft resolution the United Nations would be able to achieve that truly representative character. They stated that the draft resolution presented by the Sub-Committee represented a satisfactory compromise solution of a complex and controversial political and legal issue.

The representatives of the Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, Poland, the Ukrainian SSR and the USSR opposed the Sub-Committee's draft resolution. They emphasized the fact that there was no need for a special decision regarding the representation of Member States, since the provisions of the Charter and the rules of procedure of various organs were sufficiently clear on that point. In accordance with the practice followed by the United Nations with regard to representation, each organ, they said, acting within its rules of procedure, recognized the credentials of representatives of a Member State appointed by the government which exercised real authority in the territory of that Member State. They argued that the Sub-Committee's draft resolution, under the pretext of establishing a uniform procedure, if adopted, would tend to legitimize the intervention of the General Assembly in the domestic affairs of Members of the United Nations. Moreover, if that draft were accepted, they said, it would be possible to prevent a Member from taking part in the work of the Organization, in defiance of the provisions of the Charter, of international law and of the rules of procedure of the Organization. They stated that the draft resolution illegally extended the rights and competence of the General Assembly and of the Interim Committee—which was an illegal organ—in order to enable them to interfere in the internal affairs of Member States. The object of the draft resolution, they asserted, was to prevent the Government of the People's Republic of China from taking part in the work of the United Nations. They were of the opinion that the "representative of the Kuomintang group" should be excluded from all United Nations organs and that the representative of the Government of the People's Republic of China should be admitted to them. Any attempt to lay down new tests for representation, they were convinced, would inevitably delay solution of the problem of the representation of the People's Republic of China.

Other representatives criticized certain aspects of the draft resolution. Thus, for example, the representatives of Argentina, Colombia, Sweden, Turkey and Venezuela, among others, criticized that part of the draft resolution dealing with the factors to be considered when the representation of a Member State was in issue. They said that effective control of territory was undoubtedly an objective factor, but the same could not be said of the agreement of the population, which could not be established without previous inquiry. Such an inquiry would amount to an intervention in matters essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of a State and be a breach of the provisions of Article 2, paragraph 7, of the Charter.

The representative of the Netherlands felt that the draft resolution lacked clarity and therefore would not advance the solution of the matter.

The representative of France asserted that the draft resolution had been the product of differing and often contradictory concepts. It succeeded in stating some of the principles involved in the problem, but it did so in vague and equivocal terms. It provided no uniform machinery applicable to all cases; consequently, the question remained unresolved.

The representative of Yugoslavia stated that he could not accept the Sub-Committee's compromise draft resolution because it was not clear and some of its provisions would permit interference in the internal affairs of States.

India could not accept the references to the Interim Committee. India stated that the General Assembly, not the Interim Committee of the Assembly, should decide on the representation of a Member State. No mention had been made of the Interim Committee in the Charter, and that organ, therefore, could not be regarded as representing all the Members of the United Nations.

Some representatives expressed their intention of abstaining on the vote of the Sub-Committee's draft resolution. The representative of the United Kingdom stated that he did not consider the draft satisfactory, but it had been sufficiently amended to permit his delegation to abstain from voting. Denmark observed that it seemed doubtful whether the draft would obtain general consent. In those circumstances, it would abstain from voting if the draft resolution were voted upon in its existing form. Pakistan also stated that even if certain amendments to the draft resolution were adopted, it would probably abstain from voting for it.

The Ad Hoc Political Committee, at its 60th meeting on 28 November, voted on the Sub-Committee's draft resolution and the amendments to it. The Belgian and Egyptian amendments were adopted by varying votes; the USSR amendment was rejected by 35 votes to 6, with 11 abstentions. The draft resolution of the Sub-Committee, as amended, was adopted as a whole by 29 votes to 7, with 15 abstentions. A draft resolution (A/AC.38/L.55), calling for the study of the legal aspects of the question by the International Law Commission, submitted by the representative of the Dominican Republic at the Committee's 60th meeting, was withdrawn after the vote.

b. CONSIDERATION BY THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY

The report (A/1578 & Add.1) of the Ad Hoc Political Committee was considered by the General Assembly at its 325th plenary meeting on 14 December. An Egyptian amendment (A/1582) restoring the paragraph deleted by the Committee to the effect that when a question concerning representation arose, it should be considered by the General Assembly, or by the Interim Committee if the General Assembly were not in session, was adopted by 25 votes to 10, with 8 abstentions. The draft resolution, as amended, was adopted by 36 votes to 6, with 9 abstentions.

Following the adoption of the resolution, the representatives of Czechoslovakia, Poland, and the USSR declared that it was unacceptable to them. They stated that the whole question of representation had been brought up to deprive the People's Republic of China of its legitimate place in United Nations organs. The establishment of criteria was intended to make it possible, when the question of the recognition of the representation of a given Member State arose, to make particular demands upon that State, and to deprive it of its legitimate rights under the Charter. This would amount to illegal expulsion of the Member State from the Organization. The use of such criteria would inevitably lead to arbitrary and discriminatory measures in respect of certain Member States, and would open the way to interference in the internal affairs of Members. Stating that there was no need for the establishment of any criteria whatsoever, or for any uniformity in practice, these representatives maintained that such problems should be decided independently by each organ of the United Nations in accordance with its own rules of procedure. Recognition should be given only to the representatives appointed by the governments which exercised effective power in given Member States, since only such governments could carry out the obligations of the Charter.

The representative of China, explaining why he had voted for the resolution, declared that although the resolution adopted fell somewhat short of the original draft submitted by Cuba in the Ad Hoc Political Committee and also of the draft submitted by the Sub-Committee, it nevertheless gave primary importance to the principles and purposes of the Charter as guiding considerations in the determination of the question of representation, and it established an appropriate machinery for the determination of such questions.

The text of the resolution (396(V)) read:

The General Assembly,

Considering that difficulties may arise regarding the representation of a Member State in the United Nations and that there is a risk that conflicting decisions may be reached by its various organs,

Considering that it is in the interest of the proper functioning of the Organization that there should be uniformity in the procedure applicable whenever more than one authority claims to be the government entitled to represent a Member State in the United Nations, and this question becomes the subject of controversy in the United Nations,

Considering that, in virtue of its composition, the General Assembly is the organ of the United Nations in which consideration can best be given to the views of all Member States in matters affecting the functioning of the Organization as a whole,

1. Recommends that, whenever more than one authority claims to be the government entitled to represent a Member State in the United Nations and this question becomes the subject of controversy in the United Nations, the question should be considered in the light of the Purposes and Principles of the Charter and the circumstances of each case;

2. Recommends that, when any such question arises, it should be considered by the General Assembly, or by the Interim Committee if the General Assembly is not in session;

3. Recommends that the attitude adopted by the General Assembly or its Interim Committee concerning any such question should be taken into account in other organs of the United Nations and in the specialized agencies;

4. Declares that the attitude adopted by the General Assembly or its Interim Committee concerning any such question shall not of itself affect the direct relations of individual Member States with the State concerned;

5. Requests the Secretary-General to transmit the present resolution to the other organs of the United Nations and to the specialized agencies for such action as may be appropriate.

R. MATTERS BROUGHT TO THE ATTENTION OF THE SECURITY COUNCIL BUT NOT PLACED ON THE AGENDA

1. Cases Submitted by Haiti and the Dominican Republic to the Organization of American States

At a special meeting of the Council of the Organization of American States held on 6 January 1950, the Council took cognizance of a note presented on 3 January by the delegation of Haiti requesting that the Organ of Consultation be convoked in conformity with the Inter-American Treaty of Reciprocal Assistance, and also of a note presented at the meeting by the delegation of the Dominican Republic. The Council decided at that meeting to constitute itself provisionally as the Organ of Consultation and to appoint a committee to investigate on the spot the events, and the antecedents thereof, mentioned in the notes of Haiti and the Dominican Republic.

On 13 March 1950, the Investigating Committee reported to the Organ of Consultation its findings and recommendations relative to the petition of the Dominican Republic concerning the same situation in the Caribbean resulting from the support given by some governmental authorities to revolutionary movements and exile groups, with particular reference to the acquisition of armaments by groups in Cuba and Guatemala for the purpose of attacking the territory of the Dominican Republic. On 8 April the Council of the Organization adopted several decisions on the basis of the report of the Committee of Investigation declaring, inter alia, that the danger to international peace that might have arisen from the events affecting relations between Haiti and the Dominican Republic had fortunately been dispelled and that there had formerly existed within Cuba and Guatemala armed groups animated by the purpose of overthrowing by force the Government of the Dominican Republic; and resolving to appoint a committee of five to acquaint itself with the manner in which the Council's resolutions were carried out and to assist the interested parties in complying with the resolutions.

Those activities of the Council of the Organization of American States were outlined in a letter (S/1492) dated 23 May 1950 from its Chairman to the Secretary-General enclosing the report of the Investigating Committee of the Organ of Consultation and the Council's decisions. The Secretary-General informed the Security Council of these activities.

By letter dated 10 July 1950 (S/1607), the Secretary-General of the Organization of American States transmitted to the Secretary-General of the United Nations, for the information of the Security Council, the report submitted to the Governments of the States members of the Organization of American States on 30 June 1950 by the Special Committee for the Caribbeans.

2. Panel for Inquiry and Conciliation

At the 199th plenary meeting of the General Assembly on 28 April 1949, resolution 268 D (III)¹⁴⁶ was adopted providing for the establishment of a list of persons deemed to be well fitted to serve as members of commissions of inquiry or conciliation. In accordance with article 2 of the annex to that resolution, the Secretary-General, in letters dated 27 March (S/1476) and 3 May 1950 (S/1476/Add.1) to the President of the Security Council, communicated lists of persons who had been nominated by Governments of Member States for inclusion in the panel.

In a note dated 8 December 1950, the Secretary-General communicated to the members of the Security Council a consolidated list of the persons who had, by that date, been designated.

Biographical information on these individuals has been made available for consultation in the Department of Security Council Affairs of the Secretariat.

3. Complaint by the USSR against Greece

By letter dated 29 August 1950 (S/1735), the representative of the USSR, in his capacity as the President of the Security Council, drew the attention of the members of the Council to two communications, one from the All-Union Council of Trade Unions (USSR) and the other from relatives of Greek political prisoners appealing for cessation of terror against Greek democrats, of mass executions, and of the inhuman plan for the transfer of prisoners suffering from tuberculosis to islands where elementary medical care did not exist with a view to bringing about their destruction. He expressed the hope that the Council and the General Assembly would adopt a decision to save the lives of these people who had waged a courageous struggle against Hitlerite invaders.

On 31 August, the item, "The unceasing terrorism and mass executions in Greece", proposed by the USSR was placed on the provisional agenda of the 493rd meeting of the Council.

Citing telegrams and letters (S/1735/Corr.1; S/1737), which reported inhuman torture and barbarous treatment of political prisoners in concentration camps, the representative of the USSR stated that the Security Council could not ignore all the acts of inhuman cruelty committed by the Greek monarcho-fascist regime. One of these communications stated that democrats who had played an active part in the national resistance movement were being tried by special military courts and were in danger of being executed simply because of their refusal to change their democratic beliefs.

The representative of the USSR therefore submitted a draft resolution (S/1746/Rev.1), which noting that the military courts in Greece were continuing to pass death sentences on the leaders of the national resistance movement and that the number of persons sentenced to death amounted to 2,877, noting also that at the present time in Greece 45 Greek democrats were before a military tribunal in Athens and were in danger of being shot, noting that the Greek Government was transferring political prisoners suffering from tuberculosis to desert islands and injurious climatic conditions, requested the Greek Government to suspend the execution of the death sentences of 45 active members of the national resistance movement, to prohibit further executions of political prisoners and not to allow the transfer of tubercular political prisoners to desert islands with an unhealthy climate.

A majority of the members of the Council, including the representatives of China, Cuba, Ecuador, the United Kingdom and the United States felt that the matters alleged did not really threaten peace and were not within the jurisdiction of the Security Council and could be discussed by the General Assembly at its fifth session.

The representative of Yugoslavia stated that the question should be admitted to the Council's agenda and that the Council should try to save the lives and alleviate the fate of the people concerned. Many of them, he stated, had waged a gallant struggle against Axis invaders and had fought in the post-war period for a democratic pattern of affairs in Greece.

At its 493rd meeting on 31 August, the Council decided, by 9 votes to 2 (USSR, Yugoslavia) not to include the item in its agenda.

In a reply dated 1 September 1950 (S/1749) to the charge brought against Greece by the USSR, the permanent representative of Greece stated that the persons whose defence the representative of the USSR had undertaken were not democrats with a stainless record or freely elected trade union leaders; that they had not been sentenced for their democratic convictions but for crimes which had covered Greece with blood and tears, that not a single death sentence had been carried out during the last months; and that special care was being taken for the maintenance of satisfactory sanitary conditions in the island where a few of those criminals were detained.

IV. Economic and Social Questions

A. ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT OF UNDER-DEVELOPED AREAS

1. Financing of Economic Development

a. CONSIDERATION BY THE ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL AT ITS TENTH SESSION

The question of the financing of economic development was considered by the Council at its 367th—371st plenary meetings, 28 February—2 March 1950.

Among other things, the Council had before it the following studies prepared by the Secretariat in accordance with resolution 222 D (IX) adopted at its ninth session in July-August 1949:¹

Survey of Policies Affecting Private Foreign Investment (E/1614/Rev.1).—This study described the main types of laws, regulations and economic policies of both capital-exporting and less developed countries, with respect to foreign investments; it also included brief summaries of laws, regulations and policies in certain less developed countries in Asia and the Far East, Latin America, the Middle East and among British colonial territories.

Methods of Increasing Domestic Savings and of Ensuring Their Most Advantageous Use for the Purpose of Economic Development (E/1562).—This report was based on a meeting of experts on financing economic development, which was held at Lake Success in October 1949, under General Assembly resolution 200(III).² The report contained the general views expressed by the experts who participated in the meeting; a summary of the discussions; and the papers prepared by each of seven participants, describing the experience of his country in obtaining domestic financial resources for economic development, together with an annotated guide to the papers prepared by the Secretariat to facilitate the discussions.

In addition to these studies, the following pertinent reports were made available to the Council at its tenth session:

Methods of Financing Economic Development in Under-Developed Countries.³ This report was prepared by the Secretary-General pursuant to resolution 179 (VIII)⁴ and was presented to the ninth session of the Council. However, in view of the fact that the Council's work at that session centered largely on problems of technical assistance, it was not then possible for the Council to give detailed consideration to the problems of financing. Relative Prices of Exports and Imports of Under-Developed Countries.⁵ This study was made available in its preliminary form to the third session of the Sub-Commission on Economic Development in March-April 1949, under the title "Post-War Price Relations in Trade between Under-developed and Industrialized Countries" (E/CN.I/Sub.3/W.5). It was prepared in response to the Sub-Commission's recommendation that a study be made of the price trends of primary products relative to prices of capital goods. The study was concerned with the post-war increase in the prices of goods—especially capital goods, machinery and equipment—imported by under-developed countries, compared with price increases in their exports, predominantly primary products.

International Capital Movement during the Inter-War Period⁶ In its preliminary form, this study had been submitted to the third session of the Sub-Commission on Economic Development. The report contained information on the magnitude and direction of the movement of capital during the inter-war period, the terms of investment and their effects on borrowing countries.

The Council also had before it at its tenth session other documents in connexion with the question of financing economic development, including a communication (E/1591) from the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations, transmitting a report on international investment and financing facilities adopted by the fifth session of the Conference of FAO; the fourth annual report, 1948/49, of the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, which included a chapter on the role of the Bank in economic development (E/1597); a report entitled National and International Measures for Full Employment⁷ which was prepared by a group of experts appointed by the Secretary-General in accordance with Council resolution 221 A (IX), and which contained recommendations concerning the stabilization of international investment for economic development; and a report entitled The Effects of Taxation on Foreign Trade and

Although the Council was aware of the concern of the General Assembly with problems of financing economic development, as expressed in General Assembly resolution 306(IV),⁹ it also took note of the Secretary-General's statement (E/1602) to the effect that it appeared "that both more definitive data as well as draft recommendations in the field of financing economic development should be available in time for consideration during the eleventh session of the Council". After engaging in a preliminary discussion on the subject,¹⁰ it recognized the need for further study of the problems of financing economic development before it could recommend definitive action. The Council, therefore, decided to defer action on these problems till its eleventh session. To facilitate action at that session, it unanimously decided at its 371st plenary meeting on 2 March 1950 (268 B (X)) that "the Sub-Commission on Economic Development should meet in 1950 and that it should, utilizing fully the studies prepared by the Secretariat and the records of the relevant debates of the Council, formulate practical recommendations for financing economic development of under-developed countries at its next session and make them available in time for consideration by the eleventh session of the Council". It also took account of General Assembly resolution 307(IV)¹¹ on economic development and international economic and commercial policy, in which it was recommended that the Council should give further attention to "such questions of international economic and commercial policy as may influence the process of development of the economies of under-developed countries, with a view to making recommendations to the General Assembly".

b. CONSIDERATION BY THE SUB-COMMISSION ON ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT AT ITS FOURTH SESSION

The Sub-Commission on Economic Development at its fourth session, 17 April-11 May 1950, therefore concerned itself primarily with the formulation of practical recommendations for financing economic development. In its report (E/CN.80 & Add.I), the Sub-Commission emphasized the major role of domestic effort and domestic resources, including domestic capital, in the development of under-developed countries, but considered foreign and international aid an important supplement for accelerating economic development. Pointing out that both the usefulness of and the opportunities for obtaining external financing on an increased scale depended to a large extent upon domestic organization and activity, the Sub-Commission stressed the importance of self-help in furthering economic development, stating that "on this foundation rest the hopes and the best opportunities for promoting international arrangements for financing that are needed for further accelerating economic development".

In its review of available foreign financing, the Sub-Commission covered private, governmental and international sources. It concluded that these sources were at present inadequate to provide the foreign financing needed for the large volume of low-yielding and slow-yielding "social and economic overhead" projects in such fields as education, health, housing, transport, communications and power, which were a necessary foundation for continued, accelerated economic development.

After taking into consideration certain advantages of private foreign investments, the Sub-Commission recommended a number of measures which would increase the flow of such capital for the purpose of financing economic development. Primarily, it recommended that under-developed countries subject private enterprise to the fewest possible restraints and controls, accord private investors non-discriminatory treatment, pledge the security of foreign persons and property, assure preference to transfer of earnings and withdrawal of capital if desired in the event of balance of payments difficulties, assure adequate compensation and reasonable transfer of earnings in the event of nationalization of the enterprises, and refrain from imposing inflexible requirements upon foreign investors with respect to percentage of foreign ownership and number or proportion of local directors, managers and employees. The more developed countries, the Sub-Commission held, should encourage private investment by their nationals by entering into bilateral treaties designed to assure fair treatment to the invested capital and entering into tax conventions in order to eliminate double or multiple taxation, by offering unilateral tax incentives and by making provision for long-term government contracts for the purchase of raw materials.

However, deterrents to the expansion of private foreign investment were seen rather in the existing obstacles to the transfer of funds between countries than in the lack of agreement on codes, treaties and general principles. The Sub-Commission concluded that a substantial expansion in private foreign investment was not immediately to be expected, and that an acceleration of private investment commensurate with the needs of under-developed countries would, at best, take a considerable number of years to materialize.

Two of the members of the Sub-Commission did not subscribe to the opinion of the majority concerning private foreign investment. In their view, it was neither desirable nor feasible to discuss at an international level the detailed conditions necessary for the promotion of private investment without much more preparatory work and mutual consultations by the Governments and nationals of the countries concerned. For one thing, detailed international obligations of the type suggested in the draft resolution on the subject would be in conflict with the existing legislation and, in some cases, even of the constitutions of a number of under-developed countries. In addition, it would be a matter of no small difficulty to get the necessary changes made therein, especially if the initiative was to come from an international body rather than from the nationals or the Governments concerned. They also stated that action under this head should emanate from individual Governments—both capital-exporting and capital-importing—rather than from an international body until such time as conditions favour the negotiation of an international treaty on the subject.

With regard to foreign financing through governmental and international agencies, the Sub-Commission was encouraged by the prospects of increasing such financing through the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development and the United States Export-Import Bank in Washington. In this connexion, the Sub-Commission noted with satisfaction the assurance of the representatives of the Bank that the Bank was favourably disposed towards granting loans for financing a series of interrelated projects, relying for repayment on the general credit condition of the country concerned rather than on the self-liquidating character, in terms of foreign exchange, of a specific project. In view of the scope of the low-yielding and slow-yielding basic projects requiring foreign financing, however, the Sub-Commission concluded that there was urgent need for additional sources of funds at lower interest rates and with longer maturities than are presently available.

The Sub-Commission, recognizing that the main financial burden would fall on one particular Member State, did not feel that it should recommend at this time the creation of an international organization to finance economic development. It therefore recommended urgent consideration of the problems by the Governments in a position to provide such funds, and by the Economic and Social Council at its eleventh session. If the necessary response were forthcoming, the Sub-Commission suggested that the creation of such an agency might then be discussed in detail.

The above considerations were embodied in the draft resolutions which the Sub-Commission, in its report, proposed for consideration by the eleventh session of the Council.

The Sub-Commission also suggested that the Council should make appropriate provision for a study dealing with the important problems of unemployment and under-employment in the under-developed countries.

c. CONSIDERATION BY THE ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL AT ITS ELEVENTH SESSION

At its eleventh session the Council had before it, in addition to the report of the Sub-Commission, the Experts' report on National and International Measures for Full Employment, the studies which had been previously submitted to the tenth session and a number of other studies, together with the following documents which had become available between the two sessions: Economic and Legal Status of Foreign Investments in Selected Countries of Latin America (E/CN.12/166 & Add. 1 to 9 inclusive).—prepared by the Secretariat for the third session of the Economic Commission for Latin America. Foreign Investment Laws and Regulations in the ECAFE Region (E/CN.11/1 & T/25).—prepared by the Secretariat for the second session of the Committee on Industry and Trade of the Economic Commission for Asia and the Far East. Financing Economic Development (E/C.2/256/-Add. 1).—statement submitted by the International Chamber of Commerce, a non-governmental organization in category A consultative status.

Taking as a basis the proposals of the Sub-Commission, together with the pertinent parts of the report of the experts on full employment, the Council discussed the problems of financing of economic development of under-developed countries at the 90th, 91st and 95th-97th meetings of its Economic Committee, 27 and 28 July and 10 and 11 August, and at its 381st-385th and 409th plenary meetings, 10-12 July and 12 August 1950.

In addition, the Council had before it a note by the Secretary-General on methods of financing economic development (E/1690) and a report by him on measures being taken by the United Nations and specialized agencies to promote economic development (E/1729).

During the discussions in the Council, the majority of members supported the conclusions of the Sub-Commission, particularly its recommendations (1) that there should be joint participation of domestic and foreign capital in financing development projects in under-developed countries, (2) that more of the developed countries should permit the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development to utilize an increasing amount of their domestic currencies for such of the Bank's loan transactions as involve a demand for such currencies and (3) that foreign financing should not be confined to the direct needs of development projects for foreign expenditures and that international credit organizations should consider a possible reduction of interest rates and an improvement of amortization terms so as to ease the financial burden on the under-developed countries.

With regard to the last-mentioned point, the representatives of the United Kingdom and Iran stressed that unless projects which produced little or no direct financial return (e.g. housing, education, sanitation, power, etc.) were financed, possibilities for other types of investment would be restricted. The United Kingdom representative stated that he agreed with the Sub-Commission that much essential development of a "social overhead" nature could not be financed by the Bank and felt that much more thought should be given to finding a solution for the problem.

It was also agreed in the Council that while under-developed countries should rely first of all on domestic financing, it was impossible for them to develop their resources without help from foreign finance. It was also generally felt that while private foreign investment was extremely important, public or governmental lending was of primary importance.

The representative of Australia pointed out that both the Experts on Full Employment and the Sub-Commission on Economic Development had agreed that (1) it was essential to draw a clear-cut distinction between investments for specific projects which yielded direct returns and those in fields such as health and education which yielded indirect returns, (2) it was most desirable to promote as much as possible the financing of economic development from domestic capital resources of under-developed countries but that total reliance on domestic resources was impossible, (3) in prevailing conditions the flow of private international investment would be irregular as well as inadequate to meet the world's requirements for economic development and (4) it was essential to supplement private international lending by loans granted under governmental auspices which should not be tied to specific projects. However, they had not been able to reach agreement on how to organize and administer such a flow of capital on a larger and more stable basis. The Experts had recommended expansion of the Bank's functions with appropriate modification of organization while the Sub-Commission had again suggested the creation of a United Nations economic development administration to finance economic development. A third possible approach was action by particular countries.

The representatives of India and Iran favoured the creation of a new international agency. In the opinion of the representatives of Australia and Canada, however, there were already enough international institutions in existence. The representative of Brazil felt that the time was not yet ripe for the establishment of such an agency.

Other members, among them the representatives of Australia, Brazil, Chile and France, agreed with the Experts on Full Employment that the scope of the Bank's operations should be enlarged and diversified to finance general development programmes, including basic social development rather than specific projects.

The representatives of the United States and United Kingdom, while in favour of the Bank's present trend to extend, within its present framework, more loans for development in general, were opposed to any modification of its constitution at this time. The United States representative stated that in his opinion the scope of international capital resources available for development and the methods by which they could be increased should be determined only after further experience had been gained in the actual financing of loans for development. If, in the future, the Bank's resources proved inadequate, then consideration could be given to increasing its lending capacity.

The representative of Belgium maintained that private capital should be the basis of international financing and that it was necessary to develop an international market for capital. The under-developed countries, he felt, should create a favourable "climate" by improving legislative and administrative machinery and by guaranteeing loans made by private sources. In this connexion he welcomed the Sub-Commission's suggestion regarding guarantees to be given by borrowing countries to their creditors. But, in addition, guarantees should also be provided against debtor countries which defaulted.

While the majority of members agreed that the creation of a favourable "climate" was important, the representatives of Chile, India and the United States pointed out that it was equally the responsibility of the lending countries to create a favourable economic "climate". Public capital, the representative of Chile held, should give an example to private capital and so help create such a "climate".

The representative of Mexico was of the opinion that the element of distrust that existed between capital-exporting and capital-importing countries prevented a favourable "climate" from developing and that the explanation for this distrust lay not in legislative measures adopted by capital-importing countries but in the general political tendency shown in all countries of the world of increasing State intervention in economic life arising out of the difficulties of the world economic situation.

The representatives of Chile, Mexico, India and Brazil questioned the Belgian proposal for the use of sanctions if countries failed to meet their financial obligations. Such action would be a step backwards. Moreover, private capital, while important, should play only one part in financing economic development. The representative of Peru pointed out that the question was to organize sound economic relations throughout the world in an entirely new spirit calculated to produce new results. The representatives of India and Pakistan pointed out that it ultimately was in the interests of industrialized countries to raise the standard of living in eastern countries because the poverty there was the greatest menace to world peace.

The representatives of Mexico and Chile felt that the recommendations of the Sub-Commission on the stimulation of private foreign investment placed foreign investors in a more favourable position than local investors and therefore would tend to discourage the latter. This was running counter to the principle that the economic development of under-developed countries should be ensured primarily by domestic savings.

The United States representative noted that all were agreed that under-developed countries needed foreign capital—both private and public—to formulate and accelerate their economic development and that it was desirable and necessary to facilitate the international flow of capital for this purpose. It was generally agreed, also, that private capital was of particular importance in furthering economic development. He and the representative of Australia stressed the importance of the technical assistance programme in developing local measures necessary for capital formation in under-developed areas and to channel savings into productive enterprises. The programme would also provide means for helping countries to assess their resources and possibilities and to prepare programmes and projects for development and for international financing.

After a detailed and technical discussion of the proposals of the Sub-Commission, the Economic Committee at its 91st meeting on 28 July referred them to a Drafting Committee which had previously been set up by the Committee when discussing the problem of full employment. The Drafting Committee, consisting of the representatives of Australia, Brazil, Canada, Chile,¹² France, the United Kingdom and the United States met under the chairmanship of the Chairman of the Economic Committee (India) on 2, 3 and 4 August and submitted several resolutions (E/AC.6/L.12/Rev.1) to the Economic Committee for consideration.

In addition to the proposals of the Sub-Commission, the Drafting Committee had taken into consideration the following additional substantive draft resolutions and amendments, as well as several oral proposals and suggestions raised in the debate:

(1) A draft resolution (E/1757) by the representative of Chile to replace the Sub-Commission's proposals on external financing of local currency costs of development, which he felt were not sufficiently definite. The Sub-Commission had recommended that international lending institutions follow flexible policies in making external loans for local currency costs of development and make them at a rate of interest and on terms of amortization which would place the smallest possible burden on the under-developed countries. The Chilean draft resolution was intended to ensure that different types of programmes were combined in an organic whole in order to circumvent inflationary tendencies which might arise from the implementation of certain development schemes. The representative of Chile explained that his draft resolution was based on the principles under which the ECA operated in Europe and was intended to enable the Governments affected to increase available resources for economic development and avoid inflationary tendencies.

¹² The representative of Chile was added to the original composition of the Drafting Committee.

(2) Section 9 of a draft resolution (E/L.67) presented by the representative of the United Kingdom during the discussion of full employment.¹³ This section was an amendment to the same Sub-Commission proposal and would recommend that Governments consider within the framework of the Bank broadening the criteria of ordinary Bank lending with a view to laying greater emphasis on the size, composition and financial implications of a borrowing country's investment programme as a whole and less on the detail of selected projects.

(3) Section 8 of the same draft resolution (E/L.67), which would recommend that Governments extend the principle of untied lending to all Governmentally-controlled or guaranteed foreign lending.

(4) A joint draft resolution (E/L.73) presented by the representatives of Chile and the United States, which also contained recommendations for the organization of the Economic and Employment Commission and its Sub-Commissions.¹⁴ The relevant action recommended that Governments promote domestic measures and international agreements to encourage a large and more stable flow of capital exports toward under-developed areas, and establish conditions necessary for participation of foreign private capital in the form either of direct investments or of governmental, private or public corporation bonds, and that governmental and inter-governmental credit organizations consider means of using their funds more effectively to accelerate the rate of economic development in under-developed countries.

The report of the Drafting Committee (E/AC.6/L.12/Rev. 1) was considered at the 95th to 97th meetings of the Economic Committee on 10 and 11 August. The Drafting Committee had proposed three draft resolutions, entitled "A. With the Object of Encouraging Effective Methods of Mobilizing Domestic Capital for the Economic Development in Under-Developed Countries"; "B. With the Object of Encouraging Effective Methods for Increasing the Flow of International Capital for the Economic Development of Under-Developed Countries"; "C. With the Object of Facilitating Further Studies in the Field of International Investment and Price of Primary Products". (For texts, as amended, see below.)

Section A was adopted at the 95th meeting, with minor drafting changes, without comment.

Under Section B, the representatives of Canada and the United States presented joint amendments (E/AC.6/L.13) which would refer to the criteria for the Bank's lending in the preamble to the resolution and delete the paragraph which recommended that Members consider whether the Bank had given sufficient emphasis to the size, composition and financial implications of a borrowing country's investment programme as a whole as distinct from the detailed costs of selected projects. They felt that the inclusion of such a paragraph implied an unjustified criticism of the Bank. They also proposed that the Council should recommend that governmental and inter-governmental credit organizations also consider means by which funds could be used more effectively to help carry out integrated investment programmes designed to carry forward in a co-ordinated manner development projects in different branches of the country's economy as well as means to accelerate the rate of economic development in under-developed countries.

Those opposing the joint amendments, among them the representatives of the United Kingdom, Pakistan and Peru, felt that the paragraph in question was not a reproof since members were merely asked to consider whether sufficient emphasis was being placed on certain things. The representative of the Bank had said himself that only in exceptional circumstances could local currency costs be financed.

At its 96th meeting, the Committee adopted by 12 votes to none, with 3 abstentions, the paragraph to be inserted in the preamble, as proposed in the joint amendments and further amended by France and Australia (see below, Section C, paragraph 10).

By 11 votes to 4 it adopted the remainder of the proposals in the joint amendments.

Section B, as amended, was adopted in paragraph-by-paragraph votes.

Section C was adopted unanimously without comment.

At the 97th, meeting, the Committee agreed that the paragraphs forming Section B should be rearranged by the Secretariat under the guidance of the Chairman and in keeping with structural suggestions (E/AC.6/L.15) made by the Chilean delegation.

The Council at its 409th meeting on 12 August 1950, after adopting a minor drafting amendment proposed by the United States representative, adopted the resolutions proposed by the Economic Committee (E/1817) unanimously. Resolution 294 (XI) read as follows:

The Economic and Social Council,

Taking note of the report of the fourth session of the Sub-Commission on Economic Development, the experts' report on National and International Measures for Full Employment, the report of the fourth session of the Economic and Employment Commission, and

Considering the studies prepared by the Secretary-General in pursuance of Council resolutions 179 (VIII) and 222 D (IX)

A. WITH THE OBJECT OF KEEPING UNDER CONTINUING REVIEW PROBLEMS OF FINANCING ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

1. Recommends that the Economic, Employment and Development Commission undertake to study and keep under review the nature and magnitude of the problems involved in financing the economic development of under-developed countries, and make recommendations thereon to the Council from time to time; and

B. WITH THE OBJECT OF ENCOURAGING EFFECTIVE METHODS OF MOBILIZING DOMESTIC CAPITAL FOR THE ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT OF UNDER-DEVELOPED COUNTRIES

2. Having regard to the necessity of mobilizing the domestic financial resources of under-developed countries to the fullest possible degree either independently or in conjunction with any foreign funds which may be available for economic development,

3. Considering the importance of promoting the self-generating character of economic development, which requires reinvestment as far as possible of increases of income following upon development, and

4. Considering the desirability of utilizing and pooling the credit standing of established industrial enterprises and financial institutions for facilitating the import of foreign capital,

5. Draws to the attention of Member Governments the report prepared by the group of experts convened by the Secretary-General pursuant to Council resolution 222 D(b) (IX) in which various views and suggestions concerning methods of increasing and channelling domestic savings are discussed; and

6. Commends to the attention of the Governments concerned the desirability of considering the formation in their countries of banking syndicates or development banks with the participation of domestic banks and industrial enterprises, as a means of attracting and channelling foreign investments into essential projects; and

C. WITH THE OBJECT OF ENCOURAGING EFFECTIVE METHODS OF INCREASING THE FLOW OF INTERNATIONAL CAPITAL FOR THE ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT OF UNDER-DEVELOPED COUNTRIES AND

7. Recognizing:

(a) That a more rapid increase of production in under-developed countries is essential for raising the level of productive employment and the living standards of their populations and for the growth of the world economy as a whole,

(b) That the domestic financial resources of under-developed countries together with the international flow of capital for investment have not been sufficient to assure the desired rate of economic development, and

(c) That such accelerated economic development of under-developed countries requires not only a more effective and sustained mobilization of domestic savings but also an expanded and more stable flow of foreign capital investment,

8. Recommends:

(a) That Governments establish through domestic measures and, if necessary, through bilateral or multilateral agreements, conditions to encourage participation of foreign private capital in desirable economic developments either in the form of direct investment or in the form of investment in bonds of Governments or of private and public corporations;

(b) That Governments of the more developed countries seek to encourage by appropriate means the investment of private capital by their nationals in under-developed countries;

(c) That more of the developed countries take early action, in the light of their balance-of-payments position, to grant permission to the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development to utilize increasing parts of the 18 per cent of their subscriptions which have been pledged to be payable in domestic currencies, for such loan transactions as the Bank may be undertaking and which involve a demand for such currencies, and consider granting permission to the Bank to place its bond issues in their financial markets; and

(d) That Governments extend progressively, so far as their balance-of-payments position and prospects permit, the principle of untied lending to all governmentally controlled or guaranteed foreign lending;

9. Recognizing:

(a) That economic development requires the execution not only of self-liquidating projects but also of projects in such fields as transport, power, communications, public health, educational institutions and housing, which, while not always fully self-liquidating, are justified by reason of their indirect effect on national productivity and national income, and

(b) That with respect to financing of economic development, there is no direct logical connection between the immediate expenditures in local and foreign currencies on the one hand and the desirable amount of domestic and foreign financing, respectively, on the other, and

10. Taking note of the constructive statements made by the representative of the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development at the eleventh session of the Council, and welcoming, as being of special importance in relation to the problem of economic development of under-developed countries, his assurance that, in considering applications for loans, it is the determined policy of the Bank to examine the size, composition and financial implications of a borrowing country's investment programme as a whole, as well as the details of selected projects,

11. Recommends:

(a) That under-developed countries give greater attention to the formulation of integrated programmes of development and to the planning of loan projects for presentation to the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development so as to facilitate the Bank's operations and thereby accelerate the rate of economic development;

(b) That governmental and intergovernmental credit organizations which can assist in the economic development of under-developed countries consider means by which the funds which are at their disposal can be used more effectively to help carry out integrated investment programmes, designed to carry forward in a co-ordinated manner development projects in different branches of the country's economy, and in general to accelerate the rate of economic development of under-developed countries;

(c) That institutions providing international loans, in considering the amount of external finance required in connection with any project, give appropriate consideration not only to the direct foreign costs but also to the foreign costs which tend to arise indirectly from the additional claim which the projects make on local labour and other resources, and from the additional incomes thus created; and

(d) That these institutions make any such loans at rates of interest and on terms of amortization designed to place the smallest feasible burden on the exchange availabilities of the under-developed countries, consistent with the maintenance of these institutions as self-supporting entities;

D. WITH THE OBJECT OF FACILITATING FURTHER STUDIES IN THE FIELD OF INTERNATIONAL INVESTMENT AND PRICES OF PRIMARY PRODUCTS

12. Considering the great importance for the promotion of private foreign investments of assurances of ability to transfer earnings and withdraw capital in the currency in which the original investment has been made, and

13. Considering, furthermore, that such assurances of ability to transfer raise a number of technical difficulties, some of them closely related to the rights and obligations of members of the International Monetary Fund,

14. Expresses the opinion that the practical conditions under which such assurances can be made effective have not so far been sufficiently examined at the technical level;

15. Requests Member Governments to provide the Secretary-General and the International Monetary Fund with such statistical and other data as may be necessary for the carrying out of the studies referred to below;

16. Recommends that the International Monetary Fund be requested to assemble and analyse, in consultation with the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, and when appropriate with other interested international agencies, the statistical and other data bearing upon the capacity of under-developed countries to service investments of foreign capital, with special reference to:

(a) The proportion of the foreign exchange receipts of such countries currently absorbed by services on foreign investment as compared with the past periods;

(b) The proportion of foreign exchange receipts of more developed countries which, in earlier stages of their development, has been absorbed by services on foreign investment in these countries;

(c) Statutory and administrative measures designed to provide for servicing foreign investment in times of exchange stringency; and

17. Requests the Secretary-General, in co-operation with the interested international agencies and within the resources available, to undertake a study of the relation of fluctuations in the prices of primary products to the ability of under-developed countries to obtain foreign exchange.

2. Technical Assistance for Economic Development under General Assembly Resolution 200(III)

To deal with economic and social development of under-developed areas, four inter-related programmes have been established by the General Assembly and the Economic and Social Council on technical assistance for economic development, training in public administration, advisory social welfare services (all of which operate on separate budgets within the United Nations regular budget) and the so-called Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance. The Expanded Programme is financed by voluntary contributions and includes the work of the specialized agencies, whose programmes are co-ordinated through the Technical Assistance Board. In administering these four inter-related programmes, the Technical Assistance Administration, established in 1950, makes no distinction as to the source of funds.

Under General Assembly resolution 200(III)¹⁵ the Secretary-General was requested to report to each session of the Council on the measures he had taken in compliance with the provisions of the resolution. Accordingly he submitted his third and fourth reports (E/1576, E/1700) to the tenth and eleventh sessions of the Council, respectively.

The Secretary-General pointed out that, under the 1950 programme, sixteen countries had by 1 June 1950 requested expert advice in furtherance of their plans for economic development. The experts made available numbered approximately 50 and represented some twenty different nationalities. It could thus be said that the programme of technical aid to the less advanced countries combined and made use of the experience of many nations with different social patterns and cultural traditions. The Secretary-General reported that a group of experts in public administration and in agricultural, industrial, geological and other fields began its work in Afghanistan in June; that a comprehensive team of experts organized under General Assembly resolutions 58(I)¹⁶ and 200(III), and recruited in consultation with the specialized agencies concerned, was at that time in Bolivia advising the Government on a wide range of subjects concerning its development programme; that several experts had visited Chile to review economic policies bearing on problems of economic stability in relation to Chile's development needs and to discuss with the Chilean authorities the country's public finance structure; and that a further group of experts had visited Ecuador to undertake basic investigations and advise on the preparation of legislation in the fields of taxation, public finance, customs organization, public administration, civil service and census techniques. Negotiations were in progress for the dispatch to Iran under General Assembly resolutions 58(1) and 200(III) of an expert mission in the fields of social questions, public administration, public finance and customs organization. In response to a request from the Government of India in connexion with its sponsorship of a pilot reclamation and development project, a soil conservation expert had been appointed in consultation with the Food and Agriculture Organization, and it was planned to make available the services of a community planning and housing expert under General Assembly resolution 58(I). Individual experts were, furthermore, rendering advice in a number of specific fields in response to requests from Brazil, Burma, Lebanon, Mexico, Paraguay, the Philippines and Thailand. Requests had been received from Yugoslavia for extensive technical assistance involving the assignment of experts and the provision of semi-industrial and laboratory appliances. A further clarification of the scope of these requests was being sought. The Secretary-General further informed the Council that he had appointed a resident representative in Haiti, whose first task was to advise the Government on the implementation of the recommendations of the United Nations Mission which visited that country in 1948, and to help arrange for the provision, of such continued technical assistance as the Government might request. A similar appointment of a resident representative was being made in Pakistan. Expert advice in a number of specific fields was also being rendered by individual experts in both countries.

The Secretary-General reported that, under the 1950 fellowship programme, fellowships for economic development had been awarded to 68 candidates selected from a total of 276 candidates nominated by 28 Member Governments. The principal fields of study of the fellowship holders included economic geology, coal mining, photogrammetry, statistical services, regional economic development techniques, co-operatives, agricultural and industrial credits, hydro-electric and thermal-electric power production, distribution and utilization, fertilizer manufacture, telecommunications, railroad operation and maintenance, airport operation and maintenance, public finance and fiscal administration, livestock management, plant breeding, seed production and storage, irrigation techniques, utilization of forest products and organization of research facilities in agriculture. The fellowship holders were using host facilities made available by the following thirteen Member States: Australia, Belgium, Brazil, Canada, Denmark, France, India, Mexico, Netherlands, New Zealand, Sweden, United Kingdom and United States.

The Secretary-General further informed the Council that under paragraph 3(c) of General Assembly resolution 200(III), which provides for the organization of training institutes, the Statistical Office of the United Nations and the Food and Agriculture Organization had collaborated in census-training centres in Cairo and New Delhi; and that an inter-American seminar on biostatistics would be organized jointly by the United Nations and the World Health Organization in September 1950. The Asian Centre on Agricultural and Allied Projects, sponsored jointly by the Government of Pakistan, the United Nations, the Food and Agriculture Organization and the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, would be held from 1 October to 22 December 1950 at Lahore, Pakistan. The centre would consist of a training institute on economic appraisal of development projects, to aid participants in formulating such projects for subsequent action by administrative officials and by national and international financial institutions. The Secretary-General further reported that in implementation of paragraph 3(d) of General Assembly resolution 200(III) the beginnings of a clearing-house service had been established to handle specific inquiries for technical information and for advice on the location of technical assistance personnel, equipment and supplies.

The Secretary-General drew special attention to various practical considerations affecting the implementation of the programme and to a number of difficulties encountered during day-to-day operations. In his third report, he anticipated that future efforts under resolution 200(III) would be greatly facilitated by the General Assembly's decision to place such activities on a continuing basis, since services could henceforth be planned without the restraints imposed by the financial necessity of completing action within a calendar year. He also advised that the programme of the International Centre for Training in Public Administration and the technical assistance programme under resolution 200(III) would be integrated and in essence be as a single programme. In addition, while there would be two separate sources of funds for technical assistance, on the operational level he had decided to ensure complete administrative integration of the activities of the expanded programme and the programme under 200(III) irrespective of the source of the funds which would be used to finance them. In his fourth report, the Secretary-General drew particular attention to the appointment in certain countries of resident technical assistance representatives, and emphasized that such appointments could greatly contribute towards the avoidance of confusion which might otherwise arise from a multiplication of channels for technical assistance, and that such representatives would also assist under-developed countries which do not already have appropriate co-ordinating machinery to view their requirements for technical assistance from the standpoint of the over-all development needs of the country.

a. CONSIDERATION BY THE ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL AT ITS TENTH SESSION

The Council at the 82nd meeting of its Economic Committee on 9 February and at its 349th plenary meeting on 13 February briefly reviewed the third report (E/1576) of the Secretary-General, commending the work accomplished in implementing resolution 200(III).

Among the few specific points raised, the representative of Pakistan expressed his belief that the expanded technical assistance programme and the regular United Nations programme should be co-ordinated, with the general objective of optimum utilization of resources. The representative of Brazil thought that while the programme of the International Centre for Training in Public Administration¹⁷ should be co-ordinated with the regular technical assistance programme under resolution 200(III), its independent structure should be preserved. The representative of France considered that there was a need for a definite policy on the implementation of the programme of expert advice and that the United Nations should both centralize and disseminate information. He further considered that some fellowships should be reserved for experts who were less trained but whose course of study might be lengthened, that the requirement that candidates should know the language of the host country was necessary but should not be too strictly applied and that a request should indicate three host countries in order of preference which could be changed only after consultation with the countries concerned.

The Economic Committee (E/1604) on 9 February and the Council (268(X)) on 13 February 1950 unanimously adopted a resolution which took note of the third report and expressed satisfaction with the progress achieved during the year, notwithstanding the difficulties encountered.

b. CONSIDERATION BY THE ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL AT ITS ELEVENTH SESSION

The Council considered the fourth report of the Secretary-General (E/1700 & Add. 1) at its 412th plenary meeting on 15 August 1950. In view of the fact that resolution 200(III) requires the Council to make recommendations concerning any budgetary action that may be required by the General Assembly, the Council considered the Secretary-General's proposal that an amount equal to that appropriated for 1950 again be appropriated for 1951. The representative of the United Kingdom commended the Secretary-General for the modesty of his proposal. The representative of France also expressed the view that, with the exception of the origin of the funds, no administrative distinction need be made between the technical assistance programme which is administered under General Assembly resolution 200 (III) and that part of the expanded programme for technical assistance which is to be administered by the United Nations under Council resolution 222 A (IX) and General Assembly resolution 304(IV).

The Council also had before it a policy matter, deferred from its tenth session (E/1603) dealing with a proposal by Chile (E/AC.6/L.1 & Corr. 1) that the General Assembly so amend resolution 200(III) as to make eligible for technical assistance under this resolution all those non-member countries which are responsible for their international relations and participate as associate members in the work of any of the regional economic commissions. This question had grown out of a somewhat similar proposal which had been submitted too late for consideration by the Second Committee at the fourth session of the General Assembly. In view of the fact, however, that the non-members concerned had meanwhile become eligible for similar technical assistance under the expanded programme by virtue of their membership in one or more of the specialized agencies participating in the latter programme, the representative of Chile withdrew the draft resolution. The representatives of France and the United Kingdom, nevertheless, took the opportunity to point out that they would have supported the proposal, and indicated that they might re-open the issue in the future should the circumstances require it.

The Council unanimously adopted the draft resolution proposed by the Secretary-General (E/1700), with minor amendment, as resolution

¹⁷ See pp. 454-56.

291 A (XI). In it the Council expressed its satisfaction with the Secretary-General's report and recommended that the General Assembly (1) approve the same amount for technical assistance in 1951 as in 1950 and (2) recommend that requests for technical assistance for economic development under resolution 200(III), which cannot be financed with funds provided in the regular budget, should be eligible for financing under the expanded programme of technical assistance.

c. ACTIVITIES DURING 1950

By the end of 1950 action had been planned or undertaken under resolution 200(III) on requests for expert advice from the following sixteen countries: Afghanistan, Bolivia, Brazil, Burma, Chile, Ecuador, Haiti, India, Iran, Lebanon, Mexico, Pakistan, Paraguay, the Philippines, Thailand and Yugoslavia. The services of over 50 experts were made available, in some cases through the co-operation of the specialized agencies. The assistance rendered covered a wide field and included, besides general problems of economic development, such questions as raw materials utilization, industrial development, public finance, public administration, fiscal questions, development finance, organization of statistical services, customs administration, mining, electric power, transport, cottage industries, irrigation, improvement of livestock, fisheries, soils analysis, forestry and tropical agriculture.

Thirty Member States nominated 306 candidates for fellowships, including nine from Non-Self-Governing and Trust Territories. Awards were made to 93 of these candidates to study in thirteen Member States. The principal fields of study included industrial development, statistics, development of land and water resources, transport and communications, co-operatives in economic development, and combined resource development.

In addition to the provision of expert advice and the award of fellowships to experts from the under-developed countries for study abroad, technical assistance is provided to Member Governments under resolution 200(III) through the organization of training institutes, seminars and meetings of experts to discuss problems of special concern to the under-developed countries. The two main activities of this type during the year were the Asian Centre on Agricultural and Allied Projects in Lahore, Pakistan, from October to December, and the Inter-American Training Seminar for Biostatistics in Santiago de Chile, from 25 September to 16 December.

3. Technical Assistance under the Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance for Economic Development

a. TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE CONFERENCE

In accordance with Council resolution 222 A (IX) and General Assembly resolution 304 (IV),¹⁸ the Secretary-General convened the United Nations Technical Assistance Conference at Lake Success on 12 June 1950. All Members of the United Nations were invited as well as all other Governments who, while not Members of the United Nations, were members of one or more of the specialized agencies participating in the expanded programme through their membership on the Technical Assistance Board (TAB). Representatives of the specialized agencies were also invited. The purposes of the Conference were to ascertain the total amount of contributions which would be made available by Governments for the execution of the expanded programme of technical assistance, and to obtain the final consent of the participating Governments to the proportionate shares of the total contributions which would be allotted to the various participating organizations, as well as their consent to the other financial arrangements set out in Council resolution 222 A (IX). The Technical Assistance Conference met from 12 to 14 June 1950. Many of the delegations, both at the Conference and later at the eleventh session of the Economic and Social Council, expressed their satisfaction regarding the careful preparations which had preceded the Conference and which had made it possible for it to conclude its business expeditiously and by unanimous action. Governments declared their intention of making available for the special account for technical assistance, in the first period of operation up to 31 December 1951, a sum slightly exceeding the equivalent of $20,000,000.

The Governments of the following States were represented at the Conference by delegations:

Afghanistan	Burma	Cuba
Argentina	Canada	Denmark
Australia	Ceylon	Ecuador
Austria	Chile	Egypt
Belgium	China	El Salvador
Bolivia	Colombia	Ethiopia
Brazil	Costa Rica	Finland

France	Liberia	Thailand
Greece	Luxembourg	Turkey
Haiti	Mexico	Union of
Honduras	Monaco	South Africa
India	Netherlands	United Kingdom
Indonesia	New Zealand	United States
Iran	Norway	Uruguay
Ireland	Pakistan	Venezuela
Israel	Philippines	Yemen
Italy	Sweden	Yugoslavia
Korea	Switzerland
Lebanon	Syria

The following specialized agencies and inter-governmental organizations were represented:

International Labour Organisation
Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations
United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization
International Civil Aviation Organization
World Health Organization
International Bank for Reconstruction and Development
International Monetary Fund
International Refugee Organization
International Meteorological Organization
Inter-governmental Maritime Consultative Organization Organization of American States

The Conference adopted a Final Act which included resolutions (I) on the subject of contributions from Governments to the expanded programme of technical assistance; and (II) on the financial arrangements concerning the expanded programme of technical assistance through the United Nations and the specialized agencies, and reproducing the financial arrangements set out in paragraph 9 of Council resolution 222 A (IX). The text of these resolutions follows.

RESOLUTION I

CONTRIBUTIONS FROM GOVERNMENTS

The United Nations Technical Assistance Conference.

Believing that world peace and prosperity depend on a rising standard of living among all peoples and particularly among the peoples of the countries which are now economically under-developed,

Being impressed with the significant contribution to economic development that can be made by an expansion of the international interchange of technical knowledge and skills,

Noting the recommendations contained in resolution 304 (IV) adopted by the General Assembly of the United Nations on 16 November 1949 regarding an expanded programme of technical assistance for economic development of under-developed countries,

1. Notes with satisfaction that the total amount of monetary sums and domestic credits hitherto ascertained to be made available from contributing Governments during the first financial period of the operation ending

31 December 1951 for the expanded programme of technical assistance through the United Nations and the specialized agencies is equivalent to approximately $20,012,500;

2. Notes further that, by indicating the amounts listed in the schedule appended hereto (Annex I) each of the contributing Governments has declared that it will, so far as its appropriate constitutional bodies authorize and, where necessary, appropriate funds, make available such amounts to the expanded programme of technical assistance during the first financial period of its operation;

3. Urges that contributions for the first period of operation be made available as soon as possible to the special account for technical assistance for economic development to be set up and administered by the Secretary-General of the United Nations in accordance with the provisions of paragraph 8 of resolution 222 A (IX) of the Economic and Social Council and paragraph 3 of resolution 304 (IV) of the General Assembly.

RESOLUTION II

The United Nations Technical Assistance Conference Approves the following financial arrangements recommended in paragraph 9 of resolution 222 A (IX) of the Economic and Social Council:

(a) Contributions shall be made by Governments in such forms and subject to such conditions as may be agreed between the Secretary-General, after consultation with the Technical Assistance Board established pursuant to resolution 222 A (IX) of the Economic and Social Council, and the contributing Governments, provided that contributions shall be made without limitation as to use by a specific agency, or in a specific country or for a specific project;

(b) The Secretary-General shall allot contributions received during the first fiscal year as follows:

(i) The first $10,000,000 in contributions shall automatically be available for distribution to the participating organizations for the expanded technical assistance programme;

(ii) Of the second $10,000,000 of contributions received, 70 per cent shall be automatically available for distributions to the participating organizations and 30 per cent shall be retained for subsequent allocations, bearing in mind the desirability of retaining an appropriate proportion of convertible currencies;

(iii) All contributions above $20,000,000 shall be similarly retained;

(c) Contributions automatically available for distribution to the participating organizations, in accordance with sub-paragraph (b) (i) and (ii) above, shall be transferred by the Secretary-General to the organizations in accordance with the following percentages:

	Per cent
United Nations	23
International Labour Organisation	11
Food and Agriculture Organization	29
United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization	14
International Civil Aviation Organization	1

Total 100

(d) Contributions retained under sub-paragraph (b) (ii) and (iii) above shall be allotted by the Technical Assistance Board in such a manner as it may decide and at such time as it may decide, taking into consideration all relevant factors, in particular the amounts and kinds of resources on hand and receivable, the technical assistance requests received which fall within the field of the several participating organizations, the uncommitted balances held by them, and the need for the retention of any reserves to meet unforeseen requests from Governments;

(e) The Technical Assistance Board shall determine the manner in which different currencies and services or materials can be most effectively utilized;

(f) The amounts received by the participating organizations shall be available to them for the purpose of assuming obligations or commitments during the fiscal year in which these amounts are received, but actual expenditures shall be allowed to extend over a period of not more than the two ensuing fiscal years;

(g) The Secretary-General and the executive heads of the other participating organizations shall, after consultation, make appropriate arrangements for the audit of contributions and expenditures under this programme.

The Conference also took account of the fact that several Governments were not in a position to announce contributions during the Conference but that they contemplated submitting such amounts after the end of the Conference. The Conference requested the Secretary-General to communicate to the Governments invited to the Conference the additional amounts announced by Governments notified to him after the close of the Conference. As of 31 December 1950¹⁹ the following additional contributions had been announced:

Governments	Amounts
Ireland	£5,000
Finland	Finnish marks 1,155,000
Iraq	Equivalent of $5,000
Guatemala	$5,000

b. CONSIDERATION BY THE ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL AT ITS ELEVENTH SESSION

The question was discussed by Council at the 1st to 5th meetings of its Technical Assistance Committee (TAC) from 2 to 15 August and at its 412th and 413th plenary meetings on 15 August 1950. The Council had before it the report by the Secretary-General (E/1733) briefly summarizing the work of the Conference and the report of the Technical Assistance Board (E/1742). The latter dealt with the Conference, the establishment of the Board, the work it had undertaken and arrangements with regional organizations.

During the discussion in the Committee, the following comments and suggestions were made.

Many members stressed the importance which Governments attached to the technical assistance activities of the United Nations and the specialized agencies. The economic development of the under-developed countries, they felt, could contribute much towards promoting conditions of world peace and security. In this connexion, the international programme of technical assistance had a vital role to play. The Committee was impressed by the variety and scope of technical assistance requested from, or being rendered by, the international agencies to more than 50 countries. The Committee also noted with interest that, although the expanded programme provided for in Council resolution 222 (IX) and General Assembly resolution 304(IV) had only recently come into being, many of the pending requests were already being considered under the new programme.

The implementation of the programmes to which the requests for advice referred would represent an immense effort on the part of the more and the less developed countries alike. Several representatives, among them the representatives of Canada, France and the United States, expressed the opinion that special attention should be given to the achievement of a better balance in the technical assistance to be rendered under the expanded programme in terms of the economic and social needs of the recipient countries, and that the United Nations and specialized agencies should continue to assist Governments at their request in ascertaining the technical assistance requirements of the countries concerned in relation (1) to their own economic plans; (2) to the resources at the disposal of the United Nations and specialized agencies; and (3) to current or projected programmes or requests for technical assistance from all sources. The representative of Canada was of the opinion that the appointment for this purpose of resident technical assistance representatives, wherever appropriate, as discussed in the report of the Technical Assistance Board, would be particularly desirable. The Committee hoped that TAB would, as the programme developed, be in a position to set out criteria to govern the selection of technical assistance projects, especially in view of the limited resources at the disposal of the participating organizations.

The Committee noted with satisfaction the declarations made by some Governments that they envisaged making available to TAB information on their bilateral or regional programmes of technical assistance. The view was expressed by the representative of Australia that the existence of such bilateral or regional programmes should not affect the eligibility of recipient countries to receive technical assistance requested from the United Nations and specialized agencies in accordance with the principles laid down by the Council; the assistance provided through bilateral and regional programmes would be complementary to that provided through the United Nations and the specialized agencies and not a substitute.

Reference was made to the need for full information to be supplied by TAB to TAC in order to enable TAC to carry out the duties entrusted to it with full effectiveness. Inter alia, TAC should receive, within a reasonable period of time, information which would enable it to make an evaluation of the actual results being achieved and to be expected from the expanded programme.

The co-operative spirit which the various participating organizations had shown in accepting the conditions and guiding principles laid down in Council resolution 222 (IX) and to the work of the various secretariats in carrying through the initial stages of the work was praised by the members of the Committee. It was noted that TAB, consisting of representatives of the participating organizations, had had the full co-operation of the International Monetary Fund and of the International Refugee Organization, whose representatives had attended its meetings. The Board and the participating organizations should be given every support by Governments to proceed efficiently and with the necessary freedom of action with their work.

The Committee felt that the expanded programme had made a good start with the pledging of over $20,000,000 by Governments at the Technical Assistance Conference and with the establishment of TAB in effective working order. As regards contributions, the Committee noted that funds had already been made available by certain Governments, although the Technical Assistance Conference had only been recently concluded. It was clear that, now that all the preparatory steps had been taken and the machinery had begun to operate, the under-developed countries could expect action on the programme and could look forward with confidence to its benefits.

The Committee took a number of specific decisions regarding the organization of its work:

- (1) Its sessions should be held twice a year, immediately before or during the early part of Council sessions, as long as the Council held two sessions a year; and the Chairman of the Committee should be authorized to call further sessions of the Committee if and when necessary
- (2) TAB should transmit to TAC, on a monthly basis, lists of requests received by participating organizations;

these lists should be circulated only to members of TAC (3) Analytical reports, describing activities and potential projects, and covering questions of policy, administration and finance, under the expanded programme, should be submitted by TAB to TAC twice yearly, normally at the sessions held in conjunction with sessions of the Council.

The Technical Assistance Committee unanimously recommended (E/1833) that the Council note its first report and the first report of the Technical Assistance Board (E/1742) and transmit the records of the Council and Committee discussions to TAB and the organizations represented on it for guidance in their work.

Following minor drafting changes, the Council, at its 412th plenary meeting on 15 August, unanimously adopted the proposed resolution (E/1833). At its 413th meeting, however, the representative of India expressed the opinion that the Council should also note the Secretary-General's report on the Technical Assistance Conference (E/1733). The Council agreed that such a paragraph should be included in the final resolution. In resolution 291 B (XI) the Council therefore noted with satisfaction the Secretary-General's report on the Conference, noted the first reports of the Technical Assistance Committee and the Technical Assistance Board and transmitted the records of the Council and Committee discussions to the Technical Assistance Board.

By 31 December 1950, approximately 265 requests for assistance under the expanded programme had been received from 55 Governments. Of these, the United Nations received 48 requests (including certain activities under Assembly resolutions 58(I) and 200(III)), ILO received 16; FAO, 62; UNESCO, 39; ICAO, 19; and WHO, 81, 24 of which have been transferred to the regular WHO programme. Six of the 265 requests were submitted by the administering authorities on behalf of five Non-Self-Governing Territories.

One hundred and forty-five projects had been initiated by the United Nations and the participating organizations in 38 countries as follows: United Nations, 21; ILO, 13; FAO, 58²⁰; UNESCO, 13²⁰; ICAO, 12; and WHO, 28. These required the services of approximately 513 experts and the provision of a considerable number of fellowships, a total estimated cost, inclusive of incidental equipment, of $2,106,680. From agreements then under negotiation, 150 additional projects were expected to result.

In addition, the Bank had received eight requests and had initiated six. The Fund, which generally does not report requests received to TAB, stated that it had undertaken sixteen projects during the period.

By the end of 1950, the United Nations and the specialized agencies²¹ were operating in 43 countries as follows:

Latin America: Bolivia, Fund; Brazil, United Nations; Chile, WHO; Colombia, United Nations, ILO, FAO, UNESCO, ICAO, WHO, Fund; Costa Rica, FAO, WHO; Cuba, Bank, Fund; Dominican Republic, WHO; Ecuador, United Nations, ILO, FAO, UNESCO, WHO, Fund; Guatemala, United Nations, ILO, FAO, Bank; Haiti, United Nations, FAO; Honduras, FAO, Fund; Mexico, ILO, UNESCO, WHO; Nicaragua, ICAO, Fund; Paraguay, Fund; Peru, FAO, WHO, Fund; El Salvador, ILO, WHO; Uruguay, FAO, Bank; Venezuela, WHO

Middle East: Egypt¹, ICAO, Fund; Iran, UNESCO, ICAO, WHO; Iraq, United Nations, FAO, UNESCO, ICAO, Bank; Israel, ILO, FAO, ICAO; Jordan, FAO; Lebanon, UNESCO, ICAO, WHO, Fund; Saudi Arabia, FAO, WHO; Syria, FAO, WHO; Turkey, WHO, Bank

Asia and Far East: Afghanistan, United Nations, FAO, WHO; Burma, United Nations, ILO, FAO; Ceylon, FAO, UNESCO, WHO; India, United Nations, FAO, UNESCO, WHO; Indonesia, United Nations, ILO, FAO, UNESCO, ICAO, WHO; Pakistan, ILO, FAO, UNESCO, ICAO; Philippines, United Nations, Fund; Thailand, United Nations, ILO, FAO, UNESCO, ICAO

Europe: Finland, ICAO, Fund; Greece, Fund; Iceland, Bank, Fund; Italy, United Nations, Fund; Yugoslavia, United Nations, FAO

Africa: Ethiopia, ICAO, WHO; Liberia, UNESCO, WHO; Libya, United Nations, FAO, UNESCO, WHO, Fund

The United Nations co-operates in the Expanded Programme through the Technical Assistance Administration, created during the year. The major fields in which technical assistance is provided are industrial development, road, rail, and inland water transport, public finance and fiscal policies, public administration and social welfare. During 1950 the United Nations provided, or was about to provide, for example, a technical assistance resident representative in Colombia to be responsible for co-ordinating the work there of all the agencies. At the end of the year, the United Nations was recruiting for Colombia experts in public utilities, harbour management, central government and local government finance, tax administration, and price and production statistics.

²¹ For specific activities of the specialized agencies, see Part II of this volume.

Experts were sent to Ecuador and Mexico to assist them in using available power resources, including lignite. A social welfare adviser had helped Guatemala to organize a school for training workers for various social services.

In Afghanistan, following an exploratory mission, technical experts were working with the Government to overcome the lack of power and transport facilities. An oil geologist was surveying possible oil resources. A small industries expert advised the Burmese Government on the rehabilitation of certain industries affected by the war, such as paper making and sugar refining, as well as on the organization of marketing for cottage industry output.

The United Nations also sent statisticians to Thailand and Lebanon, among other countries, to aid governments in organizing their basic statistical services.

One request pending at the end of the year was for an expert to assess the possibilities of harnessing the volcanic steam of Santa Lucia, British West Indies, to end the power shortage there.

An important part of the programme is the providing of fellowships for the training of local officials abroad. An Indian hydro-electric engineer, for example, was sent to Canada to study and observe the practices in that country in the use of hydro-electric power in industries. In addition to awarding fellowships to individuals, the United Nations has joined with other agencies to provide a faculty of experts for a regional training institute on how to evaluate the economics of development projects. Fifty-five officials of eight countries in South East Asia spent the last three months of 1950 at Lahore, Pakistan, on such a study.

4. Training for Apprentices and Technical Workers

At its eleventh session the Council had before it at its 395th meeting on 20 July a report (E/1705 & Add. 1) from the International Labour Organisation in response to General Assembly resolution 201 (III).²² The report dealt with arrangements to facilitate the admission of candidates to the world's centres of training for apprentices and technical workers, from countries suffering from a lack of qualified personnel necessary to the development of their national economy.

The report dealt with the nature and scope of the problem and plans for assembling and making available to the countries concerned technical documentary materials on methods of vocational training, for making technical assistance available in introducing modern systems and methods of vocational training in countries planning economic development, and for assistance in the organization and development of technical training abroad. ILO outlined the framework of its programme, indicating the staff to whom it would apply and the types and purposes of the training. The programme would comprise: a study of the needs of the various countries in regard to vocational training abroad; a study of the training possibilities open to foreigners in the various countries and of their development; and a study of measures to solve the general or specific problems raised by training abroad (in particular, choice of candidates, preparation of programmes of study, control of the results of training, financing, problems of exchanges, etc.). ILO stated that a start had already been made to put the programme into effect in co-operation with the other international organizations concerned.

In introducing the report, the representative of the ILO, inter alia, pointed out that the efforts devoted to the extension of external opportunities in the field of technical training could be effective only if they were accompanied by efforts directed toward the systematic organization of technical training within countries which were suffering from a lack of qualified personnel necessary to the development of their national economy. ILO was consequently intensifying its efforts, in various parts of the world, to build up vocational training programmes within countries at the same time as it organized and developed opportunities for training abroad.

During a brief discussion the members of the Council commended ILO on the work it had undertaken. Since a number of representatives had emphasized the close relationship between the technical assistance programme and the programme for the training of apprentices and technical workers, the President suggested that a paragraph should be added to the draft resolution (E/L.71) proposed by France which would draw the attention of the Technical Assistance Board and the organizations participating in the expanded programme of technical assistance to the report. The representative of France accepted this suggestion as well as several drafting changes suggested by the representative of India.

The amended draft resolution was adopted unanimously at the same meeting. By resolution 293 (XI) the Council drew the attention of the Technical Assistance Board and the organizations participating in the expanded programme of technical assistance to the ILO report; noted the work accomplished by ILO; and recommended that ILO pursue and develop, in co-operation with the United Nations and other specialized agencies concerned, its extended programme in this sphere in accordance with the proposals outlined in the report. The resolution further recommended that Member States give their full co-operation in the task undertaken by ILO of extending the possibilities of providing training facilities abroad for apprentices and technical workers.

5. Programme for Training in Public Administration under General Assembly Resolution 246(III)

The General Assembly at its third session had resolved (246(III))²³ that an International Centre for Training in Public Administration should be established under the direction of the United Nations and at its fourth session had approved an amount of $145,000 for the operation of the centre in 1950.

a. CONSIDERATION BY THE ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL AT ITS TENTH SESSION

At its 371st meeting on 2 March 1950 the Council had before it a report, prepared by the Secretary-General (E/1577), on the arrangements considered desirable to co-ordinate the programme of training in public administration with the programme of technical assistance. He reported that it was proposed to organize the International Centre for Training in Public Administration within the Department of Economic Affairs and to develop its activities as an integral part of the whole technical assistance programme. He further informed the Council that certain functions common to the two programmes, such as fellowships, scholarships, seminars and allied activities, were already being planned and organized jointly and would be carried out jointly. In other activities, the Centre would serve as a consultative unit "with respect to all administration aspects of such substantive activities as may arise under the technical assistance programme".

The representatives of France and Belgium felt that it was not the intention of the authors of the two programmes that the International Centre should permanently become an integral part of the technical assistance programme as was implied in the draft resolution proposed by Brazil (E/L.38). They therefore proposed (E/L.39) to insert a reference to the year 1950, since undoubtedly the major part of the Centre's programme during this year would be linked with technical assistance. The representative of Brazil accepted this amendment.

The Committee adopted by 10 votes to 2, with 3 abstentions, a United Kingdom amendment to refer to training in public administration rather than specifically to the Centre's programme. The amended Brazilian resolution (E/L.38) was unanimously adopted as resolution 269 (X). By this resolution the Council noted the report of the Secretary-General on the arrangements considered desirable to co-ordinate during the year 1950 the programme of training in public administration with the programme of technical assistance and requested that a report on the final arrangements be submitted to a subsequent session of the Council.

b. CONSIDERATION BY THE ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL AT ITS ELEVENTH SESSION

The Secretary-General accordingly submitted to the eleventh session of the Council a report (E/1708 & Add. 1 & Add. I/Corr. 1) on the progress of the Centre, describing the work (see below) which had been undertaken and the general plan according to which it would be carried forward. The report stated that it was expected that the organization of the Centre would be completed in 1951.

The Council considered the report at its 379th and 380th plenary meetings on 5 July 1950. During the discussion several representatives, including those of Australia; Canada, Denmark, France, India, the United Kingdom and the United States, stressed that the Centre should not, as a result of a misunderstanding of the Assembly's intention in resolution 246(III), become an academic institution for training on a purely theoretical plane divorced from the practical problems of public administration. The United Kingdom representative pointed out that the Secretary-General's report showed clearly that the phrase "international centre" was to be interpreted in the broad sense of an office for administrative co-ordination and not in the narrower sense of a particular geographic location. The representatives of Brazil and China felt that the establishment of a central unit was essential.

The Council, by 6 votes to 3, with 5 abstentions, rejected an oral Brazilian amendment which proposed that the title should read "International Centre for Training in Public Administration", as originally drafted, instead of "Programme for training in public administration", which had been accepted by Peru.

Several representatives, among others the representatives of Brazil and the United States, expressed concern at the slow pace at which the programme was being implemented. The majority expressed satisfaction at the arrangements made by the Secretary-General to co-ordinate the programme of training in public administration with the programmes of technical assistance.

Following the acceptance by the representatives of Peru of several drafting amendments, presented by France, the Council voted on the other proposed amendments to the Peruvian draft resolution (E/L.49).

By 8 votes to 6, the Council rejected an amendment by India (E/L.55) which would delete the recommendations for Assembly action, thereby making the recommendations stem from the Council itself. However, the representative of Peru accepted a Canadian amendment (E/L.54) which would have the same effect as the Indian proposal except that it would retain the paragraph which noted with approval that the Secretary-General had included in the 1951 budget the same amount as was appropriated in 1950.

On the suggestion of the representatives of India and Canada, the Council agreed that the Council should, itself, recommend action, rather than call on the Assembly to do so.

By 11 votes to 3, with 1 abstention, the Council adopted a Canadian amendment (E/L.54) which would recommend that additional activities undertaken in the field of training in public administration at the request of Member Governments should be considered under the Expanded Programme rather than commit the Council to definite financial action under the Expanded Programme.

Following the adoption of another drafting amendment suggested by India, the Council, at its 380th meeting on 5 July 1950, unanimously adopted the draft resolution (E/L.49), as amended. Resolution 292 (XI) read as follows:

The Economic and Social Council

Notes with approval the arrangements made by the Secretary-General and contained in document E/1708 submitted to the Council in accordance with Economic and Social Council resolution 269(X); and further

Notes with approval that the Secretary-General has included in the budget for 1951 the same amount as was appropriated by the General Assembly in 1950 for the purpose of carrying out the activities authorized under General Assembly resolution 246(III); and Recommends that additional activities undertaken in the field of training in public administration at the request of Member Governments should be considered under the Expanded Programme for Technical Assistance.

c. ACTIVITIES DURING 1950

The first seminar of the Public Administration Programme opened at the United Nations Headquarters on 30 October and was scheduled to close on 30 January 1951. The seminar, the subject of which was public personnel management, was attended by officials from the following nineteen Member States: Australia, Belgium, Canada, China, Colombia, Costa Rica, Denmark, Ecuador, Egypt, France, Haiti, Israel, Norway, Pakistan, Philippines, Thailand, United Kingdom, United States and Uruguay.

One hundred and twenty-three nominations for scholarships in public administration were submitted during 1950 and 32 fellowships and 25 scholarships awarded to candidates from 24 countries. The fellowships and scholarships were provided mainly in the following fields: principles of public administration; public finance and fiscal policies; principles of organization; public personnel administration; administrative regulations; administrative planning; government corporations; public relations; state and municipal administration; organization and management of services for purchase and control of supplies; public utilities regulation and related problems; and administrative regulation and adjudication.

The Secretary-General entered into an agreement with the International Institute of Administrative Sciences of Brussels covering the provision of documentary material to the United Nations on such subjects as the improvement of administrative practices, organization and methods, structure and operation of central government, problems of personnel administration, budget management and fiscal administration.

By the end of 1950 the Institute had already undertaken several projects, including a report on the value of central "organization and methods" offices within government administrations and a draft model statute or regulation outlining their structure and defining their functions; a manual on the technique of conducting studies of administrative organization and methods within national administrations; a guide to the establishment of civil service systems in countries which at present do not have such systems or wish to improve their present systems; a report, based on administrative surveys of national governments, summarizing the problems to be dealt with in the conduct of administrative surveys; and a summary report on the central administrative planning and co-ordinating facilities which governments are setting up to deal with public administration matters.

6. General Consideration of Economic Development by the Assembly at Its Fifth Session

The General Assembly considered the over-all question of economic development of under-developed countries at the 119th to 135th meetings of its Second Committee from 9 October to 8 November and at its 312th plenary meeting on 20 November 1950.

a. GENERAL DEBATE IN THE SECOND COMMITTEE

During the general debate in the Second Committee from 9 to 19 October the General Assembly discussed the general principles which should govern action with regard to the economic development of under-developed countries and which would ensure smooth international co-operation, the existing obstacles to and the problem of financing economic development, and the United Nations programmes of technical assistance.

Primary attention was paid to the question of financing economic development. In this connexion the Committee discussed the role of domestic capital resources and how it could be increased; how far the needs could be met by the present sources of foreign finances (private, governmental and international); and what part could be played by bilateral arrangements, private capital and international agencies, especially the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development. The question of the desirability of creating a new international agency for financing economic development was again discussed and the need for giving special attention to non-self-liquidating projects was stressed. It was generally agreed that much remained to be done to further economic development, particularly in making specific and practical recommendations for international action for its financing.

As in the Council, it was generally agreed that while under-developed countries should contribute as much as possible toward their development from their own resources, their scale of production was too low to leave a margin for savings, and therefore external financing was necessary.

The representatives of India, Pakistan and the Philippines pointed out that it was futile to expect substantial domestic savings in countries where the masses had a sub-marginal existence and inflation had depleted the middle class, the major source of such savings. The representative of Iran thought that if basic projects had to be financed through domestic savings, inflation would result. The representative of Yugoslavia stressed that if domestic resources were relied on completely they would upset the fixed relationship between investment and consumption and cause a rapid change in the structure of the national economy; this would inevitably lead to social repercussions and would endanger the stability of the national currency.

The representative of France pointed out that it should also be remembered that improvements in the productivity of under-developed countries might temporarily disturb their balance of payments. The exports of such countries depend more on an increased national income in the larger importing countries than on a decrease in their own production costs.

The representatives of the Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, Poland the Ukrainian SSR and the USSR felt that funds should come mainly from the internal resources of the under-developed countries. Foreign finances should be provided only as an additional source and national sovereignty must be assured.

The United Kingdom representative pointed out that development needs were no longer being met by the flow of private capital as they had been in the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. War had weakened the economies of the Western European countries which had during that period supplied most of the capital to the rest of the world. Economic troubles since the First World War had discouraged investors from risking capital abroad. Moreover, returns expected from investments abroad were often no greater than those expected from home investment and involved much greater risk. Another difficulty was that, as far as the United States was concerned, a substantial portion of the existing private capital was in trust funds and thus not available. The representative of the USSR, however, claimed that, instead of declining, the rate of profit on foreign investment was in fact increasing visibly.

The representatives of Brazil, Chile and Colombia, among others, maintained that developed countries should undertake more conscious direction of foreign investment policy to ensure a more stable and adequate flow of capital to under-developed countries.

The representative of New Zealand considered that the United Nations should direct its attention to giving full information and advice on how to attract foreign capital. The principle of untied lending, he stressed, should be increasingly observed in all governmentally controlled or supported foreign lending.

The representatives of Brazil, Colombia and the Philippines felt that inducements had to be offered to attract foreign capital, while the representative of India thought that such attempts would be difficult, if not in vain, as long as opportunities for capital investment existed in the lending countries themselves.

The representative of Mexico thought that investments should promote activities likely to lay a sound basis for development despite the absence of immediate profits. He felt that they were refusing to recognize the reality that foreign capitalists were no longer seeking investment privileges to which they had been accustomed and it was this, not a lack of favourable conditions, that had slowed the flow of foreign capital.

The representative of China warned against private loans impairing the sovereignty of under-developed countries.

The representatives of the Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, Poland, the Ukrainian SSR and the USSR held that under-developed countries must be able to build up national industries, including heavy industries, and develop their agriculture. Governmental methods must be taken within the under-developed countries themselves to create favourable conditions for industrial development. The situation would improve, they felt, if under-developed countries ceased to be appendages of developed countries and mere economic outlets and sources of cheap labour. Financing of economic development would be easier if the shares of national income which now left the country to pay profit to foreign shareholders or in repayment of foreign debts remained within the country. Internal resources would then be ample to finance economic development. Foreign loans, they stressed, should be made without economic, political or military conditions which would place the lender in a privileged position. Rapid economic development was possible if appropriate social and political conditions prevailed.

The representatives of Egypt, Iran, Iraq, Lebanon, Syria, Turkey and Yemen considered that private investments from abroad were insufficient and likely to interfere with the independence of the borrowing country. More emphasis, therefore, should be placed on investments by Governments or international agencies.

The representative of Brazil suggested that under-developed countries could conclude bilateral agreements with capital-exporting countries for joint development plans.

The representative of Haiti once again suggested that a financial security covenant should be drawn up to safeguard foreign investors against the risks of excessive taxation, nationalization, confiscation or exchange control, and to safeguard the beneficiary countries against foreign control and domination.

The representative of Yugoslavia felt that too much attention had been paid to financing from private sources and that such financing would only achieve positive results if concentrated under the control of the Bank. He suggested that in order to meet the financial needs of under-developed countries which could not be met from these sources, a solution might be found by considering new methods of financing from international public funds.

A number of representatives, including those of Belgium, Chile, Egypt, France, Iran, Iraq, Lebanon, Syria, Turkey and Yugoslavia, were of the opinion that the Bank's operations should be expanded and liberalized. In this connexion the United States representative noted with approval the new policies of the Bank, such as the wide geographical distribution of its loans, the enlargement of its technical assistance activities, the broader scope of the projects it was financing, and the promise of greater flexibility with regard to financing local currency costs. The representative of Greece, among others, felt that it should be transformed from an institution relying on private lending to one relying on public lending and should be enabled to borrow from Governments to make loans for general development purposes. The representative of Brazil thought that a separate department should be set up within the Bank, while the representatives of India, Iran, Turkey, the Philippines and Pakistan supported the creation of a new international agency. The representative of Pakistan suggested that a financial assistance board set up to deal with the financial needs of under-developed countries particularly in respect to non-self-liquidating projects might be empowered to grant long-term loans at low rates of interest. It could also issue bonds for subscription by all the people of the world who believed in United Nations objectives. He thought that certain Governments and agencies might be prepared to make loans to such a body.

Several representatives, among them those of Australia, Greece, India, the United Kingdom and the United States, stressed the importance of financing those projects which yield no direct financial return—such as roads, bridges, and schools—but which are basic to the development of large-scale agricultural, industrial or commercial projects. It was pointed out that while the other types of project, which would have direct though possibly no immediate returns—such as railways, mining, light industries—had been financed to some extent by private investment and Bank loans, the former type of project did not lend itself to private investment.

The representative of Australia felt that rapid progress in financing non-self-liquidating projects could best be tackled on a regional basis as was, for example, being done under the Commonwealth Plan to aid Southeast Asia.

With regard to the United Nations programmes for technical assistance, the Second Committee praised the work which had been accomplished.

In discussing the general principles involved in carrying out technical assistance programmes, the representative of Iraq stressed that any such programme must aim at developing both agriculture and industry. If agriculture alone were stressed, development would be painfully slow.

The representative of Saudi Arabia wanted a more precise definition of technical assistance. He considered that standards should be set up to determine the urgency, priority and amount of aid which various regions were entitled to request, taking into account political factors. For example, he held that it would be unfair in the Middle East to give priority to a State with a considerable force of trained immigrant labour and access to foreign capital.

The Ukrainian SSR representative stressed that technical assistance must have as its aim full economic and political independence of recipient countries and assistance given only on request. The representative of Yugoslavia held that the country concerned should have exclusive rights in deciding upon programmes and projects and that the specialized agencies should not insist on their own conceptions of economic development in giving technical assistance. The representatives of the Byelorussian SSR and the USSR stressed that assistance should correspond to the needs of the recipient country's economy and not to the requirements of the world's market.

The representative of Poland was of the opinion that by separating technical assistance from the general question of economic development, and by limiting the studies and debates to financing, the problem of furthering development had been transformed into an effort to extend the field for profit-making investments.

The representative of Mexico suggested that the scope of the technical assistance programme should be broadened. It should be co-ordinated with financial assistance, assistance should be distributed on an equitable basis, close adherence should be maintained to the basic principles guiding the programme, concrete assistance rather than investigations should be emphasized, staff selected should be conversant with the problems of the country concerned and assisted by qualified staff from the recipient country, and technical assistance should not become a pretext for intervention in the internal affairs of the recipient country.

Among the specific suggestions for implementing the technical assistance programmes, was that of the representative of Turkey, who urged that inter-regional activities should be undertaken to complement the technical assistance programmes. With regard to the expanded programme of technical assistance, the representative of China stressed the need for employing experts familiar with the areas to which they were sent, and the representative of Yemen suggested that the programme be increased by means of more fellowships and more experts. The representative of Haiti felt that the costs of maintaining experts were too high for small countries and suggested that the beneficiary Government should be responsible only for the board and lodging of United Nations experts, the United Nations bearing the other expenses.

The representative of Bolivia noted that the fate of the expanded programme of technical assistance would depend on its administration. Among other things, dissipation of efforts should be avoided; Member Countries should concentrate their requests upon a group of related problems; every country should be prepared to contribute to the expenditures which technical aid entailed; and every ministry and public undertaking should make every possible effort to recover the funds it had invested by putting the expert advice into practice. The representative of Greece thought that the Bank should participate in the technical assistance programmes and that its work should be co-ordinated with that of other participating agencies.

b. FINANCING ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT OF UNDER-DEVELOPED COUNTRIES

The Second Committee had before it two draft resolutions on the financing of economic development of under-developed countries. The first (A/C.2/L.35 & Add.1), submitted jointly by Egypt, Iraq, Lebanon, Syria, Yemen and Yugoslavia, suggested that the Economic and Social Council on the basis of the work of an inter-governmental committee to be established by the Council for this purpose, should consider and report to the sixth regular session of the General Assembly on the extension of the international machinery through which international public funds could be made available to accelerate economic development.

The representative of Cuba spoke in favour of the resolution. Those opposing it, among them the representatives of Australia and the United States, were not in favour of the establishment of a special agency to finance development, which they felt the draft resolution implied.

The second draft resolution (A/C.2/L.38), submitted jointly by Pakistan and the United Kingdom, recommended that the Economic and Social Council should consider in greater detail the problem of financing non-self-liquidating projects which were basic to economic development and work out plans for implementation.

The Committee discussed the draft resolutions at its 127th meeting on 19 October, together with the relevant amendments. The first amendment submitted by Cuba (A/C.2/L.40) to the joint draft resolution proposed by Egypt, Iraq, Lebanon, Syria, Yemen and Yugoslavia (A/C.2/L.35 & Add.1) suggested that the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development make concurrently a study on the same subject with a view to the adoption of a more active and liberal financing policy; the second, submitted by Greece (A/C.2/L.43) to the joint Pakistan and United Kingdom draft resolution (A/C.2/L.38), substituted a new text for the last paragraph of that draft resolution recommending that the Economic and Social Council continue to consider the problem of financing economic development, and work out schemes for the expansion and steadier flow of foreign capital with special attention to the financing of non-self-liquidating projects. The representatives of Pakistan and the United Kingdom agreed to an oral amendment by the United States to indicate that a number of those basic social and economic development projects—particularly public health and educational institutions —because of the fact that they were non-self-liquidating, were sometimes not capable of being serviced through existing sources of foreign finance. Since the Committee had welcomed the Bank's efforts to service non-self-liquidating projects, the United States representative considered it should not "recognize" that "most" of such projects were not capable of being serviced by the Bank.

The Second Committee set up a Sub-Committee consisting of the representatives of Cuba, Egypt, Greece, Pakistan, United Kingdom, United States and Yugoslavia, to draft a resolution based on the two original draft resolutions and the relevant amendments. The Sub-Committee met once and unanimously agreed on the text of a resolution (A/C.2/L.46), which was considered by the Second Committee at its 128th meeting on 31 October and unanimously adopted (A/1524B). The General Assembly, at its 312th meeting on 20 November 1950, without discussion unanimously adopted the resolution proposed by the Second Committee as resolution 400 (V). It read as follows:

The General Assembly

Taking note of the report of the fourth session of the Sub-Commission on Economic Development, the experts' report entitled "National and International Measures for Full Employment", the report of the fourth session of the Economic and Employment Commission to the Economic and Social Council, and the report of the Economic and Social Council to the fifth session of the General Assembly,

Taking note further of the studies prepared by the Secretary-General in pursuance of Economic and Social Council resolutions 179(VIII) and 222D(IX),

Recognizing that a more rapid economic development of under-developed countries, in particular an increase of their production, is essential for raising the level of productive employment and the living standards of their populations, for the growth of the world economy as a whole and for the maintenance of international peace and security,

Recognizing further that, although the economic development of under-developed countries depends primarily upon the efforts of the people of those countries, the necessary acceleration of that development, on the basis of their own plans and programmes, requires not only technical but also financial assistance from abroad, and particularly from the more developed countries,

Considering that the domestic financial resources of the under-developed countries, together with the international flow of capital for investment, have not been sufficient to assure the desired rate of economic development, and that the accelerated economic development of under-developed countries requires a more effective and sustained mobilization of domestic savings and an expanded and more stable flow of foreign capital investment,

Being convinced that the volume of private capital which is currently flowing into under-developed countries cannot meet the financial needs of the economic development of the under-developed countries and that those needs cannot be met without an increased flow of international public funds,

Taking account of the fact that some basic development projects are not capable of being adequately serviced through existing sources of foreign finance although they contribute directly or indirectly to the increase of national productivity and national income,

1. Recommends that the Economic and Social Council, in giving further study to the problem of the financing of economic development, consider practical methods, conditions and policies for achieving the adequate expansion and steadier flow of foreign capital, both private and public, and pay special attention to the financing of non-self-liquidating projects which are basic to economic development;

2. Calls upon the governments of all Member States and the specialized agencies concerned to submit to the Economic and Social Council any proposals bearing upon the present resolution;

3. Requests the Economic and Social Council to submit its recommendations to the sixth session of the General Assembly.

c. LAND REFORM AND DEVELOPMENT OF ARID LAND

The Committee, at its 127th meeting, also began discussion of the draft resolution submitted by Poland (A/C.2/L.36), which proposed that the Council, at its thirteenth session and on the basis of a report to be prepared by the Secretary-General, draw up recommendations for improving the conditions of landless peasants, and those with small and medium-sized holdings by (a) land reforms; (b) governmental aid through cheap agricultural credit facilities and comprehensive technical assistance; (c) construction of small factories and workshops for making and repairing essential agricultural machinery, equipment and spare parts; (d) easing the tax burden; and (e) other welfare measures.

During the discussion at the 127th, 128th and 129th meetings on 9 and 31 October and 1 November, the majority supported the proposal in principle, although a number of amendments were presented.

The representative of the United Kingdom thought that the Polish resolution prejudged the findings of the investigation called for and he agreed with the representatives of Canada and South Africa that to call for more reports would delay immediate action. He proposed (A/C.2/L.52) that the Council act, in consultation with FAO and other specialized agencies concerned, to provide Governments of under-developed countries with expert advice: (a) for developing land reform plans; (b) for rendering financial aid to farmers through agricultural credit facilities; (c) for constructing workshops to repair and service agricultural machinery and (d) for other measures to promote the welfare of agricultural communities.

The representative of Egypt supported this amendment and wished also to refer (A/C.2/L.51) not only to agrarian reforms, but also to development of arid zones and the need for the United Nations to devote more attention to the problem of the landless peasants and those with small and middle holdings.

The representative of Cuba suggested (A/C.2/L.41) that in addition to the measures recommended for improving conditions, mention should be made of measures for the satisfactory utilization of large agricultural estates in cases where their retention was necessary owing to the type of agriculture carried on.

The representative of Poland accepted a Cuban amendment (A/C.2/L.41) to paragraph (c) of his draft resolution, to indicate that the factories and shops should also be used for storage of spare parts and that they should be financed either by direct state action or through suitably-financed co-operative groups.

The United States representative stated that he agreed with the principle in the draft resolution that land should belong to those who cultivated it. His amendment (A/C.2/L.54) was designed to facilitate and promote family-owned and operated farms and rural co-operatives for the benefit of small farmers. This amendment was supported by the representatives of Venezuela, Chile and Greece.

The representative of Haiti (A/C.2/L.47/-Rev.1) suggested that where the words "backward countries" appeared, they should be replaced by the words "under-developed countries". All under-developed countries which might apply for technical aid were not necessarily backward. He also proposed that the Secretary-General should report on the agrarian structure of under-developed countries, and on "methods for improving (in countries suitable therefor) the conditions of the landless peasants who constitute the agricultural force, with a view to securing them in possession of inalienable family holdings".

The representative of Yugoslavia presented an amendment (A/C.2/L.48) to indicate that industrialization should play a prominent part in development.

The Second Committee, at its 129th meeting, decided to refer the draft resolution and amendments to a sub-committee consisting of the representatives of Cuba, Egypt, Haiti, Poland, the United States, the United Kingdom and Yugoslavia. The representative of FAO also participated in the work of the Sub-Committee which met on 2 November and unanimously agreed on two draft resolutions (A/C.2/L.60)—one on land reform and the other concerning the development of arid land. The latter was based on the proposals of the Egyptian representative (A/C.2/L.51) (see above). The Second Committee considered these draft resolutions at its 134th and 135th meetings on 8 November.

(1) Land Reform

The Committee rejected the following amendments to the draft resolution proposed by the Sub-Committee:

- (i) A Peruvian oral amendment, which would have the Council, when making recommendations for the improvement of conditions of agricultural populations, take into account such factors as the industrial growth and the foreign trade of the countries concerned (rejected by 24 votes to 2, with 19 abstentions),
- (ii) An Argentine oral amendment, to delete the word "small" in reference to factories and workshops, to delete the reference to "most essential" agricultural machinery, and to delete the words "locally based" in reference to the enterprises for the processing of agricultural products (rejected by varying votes).
- (iii) A Haitian amendment (A/C.2/L.64), which would refer to the need for providing landless peasants with inalienable family holdings (rejected by 16 votes to 3, with 26 abstentions).

The representative of Uruguay asked for a clarification of the nature of the study requested of the Secretary-General, especially with reference to sub-paragraph (a) on the institution of appropriate land reforms. The Secretary of the Committee explained that the sub-paragraph concerned one of the methods for improving the conditions of the agricultural populations, and stated that the phrase "institution of appropriate land reform" comprised the entire complex of relationships between ownership of land and the actual cultivation of land and that the Council was to consider such reforms of those relationships as would tend to remove any which impede economic development and depress the standard of living of agricultural workers and tenants and of small and medium-sized farmers.

It was agreed that the explanation would be embodied in the Rapporteur's report.

The draft resolution as proposed by the Sub-Committee (A/C.2/L.60 A), with minor drafting amendments, was adopted by the Second Committee (A/1524 C) at its 135th meeting on 8 November, by 50 votes to none, with 1 abstention. The General Assembly, at its 312th plenary meeting on 20 November 1950, without further discussion, adopted the proposal unanimously as resolution 401(V). It read as follows:

The General Assembly,

Bearing in mind the many resolutions adopted by the General Assembly and by the Economic and Social Council concerning the economic development of under-developed countries in which industrialization as well as the development of agriculture must play an essential part,

Considering, however, that agrarian conditions which persist in many under-developed countries and territories constitute a barrier to their economic development because such conditions are a major cause of low agricultural productivity and of low standards of living for the populations of those countries and territories,

Convinced that immediate steps should be taken to study the extent to which existing agrarian conditions hamper the economic development of under-developed countries as well as to assist Governments, at their request, in the utilization of the facilities available in the United Nations and the specialized agencies for the improvement of such conditions,

1. Recommends that the Secretary-General, in co-operation with the Food and Agriculture Organization and in consultation with other appropriate specialized agencies, prepare and submit to the thirteenth session of the Economic and Social Council an analysis of the degree to which unsatisfactory forms of agrarian structure and, in particular, systems of land tenure, in the under-developed countries and territories impede economic development and thus depress the standards of living especially of agricultural workers and tenants and of small and medium-sized farmers;

2. Calls upon the Economic and Social Council to consider the analysis referred to above and to prepare recommendations to the General Assembly with a view to the improvement of the conditions of agricultural populations, paying special attention to such measures as the following:

- (a) Institution of appropriate land reform;
- (b) Appropriate action on the part of the governments concerned to render financial aid to agricultural workers and tenants and to small and medium-sized farmers through cheap agricultural credit facilities, comprehensive technical assistance and the promotion of rural co-operatives;
- (c) Construction or development, either by direct government action or suitably financed co-operative groups, of
 - (i) Small factories and workshops for the manufacture, maintenance, repair and servicing of the most essential agricultural machinery and for the storage of spare parts;
 - (ii) Locally-based enterprises for the processing of agricultural products;
- (d) Taxation policies designed to lighten, to the greatest possible extent, the tax burden on tenants and small and medium-sized farmers;
- (e) Promotion of family owned and operated farms and of co-operative farms, as well as of other measures to promote the security of tenure and the welfare of agricultural workers and tenants and of small and medium-sized farmers;

3. Recommends to the governments of the under-developed countries concerned that they avail themselves of the facilities available to them through the United Nations expanded programme of technical assistance, in order that they may obtain expert advice in the planning of such measures as those listed in the preceding paragraph, for the purpose of improving agrarian conditions.

(2) Development of Arid Land

In the course of the discussion of the draft resolution on the development of arid land, the representative of the USSR objected to the implication that an increase in the population was undesirable. He thought, rather, that the resolution should point out that it was essential to develop national resources which would satisfy the needs of a growing population. He therefore presented an oral amendment suggesting the deletion of the paragraph. He agreed, however, to the amendment which was put forth by the representative of Egypt and finally accepted by the Committee (see below, (b)). The Committee, by 24 votes to 11, with 10 abstentions, rejected an oral amendment by Colombia to replace the word "arid" with the word "uncultivated" wherever it occurred.

The draft resolution as proposed by the Sub-Committee (A/C.2/L.60 B), as amended, was unanimously adopted by the Second Committee (A/1524 D), at its 135th meeting on 8 November, and by the General Assembly, at its 312th plenary meeting on 20 November 1950, (402-(V)). It read as follows:

The General Assembly,

Considering that:

(a) One of the basic reasons for the low standard of living in certain under-developed countries is the inadequate extent of the areas at present under cultivation,

(b) The continual increase in the populations of these countries requires the adoption of appropriate and urgent measures for the development of their resources,

(c) It is essential in the above circumstances, if the equitable distribution of land is to be promoted and the standard of living raised, that, among other measures, the areas at present under cultivation be increased by the development of arid zones,

(d) The Economic and Social Council, in resolution 324 D (XI) of 9 August 1950, has recommended an intensification of scientific research to promote the economic and social progress of mankind and has recognized the necessity for co-ordinating the efforts of the various competent bodies of the United Nations and the specialized agencies in order to study the problems of the arid zones both in their scientific and in their practical aspects,

1. Recommends that the Secretary-General prepare, in collaboration with the competent specialized agencies, a report on the practical measures adopted for the study of the problems of arid zones and on the technical and financial means employed by the specialized agencies for this purpose;

2. Invites the Secretary-General to submit his report on this matter not later than to the fourteenth session of the Economic and Social Council;

3. Calls upon the Economic and Social Council to examine the report and, with a view to facilitating and encouraging the development of arid land, to consider such measures as:

(a) Devoting sufficient technical and financial means to the study of the relevant scientific and practical problems;

(b) Promoting and co-ordinating the activities of the United Nations and the specialized agencies to that end;

(c) Furnishing appropriate technical assistance to the governments concerned.

d. VOLUME AND DISTRIBUTION OF NATIONAL INCOME IN UNDER-DEVELOPED COUNTRIES

The Committee discussed, at its 129th to 133rd meetings from 31 October to 3 November, a draft resolution submitted by Poland (A/C.2/L.37) requesting the Secretary-General to submit to the Economic and Social Council a report on the level and distribution of national income in under-developed countries and territories, with particular regard to the part of the income accruing to foreign companies or used for the liquidation of foreign debt. The proposal was supported in general by the representatives of Brazil, Burma, Czechoslovakia, Egypt, India and the USSR. Among those opposed were the representatives of Belgium, Haiti, New Zealand, Peru, the United Kingdom and the United States. An amendment proposed by Cuba (A/C.2/L.42) specified in greater detail the nature of the proposed study. An amendment submitted by Yugoslavia (A/C.2/L.49) proposed that the references to foreign debt and foreign companies and firms be accompanied by words "private and other". These two amendments were accepted by Poland and incorporated in a revised draft of its proposal (A/C.2/L.37/Rev.1).

To this revised text, Chile proposed to add two paragraphs (A/C.2/L.54): to recommend that the under-developed countries give special consideration to studies relating to the calculation of national income and its distribution and that such studies should be made in connexion with those recommended by resolution 294 D (XI)²⁴ of the Economic and Social Council, in order to avoid duplication of effort. The representative of Cuba proposed (A/C.2/L.55) to amend the first paragraph of the preamble to indicate the desirability of knowing the volume of national income and the effect of its distribution on the rate of economic development in under-developed countries, in connexion with the mobilization of resources for the acceleration of economic development. Subsequently, both Chile and Cuba withdrew their respective amendments and submitted a joint draft amendment (A/C.2/L.56), substituting for the revised Polish draft a new single text which incorporated these points. The Committee agreed to consider this amendment as a new proposal. An oral amendment to the revised Polish draft was made by France, to change the word "constitutes" to "may constitute" in the third paragraph of the preamble; this amendment was adopted by the Committee. The revised Polish draft resolution was then voted on paragraph by paragraph. Since the operative part of the proposal was rejected by 24 votes to 16, with 7 abstentions, the Chairman declared the entire proposal to be rejected.

The joint draft resolution proposed by Chile and Cuba (A/C.2/L.56) proposed that the General Assembly should recommend that under-developed countries should devote special attention to the national income studies; request the Secretary-General to give favourable consideration to requests for technical assistance for this purpose; and request the Economic and Social Council to study and report on the volume and distribution of national income in those countries, particularly with respect to the various income groups and the ability of countries to meet their foreign commitments arising from loans and investments. These studies were to take into account the statistical data compiled by the Secretary-General and were to be made in connexion with the studies recommended by Economic and Social Council resolution 294 D (XI).

The Committee adopted, by 40 votes to 1, with 1 abstention, an amendment by Poland (A/C.2/L.57), directing the Secretary-General to prepare and submit to the Economic and Social Council a report to enable it to carry out the request of the General Assembly, but rejected by 24 votes to 8, with 13 abstentions, another amendment by Poland (A/C.2/L.57), which would require the Council to report in particular on the parts of the national income used for servicing of foreign debts, instead of reporting on the ability of the countries to meet their foreign commitments arising from loans and investments. The sponsors of the joint draft resolution then accepted an amendment by Peru (A/C.2/L.59), which would require the Council to study and report on the amounts used by the under-developed countries to meet their foreign commitments, instead of on their ability to meet them. By varying votes, the Committee also adopted amendments proposed by the United States (A/C.2/L.61), to refer in the preamble to Economic and Social Council resolution 299 E (XI);²⁵ to request not only the Secretary-General but also the specialized agencies concerned to give favourable consideration to requests of under-developed countries for technical assistance in their national income studies; and to reword the final paragraph of the draft resolution. On the basis of an amendment proposed by Uruguay (A/C.2/L.58), the sponsors of the joint draft resolution agreed to substitute the words "respective proportions" for the word "relations" in the operative part. The Committee, however, rejected, by 23 votes to 7, with 9 abstentions, the Uruguayan proposal to replace the word "ability" in the operative part by the words "financial ability".

The joint draft resolution proposed by Chile and Cuba, as amended, was adopted by the Committee (A/1524 E) by 38 votes to none, with 8 abstentions.

The General Assembly, without discussion at its 312th plenary meeting on 20 November 1950, unanimously adopted the resolution proposed by the Second Committee as resolution 403 (V). It read as follows:

The General Assembly,

Considering that, in order to mobilize better their resources with a view to accelerating their economic development, it is desirable that the under-developed countries should have knowledge of their national income and its distribution,

Noting Economic and Social Council resolution 299 E (XI) of 12 July 1950 concerning national income and social accounts,

1. Recommends that the under-developed countries should devote special attention to studies directed towards the calculation of their national income and its distribution;

2. Requests the Secretary-General and the specialized agencies concerned to give the most favourable consideration possible to requests for technical assistance made for the above purpose;

3. Requests the Economic and Social Council to study and report on the volume and distribution of national income in the under-developed countries, with special reference to:

(i) The various income groups and the respective proportions between them;

(ii) The amounts used by these countries to meet their foreign commitments arising from loans and investments, public and private, and the payment of services;

²⁵ See pp. 493-94.

4. Directs the Secretary-General to prepare and submit to the Economic and Social Council a report to enable it to carry out the request made in paragraph 3 above;

5. Requests the Secretary-General, in carrying out studies relating to the present resolution, to avoid any duplication with the study recommended in paragraph 16 of Economic and Social Council resolution 294 D (XI) of 12 August 1950.

e. ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT AND INTERNATIONAL ECONOMIC AND COMMERCIAL POLICY

A draft resolution submitted by Cuba (A/C.2/L.39), reaffirming General Assembly resolution 307 (IV)²⁶ on international commercial policy, and requesting the Secretary-General to submit to the sixth session of the Assembly a report on the effect of international commercial policy on economic development plans, was considered at the 133rd and 135th meetings of the Second Committee on 3 and 8 November. Two amendments were submitted: one by the Ukrainian SSR (A/C.2/L.53), another by Greece (A/C.2/L.62). The first was designed to express the fact that the position of certain countries as regards their imports and exports is an important factor in economic development, instead of stating that the economic welfare of most countries depends at least in some degree on their imports and exports, and that these imports and exports are directly affected by prevailing commercial policies. The second would request the group of experts appointed under Council resolution 290 (XI)²⁷ to pay due attention to the influence that prevailing commercial policies have on national plans for economic development of under-developed countries. The representative of Cuba agreed to revise his draft resolution (A/C.2/L.39/Rev.1) to incorporate the substance of these two amendments and the representatives of the Ukrainian SSR and Greece therefore withdrew them as such. Two amendments were then proposed by Canada (A/C.2/L.63) to the revised draft. The first, which proposed to delete the words "at least in some degree" in the first paragraph of the preamble of the revised draft, was adopted by the Committee by 39 votes to none, with 7 abstentions. The representative of Canada withdrew a second amendment in favour of an oral amendment by Chile, to the effect that the United Nations and its specialized agencies must thoroughly and continuously study this problem. The Chilean amendment was accepted by the representative of Cuba. The draft resolution submitted by Cuba, as amended, was unanimously adopted by the Committee (A/1524 F) at its 135th meeting on 8 November and by the General Assembly (404(V)), at its 312th plenary meeting on 20 November 1950. It read as follows:

The General Assembly,

Considering that the economic welfare of most countries depends on their imports and exports, and that these imports and exports are directly affected by prevailing commercial policies,

Considering further that the United Nations and its specialized agencies must thoroughly and continuously study the extent to which prevailing commercial policies influence the plans for economic development of under-developed countries,

Reaffirms General Assembly resolution 307 (IV) of 16 November 1949 concerning economic development and international economic and commercial policy, and requests that the group of experts, to be appointed by the Secretary-General under Economic and Social Council resolution 290 (XI), paragraph 13, after consultation with the Executive Secretary of the Interim Commission for the International Trade Organization, pay due attention to the influence that prevailing commercial policies have on national plans for the economic development of under-developed countries.

f. TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE ACTIVITIES UNDER GENERAL ASSEMBLY RESOLUTION 200(III)

The draft resolution on this subject recommended by the Economic and Social Council (291 A (XI))²⁸ was considered by the Second Committee at its 127th meeting. The representative of Egypt pointed out that the sum voted for the 1950 budget had been $539,000. However, it had been reduced later to $508,420 because of economies resulting from the devaluation of currencies. The funds of the special account were already inadequate, he felt, and the regular programme should not be financed from it. He presented an amendment to make certain that the full $539,000 should be voted again, but later withdrew it on the understanding that the Rapporteur's report would indicate that the Committee desired the figure to be not less than this amount.²⁹ The draft resolution as proposed by the Council (A/1359) was unanimously adopted at the 127th meeting of the Second Committee on 19 October and at the 312th plenary meeting of the General Assembly on 20 November 1950 (399(V)). It read as follows:

The General Assembly,

Having decided at its fourth session (resolution 305 (IV)) that the regular budget of the United Nations should continue to provide for the activities authorized by General Assembly resolution 200(III),

1. Notes with approval that the Secretary-General has included in the budget of the United Nations for the year 1951 the same amount as was appropriated by the General Assembly in 1950;

2. Recommends that the requests for technical assistance for economic development received by the Secretary-General in accordance with resolution 200(III) which cannot be financed with funds provided on the regular budget of the United Nations, should be eligible for financing from the special account for technical assistance for economic development established in accordance with General Assembly resolution 304 (IV) and with the actions of the Technical Assistance Conference convened by the Secretary-General under the terms of Economic and Social Council resolution 222A (IX).

7. Other Related Activities

a. UNITED NATIONS SCIENTIFIC CONFERENCE ON THE CONSERVATION AND UTILIZATION OF RESOURCES

At its tenth session, the Council had before it a report³⁰ by the Secretary-General (E/1579 & Add.1) on the Conference held at Lake Success, from 17 August to 6 September 1949, under Council resolution 32 (IV).

The report summarized the scope of the discussions which took place in the plenary meetings and in the meetings of the six sections of the Conference—minerals, fuels and energy, water, forests, land, and wild-life and fish resources.³¹ It indicated that the Conference had proved fruitful, and suggested that the Council might wish to continue the collaboration of the experts and scientists who had participated in the Conference, and to review carefully the practicable suggestions which had emerged during the Conference, in view of the proposed expansion of the programme of technical assistance for economic development.

The Council discussed the report at its 349th plenary meeting on 13 February 1950. During the discussion, various representatives pointed out that the experience of the Conference had justified the comprehensiveness of the programme. The participants had come, not as representatives of Governments or other organizations, but as experts prepared to benefit from the exchange of information and experience. It was also pointed out that the records of the Conference contained valuable suggestions for action by which the United Nations, the specialized agencies, the Governments and scientific institutions could improve standards of living through the analysis, use and development of natural resources. The members of the Council stressed the importance, not only of publishing and distributing the proceedings, but of publicizing the work of the Conference so that these valuable suggestions would have the widest possible effect.

The Council unanimously adopted, as resolution 271(X), the draft resolution proposed by Denmark (E/L.7). By this resolution, the Council expressed "satisfaction with the success of this Conference" and, in line with the conclusions set forth in the report of the Secretary-General, requested the Secretary-General "to study the proceedings of the Conference and to report to the Council such proposals for the consideration of the Council as he may deem appropriate; and in this connexion to consult with the specialized agencies concerned and with such of the Conference participants as he may deem useful".

b. AVAILABILITY OF INSECTICIDES FOR THE CONTROL OF MALARIA

The Council, at its 403rd meeting on 8 August 1950, had before it a report (E/1709 & Corr. 1 & 2) prepared by the Secretary-General in pursuance of Council resolution 225(IX),³² a communication from the World Health Organization (E/1720) regarding a resolution of the World Health Assembly on labelling and distribution of insecticides, and a draft resolution submitted by Brazil (E/L.91) on the availability of insecticides for the control of malaria.

The Secretary-General's report dealt with the production, needs and consumption of insecticides, and factors affecting their availability in non-producing countries, i.e. Government activities, prices and distribution, equipment for application, exports of producing countries, tariffs and taxes, and import and exchange restrictions.

In the course of the debate, it was agreed that national and international governmental action was needed to wage on all fronts a successful fight against malaria, and that technical assistance for that purpose should be provided by international organizations at the request of Governments. Several representatives, among them those of Brazil, China and the United States, expressed their appreciation of the valuable information and analysis contained in the Secretary-General's report, and suggested that further work in this field should be continued.

The representative of Brazil agreed to accept two amendments to the draft resolution: one suggested orally by the United States to add a sentence calling on Governments to adopt the measures recommended in the Secretary-General's report for increasing the amounts of insecticides available for combating malaria and another by the President of the Council to submit the records of the discussion to WHO and FAO.

The Council unanimously adopted the amended draft resolution as resolution 297 (XI). By it, the Council noted the report of the Secretary-General and the resolution of the third World Health Assembly concerning labelling and distribution of insecticides, re-affirmed the recommendations contained in its earlier resolution 225 (IX), and commended to the attention of Governments the Secretary-General's report and discussion of the various problems associated with the increased production and distribution of insecticides for the control of malaria. The resolution also urged Governments to adopt such measures among those suggested in the report as were appropriate to their circumstances, and requested the Secretary-General to transmit the records of the discussion on the subject to WHO and to FAO.

B. FULL EMPLOYMENT

By resolution 221 E (IX) of 11 August 1949, the Economic and Social Council, at its ninth session, invited the Secretary-General to appoint a group of experts to prepare, in the light of the current world situation, a report on national and international measures required to achieve full employment. It invited the Economic and Employment Commission to examine this report and submit to the tenth session of the Council any comments and recommendations for action that seemed appropriate. It also requested the Secretary-General to publish, on a current basis, brief reports on measures taken in various countries for the purpose of achieving full employment and invited Governments to assist the Secretary-General in this matter.

The Secretary-General addressed a questionnaire to Governments concerning their actions to maintain full employment in the second half of 1949. The first report based on the replies received was published under the title Implementation of Full Employment Policies.³³

With respect to the appointment of the group of experts referred to in resolution 221 E (IX), the Secretary-General appointed the following economists: John Maurice Clark, Professor of Economics, Columbia University, New York, who worked in association with Arthur Smithies, Professor of Economics, Harvard University; Nicholas Kaldor, Fellow of King's College, Cambridge University; Pierre Uri, Economic and Financial Adviser to the Commissariat general du Plan, Paris; and E. Ronald Walker, Economic Adviser to the Australian Department of External Affairs. The report of this group is described below.

The General Assembly, at its fourth session,³⁴ adopted at its 256th plenary meeting on 25 November 1949, resolution 308 (IV), in which it approved the action of the Secretary-General in inviting the group of experts to report on national and international measures required to achieve and maintain full employment. In this resolution, the General Assembly also stated that national and international action by Members, designed to promote and maintain full employment in accordance with Articles 55 and 56 of the Charter, was a basic requirement for the achievement of a stable and expanding world economy; that action was needed to overcome unemployment and under-employment especially prevalent in under-developed countries, and that to this end it was necessary, inter alia, to stimulate the economic development of under-developed countries; that failure to take action to maintain full and productive employment, especially in countries which have an important share in world trade, would seriously impair the objectives of international agreements for the furtherance of the production and consumption of, and the expansion of international trade in, goods on as free as possible a basis; and that a high and stable level of international investment, particularly in the under-developed areas of the world, would contribute materially to the realization of those objectives. The resolution also noted with satisfaction the declarations of various Governments that they intended to deal promptly with unemployment and had already taken appropriate measures or had such measures under study. It recommended that each Government should consider, as a matter of urgency, its international responsibility under Articles 55 and 56 of the Charter to take action, as the need arises, designed to promote- and maintain full and productive employment through measures appropriate to its political, economic and social institutions; and requested the Economic and Social Council, during its consideration of full employment and economic development, to give attention to unemployment and under-employment, especially in under-developed countries.

1. Recommendations of the Group of Experts

The group of experts appointed by the Secretary-General met from 22 October to 16 December, 1949, and prepared a unanimous report entitled *National and International Measures for Full Employment*³⁵ The report contained a set of recommendations covering action in both the national and the international field.

a. NATIONAL MEASURES

With respect to domestic measures, the experts recommended that each Government should take action on the following lines:

- (i) It should adopt and announce a full employment target which will define the meaning of full employment in the country concerned in operational terms, and constitute the standard to the attainment of which the national employment stabilization measures will be directed.
- (ii) It should announce a comprehensive programme for directing its fiscal and monetary policies, its investments and production planning, and its wage and price policies (including anti-monopoly policies) to the continuous achievement of its full-employment objective.
- (iii) It should adopt and announce an appropriate system of compensatory measures designed to expand effective demand which would be prepared in advance for automatic application in case its general programme for maintaining full employment, indicated above, fails to prevent unemployment from exceeding the limit prescribed by the full-employment target by a predetermined amount for three successive months.
- (iv) It should announce the nature of the policies which it will adopt in order to maintain the stability of the price level and to combat inflationary tendencies in a manner consistent with the maintenance of its full-employment target.

- (v) It should adapt its legislative procedures, its administrative organization and its statistical services to the implementation of its full-employment programme.

b. INTERNATIONAL MEASURES

The international measures recommended by the experts were designed to serve three main purposes:

- (i) To create a workable system of international trade for a stable and expanding world economy and thereby provide the conditions required for the elimination of undue trade barriers and for the restoration of the convertibility of currencies.
- (ii) To accelerate the orderly economic development of the under-developed areas of the world.
- (iii) To prevent the international propagation of fluctuation in effective demand.

For these purposes they recommended that Governments should take early action on the following lines:

- (i) To establish a programme, through consultation among Governments under the auspices of the Economic and Social Council, to eliminate the present structural disequilibrium in world trade.
- (ii) To create a stable flow of international investment at a level appropriate to the needs of the under-developed areas of the world and to the capacity of the lending countries.
- (iii) To stabilize international trade by maintaining external disbursements on current account in the face of internal fluctuations of effective demand.

2. Consideration by the Economic and Employment Commission at Its Fifth Session

The Economic and Employment Commission considered the report of the group of experts at its fifth session in January 1950, in accordance with Council resolution 221 E (IX), and declared in its report (E/1600) that "in view of the far-reaching character of the recommendations contained in the full employment report and the lack of opportunity for sufficient study and formulation of views by Governments, it would be inappropriate at this stage to put forward substantive recommendations for consideration by the Council".

The Commission confined itself to a preliminary examination of the report and presented a draft resolution, which suggested a procedure for further action on the report, for the consideration of the tenth session of the Council. In this draft resolution, the Commission recommended that the Council should commend the report of the experts to Governments, interested specialized agencies and non-governmental organizations for their serious consideration and detailed examination; that Governments should be urged to take appropriate measures to facilitate widespread consideration of the report in their respective countries; and that members of the Council should be prepared at the eleventh session to express their considered views on the proposals contained in the report and to present any alternative proposals they might have in this connexion (E/1600, annex A). Several members submitted a number of points which they thought should be considered by the Council at its eleventh session. The Commission could not, in the time available, discuss these points, but it included them in another annex to its report (E/1600, annex B).

3. Consideration by the Economic and Social Council at Its Tenth Session

At its tenth session, held from 7 February to 6 March 1950, the Economic and Social Council considered the report of the Economic and Employment Commission (E/1600). Insofar as it related to the subject of full employment and the Commission's recommendations in this connexion, the Council debated the report at its 356th to 358th plenary meetings on 20 and 21 February. A number of representatives, including those of Australia, Belgium, Canada, Chile, China, Denmark, France, India, Peru, the United Kingdom and the United States, in expressing general approval of the report of the group of experts, favoured the procedure suggested by the Economic and Employment Commission in its report. Most representatives confined themselves to preliminary observations on the procedure or refrained from commenting on the substance. Some reservations in respect of particular details were made by representatives.

It was pointed out by some delegations, among them those of Brazil, Chile, India, Pakistan and Peru, that though the experts, as shown in the report, recognized the problem of unemployment and under-employment in under-developed countries, they had decided that this problem was outside their terms of reference and had considered only problems of unemployment caused by lack of effective demand. It was also pointed out by some representatives, including those of Australia, Brazil, Chile, India, Pakistan and the United States, that in Resolution 308 (IV) the General Assembly had stressed the need for action to overcome unemployment and under-employment in under-developed countries and had requested the Economic and Social Council, during its consideration of full employment and economic development, to give attention to this problem. It was incumbent upon the Council to devote time to the consideration of this problem at its next session.

Two amendments to the recommendations of the Commission were adopted unanimously by the Council at its 358th plenary meeting on 21 February 1950.

The first, by the United States (E/L.19), added a paragraph to the draft resolution to request the Secretary-General to obtain in writing the views on the Experts' Report of the interested and competent non-governmental organizations, in time for circulation to the members of the Council before its eleventh session.³⁶

The second, by Chile (E/L.22), commended the records of the Council's debate on the matter, together with the Expert's Report, to Member Governments of the United Nations, the interested specialized agencies and non-governmental organizations for their detailed examination.

At the same meeting, by resolution 267 B (X), the Council unanimously adopted, with the above amendments, the recommendations of the Economic and Employment Commission, which invited widespread dissemination and consideration of the report.

4. Related Activities of the Regional Economic Commissions

Some of the activities of the regional economic commissions³⁷ which relate directly to the problem of full employment were the following.

a. ECONOMIC COMMISSION FOR EUROPE

The Economic Survey of Europe in 1949,^{37a} prepared by the Secretariat of the Economic Commission for Europe (ECE), contains information bearing on questions of domestic stability and employment, on prospects of expansion in European production, as well as on the balance-of-payments problems of European countries and on international trade. ECE itself, during its fifth session, after recalling that the International Labour Organisation was the competent organ of the United Nations to deal with questions concerning unemployment insurance, migration, vocational training and, generally, with anything concerning seasonal or partial unemployment, noted that unemployment due to lack of effective demand was a function of the general economic situation and that the remedies for its prevention and cure lay in all measures calculated to expand the economy by the development of production and exchange (E/1674). The Commission reminded its committees, sub-committees and working parties that it was their duty to keep their efforts constantly directed to an expansion of production and exchange so as to assist in the campaign against unemployment and for the achievement of productive full employment.

b. ECONOMIC COMMISSION FOR ASIA AND THE FAR EAST

Apart from the information bearing on production, employment and trade contained in the Economic Survey of Asia and the Far East, 1949,^{37b} the Economic Commission for Asia and the Far East (ECAFE) adopted several resolutions bearing on the problem of full employment in the sense that they were directed toward the encouragement of action designed to expand the international exchange of goods and services.

c. ECONOMIC COMMISSION FOR LATIN AMERICA

The Economic Survey of Latin America, 1949,^{37c} also brought together a large volume of information and presented valuable analyses bearing directly on the question of unemployment in Latin-American countries and on the relations between fluctuations in employment, production and exports of Latin-American countries to recessions in other countries. Bearing this information in mind, the Economic Commission for Latin America (ECLA) adopted, during its third session a resolution which, inter alia, took account of the measures proposed in the experts' report on National and International Measures for Full Employment^{37d} but noted that these measures were applicable principally to the great industrial areas and that, in the Latin-American countries, cyclical phenomena had different characteristics from those contemplated by the experts. The Commission recommended that its secretariat should study the adaptation of the measures recommended by the experts, as well as other measures suited to the economic characteristics of the Latin-American countries, with a view especially to avoiding the adverse effects which such measures might have on the balance of payments. The Commission, bearing in mind that measures of anti-cyclical policy were not incompatible with the plans of economic development but were in fact complementary to them, recommended that Latin-American Governments, in their plans for developing domestic activities, should consider the desirability of a composition of imports that was easily adaptable to the cyclical declines of the capacity to import, thus making possible the application of anti-cyclical measures without bringing about a disequilibrium of the balance of payments.

5. Consideration by the Economic and Social Council at Its Eleventh Session

In considering the problem of full employment at its eleventh session, held from 3 July to 16 August 1950, the Council had before it the report of the group of experts, entitled National and International Measures for Full Employment; the report of the fifth session of the Economic and Employment Commission (E/1600 & Corr. 1, Add. 1-2); the views of certain non-governmental organizations of the experts' report (E/1695 and Addenda); the resolution on action against unemployment (E/1744) adopted by the International Labour Conference at its 33rd session, together with the report on Action Against Unemployment³⁸ prepared by the International Labour Office as a basis for the Conference discussion; the reports of Governments on measures taken by various countries for the purpose of achieving full employment (E/1698 & Add. 1-8), and the report of the Secretary-General entitled Implementation of Full Employment Policies³⁹

The Council also heard the views of two of the experts who served on the group which prepared the report National and International Measures for Full Employment. The Council was also assisted by representatives of the specialized agencies, including those of the International Monetary Fund and the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, who participated in the discussions in view of the proposals under consideration relating to the structure and functions of those agencies.

The matter came before the Council's Economic Committee at its 86th to 89th, its 93rd to 95th and 97th meetings, from 24 July to 11 August, and before the Council at its 389th to 394th plenary meetings, from 17 to 19 July, and at its 411th and 412th plenary meetings, on 14 and 15 August 1950. During the Council's discussions, several draft resolutions were submitted: by the United Kingdom (E/L.67), by Canada (E/L.69) and by the United States (E/L.70). These draft resolutions diverged in a number of important respects and concerned both domestic and international measures.

a. NATIONAL MEASURES

In the field of domestic measures to maintain full employment, the draft resolution by the United Kingdom (E/L.67), for example, recommended that each Government should announce a provisional full employment "target" in the form of a level of employment or unemployment which it would endeavour by all means in its power to maintain; and that it should submit a report to the United Nations on its general domestic policies for achieving full employment and economic stability, with particular reference to the various techniques suggested in the experts' report including flexible fiscal policies, adjustable public investment programmes, measures to maintain incomes and levels of consumption, the adoption of automatic compensatory measures or alternative measures for taking rapid action to counteract an unfavourable trend, means for ensuring the stability of prices and the avoidance of inflation and the adequacy of its legislative procedures, administrative organizations and statistical services to implement those policies.

The draft resolution by Canada (E/L.69) contained a proposal that the Economic and Social Council should note that, since the depression of the 1930's there had been a change of attitude among Governments and peoples, that many Governments were now committed to take appropriate measures if necessary to prevent economic recession, and that many Governments had adopted positive measures to promote social welfare, international security, high levels of trade, and vigorous economic development. The draft resolution suggested that the Council should state that it therefore believed that the risk of widespread unemployment in highly industrialized countries had been substantially reduced, but that the Council should nevertheless urge Governments that had not already done so to state publicly their employment objectives and to describe the various means at their disposal to maintain employment, such as flexible fiscal policies, public works programmes, social security measures and other "built-in stabilizers"; and to report to the Secretary-General on both recent developments and on the future outlook in the fields of domestic employment, production, trade and related matters. It also suggested that the Council should emphasize the desire of facilitating the mobility of labour and, therefore, of maintaining organized and efficient employment exchanges, and adequate training and retraining facilities.

The draft resolution by the United States (E/L.70) was closer to the first in its recommendations, although these were somewhat less specific in that the draft did not refer to the various techniques suggested in the experts' report. This draft resolution also suggested that the Council should decide to place on its agenda annually the problem of achieving and maintaining (1) full and productive employment with progressively improving levels of production, trade and consumption, and (2) equilibrium in balances of payments; that it should ask Member Governments to supply to the Secretary-General periodic information on their economic situation, targets, policies, plans, programmes and actions relating to the above problems; and that the Economic and Employment Commission should periodically: (1) appraise the adequacy of the actions being taken by Governments with respect to employment, unemployment, production and related factors; (2) determine whether there were any conflicts among the targets, policies, plans, programmes or actions on the part of the Governments; (3) formulate significant issues for consideration by the Council; and (4) recommend proposals for Council action.

b. INTERNATIONAL MEASURES

In the field of international measures, the draft resolution by the United Kingdom (E/L.67) suggested that the Council, with the object of facilitating progress toward a new equilibrium in international trade, should recommend to Governments:

(1) that each Government agree to make it a principal objective of policy to act in such a way as to assist in rectifying the fundamental or structural disequilibrium in international trade and payments; (2) that, as a step towards the achievement of this objective, it indicate by means of quantitative estimates, the nature of the equilibrium it hoped to attain in its balance of payments by 1954 on both current and capital account; and (3) that, in preparing these estimates, it take account of the desirability of increasing its gold and dollar reserves if these reserves were low in relation to their international payments, so that when a new equilibrium in international payments is achieved all countries may possess gold reserves sufficient to enable them to meet such fluctuations as may reasonably be expected in their receipts of foreign exchange.

In addition, it recommended that the Council, with the object of ensuring effective international action to prevent the spread of depression from one country to others and to maintain a steady flow of capital for development purposes, should instruct the Secretary-General to convene a meeting of Governments with a view to concluding an agreement whereby each Government would undertake to do its utmost in the event of a decline in the effective demand within its borders and, under certain conditions, to prevent a consequential decline in the aggregate supply of its currency to the rest of the world by maintaining imports, or by the provision of additional credit, if necessary, by the supplementing of private external expenditures through the use of financial resources under public control. It also suggested that Governments of the more highly developed countries should conclude an international agreement in accordance with which each Government would undertake to endeavour, under certain conditions, to maintain a high regular flow of capital export for development purposes; that Governments should extend progressively the principle of untied lending to all governmentally controlled or guaranteed foreign lending;⁴⁰ and that the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development should consider the desirability of laying greater emphasis on the size, composition and financial implications of a borrowing country's investment programme as a whole and less on the detail of selected projects.⁴⁰

The draft resolution by Canada (E/L.69) recommended that the Council should note that loans by the Bank, together with private loans for capital exporting countries, were unlikely by themselves to be sufficiently large and continuous to provide either for the efficient development of the world's under-used resources or for the elimination of undue trade barriers and for the restoration of the convertibility of currencies. It should also note the danger that reduced employment and imports in one country might spread deflationary influences to other countries unless greater provision was made to mitigate these influences by replenishing international reserves of those other countries. It was therefore suggested that the Council, while welcoming the statement made on behalf of the Bank that it hoped and intended progressively to extend its loans for development, should urge the Governments of capital exporting countries to do all in their power to maintain a high and stable level of net capital exports, and urge the International Monetary Fund to make sure that its resources were at all times as fully and readily available to its members as possible under its Articles of Agreement.

The draft resolution by the United States (E/-L.70) proposed to the Council that it should recommend Governments to seek to avoid in their policies and programmes measures which would be likely to have seriously adverse effects on the balance of payments or employment levels of other countries, and to intensify their efforts to achieve and maintain equilibrium in their balance of payments, while:

(1) eliminating restrictions on current account transactions; (2) reducing or eliminating quantitative and other restrictions on trade; (3) removing impediments to the flow of international investment funds; and (4) minimizing discrimination in all international economic relations.

It also suggested that the Secretary-General should be requested to initiate an inquiry into the changes in the demand for, and supply of, the principal commodities in international trade which might be expected to result in the establishment of a new over-all equilibrium under various plausible assumptions as to world economic developments.

All three draft resolutions were agreed in requesting the Secretary-General to appoint a small group of experts to prepare a report on unemployment and under-employment in under-developed countries and to recommend the national and international measures required to reduce such unemployment and under-employment.

During the discussion in the Council of the report, members expressed appreciation of its high quality, though some reservations were made in respect of the measures recommended. Representatives of under-developed countries considered that the experts had concentrated too much attention on unemployment in the highly industrialized countries and had proposed measures to maintain full employment which could not apply to the mainly agricultural under-developed countries. If the flow of international investment could be stimulated to these areas, they stressed, then the consequent increase in consumer demand would help greatly in maintaining full employment in industrialized countries.

A further point made by several members was that the experts had not paid sufficient attention to the factor of inflation which threatened the employment situation in a number of countries. It was also stated that full employment depended to a large extent on maintaining a steady and increasing flow of international trade, and some members emphasized the need for international equilibrium in the balances of payments as well as the need to harmonize national full employment policies so that action taken in one country would not lead to unemployment in another.

After lengthy consideration, both in plenary meetings of the Council and in its Economic Committee, the Council finally adopted unanimously, at its 412th plenary meeting on 15 August 1950, resolution 290(XI). It read as follows:

The Economic and Social Council,

Having in mind the obligations of Members of the United Nations under Articles 55 and 56 of the Charter to take joint and separate action to promote higher standards of living, full employment and conditions of economic and social progress and development,

Having considered the experts' report on National and International Measures for Full Employment, the report of the Economic and Employment Commission (fifth session) and the views of various specialized agencies and non-governmental organizations,

Having noted from the replies of Governments to the questionnaires on employment issued by the Secretary-General under Council resolution 221 E (IX) that many countries have succeeded in maintaining satisfactory levels of employment,

Having regard to the fact that, in some predominantly agricultural countries, figures for unemployment and under-employment may not be easily ascertainable and full employment goals may, if related only to industrial labour, lead to misleading conclusions, and that, consequently, it may not be possible for such countries to implement certain provisions of this resolution,

Bearing in mind that a new group of experts will be appointed, as provided for in paragraph 22 below, for the purpose of studying the problem of unemployment and under-employment in under-developed countries, and that further recommendations in regard to national and international measures for full employment in under-developed countries will be considered by the Council in the light of the report of this group of experts,

Recognizing that Governments can achieve and maintain full and productive employment in an expanding world economy under conditions ensuring fundamental political and economic freedoms to the individual, and being aware of the determination of peoples and Governments to achieve and maintain such full and productive employment,

Concerned with the need for continuing action by Member Governments, and by the organs and specialized agencies of the United Nations to implement the obligation contained in the Charter with respect to full employment, including the reduction of unemployment and under-employment in the less developed countries, and

Bearing in mind the close relationship, in a free and expanding world economy, between high and stable levels of domestic employment, international capital movements, and imports and exports,

A. WITH THE OBJECT OF ENSURING REGULAR SYSTEMATIC CONSIDERATION OF EMPLOYMENT PROBLEMS BY THE COUNCIL

1. Decides to place on the Council agenda once each year, beginning in 1951, for consideration in the light of economic trends, the problem of achieving and maintaining full employment with progressively improving levels of production, trade and consumption, and maintenance of or progress towards the achievement of equilibrium in balances of payments;

B. WITH THE OBJECT OF ENCOURAGING THE ADOPTION OF EFFECTIVE DOMESTIC FULL EMPLOYMENT POLICIES

2. Recommends that each Government:

(a) Publish annually a statement of its economic objectives for the ensuing year or for such longer period as may be appropriate, making special reference to the purposes set out in Articles 55 and 56 of the United Nations Charter, and being accompanied, wherever practicable, by a statement of quantitative goals or forecasts relating to employment, production, consumption, investment or such other pertinent measurable economic factors as may be significant indicators of the trends of its economy; and

(b) Publish as soon and as precisely as is practicable the standard by which it defines the meaning of full employment as a continuing objective of policy, such standard being expressed, wherever possible, in terms either of employment percentages or of absolute numbers of unemployed or in ranges of such percentages or numbers; and thereafter publish such revised standards as may become necessary from time to time;

3. Recommends that each Government formulate, announce, and periodically review, in the light of current and foreseeable economic trends, the policies, programmes and techniques which it intends to pursue for the purpose of achieving such objectives, goals and standards as it may set for itself under paragraph 2 above, with particular reference to:

(a) Measures, such as the adaptation of fiscal, credit, monetary, investment, wage and price policies, to promote steady economic expansion;

(b) Measures to combat recessionary tendencies, such as measures to influence the volume of investment, to increase the flexibility of budget and fiscal policies, and to prevent undue fluctuations in the incomes of primary producers;

(c) Special corrective measures, whether of a discretionary or of an automatic type, to meet emergency unemployment situations that may arise;

(d) Measures to avoid inflation and to prevent excessive increases in the price level; and

(e) Measures to promote the geographic and occupational mobility of labour;

4. Recommends that each Government keep continuously under review the adequacy of its organizational and technical arrangements, including statistical services, required for the formulation and pursuit of economic goals, policies and programmes and the analysis of economic trends;

5. Recommends that, in connexion with the information required by the Secretary-General under Council resolution 221 E (IX), each Government furnish him, upon request, with full information concerning economic trends, the full employment standard, domestic economic objectives and—where appropriate, goals or forecasts, and domestic policies and programmes, as referred to in paragraphs 2 and 3 above;

6. Invites the International Labour Organisation to take all feasible further steps towards the practical implementation of the recommendations of the Sixth International Conference of Labour Statisticians in order to facilitate international comparability of employment and unemployment data with special reference to their use in the formulation of full employment standards and annual employment goals, policies and programmes;

7. Requests the Secretary-General:

(a) To amend the questionnaires being issued under Council resolution 221 E (IX) so as to include the items referred to in paragraph 5 above, and to send to Governments the first issue of the amended questionnaire as soon as possible;

(b) To assemble and analyse the reports submitted by Governments in response to this questionnaire so as to facilitate the task of the Economic, Employment and Development Commission as set out in paragraph 8 below; and, in particular, to analyse the statistical basis of the full employment standards published under sub-paragraph 2 (b) above; and

(c) To transmit the reports and analyses prepared under (b) above, together with such special studies as he may have prepared, to the Economic, Employment and Development Commission; and

8. Requests the Economic, Employment, and Development Commission, in consultation with the representatives of the appropriate specialized agencies, to examine the reports, analyses and studies transmitted to it by the Secretary-General under sub-paragraph 7 (c) above in the light of current and foreseeable economic trends and with reference to their possible effects on the world economic situation, for the purpose of:

(a) Calling attention to the repercussions of the goals, policies and programmes of the various Governments upon the economic situation of other countries; and

(b) Formulating significant problems of international concern that may arise for consideration by the Council and recommending proposals for action by the Council;

C. WITH THE OBJECT OF ENCOURAGING EFFECTIVE INTERNATIONAL FULL EMPLOYMENT POLICIES

I

9. Recommends that each Government intensify its efforts; while pursuing its employment and other domestic goals, to achieve and maintain equilibrium in its balance of payments; such equilibrium should be at the highest possible level of mutually beneficial trade and should be characterized inter alia by:

(a) Conditions of trade involving, along the lines envisaged in the relevant international agreements:

(i) the absence of quantitative restrictions on international trade imposed for balance-of-payments reasons and of exchange restrictions on current account transactions (as defined in the Articles of Agreement of the International Monetary Fund), (ii) a reduced level of other trade barriers and (iii) a minimum of discrimination in the application of such trade, monetary or investment restrictions as may still exist;

(b) A level of reserves of convertible currencies and gold which would be sufficient to enable a country to meet normal fluctuations in its receipts of foreign exchange; and

(c) An increased and stable flow of international investment funds;

10. Recommends that each Government furnish the Secretary-General, upon his request, in connexion with its replies to the questionnaires being issued under Council resolution 221 E (IX) with estimates of its balance-of-payments position, and information on its related economic policies for the ensuing year and, when appropriate, for a longer period;

11. Recommends that each Government furnish the Secretary-General within six months after the receipt of the special questionnaire referred to in sub-paragraph 13 (a) below with quantitative estimates of the main elements of the balance of international payments that it hopes to attain by 1954, and a classification of its estimated trade by major commodities or groups of commodities which are important in its foreign trade, making clear to what extent the conditions set forth in paragraph 9 above are assumed to have been realized;

12. Requests the Secretary-General:

(a) To amend the questionnaires being issued under Council Resolution 221 E (IX) so as to cover the items referred to in paragraph 10 above;

(b) To assemble and analyse the reports submitted by Governments under paragraph 10 above so as to facilitate the task of the Economic, Employment and Development Commission as set out in paragraph 14 below;

(c) To continue to make special studies concerning the international aspects of the full employment problem; and

(d) To transmit the reports, analyses and studies prepared under sub-paragraphs (b) and (c) above to the Economic, Employment and Development Commission;

13. Requests the Secretary-General:

(a) To prepare, with the advice of suitable experts, and to issue to Governments as soon as conveniently possible, a special questionnaire for the purpose set out in paragraph 11 above, and, in carrying out this task, to take full account of similar work being undertaken by other international organizations in such a way as to avoid laying any unnecessary burden on Governments;

(b) To appoint a group of three independent experts, and to furnish them with such assistance as may be necessary to enable them to submit, on their own responsibility, to the Economic, Employment and Development Commission, a report analysing and commenting on the replies to the questionnaires received from Governments with a view to assisting the Commission to carry out the task assigned to it under paragraph 14 below; and

(c) To undertake, and if practicable, to annex to the report referred to in (b) above an analysis of the changes in demand for and supply of the principal commodities in international trade which might be expected to occur in the light of the data supplied by Governments under paragraph 11 above and other relevant material; and

14. Requests the Economic, Employment and Development Commission, in consultation with representatives of the appropriate specialized agencies, to examine the reports, analyses and studies submitted to it under sub-paragraphs 12 (d), 13 (b) and 13 (c) above, in the light of current and foreseeable economic trends and with reference to their possible effects on the world economic situation, for the purpose of:

(a) Calling attention to any major problems which appear likely to arise in the light of the information supplied by Governments regarding international transactions, policies and programmes;

(b) Recommending proposals with respect to international policies and programmes for Council consideration and action; and

(c) Enabling the Council at its fourteenth session to consider the report prepared under sub-paragraph 13 (b) above, together with the Commission's comments and recommendations;

II

15. Recommends that Governments:

(a) Achieve and maintain, to the extent feasible, a high level and regular rate of flow of international investment capital for development purposes;

(b) Strive to prevent lapses in the flow of international investment resulting from or associated with economic recessions; and

(c) Continue to co-operate in efforts to achieve these results by both national and international measures;

16. Recommends that Governments:

(a) Seek to avoid, in their economic policies and programmes, measures which would be likely to have seriously adverse effects on the balance of payments or employment levels of other countries;

(b) In the event of a domestic recession, adopt, to the extent feasible, measures to offset the adverse effects of such recession on the balance of payments or employment levels of other countries; and

(c) Continue to co-operate in investigating ways and means for preventing domestic recession from spreading to other countries;

17. Urges the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, while achieving and maintaining in ordinary times a high level and steady rate of flow of international investments for economic development, to utilize in case of recession, all practicable opportunities of increasing its resources, in order to expand the volume of its lending, inter alia by making fullest use of its borrowing capacity;

18. Urges the International Monetary Fund to make its resources available to its members to meet needs arising from economic recessions as fully and readily as its Articles of Agreement permit;

19. Requests the Secretary-General to appoint a group of three to five experts to make technical studies and, after seeking the views of the International Monetary Fund and the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, to prepare a report in accordance with the objective of paragraphs 15 and 16 above, formulating and analysing alternative practical ways of dealing with the problem of reducing the international impact of recessions that may arise, the report to be submitted to the Secretary-General and issued on the responsibility of the expert group;

20. Requests the Economic Employment and Development Commission to study the report prepared under paragraph 19 above and to make recommendations thereon to the Council at its fourteenth session; and

21. Recommends that Governments, the specialized agencies concerned and the Secretary-General pursue the action already undertaken in the field of migration, taking into consideration the importance of facilitating the international mobility of labour for the solution of the problems of full employment;

D. WITH THE OBJECT OF FACILITATING THE COUNCIL'S FURTHER CONSIDERATION OF THE PROBLEM OF UNEMPLOYMENT, PARTICULARLY IN THE LESS-DEVELOPED COUNTRIES

22. Requests the Secretary-General to appoint a small group of experts to prepare, in the light of the current world economic situation and of the requirements of economic development, a report on unemployment and under-employment in under-developed countries, and the national and international measures required to reduce such unemployment and under-employment, the report to be issued on the responsibility of the expert group; to give every assistance to the group of experts in the preparation of this report and, in particular, keep the group informed of work already done or currently being undertaken in this field by the United Nations and the specialized agencies, and to transmit the report to Member Governments; and

23. Requests the Economic, Employment and Development Commission to examine the report prepared by the group of experts and to submit to the Council, at an early session, any comments and recommendations for action which seem to it appropriate; and

E. WITH THE OBJECT OF FACILITATING THE IMPLEMENTATION OF THIS RESOLUTION

24. Recommends that the Secretary-General and the appropriate specialized agencies provide, within their capacities, technical assistance to Governments, upon their request, for the purpose of carrying out this resolution; and

25. Requests the Secretary-General:

(a) In carrying out the tasks under paragraphs 7, 12 and 13 above to co-operate and consult with the specialized agencies concerned and other appropriate bodies in order to avoid duplication; and

(b) To take all appropriate measures to ensure that action under this resolution is initiated without delay.

Pursuant to this resolution of the Council, a questionnaire of the Secretary-General, to cover the years 1950 and 1951 and relating to full employment standards, economic trends and objectives, economic policies and balance-of-payments problems and policies, was sent on 1 December 1950 to Member Governments and those Governments participating in regional economic commissions.

6. Publicity for United Nations Action on full Employment

After adopting the resolution on full employment, many members of the Council expressed the view that its provisions were so far-reaching, and went such a distance toward elaborating the obligations that were assumed by Governments when they subscribed to Articles 55 and 56 of the United Nations Charter, that the Secretary-General should utilize all means at his disposal to give publicity to the resolution. It was most desirable to ensure that not only officials and Governments should know and understand these provisions, but that they should be publicized as widely as possible so that the peoples of the world should clearly understand that the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations had recommended to Governments:

(1) that they should publicize and each tell their own people what they mean by their obligation to maintain full employment;

(2) that they should provide them publicly with the standard by which the achievement of, or the failure to achieve, full and productive employment can be gauged; and

(3) that each Government should tell its own people how it proposed to achieve the standard which it has set for itself, and that it should also give this information to the Council so that the latter might examine these policies and programmes for the purpose of calling attention to any repercussions which they may have upon the economic situation of other countries.

It was also pointed out that the resolution on full employment adopted by the Council represented an embodiment of the faith of the United Nations that mass unemployment need not last, and that it can be eliminated in an expanding world economy under conditions which ensure those fundamental political and economic freedoms to the individual which are the cornerstone of the United Nations. Members recognized that more remained to be done, both with respect to the object of encouraging effective international full employment policies and with the object of the elimination of unemployment in under-developed countries.

7. Consideration by the Assembly at Its Fifth Session

At the Assembly's fifth session, the question of full employment and economic stability was considered by the Second Committee at its 137th to 144th meetings, from 14 to 28 November. The Committee's recommendations were adopted without discussion by the General Assembly at its 320th plenary meeting on 12 December 1950.

The Second Committee had before it the report of the Economic and Social Council to the fifth session of the General Assembly (A/1345), containing a chapter on the Council's activities in this connexion at its tenth and eleventh sessions (see above). The first five meetings of the Committee (its 137th to 141st meetings, held from 14 to 23 November) were devoted to a general debate in which 29 delegations took part: those of Afghanistan, Argentina, Australia, Belgium, Brazil, Byelorussian SSR, Chile, China, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, Egypt, France, Greece, Iran, Israel, Indonesia, Mexico, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Pakistan, Philippines, Poland, Ukrainian SSR, USSR, the United Kingdom, the United States and Uruguay, as well as representatives of FAO and ILO.

Representatives generally were agreed on the importance both from a national and international point of view, of the maintenance of full employment, and a number gave instances of what their Governments were doing towards the attainment of that end. Certain representatives, however, among them those of the Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, Poland, the Ukrainian SSR and the USSR stressed that in their countries the maintenance of full employment did not exist as a problem, and that it had been solved by their own economy. The importance in under-developed countries of an adequacy of capital goods and the need for financing full employment by suitable measures was stressed by many representatives, including those of Afghanistan, Argentina, Brazil, Chile, Cuba, Egypt, Iran, Israel, Pakistan, the Philippines and Uruguay. General support for the recommendations of the Council and the Committee was forthcoming in the discussions, although a number of representatives made reservations in respect of details of the Council's resolution or the report.

At the conclusion of the general debate, the Committee had before it the following specific proposals:

(1) Full employment: proposals concerning resolution 290 (XI) of the Economic and Social Council were contained in part A of a draft resolution submitted by Chile (A/C.2/L.70) and in a draft resolution submitted by Uruguay (A/C.2/L.73);

(2) The current world economic situation: a proposal relating to the examination of the world economic situation by the twelfth session of the Council was contained in part B of a draft resolution submitted by Chile (A/C.2/L.70);

(3) Guides for organization and collection of economic data in under-developed countries: a draft resolution by Cuba (A/C.2/L.71);

(4) Mechanization and unemployment: a draft resolution by Cuba (A/C.2/L.72).

a. FULL EMPLOYMENT

The proposal contained in part A of the Chilean draft resolution as revised by its sponsor (A/C.2/L.70/Rev. 1) would note with satisfaction Economic and Social Council resolution 290 (XI) and invite Governments to comply with its terms and to co-operate with the Secretary-General in carrying out the tasks entrusted to him by that resolution. The draft resolution submitted by Uruguay (A.C.2/L.73) would note the Council resolution, congratulate the Council on the work accomplished and commend to its attention the desirability of continuing its efforts in the field of full employment, particularly with respect to under-developed countries. The Committee considered these proposals at its 142nd and 143rd meetings on 27 and 28 November. After the representative of Chile had orally revised his proposals to take account of the points made in the Uruguayan draft, the representative of Uruguay withdrew his draft resolution. The Committee then considered simultaneously both part A and another Chilean proposal contained in part B (see below) of the Chilean draft resolution. Several oral amendments to the revised Chilean draft were suggested by the representatives of Australia, Belgium, Canada, France, Peru and the United States, and, as a result, a new revision (A/C.2/L.70/Rev. 2) of the Chilean draft resolution, sponsored by Chile, Pakistan, Peru and Uruguay, was submitted. Before voting on this joint draft resolution, the Committee agreed to treat parts A and B as two separate resolutions.

At its 143rd meeting on 28 November, part A of the joint draft resolution was adopted by the Committee by 37 votes to 5, with 1 abstention. In adopting the resolution, it was the sense of the Committee that the Secretary-General should, in view of the rapidly changing economic conditions in the world, regard himself as authorized to use his discretion with respect to the time period to be covered by the special questionnaire referred to in paragraphs 11 and 13 of Economic and Social Council resolution 290 (XI) so as not to ask Governments to submit estimates of their balance of international payments for a longer period than they could reasonably be expected to supply. The General Assembly adopted without discussion at its 320th plenary meeting on 12 December 1950, by 43 votes to 5, with 1 abstention, resolution 405 (V). It read as follows:

The General Assembly,

Considering that the Economic and Social Council, in its resolution 290(XI) of 15 August 1950 concerning full employment, has formulated recommendations to governments designed to strengthen the resistance of their national economies and of the international economic structure against the danger of recession,

Considering that the additional studies which the Secretary-General and the various groups of experts are requested to undertake by that resolution are designed to provide a sound basis for the adoption of national and international measures tending to ensure full employment, both in economically advanced and in under-developed countries,

1. Notes with satisfaction the vigorous action taken by the Economic and Social Council in connexion with full employment;

2. Invites governments to co-operate with the Secretary-General in carrying out the tasks entrusted to him.

b. CURRENT WORLD ECONOMIC SITUATION

Part B of the draft resolution as revised by Chile (A/C.2/L.70/Rev. 1) dealt with the need for discussion by the Economic and Social Council at its twelfth session of current international economic problems in connexion with the Council's examination of the world economic situation, so that the Council might be in a position to make recommendations to Governments and to the General Assembly concerning measures designed to make possible the uninterrupted progress of programmes of economic stability and development. This draft resolution also proposed arrangements for obtaining the views of the members of the Council and of the other Members of the United Nations concerning this matter prior to the opening of the twelfth session of the Council.

Part B of the Chilean draft resolution was considered by the Committee simultaneously with part A (see above). The draft resolution contained in part B of the joint draft resolution submitted by Chile, Pakistan, Peru and Uruguay (A/C.2/L.70/Rev. 2) was adopted by the Committee by 37 votes to none, with 6 abstentions at its 143rd meeting on 28 November, and by the General Assembly (resolution 406(V)), without discussion, at its 320th plenary meeting on 12 December, by 50 votes to none. It read as follows:

Bearing in mind that, as a result of the international events of the last few months, new economic factors have appeared which may unbalance and dislocate the general economic stability and the economic progress of many countries,

Recognizing that, under Articles 55 and 56 of the Charter, the United Nations is under an obligation to use all the means at its disposal to ensure the steady growth of the world economy and to prevent the emergence of those factors of economic disequilibrium which impair general economic stability and disturb the economic development of the under-developed countries,

1. Requests the Economic and Social Council, when examining the world economic situation during its twelfth session, to pay special attention to changes currently taking place in the international economic situation, with a view to recommending to governments and to the General Assembly measures designed to make possible the uninterrupted progress of programmes of economic stability and development;

2. Invites all the members of the Economic and Social Council to submit to the twelfth session of the Council their views concerning the way in which the current world situation has affected their economic progress and the prospects of continuing world economic expansion, and, if possible, to communicate these views, through the Secretary-General, to the Council before the opening of its twelfth session;

3. Invites all the other Members of the United Nations similarly to submit their views to the Council, with the object of assisting the Council in its task of recommending measures referred to in paragraph 1 above to the governments and to the General Assembly.

c. GUIDES FOR ORGANIZATION AND COLLECTION OF ECONOMIC DATA IN UNDER-DEVELOPED COUNTRIES

The draft resolution submitted by Cuba (A/C.2/L.71) was considered by the Committee at its 143rd and 144th meetings on 28 November. The proposal recommended that the Secretary-General, in co-operation with the specialized agencies concerned, should prepare material which would be of help to under-developed countries in organizing and collecting economic data in connexion with Economic and Social Council resolution 290 (XI); it further affirmed that any expenses involved could be charged to the Special Account set up under Economic and Social Council resolution 222 A (IX) relating to technical assistance. An amendment to the resolution which sought to clarify and limit the task imposed on the Secretariat, submitted by Pakistan and Peru (A/C.2/L.74) was subsequently withdrawn by its sponsors after a statement by the representative of the Secretary-General that the request regarding the preparation of this material could be carried out providing financial resources were available.

An oral amendment by the representative of the United States to delete a paragraph of the draft resolution dealing with the method of financing the work requested of the Secretary-General was adopted by 24 votes to 7, with 15 abstentions. After several oral revisions by the sponsor and an oral amendment by Australia, accepted by the sponsor, the Cuban draft resolution, as amended, was adopted unanimously by the Committee.

In adopting the resolution, the Committee expressed the view that, while it wished to ensure that the work described in the resolution would be carried out, it had deleted a paragraph of the original Cuban draft resolution (A/C.2/L.71) because it did not consider it advisable to make any decision concerning the method by which this work was to be financed. The Committee's recommendations were adopted by the General Assembly (resolution 407(V)), without discussion, at its 320th plenary meeting on 12 December, by 51 votes to none, with 1 abstention. It read as follows:

The General Assembly,

Noting that the Economic and Social Council, in resolution 290 (XI) of 15 August 1950, inter alia,

(a) Recommended that governments should furnish the Secretary-General with a wide range of economic and statistical information relating to the implementation of that resolution,

(b) Stated that "Having regard to the fact that, in some predominantly agricultural countries, figures for unemployment and under-employment may not be easily ascertainable and full employment goals may, if related only to industrial labour, lead to misleading conclusions, and that, consequently, it may not be possible for such countries to implement certain provisions of this resolution",

(c) Invited the International Labour Organisation to take all feasible further steps towards the practical implementation of the recommendations in order to facilitate international comparability of employment and unemployment data with special reference to their use in the formulation of full employment standards and annual employment goals, policies and programmes,

Being aware that the Economic and Social Council, in part E of the above-mentioned resolution, recommended that the Secretary-General and the specialized agencies should provide, within their capacities, technical assistance to governments, on their request, for the purpose of assisting under-developed countries in this respect,

Recommends that the Secretary-General and the specialized agencies, taking into account the different institutional circumstances in the under-developed countries, prepare material which may serve to guide governments wishing to make use thereof and which should set forth:

(a) The types of data considered necessary to provide up-to-date information regarding the level of economic activity, employment, unemployment and under-employment;

(b) Procedures and methods suitable for obtaining and presenting such data;

(c) Other suggestions relating to the organization of adequate government machinery necessary for obtaining the said data.

d. MECHANIZATION AND UNEMPLOYMENT IN UNDER-DEVELOPED COUNTRIES

The draft resolution submitted by Cuba (A/C.2/L.72) on mechanization and unemployment in under-developed countries was considered by the Committee at its 144th meeting on 28 November. After several oral revisions by the sponsor and oral amendments by the representatives of Canada, the United Kingdom and the United States, which were all accepted by the sponsor, the draft resolution, as amended, was adopted unanimously by the Committee and by the General Assembly (resolution 408(V)), without discussion, by 53 votes to none, at its 320th plenary meeting on 12 December 1950. It read as follows:

The General Assembly,

Having in mind that, at its fourth session, it expressed its belief that "action is needed to overcome unemployment and under-employment such as that arising, particularly in under-developed countries, among large numbers of people engaged in agricultural pursuits; and that, to this end, it is necessary, inter alia, to stimulate the economic development of under-developed countries",

Having noted that the group of experts appointed by the Secretary-General under Economic and Social Council resolution 221 E (IX) of 11 August 1949 to report on national and international measures required to achieve and maintain full employment has expressed the view that, in the under-developed countries, a large part of the population could be diverted from agricultural occupations without any decrease in agricultural output, and that "the only remedy for this form of disguised unemployment is economic development, which constitutes the major economic problem of the world",

Bearing in mind that the terms of reference of the Sub-Commission on Economic Development, whose functions now fall to the Economic Employment and Development Commission, include "studying the effects of industrialization and changes of a technological order upon the world economic situation",

Commending the Economic and Social Council for the action it has initiated in paragraph 22 of resolution 290 (XI) of 15 August 1950 on full employment, by which the Secretary-General is requested to appoint a group of experts to prepare, in the light of the current world economic situation and of the requirements of economic development, a report on the national and international measures required to reduce unemployment and under-employment in under-developed countries,

Realizing that the mechanization of production essential for increased productivity may in many cases give rise to unemployment unless additional employment opportunities already exist or are simultaneously created in the economy as a whole,

1. Requests the Secretary-General to impress upon the group of experts to be appointed by him under paragraph 22 of Economic and Social Council resolution 290 (XI) the necessity of giving due consideration in the course of their work to:

(i) Ways and means of preventing any aggravation of the problems of unemployment and under-employment in under-developed countries that may occur as a result of the mechanization of production in certain branches of industry and agriculture;

(ii) Measures of social security designed to ensure that there will be no interruption in the income of workers temporarily unemployed through mechanization or technological progress, taking into account the work of the International Labor Organisation in this field;

2. Requests the Secretary-General and the specialized agencies concerned, in facilitating the work of the above group of experts, to bear in mind the present resolution.

C. WORLD ECONOMIC CONDITIONS AND TRENDS

At its ninth session, held from 5 July to 15 August 1949, the Economic and Social Council, in connexion with its recommendation that the General Assembly should include in the agenda of its fourth regular session the question of promoting full employment, requested the Secretary-General, in resolution 221 F (IX) of 11 August 1949, to submit to the General Assembly the latest available information on the world economic situation. This information should concentrate particularly on factors which were critical from the international point of view, according to the Council's request, and draw attention to international agreements and machinery already in existence which were designed to promote concerted action to maintain full employment and counter the international extension of any recession.⁴¹

Accordingly, a Secretariat report, *Recent Developments in the World Economic Situation*⁴² was submitted to the fourth session of the General Assembly in October 1949, bringing up to date the comprehensive annual survey, World Economic Report, 1948,⁴³ which had been made available to the Council in July 1949. The supplemental survey generally confirmed the economic trends described in the earlier comprehensive report and noted that international trade difficulties had since been intensified.⁴⁴ While indicating that it was too early to evaluate the possible effects of the wave of currency devaluations beginning in September 1949, the report reaffirmed the conclusion of the full annual survey, that "the problem of combining the maintenance of high levels of employment and national prosperity with international integration and equilibrium is ... one which can hardly be solved in a short time or by schematic methods".

1. Consideration by the Economic and Social Council at Its Tenth Session

At its tenth session, held from 7 February to 6 March 1950, the Economic and Social Council made its annual review of the world economic situation, in accordance with the recommendation made by the General Assembly in resolution 118(II).

A report on world economic trends, Major Economic Changes in 1949 (E/1601 & Corr. 1), was submitted by the Secretariat to facilitate the Council's discussion of the general economic situation. This report, which provided a factual analysis of significant economic developments during 1949, drew attention to the fact that, while the year 1949 was one of high levels of economic activity and employment, economic developments during the year brought into focus a number of long-term economic problems, both national and international, calling for a revaluation of current economic policies and programmes. It pointed out that the strength of abnormal demand factors arising from reconstruction and reconversion requirements, which had tended to promote economic expansion throughout most of the world had been considerably reduced. The problem confronting industrially advanced countries was to ensure the maintenance of effective demand at full employment levels whenever the automatic operation of market forces no longer sufficed to achieve this result. In under-developed countries, reductions during 1949 in the income derived from their exports of primary commodities served to emphasize once more the sensitivity of their economies to fluctuations in economic activity in industrialized countries and the obstacles which this might place in the way of their steady progress in economic development. Although the need for long-term adjustments in the world structure of production and trade had been evident for some time because of the persistence of the unbalance in international payments, it was underlined by the aggravation of the unbalance during 1949, which was followed by a wave of currency devaluations in the latter part of the year. The report stressed the interconnexion between the problems of full employment, economic development and balance in international economic relations and, consequently, the necessity for a co-ordinated approach to them.

In discussing the world economic situation at the Council's 359th to 362nd meetings, from 21 to 24 February 1950, many representatives described particular economic developments in their countries and commented on the analyses contained in Major Economic Changes in 1949.

Although many representatives, including those of Belgium, Brazil, China, Denmark, France, India and Peru, commended the report, some reservations were made during the discussion. The representative of Belgium felt that the report made little mention of the monetary factor. The representatives of Canada, the United Kingdom and the United States held the view that the report tended to attribute the main trends in world economic activity to developments in the United States. For example, the report seemed to point out that decline in United States imports had been the sole cause of the increase in international disequilibrium in the first half of 1949. The representative of the United States further stressed the continuity of economic life and processes, and expressed the belief that 1949 did not mark the stopping point in the process of economic and social reconstruction, as the report seemed to indicate.

The importance of economic development of under-developed countries, which the report considered, was stressed by the representatives of Brazil, Denmark and India. The representative of Brazil felt that there was a lack of balance in economic distribution in the world. An economic vacuum existed in under-developed areas while too much money was going to Europe, he stated. The representative of Denmark said that through sound economic development of under-developed countries, the vast needs of the poorer half of mankind might gradually be translated into effective demand. A similar reference to the advantages of economic development of under-developed countries was made by the representative of India, who held the view that once the European economy had completely recovered, the United States would be able to maintain full employment only by directing its excess productive capacity towards such tasks as the economic development of under-developed countries.

Reconstruction in Europe was commented on by, among others, the representatives of Chile and France. The former pointed out that since the war, Europe had not only rebuilt the foundations of its economy but had at the same time undergone a process of technical development and modernization. The representative of France stated that the European countries were making a maximum effort to free Europe from the need of foreign aid by achieving permanent equilibrium—plans for the economic integration of Europe being prepared with that aim in mind.

At the conclusion of the general debate, the Council adopted at its 367th meeting, on 28 February 1950, a resolution (265 (X)) proposed by Chile at the 366th meeting on the same day. This resolution noted the report on Major Economic Changes in 1949, and drew the attention of Member States, of the Economic and Employment Commission, of the regional economic commissions and of the specialized agencies to the views expressed by members of the Council concerning the world economic situation.

In the course of the discussion of the world economic situation, the Council also had before it a statement (E/1611) on the Secretary-General's plans for future issues of the world economic survey, and it was noted that the world economic report, would, in future, be designed to present an over-all review of the most important national and international events in the world economic situation during the two-year period preceding its issuance and that it would be made available in time to facilitate the debate on the world economic situation at the earlier sessions of the Council each year.

2. Consideration by the Economic and Social Council at Its Eleventh Session

At the eleventh session of the Economic and Social Council, held from 3 July to 16 August 1950, the Assistant Secretary-General in charge of Economic Affairs confirmed the arrangements for future issues of the world economic survey (see above). Referring to the new tasks imposed on the Secretariat under resolution 290 (XI) on full employment,⁴⁵ he indicated that he was not in a position as yet to measure fully the manner in which the new tasks contemplated by that resolution might affect the schedule for preparation of the World Economic Report. He felt, however, that in view of the work already done it would be desirable to adhere strictly to the schedule, although it might prove advisable to make some of the materials already prepared available in a form somewhat different from what had been originally contemplated—that is, in a form other than an over-all world economic report (E/AC.6/L.19).

In conjunction with the discussion of the world economic situation at the tenth session of the Council, the Council also considered the problem of studies and data relating to the economic situation of Africa. The Council discussed the desirability of the preparation of a special survey relating to economic conditions in Africa or of inclusion in the world economic report of a special section relating to this matter.

The representatives of Belgium, France, the United Kingdom and the United States voiced the opinion that it was not advisable to ask the Secretariat to prepare a special survey relating to economic conditions in Africa at that time, since, inter alia, the survey would entail considerable expense. They felt that the United Nations could devote increased attention to Africa within the framework of its existing programme of studies on the world economic situation.

These representatives, among others, supported the amendment proposed by the representative of the United Kingdom (E/L34/Rev. 1) embodying these views, to the resolution of the representative of India (E/L.31) proposed at the 366th meeting of the Council on 28 February. This latter resolution, inter alia, requested the Secretary-General to collect and collate material readily available on Africa, and urged Governments concerned to co-operate in supplementing that information. It was supported by the representatives of China, Mexico and the World Federation of United Nations Associations (WFUNA), which organization had requested the inclusion of the economic situation of Africa in the Council's agenda (E/1555/Add. 3).

At the 371st meeting of the Council on 2 March 1950, the Indian draft resolution, as amended by the United Kingdom, was adopted by 14 votes to 1 as resolution 266 (X). It requested the Secretary-General to include, in the world economic report to be prepared for the twelfth session of the Council, a special section relating to economic conditions in Africa, using material readily available and such further information as may be provided by the Governments concerned, and urged such Governments to give the greatest possible co-operation to the Secretary-General in making available the data required for the preparation of this section of the report. The Secretary-General was also requested to give attention to the problems of Africa whenever appropriate in the various economic studies.⁴⁶

The members of the Council were unanimous in feeling that the question of an economic commission for Africa should be deferred.

D. INTERNATIONAL COMMODITY PROBLEMS

A feature of inter-governmental activity in 1950 regarding commodity arrangements was the concern with both surplus and shortage problems as prices fluctuated widely.

The tendency towards surplus, which had developed in some commodities in the early part of 1950, disappeared with the outbreak of hostilities in Korea which gave a sharp impetus to the demand for primary commodities. In the latter part of 1950 this demand reached a very high level with rearmament programmes, increased government purchases and anticipatory commercial buying. In many primary commodities serious shortages developed and prices rose very sharply. As a result consideration was given to the question of international allocation. In the case of wheat, however, the existence of an international agreement assured importers of certain quantities at a maximum price.

1. The Interim Co-ordinating Committee for International Commodity Arrangements

The Interim Co-ordinating Committee for International Commodity Arrangements (ICCICA) was established in 1947 by the Economic and Social Council to keep informed of, and to facilitate inter-governmental consultation and action on, commodity problems pending the establishment of the International Trade Organization. In 1950, the ICCICA requested the Council (E/1718) at its eleventh session to consider a draft resolution which would authorize the Secretary-General of the United Nations to convene, on the advice of ICCICA, inter-governmental commodity conferences, whose terms of reference would be to discuss measures designed to meet special difficulties which may exist or may be expected to arise in connexion with a particular primary commodity.

The draft resolution referred to the recommendation of ICCICA that such conferences should, as far as possible, not be held until there was some assurance that an agreement was possible, and that adequate documentation had been prepared. It provided that, in advising the convening of conferences, ICCICA would follow the principles of Chapter VI of the Havana Charter. The draft also contained a provision that invitations to such conferences should be extended to all Members of the United Nations, the Interim Commission for the International Trade Organization, the Food and Agriculture Organization and the inter-governmental study group concerned. Non-member States could also be invited if they were substantially interested in the commodity concerned, and specialized agencies would also be invited. Other rules concerned the preparation of provisional agenda and rules of procedure, and the fixing of the date and place of any conference.

The Committee also submitted to the eleventh session of the Council its Review of International Commodity Problems, 1949,⁴⁷ which contained data on specific commodities up to the end of 1949, as well as the report and suggestions of ICCICA prepared at its 1949 sessions.

2. Consideration by the Economic and Social Council

At its 386th plenary meeting on 12 July 1950, the Council considered the request of the ICCICA (E/1718). The representative of the United Kingdom noted that under the Havana Charter the ITO would have been able to call conferences on its own initiative or at the request of interested Governments but he felt that it was inappropriate to give this power to an interim body and submitted an amendment (E/L.56) to the proposed resolution providing that ICCICA, in advising the Secretary-General, should act only at the request of an inter-governmental study group. The draft resolution with this amendment was referred to the Economic Committee for further discussion, on the proposal of the representative of India, which was adopted by 8 votes to 4, with 3 abstentions.

This matter was then considered by the Economic Committee at its 84th meeting on 13 July 1950. During the discussion it was pointed out by some representatives, among them those of Belgium and the United Kingdom, that serious international difficulties arose when raw material prices declined, and that urgent action might become necessary on particular primary commodities.

Some attention was given to the need for inter-governmental responsibility in connexion with commodity agreements and to the need for protecting the interests of both producing and consuming countries. It was felt that these matters were covered in the draft resolution and the United Kingdom amendment providing that the Secretary-General should only call a conference at the request of a study group since Governments of both producing and consuming countries were members of such groups. The representative of the United States asked that the record should show that the ICCICA need not act automatically on the request of an inter-governmental study group but rather in the light of its recommendations.

The representative of India felt that although the United Kingdom amendment provided a satisfactory interim arrangement, the procedure needed further examination. He therefore proposed an amendment providing that the Secretary-General be requested "in view of the desirability of the Council giving full consideration to means whereby study groups and international commodity conferences should be convened, to prepare a study on the subject of appropriate procedures to be adopted and to place the question on the agenda of the Council for consideration at its thirteenth session", and that the authority of the Secretary-General to convene commodity conferences on the advice of ICCICA be limited to the period pending the consideration by the Council of the Secretary-General's study.

Both the Indian and the United Kingdom amendments were unanimously adopted at the 84th meeting of the Committee. At this meeting, members of the Committee also commended the publication Review of International Commodity Problems, 1949 and expressed the hope that such reviews would continue to be issued. At its 85th meeting on 14 July the Economic Committee unanimously adopted, with a minor drafting change, the amended draft resolution concerning international commodity arrangements.

At the 399th plenary meeting of the Council held on 2 August 1950, the draft resolution recommended by the Economic Committee (E/1774) was unanimously adopted as resolution (296-XI). It read as follows:

The Economic and Social Council,

Having recommended that Members of the United Nations adopt as a general guide in inter-governmental consultation or action with respect to commodity problems the principles laid down in chapter VII of the draft Charter for an International Trade Organization prepared at the first session of the Preparatory Committee of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Employment (now Chapter VI of the Havana Charter),

Having noted, that inter-governmental consultation is proceeding with respect to several commodities,

Having considered, the recommendation of the Interim Co-ordinating Committee for International Commodity Arrangements:

(a) That there should be no procedural delays in the summoning of a commodity conference by the United Nations, and

(b) That a commodity conference should, so far as possible, not be held until there is some assurance that an agreement is a possibility and that there has been adequate preparation of the necessary documentation, and

Bearing in mind General Assembly resolution 366 (IV) on "Rules for the calling of international conferences of States",

Authorizes the Secretary-General, pending consideration by the Council of the study referred to below, to convene, on the advice of the Interim Co-ordinating Committee for International Commodity Arrangements acting on the request of an appropriate inter-governmental study group, inter-governmental conferences whose terms of reference shall be to discuss measures designed to meet special difficulties which may exist or may be expected to arise concerning a particular primary commodity;

Requests the Interim Co-ordinating Committee for International Commodity Arrangements, in considering its advice to the Secretary-General, to follow the principles of Chapter VI of the Havana Charter relating to the calling of commodity conferences;

Decides that the following rules shall apply to the calling of such conferences:

(1) The list of States to be invited to such a conference shall be prepared by the Committee and shall include all Members of the United Nations, of the Interim Commission for the International Trade Organization, of the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations, and of the inter-governmental study group concerned. Non-member States may also be included if they are substantially interested in the production or consumption of or trade in the commodity concerned. Specialized agencies in relationship with the United Nations may also be invited to take part;

(2) Where the State invited so wishes, there may be separate representation for dependent territories in accordance with the provisions of article 69 of the Havana Charter;

(3) The provisional agenda and rules of procedure of the conference shall be prepared by the Committee. The Committee may also prepare such working papers as it considers would facilitate the work of the conference;

(4) The Secretary-General shall fix the date and place of the conference;

Requests the Secretary-General, in view of the desirability of the Council giving full consideration to means whereby study groups and international commodity conferences should be convened, to prepare a study on the subject of appropriate procedures to be adopted and to place the question on the agenda of the Council for consideration at its thirteenth session.

During 1950 the International Tin Study Group requested that an international conference be convened to consider the conclusion of an international agreement on tin. Acting in accordance with the procedure laid down in resolution 296-XI of the Economic and Social Council (see above), and on the advice of ICCICA, the Secretary-General convened a Tin Conference in Geneva on 25 October 1950. This conference discussed in detail the methods which might be used to bring stability to international trade in tin. In addition to the draft International Agreement on Tin submitted by the International Tin Study Group, the Conference had before it proposals submitted by various delegations. There was considerable difference in the methods of operation envisaged in the various proposals, and the conference adjourned to allow greater time to examine the manner in which the various proposals would operate. The text of the resolution adjourning the Geneva session is as follows:

This Tin Conference convened, pursuant to resolution 296(XI) of the Economic and Social Council, by the Secretary-General of the United Nations at the request of the International Tin Study Group and on the advice of the Interim Coordinating Committee for International Commodity Arrangements, and attended by delegations from Australia, Belgium, Belgian Congo, Bolivia, Brazil, British Colonial and Dependent Territories, Canada, Denmark, Egypt, France, India, Indonesia, Italy, Netherlands, Switzerland, Thailand, Turkey, Union of South Africa, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the United States of America,

Recognizing that when a surplus or shortage of tin is expected to occur, inter-governmental co-operation and action, in accordance with the principles of the Havana Charter, would be desirable to meet such difficulties,

Expecting that difficulties will arise concerning tin which may require such inter-governmental co-operation and action but having concluded that the draft Agreement prepared by the International Tin Study Group and the various international measures proposed at the conference to meet these difficulties differ so widely in their methods of operation that further examination by governments is needed,

1. Instructs the Chairman, with the assistance of the Executive Secretary,

(a) To keep under review the further discussions and conclusions of the International Tin Study Group;

(b) To consult, on the basis thereof, with the members of the Steering Committee, with a view to deciding upon a suitable date for a resumption of the conference;

(c) To consult the Secretary-General of the United Nations upon the further provision of the services and facilities of the conference; and, being satisfied that the conditions for a resumption exist, to request the Secretary-General to invite those Governments which were invited to the present meetings to come together again.

2. Decides to adjourn.

The ICCICA met at Torquay, England, at the end of 1950 and prepared the Review of International Commodity Problems, 1950⁴⁸ In the Review, the Committee summarized the conditions in various primary commodities and outlined the steps that were being taken at that time to deal with shortages.

E. TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

The Transport and Communications Commission held its fourth session from 27 March to 4 April 1950. It reviewed international developments in the field of communications and was concerned particularly with questions relating to:

(1) the facilitation of the international movement of persons and goods (including travel, passport and frontier formalities as well as barriers to the international transport of goods);

(2) problems in the field of shipping (including the need for completing the ratification of the Convention on the Inter-Governmental Maritime Consultative Organization, the unification of tonnage measurement, the pollution of sea water and problems of maritime shipping affecting Latin America);

(3) the co-ordination of the specialized agencies in the field of transport and communications (including the implementations of the decisions of the Atlantic City Telecommunications Conference of 1947);

(4) transport statistics;

(5) applications of non-governmental organizations for consultative status with the Economic and Social Council;

(6) international road transport;

(7) the co-ordination of inland transport and other problems in this field and problems of regional organization.

The report of the Commission (E/1665) was considered during the eleventh session of the Economic and Social Council (ECE) at Geneva, at the 83rd and 85th meetings of the Council's Economic Committee on 7 and 14 July and at the Council's 386th and 414th plenary meetings, on 12 July and 16 August 1950, respectively. During the discussion in the Committee and the Council, emphasis was given to the importance of considering transport and communications, particularly in under-developed countries, as an essential part of the programmes in other fields, such as agriculture, health, education and industry. The main questions discussed by the Commission and the action taken by the Council are given below.

1. Facilitation of International Movement of Persons and Goods

a. TRAVEL, PASSPORT AND FRONTIER FORMALITIES

At its fourth session, the Commission noted the extensive international activity on the facilitation and development of international travel, which, according to a report by the Secretary-General (E/CN.2/70 & Corr. 1 & Add. 1), had taken place in 1949-50. The report described developments since the third session of the Commission and outlined activities of international, inter-governmental and non-governmental bodies of a world-wide and a regional character concerned with the facilitation of international travel. Among these were:

the United Nations Conference on Road and Motor Transport; the implementation of the standards and recommended practices for international air transport of the International Civil Aviation Organization (ICAO); the revision by the World Health Organization (WHO) of International Sanitary Conventions relating to travel; proposals by the International Labour Organisation (ILO) to study, in connexion with its studies on recreation, "popular travel, especially on an international basis"; proposals by the International Chamber of Commerce (ICC) to consider existing practices which constituted "invisible barriers to trade and travel"; the activities of the regional commissions and the proceedings of the Third International Congress of African Touring, held from 4-8 October 1949, at Nairobi, East Africa.

The Commission also had before it a report by the Secretary-General (E/CN.2/71 & Add. 2) and a report by the International Union of Official Travel Organizations (IUOTO) on passport and frontier formalities (E/CN.2/71/Add. 1). The IUOTO report, which listed replies from various Governments on how principles adopted by IUOTO were being applied, also recorded that some of the proposals of the Union had not been implemented, among them:

the standardization and co-ordination of health regulations in force for travellers; the extension of the period for validity of passports to five years; the extension of the validity of visas, where still required, to a period of at least 12 months and their extension for use at all bridges and roads normally open to foreign traffic and to all means of transport; the establishment of maximum co-operation between national travel organizations and other national authorities concerned with travel problems.

The Commission, recalling Council resolution 227F(IX) which had deferred further inquiries concerning passport and frontier formalities to Governments until after the fourth session of the Commission,⁴⁹ decided (E/1665) to request the Secretary-General to address an inquiry to Governments and to prepare for the fifth session of the Commission a comparative analysis of progress achieved.

By the end of 1950, however, seven new agreements for abolishing visa requirements on a reciprocal basis had been added to the list of 63 already reported to the Commission. Activities in 1950 by the Inland Transport Committee of the Economic Commission for Europe⁵⁰ relating to the simplification of frontier formalities had helped put into effect recommendations of the Transport and Communications Commission: in 1951, for example, many trains would be speeded up considerably in crossing German frontiers, through the carrying out of frontier formalities en route (E/CN.2/99).

b. BARRIERS TO THE INTERNATIONAL TRANSPORT OF GOODS

A report by the Secretary-General on barriers to the international transport of goods (E/CN.2/79 & Corr.1 & Add.1-4), made in accordance with Council resolution 227C(IX), came before the Commission at its fourth session. The report contained the replies of Governments concerning the 12 recommendations adopted by the International Chamber of Commerce (ICC) at its Montreux Congress in 1947 (E/CN.2/79 & Corr.1 & Add.1-4).⁵¹ Replies contained in the report were made by Afghanistan, Belgium, Canada, Egypt, France, India, Iran, New Zealand, Norway, Pakistan, Sweden, the Union of South Africa, the United Kingdom and the United States. The report also contained a review of the work done in the field by the United Nations, by specialized agencies and non-governmental organizations. It listed activities by ECE, ICAO, WHO, and the ICC in connexion with barriers to the international transport of goods.

The Commission noted that direct international action with respect to the problems of barriers to the international transport of goods, such as the convening of a conference, could not be undertaken immediately since the International Trade Organization (ITO), within whose competence the matter would primarily fall, had not started to function. The Commission noted, however, that the Council of ICAO had adopted annex 9 to the Convention on International Civil Aviation entitled "Standards and Recommended Practices for the Facilitation of International Air Transport". The Commission also noted that, although there had been a substantial degree of acceptance of the standards, a number of deviations from them had been noted by the member States of ICAO.

At the 83rd meeting of the Economic Committee of the Council, the view was expressed that the barriers referred to in the Commission's report related mainly to the number of documents required in the transport of goods and to "invisible barriers"—formalities and regulations apart from tariff walls, which in themselves formed serious barriers to the international movement of goods. Such barriers, it was stated, were symptoms of a serious malady, which could only be diagnosed in terms of fundamental political and economic factors. It was also suggested that, as the Havana Charter had not been ratified and the International Trade Organization had not come into being, the question might be brought to the notice of the Interim Commission of ITO, which could, in turn, bring it to the notice of the signatories to the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade. In unanimously adopting the resolution, the Committee agreed to add a paragraph which would request the Secretary-General to bring the matter to the notice of the Interim Commission of ITO.

This resolution was adopted by the Council at its 386th plenary meeting on 12 July 1950, without discussion, as resolution 298 D (XI), in which it urged "the Members of the United Nations and all other interested Governments, bearing in mind all possible interests, to continue consideration of national measures consistent with the principles of the Charter of the International Trade Organization for the simplification of customs and related formalities constituting barriers to the international transport of goods". It asked the Secretary-General to bring this resolution to the notice of the Interim Commission for ITO.

The Economic Committee, at its 83rd meeting, and the Council at its 386th plenary meeting, unanimously adopted resolution 298 E (XI), by which it decided to convey to the Council of ICAO its satisfaction at, and approval of, the initiative demonstrated by that organization and the results so far attained in alleviating the barriers to international transport by air. The Council also urged "all Governments to take whatever further action is necessary to apply as soon as possible, wherever feasible, ICAO's Standards and Recommended Practices on the Facilitation of International Air Transport; to eliminate as many deviations as possible at an early date; and, with regard to those deviations which cannot be eliminated immediately, to continue working together through ICAO so as to find a basis for eventual full agreement".

2. Problems in the Field of Shipping

a. RATIFICATION OF THE CONVENTION ON THE INTER-GOVERNMENTAL MARITIME CONSULTATIVE ORGANIZATION

the Council noted that the Commission, at its third session in March 1949, had drawn attention to the fact that the solution of various urgent and important problems affecting international transport would be greatly facilitated when the Inter-Governmental Maritime Consultative Organization (IMCO) had started functioning. The Council also noted that the Commission, at its fourth session in March-April 1950, had again drawn attention to the fact that IMCO had not yet come into being and that this was the appropriate agency for the handling of further important and urgent problems, such as the unification of maritime tonnage measurement and the pollution of sea water. In the same resolution, the Council instructed the Secretary-General to draw the attention of Members to the fact that the early establishment of IMCO was desirable.⁵²

At the 83rd meeting of the Economic Committee, various representatives stated their Governments' position on ratification of the draft Convention. The resolution was adopted unanimously by the Economic Committee and by the Council by 12 votes to none, with 2 abstentions, after the Chairman of the Economic Committee had pointed out to the Council that the Convention of IMCO could come into effect only when at least seven States, owning more than one million tons of shipping, and 14 other States had ratified it. The Convention, he reported, had up to that time been ratified by Canada, Greece, the Netherlands, and the United Kingdom. In addition, the United States representative had stated, during the debate in the Economic Committee, that his Government had also recently ratified the Convention, and the representative of France had stated that his Government would do so in the near future.

b. UNIFICATION OF MARITIME TONNAGE MEASUREMENT

At its fourth session, the Commission considered a report by the Secretary-General (E/CN.2/81 & Add.1) on the results of an inquiry⁵³ to Governments made in response to Council resolution 227 B (IX), concerning the desirability of more general and closer adherence to the rules on the unification of maritime tonnage measurement which had been adopted at the Oslo Conference of 1947.

The Commission noted that only three Governments had so far ratified the Convention adopted at the Oslo Conference, and, moreover, that it appeared from replies received that a number of countries were not prepared to contemplate unification of maritime tonnage measurement on the basis of the Oslo Rules. The Commission considered that IMCO would be the competent agency to handle this subject. It resolved to leave the question of inter-governmental action to that agency when it had started functioning and urged Governments to continue their studies of this problem (E/1665).

c. POLLUTION OF SEA WATER

The Commission at its fourth session, considered a report by the Secretary-General (E/CN.2/68), on the pollution of sea water by oil, which reviewed the consideration given to the problem by the League of Nations. The Commission found some difference of opinion as to the urgency of the problem and the manner in which it should be approached (E/1665). It was generally agreed that the problem was one for IMCO. The Commission decided to recommend that the Secretary-General be instructed to request the views of Member Governments on the following points:

- (a) Whether, pending the establishment of IMCO, preliminary action should be taken;
- (b) If so, what would be the best procedure to follow;
- (c) In particular whether the convening of a meeting of competent governmental experts would be the appropriate procedure;
- (d) Whether the draft Convention on the Pollution of Sea Water by Oil prepared in 1935 under the auspices of the League of Nations could serve as a working basis for the consideration of the problem;
- (e) Whether the scope of the examination of the problem should be extended to cover the possible future pollution of sea water by atomic waste from fuel which may be used by ships;
- (f) Whether they would wish to give priority to the consideration of any one of the several consequences of the pollution of sea water (E/1665.)

The Economic Committee, at its 83rd meeting, accepted these recommendations unanimously. The Council, at its 386th meeting on 12 July 1950, also adopted unanimously and without discussion resolution 298 C (XI), in which it resolved to transmit the Secretary-General's report on the pollution of sea water by oil to the Members of the United Nations, and instructed the Secretary-General to request their views on the points raised by the Commission. The Council, on the recommendation of the Commission, also invited the Member Governments which possess the technical facilities to do so, to undertake research studies on this problem forthwith, collaborating on them as far as possible.

d. MARITIME SHIPPING AND LATIN AMERICA

At its fourth session, the Commission noted a report by the Secretary-General (E/CN.2/83 & Corr.1-3 & Add.1) on the problems of maritime shipping affecting Latin America. The Secretary-General, on the instructions of the Council (resolution 227 D (IX)), had sent an inquiry to the Latin American Governments, requesting from them their precise views on the problem of maritime shipping, including freight rates, affecting Latin America, so far as to enable the Commission to determine the elements of the problem.⁵⁴ At the time the Secretary-General's report was considered by the Commission, however, only two replies had been received.

The Secretary-General's report contained, in addition to the replies from these Governments, information concerning inter-governmental action since 1940 in the Americas with respect to this question, with particular reference to the Inter-American Maritime Conference held in Washington in 1940 and the work of the Organization of American States. The question of freight rates was currently under study by the Commission on Commercial Co-operation of the Organization of American States.

The Commission, accordingly, suggested to the Council that the examination of the subject, where appropriate, should be left to other competent bodies, like ECLA or some other appropriate American inter-governmental organization (E/1665).

At the 83rd meeting of the Economic Committee, the view was expressed that ECLA was now in a position to deal with problems of shipping affecting Latin America and that the matter should be referred directly to this regional Commission as the most competent body. ECLA, it was added, also enjoyed the support of all the Latin American Governments. The Committee agreed unanimously to recommend that the question be sent for examination to ECLA.

The matter came before the Council at its 386th plenary meeting on 12 July 1950. During the discussion, the representatives of Chile and Peru both supported the view expressed in the resolution of the Commission. The representative of Chile said that, with regard to the proposal that the problems of maritime shipping affecting Latin America should be referred to the Inter-American Economic and Social Council (E/AC.6/-SR.83), he felt that the case would be met by resolution L, adopted by ECLA at its third session

(E/1762), which had suggested that the Executive Secretary of ECLA should consult with the Executive Secretary of the Inter-American Economic and Social Council with a view to co-operating in the study of the problems of maritime shipping affecting Latin America.

The Council unanimously resolved to refer the question to ECLA for examination (resolution 298 F (XI)).

3. Co-ordination of Activities of the Specialized Agencies in the Field of Transport and Communications

At its fourth session the Commission noted a report by the Secretary-General (E/CN.2/84 & Corr. 1 & 3 & Add.1), reviewing the co-ordination of activities of the United Nations and its regional commissions with the activities of such specialized agencies as ICAO, the Universal Postal Union, the International Telecommunications Union, and the World Meteorological Organization.⁵⁵

The report brought up to date information contained in documents before the Commission at its third session,⁵⁶ which dealt with the co-ordination of activities of specialized agencies in the field of transport and communications and the co-ordination of activities in the field of aviation, shipping and telecommunications in regard to safety at sea and in the air. The report dealt, first with subjects of direct interest to the commission:

- (1) international transport — including the simplification of frontier formalities and the easing of barriers to international trade as well as aspects of public health relating to international transport;
- (2) international communications, including both telecommunications and postal services involving international air mails;
- (3) the application of meteorology;
- (4) the coordination of statistical activities;
- (5) the co-ordination of activities in the fields of aviation, shipping, telecommunications and meteorology in regard to safety at sea and in the air;
- (6) the facilitation of the international interchange of goods;
- (7) the removal of obstacles to the free flow between nations of educational, scientific and cultural information, such as derive from currency, customs or other regulations.

The report also dealt with subjects of indirect interest to the Commission, including the expanded programme of technical assistance for the economic development of under-developed countries; conditions of employment in international transport; telecommunications; the United Nations research laboratories; the co-ordination of cartographic activities; and fiscal matters.

The Commission expressed the desire that a similar report be transmitted to its next session (E/1665).

The Commission brought to the attention of the Council the need for ensuring the implementation of the decisions of the Atlantic City Telecommunications Conferences of 1947 with respect to the establishment of an international list of frequencies (E/1665).

On the Commission's recommendation, the Council, at its 386th plenary meeting on 12 July 1950, adopted unanimously and without discussion a resolution concerning the implementation of the decisions of the Conferences. This resolution (298 J (XI)), which had been unanimously adopted by the Economic Committee at its 83rd meeting, stated that the Council was mindful of its role as a co-ordinating organ of the United Nations in the field of transport and communications and recalled its active-participation in the calling of the Atlantic City Telecommunications Conferences of 1947. The resolution proceeded to state that the Council;

Aware that communications by radio may become disrupted through interference if the Extraordinary Radio Conference to approve the international List of Frequencies called by the International Telecommunication Union (ITU) for 1 September 1950 is not successful in the task of effecting an orderly arrangement of radio frequencies, which was entrusted to it by the Atlantic City Telecommunication Conferences as well as by the Administrative Council of the ITU,

Conscious that such disruption will be detrimental to existing services especially in the fields of aviation, shipping, point-to-point radio-telegraphy and radio-telephony, safety-aids to navigation, broadcasting, and police and security services which, in turn, will have the most adverse effect in the field of economics, culture, education and health, which are specifically entrusted to the Council under Article 62 of the Charter,

Resolves to direct the Secretary-General to bring the foregoing considerations to the attention of all the Members of the United Nations, requesting those of them attending the Extraordinary Radio Conference to give this matter the most careful consideration at the highest policy level, and to direct their representatives at the Conference to take steps to ensure that, without unnecessary delay, the Conference shall reach a successful conclusion, which can only be brought about by a broad, co-operative and realistic approach to the problems.

Since the adoption by the Council of this resolution, it was informed that, on 10 August, the International Telecommunication Union had voted to postpone the Extraordinary Radio Conference at The Hague until the Administrative Council of ITU determined that it should be held. The Administrative Council, at its fifth session at Geneva from 1 September-11 October 1950, proposed, subject to confirmation, that the Extraordinary Conference meet at Geneva on 16 August 1951.⁵⁷

4. Transport Statistics

The Commission, at its fourth session, noted a report by the Secretariat (E/CN.2/75 & E/CN.3/85)⁵⁸ which continued a three-part study aimed at:

- (1) the establishment of economic and technical statistical requirements in the field of transport;
- (2) the achievement of comparability in the information to be collected;
- (3) the standardization of forms for the collection of this information. The document before the Commission at its fourth session contained the results of a study of the achievement of comparability in transport statistics.

Suggestions were made at the Commission's discussions concerning the items to be included in a proposed list of statistical series. The Commission expressed the opinion that some revision of the series and definitions might subsequently be found desirable on the basis of experience of Governments, and recommended the compilation of a series⁵⁹ by each country affected. The Commission also requested the Secretary-General to circulate the resolution it had adopted to Members of the United Nations, so that they might examine the possibility of producing, for the purposes of international comparability, series in substantial agreement with the definitions set forth (E/CN.2/75 & E/CN.3/85, Annex 1). It also asked the Secretary-General to circulate a copy of the resolution to bodies which publish international transport statistics and to governmental and non-governmental bodies concerned.

The Commission's recommendations were considered by the Statistical Commission at its fifth session, which, in its report to the Council (E/1696), noted the work done by the improvement of transport statistics and endorsed the recommendations of the Commission.

At the 83rd meeting of the Economic Committee, the United Kingdom representative suggested that the list of shipping statistics which the Commission intended to be compiled should wait until IMCO was set up and that the Secretariat should first consider the statistical series and definitions for railways, inland waterways and road transport as well as for other questions involved.

The Committee, and the Council at its 386th plenary meeting, unanimously adopted resolution 298 G (XI) and 299 C (XI), in which it took note of the progress achieved by the Transport and Communications Commission and approved by the Statistical Commission with respect to the study of transport statistics.

5. Applications of Non-Governmental Organizations

At the request of the Council (resolution 263 C (IX)), the Commission examined at its fourth session the applications of the following organizations for consultative status: (1) Inter-American Federation of Automobile Clubs, (2) International Road Federation and (3) Permanent International Bureau of Motor Manufacturers.

After considering a report by the Secretary-General containing information on these organizations (E/CN.2/80 & Add.1 & 2), it decided to recommend that consultative status should be granted to the International Road Federation, but decided not to recommend the granting of status to the Inter-American Federation of Automobile Clubs; it resolved to postpone until its fifth session consideration of the case of the Permanent International Bureau of Motor Manufacturers (E/1665). These recommendations were to be dealt with by the Committee on Non-Governmental Organizations in connexion with the twelfth session of the Council, in 1951.

6. International Road Transport

At its 347th plenary meeting on 8 February 1950, the Council had before it the report of the Secretary-General on the United Nations Conference on Road and Motor Transport (E/1559), which was convened in accordance with Council resolution 147 B (VII) of 28 August 1948, and met in Geneva from 23 August to 19 September 1949.⁶⁰

a. WORLD-WIDE SYSTEM OF ROAD SIGNS AND SIGNALS

Inter alia, the Conference recommended that the Transport and Communications Commission should review, with the assistance of such experts as might be needed, the problem of establishing a world-wide system on road signs and signals, and advise the Council on steps to reach agreement on a uniform system. A draft resolution endorsing these recommendations was prepared by the Secretary-General and submitted to the Council (E/1559), together with a statement on the financial implications (E/1559/Add.1), based on a suggestion that the Commission be assisted by a number of experts, not exceeding seven.

The draft resolution asked the Council to instruct the Commission accordingly.

The Director of the Division of Transport and Communications, reviewing the report of the Secretary-General at the 347th plenary meeting of the Council on 8 February 1950, informed the Council that by 31 December 1949, a total of 21 Governments had signed the Convention on Road Traffic, sixteen had signed the Protocol on Road Signs and Signals and seventeen had signed the Protocol concerning Countries or Territories at Present Occupied—the three principal instruments prepared and opened for signature by the Conference.

During the discussion, The United States representative, who supported the recommendations of the Conference, said he had serious misgivings concerning the financial implications of the meetings of the proposed body of experts (E/1559/Add.1). It would appear from the document, he said, that the experts might meet over a period of years and constitute a new and costly permanent organization. The experts, he suggested, should hold no more than one or two meetings; on the basis of their findings, an ad hoc international conference might prepare and sponsor a new international convention. The United States representative was supported in this view by the representative of Australia. The Director of the Division of Transport and Communications, however, informed the Council that it was intended to hold one meeting of experts in 1950 and not more than one or two in 1951, at which it was hoped that a basis would be found for the conclusion of a convention at an international conference. A uniform world-wide system of road signs and signals was of paramount importance for the safety of road transport. In the light of this explanation the representative of the United States withdrew his objections and the draft resolution (272 (X)), approving the recommendation, was adopted unanimously by the Council.

In the same resolution, the Council also endorsed the recommendation of the Conference that the Transport and Communications Commission should review periodically developments concerning international road transport and advise the Council further on what international action would be desirable, whether by a conference or otherwise.

In accordance with this decision of the Council, the Commission, at its fourth session, adopted a resolution (E/1665), requesting the Secretary-General, in consultation with the Chairman of the Commission, to designate not more than seven experts with particular knowledge covering conditions in the various geographical regions of the world, who should meet for the purpose of studying the problem of devising a unified world-wide system of road signs and signals and preparing a draft convention embodying such a system, and who should report back to the fifth session of the Commission. It was envisaged that experts conversant with conditions in Africa, Asia and the Far East, Europe, the Middle East, North America and South America would be designated. The Commission, furthermore, expressed the hope that while the matter was under consideration by the experts and the Commission, Governments would not take any action which would prevent them from accepting a unified system of road signs and signals on a world-wide basis.

The first session of the group of experts was held at New York from 20 November to 20 December 1950 (E/CN.2/94; E/CN.2/CONF.1/3). The group made a field trip through ten states of the United States to see the practical application of the American system of road signs, signals and markings. It prepared a survey of the existing situation (E/CN.2/CONF.1/3), which included a summary of the systems in operation in Africa, Asia and the Far East, Europe, the Middle East, North America and Central and South America, together with a report of general considerations regarding the unification of road signs and signals. The next session was to be held in the early summer of 1951, at the European Office of the United Nations.

b. OTHER PROBLEMS OF INTERNATIONAL ROAD TRANSPORT

The Commission at its fourth session considered a report by the Secretary-General (E/CN.2/76 & Corr.1. & Add.1-2) which, inter alia, summarized developments with respect to those further problems relating to international road transport which had been brought to the attention of the Commission at its third session, in particular: customs formalities, civil liability and compulsory insurance, fiscal charges, freedom of movement in international road transport and the road transport contract.⁶¹ With reference to the question of customs formalities, the Commission was informed of the conclusion, in June 1949, under the auspices of the ECE, of an Agreement for the Provisional Application of the Draft International Customs Conventions on Touring, on Commercial Road Vehicles and on the International Transport of Goods by Road.

Members of the Commission suggested that the following additional subjects should be included, for the information of the Commission, in the Secretary-General's next report to the Commission on problems of international road transport:

- (1) Driver-licensing regulations and practices;
- (2) right or left traffic rule;
- (3) motor car headlamp requirements;
- (4) road development in under-developed areas;
- (5) transport of dangerous goods. It was suggested that the last problem should be studied with regard not only to road transport, but simultaneously with regard to transport by sea and air.

The Commission stated the opinion (E/1665), that no international action of a world-wide character needed to be initiated pending a review of the situation by the Commission at its fifth session, and expressed its satisfaction with the conclusion by the United Nations Conference on Road and Motor Transport of the Convention on Road Traffic and the Protocol on Road Signs and Signals and with the conclusion, under the auspices of ECE, of the agreement for the provisional application of three draft international customs conventions relating to road transport. The Commission recommended however, that the Council draw the attention of Governments which were invited to attend the United Nations Conference on Road and Motor Transport to the desirability of ratifying the Convention on Road Traffic at an early date. The recommendation was unanimously adopted by the Economic Committee at its 83rd meeting. The Council, at its 386th meeting on 12 July 1950, unanimously and without discussion adopted a resolution to this effect (298 I (XI)). A draft resolution (E/L.58), submitted in connexion with this resolution, was considered in connexion with the question of inland transport (see below).

7. Problems in the Field of Inland Transport

a. CO-ORDINATION OF INLAND TRANSPORT

The Commission, at its fourth session, noted a report by the Secretary-General on the subject of co-ordination of inland transport (E/CN.2/69 & Corr.1). It drew attention to a study which had been undertaken by ECE and to steps taken in various countries with respect to the co-ordination of inland transport since the third session of the Commission.⁶²

During the discussion by the Commission, the opinion was expressed by some members of the Commission that, while the principle of co-ordination (namely, the most economical use of the various forms of transport) was the same in all countries, the conditions of its application varied from country to country and from region to region. The relationship between the national and international treatment of the problem of co-ordination was discussed and the opinion was expressed that the problem on an international basis was, in part, that of harmonizing national co-ordination policies (E/1665). The representative of the United Kingdom, however, felt that divergent regional solutions might hamper world trade by according different treatment to the transport of the same commodities. He would have preferred to have the Secretary-General now issue a questionnaire to Governments on a world-wide basis, the replies to which should be analysed by the Secretariat with the assistance of outside experts. He submitted a questionnaire which might be used as a guide in this connexion (E/CN.2/91).

The Commission, however, did not feel that the Secretary-General should address inquiries to Governments at that time and adopted a resolution requesting the Secretariat to continue to study the problem; to follow the situation with respect to its treatment on the international and national levels; to report to the fifth session of the Commission and to recommend whether, and in what form, consultations with Governments concerning this problem should take place (E/1665).

The subject came before the Council at its 386th plenary meeting on 12 July 1950. The Council adopted at that meeting a draft resolution (298 H (XI)), recommended by the Transport and Communications Commission, and adopted by the Economic Committee at its 83rd meeting. In this resolution, the Council invited the regional economic commissions which had not already done so to study the question of co-ordination of inland transport in their regions and instructed the Secretary-General to arrange an exchange among the various regional economic commissions of their studies of the problem of co-ordination of inland transport.

This resolution had already been adopted by the Council when the representative of Peru submitted a draft resolution (E/L.58) relating to international road transport. He said that in spite of the work carried out by the Conference on Road and Motor Transport, it had so far proved impossible to draft a Convention on road signs and traffic signals. He felt, therefore, that such problems should be taken up on a regional basis.

In the discussion that followed, the view was expressed that the Council might wish to await the result of the studies by the experts it had appointed (resolution 272 (X)—see above) before deciding that the problem should be dealt with at regional conferences.

The draft resolution submitted by the representative of Peru was then referred to the Economic Committee, which discussed the proposal at its 85th meeting on 14 July 1950. Some representatives felt, at that meeting, that the draft resolution which had been submitted in connexion with the resolution on international road transport (298 I (XI)), already adopted by the Council, overlapped with the resolution (also already adopted) dealing with the co-ordination of inland transport (298 H (XI)). At the suggestion of the representative of India, the draft resolution was amended to take the form of a recommendation to the Secretary-General in respect of the holding of regional conferences on inland transport. This was agreed to unanimously by the Committee.

At its 414th plenary meeting on 16 August 1950, the Council unanimously decided to add a paragraph (E/1778) to resolution 298 H (XI), recommending that the Secretary-General, as far as lay within his power, should grant any requests for facilities for the organization of conferences for co-ordination of inland transport between countries belonging to a single geographical region.

b. REGIONAL PROBLEMS AND ORGANIZATIONS IN THE FIELD OF INLAND TRANSPORT

At its fourth session, the Commission reviewed (E/1665), on the basis of reports by the Secretary-General (E/CN.2/72 & Add.1; E/CN.2/73 & Add.1; E/CN.2/74 & Add.1), regional developments in the field of inland transport within the framework of the regional economic commissions, and also in regions where such commissions had not been established. In connexion with the review of the position of the regional economic commissions in 1951, the Chairman, on behalf of the members of the Commission, expressed confidence in view of the great value the Commission had always attached to regional transport bodies that the Commission would be consulted by the Council before any decisions involving the future of inland transport bodies were taken.

The Commission also took note that a conference on Central African Transportation Problems had been held in Lisbon in May 1949, and that, it had recommended, inter alia, the establishment of a permanent inter-territorial transport council, and had prepared the agenda for a plenary conference to be held in Johannesburg in October 1950. This Conference, which met from 25 October to 16 November 1950, drew up a draft constitution for the proposed permanent organization and forwarded it to Governments for further consideration.

F. STATISTICAL ACTIVITIES

At its eleventh session, the Economic and Social Council had before it the report of the fifth session of the Statistical Commission (E/1696), held from 8-17 May 1950. The report covered significant developments during 1949-50 in the work of the Commission on: (1) the improvement of national statistics; (2) the development of a standard international trade classification; (3) the achievement of international comparability in index numbers of industrial production; (4) national income statistics; (5) social statistics; (6) indices of prices; and (7) transport statistics.⁶³ The report dealt further with the consideration by the Commission of interim reports of progress in its work on: (1) industrial classification; (2) international trade statistics; (3) population and vital statistics; and (4) statistical sampling. The Commission also considered and made recommendations concerning an increase in its membership.

The report was discussed by the Economic Committee of the Council at its 83rd meeting on 7 July 1950. The report of the Committee to the Council (E/1753), which unanimously approved the Commission's recommendations in respect of: (1) standard international trade classification; (2) transport statistics; (3) index numbers of industrial production; (4) national income and social accounts; (5) social statistics; and (6) the increase in membership of the Statistical Commission,⁶⁴ was considered by the Council at its 386th plenary meeting on 12 July 1950. All recommendations by the Committee were adopted at this meeting by the Council, unanimously and without discussion.

1. Improvement of National Statistics

The development of national statistics, and the organization of adequate national statistical systems, are basic elements of the terms of reference of the Statistical Commission. At its fifth session, the Commission reviewed the programme undertaken by the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) and by the International Statistical Institute towards developing a centre at Calcutta, which would include intermediate and advanced education in statistical theory and application, plans for fellowships and for translations of necessary texts and teaching materials where such facilities were deficient.

The Commission also reviewed the work done in pursuance of its previous recommendations, approved by the Council in resolution 231 D (IX), for a programme of advice and expert assistance to Governments seeking to improve their statistical services. The services provided by the Secretary-General, in collaboration with the specialized agencies, included the conduct of short-period training and demonstration centres; advice on the organization and content of national statistical services; provision for the training abroad of national statistical personnel, preparation of technical manuals and other training materials to assist countries in the conduct of census programmes and other phases of their statistical services (with particular emphasis upon the application of recommended statistical methods and international standards); and advice on methods of relating national statistical requirements to the needs of international organizations for statistical information. In connexion with the implementation of this programme, more than 250 technicians from 50 countries have participated in the training activities furnished.

The Commission noted the advantages in economy and effectiveness secured by the joint efforts of United Nations and the specialized agencies in the preparation and execution of technical assistance projects in the field of statistics, and felt that this experience provided a practical pattern for the continued development of assistance to Governments. In its recommendations to the Secretary-General, the Commission emphasized the need for arrangements which would:

- (1) permit detailed advanced planning at the technical level among participating international organizations;
- (2) facilitate agreement well in advance of the initiation of particular projects upon detailed operational plans;
- (3) enable specific commitments to be made for the execution of technical assistance activities in statistics based upon such advance planning.

The Commission also urged the Secretary-General, in utilizing the resources allocated to the programme of technical assistance, to take into account the urgent unfilled needs in many countries for assistance in developing national statistical services and the benefits to be derived from expansion of facilities to provide such assistance.

In the implementation of this programme, the Secretary-General had responded to requests from Governments by assigning statistical consultants to Bolivia, Brazil, Burma, Chile, Colombia, Ecuador, Haiti, India, Iran, Lebanon, Libya, Pakistan, Paraguay, Peru, Thailand and Uruguay.

The Statistical Office had prepared technical manuals on statistical methods and procedures for use by national technicians in planning their own programmes as well as for use by the Office as a background for offering suggestions and advice. By the end of 1950, manuals had been and were being compiled in the fields of population censuses, statistical organization, industrial censuses, national income and vital statistics. This work was being expedited in response to General Assembly resolution 407 (V), which requested the preparation of guides for the assistance of underdeveloped countries in reporting on their full employment programmes and on the level of economic activity.

2. Standard International Trade Classification

The second in a series of basic systems of statistical classification, which the Statistical Commission had undertaken as part of its programme for the improvement of statistics, was submitted to the eleventh session of the Council (E/1696). This classification, the Standard International Trade Classification, was the result of three years of study by the Statistical Commission and the Statistical Office, assisted by groups of experts and taking into account the detailed comments on the successive draft classifications by statisticians of the specialized agencies and by most of the Governments whose commodities form an important part in world trade.

The Standard International Trade Classification had been developed from the League of Nations Minimum List of Commodities for International Trade Statistics, in order to provide the widest measure of international agreement. It would serve three main purposes:

(1) many countries might adopt the new classification for their own external trade statistics in place of their present classification;

(2) other countries, while continuing to use their existing national system of trade classification, would be provided with an agreed international standard classification by which national statistics might be reclassified and thus made comparable with the international trade statistics of other countries;

(3) the regular reporting of trade statistics to international agencies could be done in terms of the Standard International Trade Classification.

At the 83rd meeting of the Economic Committee on 7 July, several representatives, including those of France and the United Kingdom, described the adoption of the Standard International Trade Classification as the most important achievement of the fifth session of the Commission. The classification—compiled with world-wide assistance from Governments, groups of experts and international organizations—represented the widest international agreement possible on the subject, they said.

The Council adopted resolution 299 B (XI), as follows:

The Economic and Social Council,

Taking note of the work done by the Statistical Commission during its third, fourth and fifth sessions, and the comments received from Governments and specialized agencies regarding the Standard International Trade Classification, and

Taking note that the classification recommended can serve as a basis for a systematic analysis of world trade and as a common basis for the reporting of trade statistics to international agencies, thus reducing the burden on Governments,

Urges all Governments to make use of this Standard Classification by:

(i) Adopting this system of classification with such modifications as may be necessary to meet national requirements, without disturbing the framework of the classification, or

(ii) Rearranging their statistical data in accordance with this system for purposes of international comparison.

3. Index Numbers of Industrial Production

The Statistical Commission, at its third session, requested the Secretary-General to review the League of Nations report (1939)⁶⁵ providing guidance to countries intending to compile or to revise their indices of industrial production, taking into account the advances in the theory and practice of index number construction and the changes in industrial structure, and in the nature and amount of data available.

The report on this review (E/CN.3/86), presented to the fifth session of the Statistical Commission, took account of comments and suggestions made by Governments and international agencies on draft proposals prepared by the Statistical Office for the improvement and standardization of index numbers. The Statistical Commission, in its report (E/1696), made detailed recommendations on methods to be used in compiling index numbers of industrial production, proposing that Governments review their compilations of such index numbers utilizing the technical manual to be prepared by the Secretary-General for their guidance, in order to improve comparability with the indices of other countries. It was also recommended that Governments in whose countries industrial production was important should undertake to compile index numbers if they were not doing so. The Commission also formulated general suggestions which Governments might follow in determining the scope and methods of taking a census of industrial production for the purpose of, inter alia, providing the weights for an index on industrial production.

The Economic Committee of the Council, considering these proposals at its 83rd meeting on 7 July 1950, debated the procedure which should be recommended to Governments for revising their methods of calculation to improve the comparability of index numbers of industrial production. After the representatives of Chile, France and India had expressed themselves in favour of a clarification of procedure, the Committee decided to recommend further that the review by Governments of their compilation should be done "in consultation with the Statistical Office of the United Nations", and this recommendation was embodied in the resolution adopted by the Council (299 D (XI)).

4. National Income Statistics

Two studies on national income statistics by the Secretary-General⁶⁶ were reviewed by the Statistical Commission. The Commission recommended that the attention of Governments be drawn to the importance of periodic compilation of accounts of national income and expenditure and of the national accounts in general on an internationally comparable basis, and that those Governments in course of preparing tables of national income and expenditure and national accounts should review their compilations in order to improve comparability with the standard procedures proposed in the technical studies of the Secretariat. The Council adopted resolution 299 E (XI), endorsing the recommendations of the Statistical Commission.

5. Social Statistics

A preliminary survey of social statistics (E/CN.3/100), prepared by the Secretariat at the request of the fourth session of the Statistical Commission, reviewed the need for more adequate statistical data on social questions and the difficulties of devising satisfactory procedures for the collection and compilation of such statistics.

The Statistical Commission, in view of the importance of social statistics to the work of the Council and its Commissions, recommended that, in the programmes of the Statistical Office and the statistical services of the interested specialized agencies, greater emphasis be given to social statistics and their adequacy and comparability. The recommendations of the Statistical Commission for a programme of work to be undertaken by the Secretary-General, with the assistance of specialized agencies interested in the field of social statistics, was endorsed by the Council in resolution 299 F (XI). In this resolution, the Council asked the Secretary-General to survey the needs of the United Nations and other international agencies in the field of social statistics; to explore how these needs were being met by the United Nations and the specialized agencies, drawing attention to areas where more complete and comparable data were needed; and to investigate the availability and comparability of data not being collected by the United Nations and the agencies, compiling those most urgently needed, with appraisals of their accuracy.

6. Indices of Prices

At its fifth session, the Statistical Commission studied a preliminary report on indices of prices prepared by the Secretariat (E/CN.3/107 & Add.I). The Commission felt that the studies had shown that the methods of construction of some wholesale price indices were not wholly appropriate, and that substantial changes in the practices of many countries might be necessary in order to revise the index numbers to meet current demands. The Commission, therefore, recommended that the Secretary-General continue to work on the problem of the construction of price indices and that special attention should be given to the means by which price index numbers might be compiled to measure price movements in various important categories of goods. The Commission further directed that a report be prepared, and, after review by the members of the Commission as to its suitability, be circulated to Governments and specialized agencies for comment, preparatory to a review of this problem by the Statistical Commission at a subsequent session (E/1696).

7. Reports of Progress in Statistical Development

a. INDUSTRIAL CLASSIFICATION

The Statistical Commission received interim reports on several aspects of the programme of work it had drafted at its fourth session in 1949. In taking note of the progress of national Governments in adopting or applying the International Standard Industrial Classification of all economic activities recommended by the Economic and Social Council in resolution 149 A (VII), the Statistical Commission requested the Secretary-General to urge countries which do not adopt the International Standard Industrial Classification as their national standard to prepare and transmit to the Secretariat a convertibility index by means of which the items of their national classification may be identified in the terms of the International Standard (E/1696).

b. INTERNATIONAL TRADE STATISTICS

In considering the problems of improving methods used in the recording of transactions in international trade, the Statistical Commission recommended the study of a series of related aspects of the problems of international trade statistics. The Secretary-General, in consultation with the appropriate specialized agencies, was urged to study the practices at present employed by Governments in recording transactions in international trade and to report to the Statistical Commission, at its next session, on the desirability of modification or expansion of the relevant provisions of the International Convention relating to Economic Statistics (E/1696).

c. POPULATION AND VITAL STATISTICS

The Statistical Commission reviewed the progress made in the study of the problems of improving registration methods and the compilation of statistics of births, deaths, marriages and divorces. Both the Population⁶⁷ and Statistical Commissions received an interim report (E/CN.3/95) from the Secretary-General on the work begun in this field under previous recommendations of the two Commissions and of the Economic and Social Council. The Commissions jointly recommended that the Secretary-General should complete this work and incorporate the findings in a "Handbook of Vital Statistical Methods" and, in co-operation with appropriate international agencies, prepare draft recommendations for the improvement and standardization of vital statistics (E/1696, E/1711). The Statistical Commission called attention to the need for developing alternate methods for the registration and collection of vital statistics, which would be suitable for adoption in countries with less well developed statistical systems.

8. Statistical Sampling

The report of the third session of the Sub-Commission on Statistical Sampling (E/CN.3/83), considered at the fifth session of the Statistical Commission, dealt with a series of technical problems in statistical sampling relating to the work of the Statistical Commission, as well as problems raised by the specialized agencies. Among these were the application of sampling methods in preparing the organization and procedures for a complete census of population and for tabulating the results obtained; in developing reliable estimates of agricultural crops and in forecasting agricultural yields; in collecting manpower statistics; and in developing information necessary for the construction of estimates of national income and social accounts. As part of the broad programme of the Statistical Commission in improving the education and training of statisticians, the Sub-Commission considered the scope and content of advanced courses of instruction in statistical sampling. At the request of the Universal Postal Union, the Sub-Commission gave its preliminary advice on sampling methods which might be used in the collection of information on postal traffic.

The Statistical Commission recommended the Sub-Commission to continue to give attention to the problems raised by the specialized agencies and requested the Secretary-General to prepare detailed and full documentation on the sampling problems on which the advice of the Sub-Commission was sought (E/1696).

9. Statistical Publications of the Statistical Office

The Statistical Office as the executive agency of the Statistical Commission and the Sub-Commission on Statistical Sampling continued its activity in the various branches of statistics during 1950. During that year, the publication programme of the Statistical Office was as follows: Enlarged editions of the Statistical Yearbook⁶⁸ and the Demographic Yearbook⁶⁹ appeared, presenting the important economic, social and demographic statistical series at present publicly available in the world. The preparation of a Yearbook of International Trade Statistics proceeded. A Summary of World Trade was issued at quarterly intervals and trade-by-country data were given in a monthly publication, Direction of International Trade, issued jointly by the Statistical Office, the International Monetary Fund and the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development. *National Income Statistics of Various Countries, 1938-1948*⁷⁰ was issued covering that period. A further report containing less detailed statistics but including many more countries, National and Per Capita Income of Seventy Countries in 1949, was also issued. The Monthly Bulletin of Statistics was expanded and major emphasis was placed on the adaptation of national series to the new standard definitions and concepts developed by the United Nations and specialized agencies. A second edition of the Supplement also appeared during 1950. A quarterly publication, Population and Vital Statistics, giving population estimates, was introduced to supplement the Demographic Yearbook. In the field of sampling, reports on Sample Surveys of Current Interest appeared in the Statistical Papers Series C.

10. Transfer of Responsibility for Economic Statistics under 1928 Convention

The amendments to the International Convention relating to Economic Statistics (1928) which appear in the annex to the Protocol signed at Paris on 9 December 1948, entered into force on 9 October 1950 when the fifteenth State signed the Protocol.

G. FISCAL QUESTIONS

The Fiscal Commission did not meet in 1950, its third session having been scheduled for May 1951. Accordingly, the Secretariat continued in the fiscal field the work that had been initiated by the Fiscal Commission at its second session and endorsed by the Economic and Social Council in its resolution 226(IX).⁷¹ In addition, the Secretariat undertook a number of tasks in this field in connexion with the expanded technical assistance programme⁷² and with the requirements of regional commissions.

In response to resolution 226(IX), the Secretariat prepared for publication early in 1951 Volumes II and III of the Collection International Tax Agreements.⁷³ Volume II contains the texts of more than 100 new agreements for the avoidance of international double taxation and the prevention of fiscal evasion, signed during 1949 and 1950. Volume III presents for the first time a comprehensive analysis of the status of all known international tax agreements, giving full information not only on such technical matters as dates of signatures, ratification, modification, suspension and termination, but also on such substantive matters as the scope of the agreements (often including an exhaustive enumeration of the types of taxes covered), their extension to dependent territories and their integration in the domestic tax systems of the contracting countries through implementing laws and regulations.

In the field of technical assistance, the work of the Secretariat in the fiscal field has greatly increased under the expanded programme. Experts were selected and briefed so that they could bring to the requesting country the cumulative experience not only of their own home country, but also of the other fiscal systems on which information and experience are available at United Nations Headquarters. Technical assistance through fiscal experts was granted in 1950 to Chile, Bolivia, Ecuador, Haiti and Iran.

Improvement of public finance statistics which was called for in the report of the Statistical Commission at its fifth session, endorsed by the Economic and Social Council in resolution 299 E (XI),⁷⁴ has become a matter of greater concern to the Secretariat, especially in view of various requests for technical assistance relating to budgetary organization. A first study, Budgetary Structure and the Classification of Government Accounts,⁷⁵ which was prepared for release early in 1951, discusses the most effective forms of budget presentation permitting a periodic appraisal of the economic effects of governmental financial transactions. Individual case studies analysing the most significant features of the budget systems of Italy, Sweden, the United States and the USSR are added in appendix form. Further studies are planned on the preparation, execution and review of the budget.

The Secretariat has continued to build up its public finance information service. It has continued to issue fiscal information concerning budgetary data, taxation and the public debt; it has been evaluating the effects of fiscal developments in the light of their international implications, testing the applicability of modern fiscal techniques to less developed areas.

Two new series of country studies, Public Finance Information Papers (ST/ECA/Ser.A) and Public Finance Surveys (ST/ECA/Ser.B), were initiated; the first is intended to evaluate the public finances of individual countries, with special emphasis on comprehensive and detailed tables in which total expenditures, receipts and the public debt are sub-classified as far as possible into economically meaningful categories. Papers dealing with Egypt, Colombia and Italy were published during 1950, with further papers on Iran and Iraq scheduled for early 1951.⁷⁶

The public finance surveys are more comprehensive case studies. The first country survey, Venezuela, which was to be published early in 1951,⁷⁷ was selected to analyse the nature and effect of a number of fiscal reforms undertaken at a time when that country was in the process of major economic development.

At the request of the regional economic commissions, public finance chapters were contributed to the economic surveys for Latin America in 1950 and for Asia and the Far East in 1949⁷⁸ and 1950. These chapters contain an up-to-date set of data which show in particular the important changes in tax structure as well as the Government contribution to capital formation. They give a report on relevant fiscal developments and general trends in the area during the year. While the 1949 survey for Asia and the Far East had already been published by the end of 1950, the 1950 surveys for the two regions were scheduled for publication in the first half of 1951.

In preparing the country tables contained in the public finance chapter of the Statistical Yearbook 1949-50,⁷⁹ a number of refinements were introduced and the number of countries covered was increased. The data continued to show overall results based on official documents. In addition, another series of annual data is given, based on the replies to a public finance questionnaire issued by the Secretariat jointly with the International Monetary Fund, in the case of a number of countries. They furnish a comprehensive picture of the cash operations of central Governments, results of monetary operations, foreign grants, cash balance, borrowings and public debt. Similar tables on an annual and monthly basis currently appear in the International Financial Statistics of the International Monetary Fund.

In the Statistical Yearbook 1950-51, it is intended to give additional data for certain countries, by breaking down total expenditure and revenue into significant categories.

Replies of Member Governments to the questionnaire on tax treatment of foreign nationals, assets and transactions continued to be received and published (E/CN.8/46 & Addenda); they served as source material for the tax studies of the Secretariat. In February 1950, a study was published entitled The Effects of Taxation on Foreign Trade and Investment,⁸⁰ which analysed the problem in terms of the role which tax measures can play in furthering economic development by producing Government revenue for the financing of development projects, by stimulating foreign and domestic investment and by eliminating tax barriers, especially those arising from international double taxation. A more specific study on the taxation of corporate profits and dividends has been initiated with special emphasis on the problem of corporate taxation in under-developed countries.

The Secretariat has continued to enlist the co-operation of outside experts as consultants participating in the preparation of its fiscal studies.

H. REGIONAL ECONOMIC COMMISSIONS

1. Economic Commission for Europe (ECE)

The Economic Commission for Europe held its fifth session from 31 May to 15 June at Geneva.⁸¹

It considered, among other things, an overall report of its Executive Secretary (E/ECE/114/-Rev.1) on the Commission's work since its establishment by the Economic and Social Council on 28 March 1947. The report stated that the activity of the Commission had been given momentum by the earlier work of the Emergency Economic Commission for Europe, the European Coal Organization and the European Central Inland Transport Organization. It was aided further by the existence in Europe of strong, experienced governmental administrations and well-organized statistical services, and by the closeness and interdependence of European economies. It was in the common interest to maintain such an instrument of regular consultation.⁸²

The ending of shortages caused by the war uncovered more fundamental issues calling for European economic co-operation, the report stated. At this time, the outlook of the committees of the Commission was characterized by five main themes:

- (1) Seeking a solution for the over-all problems of European industries: national development, the report recognized, is not parallel;
- (2) the need for Europe to reduce costs of production;
- (3) the problem of market organization;
- (4) Europe's shortage of dollars, despite increased production;
- (5) the problem of bilateral agreements and their effect on trade between the countries of Europe, as well as on the trade of Europe with the outside world.

⁷⁹ See p. 495.

The Commission (E/1674) reviewed the work done, as outlined in the report, mapped out future work programmes for its committees, and, in some cases, revised the terms of reference of committees to place more emphasis on long-term development problems rather than on post-war reconstruction tasks. Discussion of the economic situation in Europe showed that further strides had been made and the back of post-war reconstruction work had been broken. Nevertheless, the general feeling was that new problems faced the European economy which were almost if not altogether as serious as those arising directly out of the war. Major problems discussed were: methods of increasing intra-European trade; the attainment of equilibrium in the balance of payments; possible new export markets for European products; the elimination of unemployment where it existed; the modernization of agricultural methods; and methods of increasing industrial productivity and output. The Commission requested the Executive Secretary to develop the exchange of technical information and technical assistance services, such activities to be co-ordinated with the technical assistance activities administered by the Secretary-General. It also authorized the Executive Secretary to proceed with consultations and studies on financial problems and factors affecting international price movements in Europe, including monopolies, cartels and State trading.

Representatives expressed general approval of the over-all work of ECE. The Commission deplored unanimously, however, what it considered the negative results achieved by the Committees on the Development of Trade, Manpower and Agricultural problems. Members of the Commission welcomed the efforts of the Executive Secretary to promote a general agreement on grain in the first place and perhaps other commodities later.

(1) Committee on Agricultural Problems

The Committee on Agricultural Problems, established at the fourth session of the Commission in May 1949, held its first session in October 1949.⁸⁴

At its second session in March 1950, it decided:

- (a) to continue its study of measures for helping holders of small and medium-sized farms, by means of granting credit and promoting modern farming techniques, with an additional item dealing with the tenancy aspects of small and medium farmers;
- (b) to complete its study of livestock feedingstuffs and fertilizers with a study, of prices dealing with the relationship of prices of coarse grains and the main livestock products (milk, pigmeat and eggs), and, in the second instance, the relationship of prices of fertilizers and the principal vegetable products.

The Committee, however, was unable to agree at its second session, held from 20-25 March 1950, on an appropriate procedure for undertaking work on intra-European trade in agricultural products.

The Committee continued work on the standardization of perishable foodstuffs.

(2) Coal Committee

The Coal Committee, which first met in November 1947, had held nine sessions by January 1950.⁸⁵ Its work had been in the following main fields:

It had recommended allocations of solid fuels available for export; it had made certain technical studies, notably on the efficient utilization of solid fuels and coal classification; it had kept under review the supply position of mining equipment and pitwood with the object of promoting the increase of coal production; it had collected coal statistics and introduced regular forecasts of the future solid fuel situation.

Until its eleventh session on 26-27 May 1950, the main operating function of the Coal Committee was that of recommending allocations of solid fuels in the common interest of Europe. Under the system which was then in force, the Allocations Sub-Committee recommended separate quarterly allocations of ten qualities and types of solid fuels. During the coal scarcity of the immediate post-war years, the allocations system ensured the fair distribution of available solid fuel supplies and played a direct part in the process of European industrial recovery.

By the middle of 1950, however, it appeared that Europe had virtually regained self-sufficiency in solid fuels. The Coal Committee therefore discontinued its allocation system and replaced its Allocations Sub-Committee and Working Party by a Coal Trade Sub-Committee, to which it gave the function of reviewing the flow and pattern of the European coal trade at regular intervals, and the competence to make recommendations on any matters affecting the European coal market.

The new system of review of the demand and supply situation of solid fuels, which replaced the old allocations procedure, underwent its first practical test during the last half of 1950 under conditions of a deteriorating supply position. By the autumn, a general scarcity was developing; coal production could not keep pace with a sharp rise in demand, which was due, in part, to increased industrial activity, particularly in the iron and steel industry. It was appreciated that if unequal sacrifices and hardships were to be avoided, some adjustment of the flow of trade would have to be accepted. Therefore, when the Coal Committee considered the position for the first quarter of 1951, at a meeting on 14 December 1950, suggestions for changes in existing trade patterns were discussed in detail, and agreement was reached on a more equitable distribution of available supplies.

In addition to the question of coal distribution, the Committee was concerned in 1950 with work in a number of other fields. It decided to study production and consumption trends, in pursuit of its general objective of bringing about a reasonable degree of equilibrium between solid fuel supply and demand. Coal production prospects in certain major producing countries and production programmes for five years ahead were examined; a general study of consumption trends was followed by the start of work on a series of studies on consumption trends in particular countries. The Committee also took up the question of coal prices in their general economic aspects; in particular, work began on a study of the chain of factors affecting the cost of coal to the consumer.

The Committee agreed, towards the end of 1950, to embark on a new programme of work in the field of solid fuel utilization and to develop the exchange of technical information on this subject. Further progress was made towards the establishment of an international coal classification system. Since a complete system, applicable to all hard coals, was in sight at the end of 1950, attention was turned to the question of introducing a simplified system, based on the complete system, for commercial and statistical use.

Forecasts of production, exports, imports and consumption of coal and coke, made for a year ahead at a time, were carried on; the regular publication of the Monthly Bulletin of Coal Statistics and the Monthly Statistical Summary was also continued.

Production of hard coal in Europe in 1950 was about 558,000,000 tons and apparent consumption amounted to approximately 545,000,000 tons (including foreign bunkers). A total of approximately 13,000,000 tons was exported to extra-European destinations.

(3) Committee on Electric Power

The Committee on Electric Power, established at the Commission's second session,⁸⁶ carried further in 1950 its assembly of technical information on particular electric-power projects and advanced its industrial, economic, and legal research into the basic problems of the general power supply in Europe (E/ECE/119). Its legal researches involved problems of hydro-electric development of rivers of common interest to neighbouring countries and national legislation concerning exchanges of electric energy across frontiers. Its studies of problems of production ranged from consideration of the gross potential water power resources of Europe to an economic analysis of the efficiency of daily pumping stations utilizing thermal energy during the night.

Production capacity of power in Europe, nevertheless, remained one of its prime considerations during 1950. Though war-damaged power installations in most countries had been restored by the beginning of 1950, the Committee felt that electric power production still lagged and that a shortage would still be felt in some parts of Europe after 1950 (E/ECE/EP/50). The growth of power capacity was restricted by commercial policy, payments and financing, the Committee said. It felt that flexibility in the regulations governing the exchange of power across frontiers would develop power resources to the best advantage.

By the end of 1950, the Committee was able to report a 13 per cent increase over 1949 in the use of electric power (E/ECE/127), mainly because many new hydro-electric and thermal plants were now operating.

(4) Industry and Materials Committee

The Industry and Materials Committee, at the time of its fourth session in March 1950, had been primarily occupied with three broad areas of the European economy: engineering, building and industrial materials and chemicals.⁸⁷

In March 1950, nearly all engineering products and industrial materials were in good supply. In Eastern Europe trade in engineering products was growing, particularly between Czechoslovakia and the USSR. In Western Europe, imports from the United States of America had fallen; France, Sweden, Switzerland and the United Kingdom were selling more on Western European markets. Even more noticeable was the increase in exports from Western Germany (E/ECE/117 & Add.1). But in the second half of 1950, with an increase in industrial production, the position changed. There were then shortages of engineering equipment (like machine tools), and of industrial materials (like coal, steel, non-ferrous metals, sulphur and textile fibres). The Committee decided, at its fourth session in March 1950, to recommend a programme of work on housing and the building industry, but it decided to postpone until the next session of the Commission a final recommendation on the future of the Committee on the engineering industry and on industrial materials.

This future programme, outlined in April 1950 (E/ECE/114/Rev.1) involved the recognition that the building of homes was one of the major unfulfilled tasks of reconstruction throughout Europe. The Committee chose to work in three main spheres: (1) the spread of technical and economic information, (2) consideration of the setting up of international organizations for the building industry, and (3) certain detailed economic studies.

The Committee noted that there was, at that time, no proposal for work on industrial products or raw materials within its terms of reference, except for future work on cement. The Commission, however, at its fifth session invited the Committee to appoint a special working party to plan work in fields other than housing and building. This working party met in Geneva, from 4-8 September 1950, and agreed on a programme dealing with engineering and industrial materials (E/ECE/IM/55).

Meanwhile, the Economic and Social Council had adopted, at its eleventh session (E/1823), a resolution (301(XI)) approving a decision by the Economic Commission for Latin America on 19 June 1950 (E/CN.12/200), calling for a study on ways to expand trade between Latin America and Europe. The working party mentioned in the previous paragraph agreed that it was interested in the promotion of trade between Europe and overseas areas and that the Committee should contribute to the joint ECE-ECLA study (E/ECE/IM/55). The Committee could assess technical factors affecting European exports of some engineering products to Latin America, particularly tractors and farm machinery. The working party also agreed to watch production trends and market developments; to continue its lists of engineering products available for export and to revise its first investigation of the elements of costs of engineering products; to recommend procedures for the provision, on requests from Governments, of technical information in connexion with Technical Assistance. It also agreed that the secretariat should prepare a document showing, in comparative form, the rate of tariffs on a limited number of engineering products in as many countries as possible and a list of documents relating to inquiries into the productivity of the engineering industry.

(5) Inland Transport Committee

The following are among the main achievements of the Inland Transport Committee by the beginning of 1950:⁸⁸ the reintroduction of the RIV (exchange of railway wagons); the conclusion of agreements on the lifting of restrictions on the freedom of the road; the drawing up of draft customs conventions on touring, on commercial road vehicles and the international transport of goods by road, which were put into force through a provisional agreement. The Committee also took steps to further the standardization of railway wagons, and began the publication of quarterly transport statistics.

At the beginning of 1950, the Committee was still examining the return and redistribution of rolling stock, identification of wagons, programmes for renewing and constructing rolling stock. It set up a working party to examine economic questions concerned with the Berne Convention—International Convention Concerning the Transport of Goods by Rail (CIM)—and the International Convention Concerning the Transport of Passengers and Baggage by Rail (CIV). It further considered ways of modifying the structure of European transport railway bodies with a view to eliminating duplications.

During 1950 the Committee was occupied with the definition of a general transport policy involving consideration of the related problems of the improvement of European communications, electrification of railways, and the co-ordination of transport investment programmes. The Committee also decided to deal with the problems relating to the transport of dangerous goods by road and inland waterways.

The Committee was also occupied with over-all problems of tourist traffic,⁸⁹ the transport of perishable foodstuffs, statistics, particularly those relating to road transport, and the drawing up of a combined transport contract. The Committee initiated work on the co-ordination of transport, including studies on the cost of transport.

In rail transport, agreements on the restitution of rolling stock were concluded in May and June 1950, after negotiations between Government representatives of Belgium, France, the Netherlands, Poland and the authorities of the Occupation Zone of Western Germany. Action was taken which led to a reduction of the time spent by passengers at a number of frontiers. The Sub-Committee on Rail Transport continued studies on the better use of rolling stock, the modernization of long-distance passenger facilities, transport safety measures, standardization of rolling stock, the use of substitute materials, a programme for rolling stock renewal and a uniform system of accountancy for main line railways. A special working party examined currency problems involved in the payment of transport charges (E/ECE/127). At the fifth session of the Committee in September 1950, a draft agreement between international non-governmental railway associations for the co-ordination of activities was prepared and later signed by the organizations concerned.

In the field of road transport, the Sub-Committee was able to report that the agreements on the lifting of restrictions on the freedom of the road could now be regarded as being in force for an indeterminate period. Three agreements between European countries—on road signs and signals and on rules of the road; on weights and dimensions of vehicles; and on a Declaration on Main International Traffic Arteries—were signed in Geneva on 16 September 1950. Further, the Sub-Committee was working on problems connected with the implementation of the draft customs convention on commercial road vehicles. It initiated work on an international road transport contract and on civil liability and compulsory insurance for foreign motorists (E/ECE/144/-Rev.1).

An annual bulletin of transport statistics was published in September 1950 for the first time, and the publication of quarterly bulletins on

(6) Manpower Committee

No meetings of the Committee were held during 1950, its programme having been taken over by the ILO in April 1948.

(7) Steel Committee

The Steel Committee, like ECE generally, was faced at first with problems of acute shortages immediately after the war. By 1950 the emphasis of its work had shifted and the main functions of its new programme (E/ECE/114/Rev.1) involved:

- (1) the exchange of information to help reduce costs and increase output;
- (2) the review of supplies of steel-making materials;
- (3) measures to increase consumption;
- (4) studies on manufacturing and marketing trends.

New terms of reference for the Steel Committee were adopted by the Council at its fifth session (E/1674). They were:

- (1) to pursue the examination of the supply position with regard to the principal raw materials and equipment of the iron and steel industry;
- (2) to collect and transmit all useful information concerning steel production and consumption trends, and the development of the principal factors in the costs of production;
- (3) to examine ways and means of increasing steel production and consumption, particularly in the under-developed countries;
- (4) to pursue its statistical work;
- (5) to undertake, in general, any studies which the committee might deem of importance;
- (6) to draw any appropriate conclusions arising from its work.

At its sixth session in March 1950, the Committee declared that its most urgent problems concerned measures to increase the consumption of steel and to reduce costs and the study of trends and the correlation of statistics (S/ECE/STEEL/48). During the first half of 1950, steel production in many European countries was close to capacity; in others it dropped to between 60 and 70 per cent. By the end of the year, however, production in the majority of countries was the highest ever attained. Crude steel produced in Europe in 1950 (excluding the USSR) reached 60,000,000 tons—5,000,000 tons higher than in 1949 (E/ECE/127). Foreign trade in steel products in 1950 increased by nearly 40 per cent for the four largest steel-producing countries. In 1951, the Committee estimated, the steel industry of Europe could produce over 69,000,000 tons if the supply of raw materials were adequate.

At its seventh session in November 1950, the Committee warned that there was a serious risk of an important deficit in coke supplies for 1951.

It decided to reconvene the Panel on Scrap, which had been kept in abeyance since 1949,⁹⁰ because of the increased demand for scrap and the depletion of reserves of war scrap. The Committee also decided to appoint a group of experts to consider supplies of iron ore, and recommended the publication of a quarterly bulletin of steel statistics for Europe, the first issue of which was published in December 1950. It further recommended close liaison with other regional commissions on the subject of steel (E/ECE/127). It adapted a scheme for promoting technical co-operation through reports on the trends in the technique of steel making.

(8) Timber Committee

The mandate to the Timber Committee, which began its work as a sub-committee of the Industry and Materials Committee,⁹¹ concerned the serious shortages after the war. In 1950, it asked that its mandate be broadened to meet the changed situation and to enable it to recommend policy for the expansion of the timber industry in Europe. The Committee sought authority to continue collection and publication of statistics on primary forest products, to publish analyses of the timber market in Europe, to watch possibilities for the better use of wood and to maintain touch with the principal forest products. At its fifth session the Commission agreed to new terms of reference on these lines (E/1674).

The Timber Committee, at its seventh session, approved nine resolutions and made recommendations to Governments with a view to the more rational utilization of wood (E/ECE/TIM/35).

The temporary easing of the situation, however, began to give way to new shortages in 1950. Western and southern Europe were using more, and there was an active demand for overseas timbers. Since the first half of 1950 there had been a "sellers' market" for timber and wood pulp (E/ECE/127).

The Committee noted that, while it was forecast for 1951 that more timber would be available, estimates of import demands had increased. The estimated deficit for 1951 was between 445,000 and 847,000 standards. Circumstances seemed to point especially to the possibility of increased European imports from Canada and the United States, and perhaps also from the Soviet Union, in order to cover the deficit in European supplies of sawn softwood. The gap amounted to between 13 and 25 per cent of the import demand.

There was also, the Committee added, an estimated deficit of 5 per cent on the probable requirements of pitprops for 1951.

The supplies available for 1951, it realized, would have to meet the demands for increased consumption resulting from the expansion of the European coal production programme. Strong demand for mechanical and chemical pulp showed no sign of diminishing; it was therefore likely that the demand for pulpwood would remain active, and, therefore, the competition between pitprop and pulpwood uses for small-size roundwood seemed likely to continue.

An investigation, designed to cover the period from 1913 in a comprehensive study of timber trends, was begun during the summer of 1950. The project was undertaken as a joint work by the secretariats of ECE and FAO, and would continue through 1951.

(9) AD HOC Committee on the Development of Trade

No meetings of the Ad Hoc Committee on the Development of Trade were held during 1950. Its activities, however, were covered by the executive secretary of the Commission in his over-all report (E/ECE/114/Rev.1) to the Commission in April 1950.

The report said that the committee had not begun to function effectively. A procedural deadlock in 1949⁹² led to the circulation of memoranda by the Executive Secretary, including a proposal for a multilateral European trade agreement (Aide Memoire of 2 November 1949—E/ECE/114/Rev.1, App. IV). The proposal involved, as part of the envisaged trade agreement, three main points:

- (1) long-term buying agreements by the Western countries for cereals from the Eastern countries;
- (2) a commitment by the Western countries that the proceeds of the sale of these products could be used to buy goods on an approved list;
- (3) arrangements for increased flexibility over payments.

No Government had expressed a view contrary to these proposals, the report said. It added that no further meeting of the Committee on the Development of Trade would be justified until a solid basis of agreement had been established by preliminary negotiations, such as those initiated by the secretariat.

(a) TRADE IN GRAINS

An ad hoc meeting of European countries interested in increasing their trade in certain grains was held at Geneva from 14-20 November 1950. It was attended by: Austria, Belgium, Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, France, Greece, Hungary, Italy, Netherlands, Norway, Poland, Romania, Sweden, the USSR, the United Kingdom and the United States. Also at the meeting were observers from Canada, Finland, Switzerland, Turkey and Yugoslavia. In addition, the interests of the Byelorussian SSR and the Ukrainian SSR were represented by the USSR; Belgium represented the interests of Luxembourg and the United States represented the interests of the Western Zones of Occupation of Germany.

After an exchange of views and information on the requirements and availabilities for the current crop year and on the possibilities of negotiating some form of longer-term arrangements, the Meeting initiated a series of bilateral conversations which were to lead to agreements on meeting part of the importing countries' requirements for the current crop year.

The Meeting also agreed that the Executive Secretary should consult Governments as to the usefulness and timing of another meeting and if sufficient interest were shown, convene such a meeting in the spring or in the summer of 1951. (E/ECE/GRAIN/3, later incorporated in E/ECE/127, App.I).

b. ECONOMIC SURVEY OF EUROPE IN 1949

The Economic Survey of Europe in 1949,⁹³ published in May 1950, was the third prepared by the secretariat of the Commission. Since the publication of the last survey, the Commission had also begun to publish the Economic Bulletin for Europe, a regular quarterly review.⁹⁴

The Survey, based on official statistics and statistical estimates made by the Secretariat, showed continued progress in production, investment and trade in most European countries. It concluded that the European industrial production could be increased by half in the next ten years, if employment and investment were kept at high levels. Such a development would broaden the basis of the whole process of economic development in later years.

It also considered that Europe could participate to its own advantage in the economic development of overseas countries, not only through its export of capital equipment, but also through the provision of financing. While the flow of capital from Europe in the form of debt repayment and new funds entailed some disadvantages, it had made a major contribution to underdeveloped countries abroad.

The Survey dealt mainly, however, with immediate threats to the expansion of production and trade. Failure to receive a much greater volume of capital goods from Western European sources could seriously retard economic development in Eastern Europe. For Western European countries, the current low level of trade with Eastern Europe limited the area within which trade could be established to solve the dollar problem.

The Survey added that another threat to economic growth lay in the failure of a number of countries to use manpower effectively. Relatively full employment should be the main aim of the future. The gravest threat to continued economic stability and growth in Western Europe appeared, however, to be its overseas payment problem. The report concluded that devaluation of sterling and of many other currencies was unlikely to solve the central problem of the dollar shortage.

The Survey also concluded that "a severe downward balancing of dollar transactions will be inevitable" when the present extraordinary United States financial assistance to European and other countries comes to an end. If action were taken at once to develop production in Europe and in other overseas sources of supply, most European countries might be able to adapt themselves to a lower level of dollar imports. The basic instability encouraged national measures of self-protection and gave further impetus to the development of bilateral trade.

Details of trends of production in both agriculture and industry were analyzed by the Survey. It dealt with the allocation of resources—with changes in real income, the level and pattern of consumption, of capital formation. It discussed internal stability and employment, intra-European trade and payments, the balance of payments and overseas trade. Its analysis contained a special study of prices, devaluation and terms of trade, of "the continuing problem of international disequilibrium" and of the prospects of expansion in European production.

C. DISCUSSION BY THE COUNCIL OF THE COMMISSION'S REPORTS

The Economic and Social Council discussed the annual report of the Commission (E/1674), at its 398th plenary meeting on 11 July 1950, during its eleventh session at Geneva. The Council had before it also the financial estimate (E/1674/Add.1), the report of the Executive Secretary on the future work of the Commission (E/ECE/- 114/Rev.1) and the Economic Survey of Europe in 1949 (E/ECE/116/Rev.1).

During the discussion, the Executive Secretary reported that considerable agreement had been reached by the Commission and that the potentialities of inter-regional co-operation were substantial. He added, in replying to the debate, that an increase of trade between Eastern and Western Europe would raise European standards of production, investment and consumption and would help solve the problem of the dollar shortage. The Commission, he said, agreed that every effort should be made to improve trade between Eastern and Western Europe.

Representatives approved the work done by the Commission, particularly its research and the publication of regular Bulletins and Economic Surveys of Europe.

Two main points were raised in the discussions: the co-operation of member States in aiding the work of the Commission and the regional aspect of its work.

Several representatives, including those of Denmark, France and the United Kingdom, emphasized that greater participation by member countries would help raise the potentialities of both the Commission and its subsidiary committees.

The representatives of Canada, Chile, India and Pakistan drew attention to the regional aspect of the Commission's work. The Canadian and Indian representatives asked that regional development should be used to complement wider associations and that the trend to self-sufficiency should not become a trend toward exclusiveness. Europe, it was contended, should not look too much to itself for the expansion of its economy, but should take into account the broader aspects of those problems.

Both India and Chile urged the establishment of close links between the regional commissions of the United Nations. Chile asked the Commission to expand and intensify trade exchanges between Europe, Asia and Latin America.

The Council unanimously adopted a resolution 300 (XI) noting the Annual Report of the Commission (E/1674) for the period between 22 May 1949 and 14 June 1950, and recommended the allocation of funds to implement decisions of the fifth session of the Commission.

2. The Economic Commission for Latin America (ECLA)

The Economic Commission for Latin America (ECLA), established by the Economic and Social Council at its sixth session in March 1948 (resolution 106(VI)), had held two sessions⁹⁵ by 1 January 1950. At this time it was committed to a work programme which involved the preparation of the Economic Survey of Latin America, 1949 (E/CN.12/164) as well as other studies, including studies of agriculture, economic development, foreign trade, technical training and assistance and relations with the Inter-American Economic and Social Council.

The work of the secretariat of the Commission between the second session at Havana, in May-June 1949, and the third session at Montevideo, in June 1950, was described in the second annual report (E/1717 & E/1762). It showed that the Commission was in consultation with specialists in Latin American countries for the collection of statistical data, and emphasized the collaboration with specialized agencies of the United Nations, including FAO, Fund, Bank, ILO, UNESCO, WHO, as well as the Inter-American Economic and Social Council. The report, which covered the period from 15 June 1949 to 21 June 1950, was adopted by the Commission at its third session.⁹⁶

a. STUDIES AND REPORTS

The secretariat of the Commission completed and presented to the Commission's third session in June 1950 a number of studies and reports.

Among these were the Economic Survey of Latin America, 1949 (see below), which dealt with problems of disequilibrium, both internal and external, which have come about with the growth of the Latin American countries, and analysed the salient features of the process of economic development in those countries.

A report entitled Trade Trends and Policies of Latin American Countries (E/CN.12/165) presented data on trade trends, showing that Latin American trade with Europe had not recovered its pre-war level and that there was a decrease in both exports and imports with Europe in 1949 as compared with 1948. The report also presented statistics on intra-regional trade, discussing the possibilities of increasing such trade in relation to the future development of these countries. It analysed the effect of policies in some Latin American countries on external trade and on certain aspects of their internal economies. It concluded that tariffs and currency depreciation had been less effective as a means of equilibrating balances of payments and protecting local industry than quantitative controls on imports, which had been made imperative by world economic conditions during the last two decades and by the need to accelerate economic development.

A study of foreign investments—Economic and Legal Status of Foreign Investments in Selected Countries of Latin America (E/CN.12/166 & E/CN.12/166/Add.1-9)—was undertaken in collaboration with the United Nations Department of Economic Affairs and with the assistance of the secretariat of the Inter-American Economic and Social Council. Countries included in the study were Argentina, Brazil, Chile, Colombia, Cuba, Guatemala, Mexico, Uruguay, and Venezuela.

The FAO-ECLA Co-operative Unit, established in September 1949,⁹⁷ completed a study entitled Agricultural Credit in Central America (E/CN.12/167). As a result of the unit's study of agricultural credit institutions and policies in various Central American countries, a number of suggestions were made to individual Governments. The principal suggestions were:

That steps should be taken to develop expert personnel in the field of agricultural credit administration; that Governments, through their banking institutions, should consider the desirability of making larger sums available for agricultural credit; that steps should be taken to develop credit-worthiness of small producers; and that an endeavour should be made to establish uniform procedure in credit administration. A suggestion was made that the third session of the Commission should call a meeting of agricultural credit experts in Central America to consider ways of carrying out suggestions made in the report.

A report on immigration (E/CN.12/169 & E/CN.12/169/Add.1-3) gave an account of the role of immigrants in the economic development of Brazil, Chile and Venezuela, the Governments' policies and plans for future immigration and the needs of each of the countries for immigrants according to broad occupational classifications.

The secretariat was also occupied during 1950 with a study of cyclical fluctuations, requested by the second session of the Commission in a resolution on economic development (E/1330/Rev.1), and with a study of productivity of the cotton textile industry in selected Latin American countries. Research for this latter study was conducted by experts in Brazil, Chile, Ecuador, Mexico and Peru.

A paper on technical assistance (E/CN.12/171), produced in collaboration with the United Nations Department of Economic Affairs, gives an account of the action taken pursuant to resolutions on this matter. The secretariat of ECLA collaborated with the operational units of the United Nations Secretariat, and particularly in the preparatory work in connexion with United Nations, technical missions to Latin American countries. The secretariat also collaborated in both the 1950 Programme of Economic Development Fellowships under a resolution of the General Assembly (200(III)) and the programme of Public Administration Fellowships and Scholarships under a further Assembly resolution (246(III)). The report showed that 27 fellowships were granted in 1949 to nationals of Latin American countries and that, up to 5 May 1950, 115 nominations for fellowships had been received under the 1950 programme. The report gave, in addition, an account of technical assistance to Bolivia, Brazil, Chile, Ecuador, Guatemala, Haiti, Mexico and Venezuela.

b. THE ECONOMIC SURVEY OF LATIN AMERICA—1949

The Economic Survey of Latin America, 1949⁹⁸ prepared by the secretariat of the Commission pursuant to a decision of the Commission's second session in Havana in May 1949, came before the third session of the Commission in June 1950.

The Economic Survey described current economic conditions in Latin America and contained a technical section dealing with features of economic development common to all Latin American countries between 1925 and 1949. The findings of this section were supported by country-by-country studies covering the economic development of Argentina, Brazil, Chile, Cuba, and Mexico. The trends of development of agriculture, mining, manufacturing and foreign trade in each of these countries were surveyed and documented by data collected by the research staff of the Commission. The statistical material, collected for the period 1925-49, indicated major changes.

The Survey stated that the world-wide extension of technical progress had been relatively slow and irregular. Vast regions of under-developed countries had remained outside the sphere of world economy until the last few decades, when the industrial potentialities of those countries were realized.

As modern technique increased productivity, the Survey went on, a surplus of labour no longer needed by primary production was created. It then fell to industry and other activities to absorb this manpower. Agricultural improvement and industrial development were two closely related aspects of the problem of economic development. Industry had been a significant force in promoting economic development in Latin America; it had also permitted the countries to absorb excess manpower displaced from primary production by technical progress.

The productivity of labour in Latin American countries had increased in all major economic fields, including primary production; but the possibilities of expanding exports had been limited by insufficient demand from industrialized countries, the Survey showed. The per capita capacity to import to Latin America had not grown between 1925 and 1949. The recovery of foreign trade and relative prices since the Second World War had helped the Latin American countries merely to offset the consequences of the depression in the 'thirties, without bringing about a net increase in the capacity of Latin America to import over the levels attained in the 1920's. Both external and internal factors had thus prevented the peoples of Latin America from sharing in the benefits of technical progress through the expansion of Latin American foreign trade and an improvement in the standards of living and welfare comparable to that which had taken place elsewhere.

The current situation was reflected, the Survey said, in certain characteristics of the economies of the Latin American countries, such as the low level of national income and saving as compared with the enormous need for capital; the low intensity of demand, which added to the difficulties of achieving large-scale production; and the lack of capital-goods industries, which, in more advanced countries, had been a significant instrument in employing workers driven out of primary production by technical progress. The limited resources of foreign exchange available for buying equipment abroad as well as cost-price relationships tended to maintain the amount of capital per worker in the industries of Latin America at a lower level, as compared with industries of more developed countries. There was in Latin America a need of sustained effort and organization to assimilate the new techniques of production.

c. THE THIRD SESSION OF THE COMMISSION

The third session of the Commission was held in Montevideo on 20-21 June 1950. It was attended by representatives of:

Specialized, agencies: ILO, FAO, UNESCO, IRO

Intergovernmental organizations: International Chamber of Commerce, Inter-American Economic and Social Council, Caribbean Commission

Non-governmental organizations (consultants): International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, World Federation of United Nations Associations, International Federation of Transport Workers, Inter-American Council for Commerce and Production, International Organization for Standardization, National Association of Manufacturers (U.S.)

(1) Economic Development

The discussion of the preliminary draft of the Economic Survey of Latin America, 1949 turned on the central thesis of the Survey, which was concerned with the characteristics of the development of Latin American economies in the last 25 years and their vulnerability to world economic fluctuations.

Some delegations felt that there should be a clear definition of the goals of economic development of Latin America before they could agree on the means of such development. They drew the attention of the Commission to certain fundamental internal deficiencies of the Latin American countries and stated that the vicious circle of low productivity, low income and low capitalization had to be broken before economic progress could be accelerated. Others stressed the dependence of the Latin American countries on the foreign markets and their sensitiveness to variations in economic conditions abroad. There was, however, a general feeling among Latin American representatives that the structure of both imports and domestic production of their countries had to be modified.

Some representatives pointed out that underdeveloped countries were especially sensitive to cyclical fluctuations and that the proper method of raising the standard of living of the peoples of Latin America was not to seek economic self-sufficiency but to bring about a greater diversification of their economies. The Commission adopted a ten-point resolution, which recommended that Latin American Governments should adopt specific goals of economic development and establish an order of priority for their realization, and that they should adopt specific policies to intensify the rate of economic development or to overcome obstacles retarding such development. The Commission also requested the Executive Secretary to prepare an economic survey for 1950, emphasizing economic development.

(2) Technical Assistance

The discussion by the third session of the Commission of technical assistance was concerned mainly with the manner in which the Commission might participate more directly in the United Nations programmes. The Commission welcomed the expanded programme of technical assistance for economic development. It expressed its desire that the programmes of technical assistance for Latin America be fully co-ordinated, and noted with satisfaction the steps taken to this end. It also agreed to request the Secretary-General that the secretariat of the Commission be utilized fully and actively in assisting member Governments to appraise needs and formulate requests for technical assistance. The Commission also requested the Secretary-General that in implementing such programmes account should be taken of the Commission's resolutions on economic development (see above).

(3) Immigration

In its consideration of the problem of immigration, the Commission had before it the study prepared by the secretariat (E/CN.12/169 & E/CN.12/169/Add.1-3), and a note by the International Labour Office on the conclusions and recommendations of the Preliminary Migration Conference at Geneva in April-May 1950 (E/CN.12/179). The conclusions reached by the Commission were in general agreement with those of the Preliminary Migration Conference. It was felt that international collaboration, both technical and financial, could best be directed towards particular development projects which would create opportunities for immigration and give a broad impetus to economic activity in the countries concerned. The Commission decided, because of the close relationship of economic development and immigration, that the Executive Secretary should set up, in co-operation with ILO and other specialized agencies, a Working Committee at the Secretariat Level, which held its first session from 16-20 October 1950 (ST/ECLA/C.1/5). The Commission also decided to recommend that the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development be invited to participate at the appropriate stage in the work of the Committee.

(4) Foreign Trade

Apart from decisions concerning international trade taken when the Economic Survey of Latin America, 1949 was reviewed by the Commission, it also agreed that one of the most serious obstacles to the expansion of trade with Europe was the inconvertibility of currencies outside the dollar area. Certain representatives thought that the Latin American countries might be brought into a system of multilateral compensation of payments with Europe. It was agreed, however, that the possibility of trade expansion with Europe should be studied by the secretariat with a view to recommending measures to this end. The Executive Secretary was requested to consult with the Executive Secretary of the Economic Commission for Europe in order to undertake a joint ECE/ECLA study of ways in which trade between the two regions might be expanded. The Executive Secretary was also requested to make a study of the prospects of increasing trade within the region. The Commission agreed to authorize the Executive Secretary to convene, in due course, meetings of trade experts (E/CN.12/168) and to continue studies on commercial policies of Latin American countries (E/CN.12/165).

(5) Financing Economic Development

The Commission examined the report Economic and Legal Status of Foreign Investments in Selected Latin American Countries (E/CN.12/166 & Add.1-9), prepared by the Executive Secretary in co-operation with the Inter-American Economic and Social Council. Two documents prepared by the United Nations Secretariat were also taken into account—*Methods of Financing Economic Development in Under-Developed Countries*⁹⁹ and International Capital Movements during the Inter-War Period.¹⁰⁰ The report of a group of experts on *National and International Measures for Full Employment*¹⁰¹ which was presented to the United Nations Economic and Social Council, was also before the representatives.

It was generally agreed that Latin American countries required an adequate and stable flow of foreign capital as a means of continuing their economic development. In this connexion, the Commission decided that the research begun by the secretariat should be continued and that the Executive Secretary should continue to compile and analyse data supplied by Member Governments. The Commission also decided to request the Economic and Social Council that the Secretariat of the United Nations should continue reports on the financing of economic development, and should make a separate analysis of the data available for Latin America.

The Commission noted with satisfaction the policy of giving increased attention to the problem of economic development in under-developed areas,¹⁰² adopted by the International Bank, and suggested that it should intensify its application (E/CN.12/198). Domestic financial resources for economic development were also considered by the Commission and two resolutions (E/CN.12/197 & E/CN.12/199) were passed. These resolutions recognized the inadequacy of such resources and recommended that the Executive Secretary undertake research on domestic capital markets, including the availability and the uses of financial resources.

(6) Agricultural Credit

The Commission studied the report of the ECLA-FAO Co-operative Unit on agricultural credit in Central America (E/CN.12/167/Add.1-5). Central American representatives said that the report would help their Governments in their endeavour to better the conditions of their rural populations and to foster agricultural production through an expansion of farm credit. Technical help given by the Co-operative Unit to Governments, at the request of the latter, had led to practical results in the countries concerned, it was stated, and the Commission felt that this kind of assistance should be given priority. The Commission also emphasized the importance of maintaining the closest co-operation with the FAO, and asked the Co-operative Unit to continue this type of study and activity (E/CN.12/196).

(7) Transport

During a discussion on maritime transport, it was pointed out that differential maritime freight rates affected prices, supply and demand in Latin American countries. The Commission decided to request the Executive Secretary—pending a decision by the Economic and Social Council—to consult with the Executive Secretary of the Inter-American Economic and Social Council, with a view to assisting in a study by the latter organization of maritime freight rates.

In regard to inland transport problems, the Commission agreed with a suggestion of the Executive Secretary that such problems could be better dealt with through technical-economic surveys carried out under the technical assistance programme. It was understood that Latin American Governments desiring to have surveys made of their transport systems in order to stimulate economic development, might request the Secretary-General to send technical missions to their countries for that purpose (E/CN.12/192).

(8) Relations with Other Bodies

Several resolutions adopted by the Commission at its third session re-affirmed and strengthened co-operation and collaboration with the Specialized Agencies and other organizations. Regarding relations with the Specialized Agencies, the Commission indicated its interest in continuing the collaboration between ECLA and the interested agencies, particularly in the fields of economic development, international trade, agriculture and immigration. Other resolutions provided for the setting up of joint machinery at the secretariat level for dealing with problems of common concern, the ECLA Economic Development and Immigration Committee, in which several agencies were invited to participate, and the ECLA-UNESCO Working Group for the study of measures to increase the availability of scientific, educational and cultural material. The results of research carried out by the ECLA-FAO Co-operative Unit were favourably received by the Commission and new tasks were assigned to that Unit.

In respect to co-operation and co-ordination with the Inter-American Economic and Social Council, the Economic Commission for Latin America considered a statement prepared jointly by the Executive Secretaries of the two bodies, expressing that co-ordination of work had been achieved by measures taken at the secretariat level. The Commission adopted a resolution (E/CN.12/203), in which it re-affirmed its policy, expressed at previous sessions, of avoiding any unnecessary duplication of effort with the Inter-American Economic and Social Council. The same resolution commended the Executive Secretary of the Commission for the co-operation achieved with the Inter-American Economic and Social Council and other international organizations, recommending that such collaboration be continued and strengthened.

d. CONSIDERATION BY THE COUNCIL OF THE COMMISSION'S REPORTS

The annual report of the Commission (E/1717, E/1762) came before the Economic and Social Council at Geneva on 7 August 1950.

In the discussion, a number of representatives emphasized the importance of the work of the Commission, particularly of its studies of economic conditions in Latin America. The work of the Commission was generally considered as an outstanding contribution to the understanding of the problems of the region in the fields of economic development, domestic stability, foreign trade and balances of payments.

During a discussion on the Commission's resolution on economic development, the majority of the Council was in general agreement with the Commission's recommendations. The United States representative, however, felt that some of the conclusions of the Commission were debatable and several representatives also disagreed on the relative emphasis attached to the development of industry and agriculture. On the latter point, there was general agreement on the desirability of a balanced development of those two branches of economic activity.

Other representatives pointed out that the industrialization of under-developed countries would strengthen, rather than affect adversely, the world economy. The representative of Chile felt that the premature adoption of a policy of free trade in Latin America could jeopardize economic development there. The representative of Peru stressed that there were deep economic, social and cultural reasons why economic development of Latin American countries might have to follow different lines from those observed in other places and times and warned against drawing unwarranted parallels between those processes.

The importance of the trade studies carried out and the new proposed studies was stressed by representatives. The majority of the Council approved the proposed study of trade between Europe and Latin America, although several representatives pointed out that such studies should not overlook the broader aspects of international trade problems and that the principles of the Havana Charter should not be lost sight of. The importance of the co-operation between the regional economic commissions for Europe and for Latin America was emphasized by a number of representatives during the discussion.

In connexion with the criticism of the Commission's resolution on technical assistance raised by some representatives, the representative of France, who also acted as Rapporteur of the Commission, pointed out that the latter did not have in mind an independent technical assistance programme but wished for close collaboration in the United Nations programme. During the discussion, the importance of the role of the regional economic commissions in the implementation of the Technical Assistance Programme was noted by most representatives.

The Council adopted, by 13 votes to none, with 2 abstentions (United States, Denmark), the following resolution (301 (XI)), submitted jointly by Brazil, Chile, Mexico and Peru:

The Economic and Social Council

Takes note of the Annual Report of the Economic Commission for Latin America, covering the period from 15 June 1949 to 21 June 1950 and the statement on financial implications submitted by the Secretary-General;

Notes the statement on work programme and priorities endorsed by the Commission;

Notes with approval the resolution adopted at the third session of the Economic Commission for Latin America which calls for a study on ways and means to expand trade between Latin America and Europe on bases which are practicable and mutually advantageous;

Invites the interested Governments to facilitate this study to the fullest extent possible, in order that concrete recommendations may be formulated at an early date;

Notes the amendment of rule 42 of the rules of procedure of the Commission adding Portuguese to the official languages of the Commission;

Approves the holding of the fourth session of the Commission at Mexico City, Mexico, in May 1951, and Recommends that the necessary funds be allocated for the purpose of implementing decisions of the third session of the Commission.

3. The Economic Commission for Asia and the Far East (ECAFE)

In the period under review, the Economic Commission for Asia and the Far East (ECAFE) held its sixth session (E/1710) at Bangkok, from 16-20 May 1950.

a. MEMBERSHIP

Indonesia, after passing through associate membership, automatically became a member of the Commission when it was admitted to membership of the United Nations on 28 September 1950.¹⁰³

At the sixth session of the Commission, considerable discussion took place regarding the representation of China. It was eventually decided, without questioning the competence of the Commission in the matter, to leave the subject to decision by a higher body of the United Nations. The representative of the USSR stated that his delegation would not participate in the work of the Commission so long as the representative of what he termed the "Kuomintang group" continued to sit on it, and further, that his delegation would not be bound by any decisions of the Commission taken in their absence. The USSR delegation then withdrew from the meeting.

b. ORGANIZATION

The Committee on Industry and Trade held its second session (E/CN.11/239) in Bangkok, from 9-17 May 1950, and the Sub-Committee on Iron and Steel held its second session (E/CN.11/I & T/18) in Calcutta, from 10-13 April 1950. A meeting of an ad hoc Committee of Inland Transport experts was held in Bangkok, 24 October-4 November 1950 (E/CN.11/262 & Add.1). Other meetings of subsidiary bodies held during the year included a meeting of railway experts and the second meeting of the ECAFE-UNESCO Working Party on educational and scientific materials (E/CN.11/266).

c. ACTIVITIES OF THE COMMISSION

Among the problems considered by the Commission during the period under review were the following:

(1) Problems of Industry and Trade

(a) INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPMENT

A comprehensive report on priorities and progress in industrial development projects (E/CN.11/I & T/15) was presented to the second session of the Committee on Industry and Trade. The Committee recommended (E/CN.11/239) further studies on electric power resources and needs, chemical fertilizers (in co-operation with FAO), hand tools and small-scale and cottage industries, particularly in regard to textiles, and a bibliography on power alcohol. It also agreed that the secretariat should include in its studies such factors as technical and management skills, domestic financial requirements and encouragement of domestic savings and investment.

At the request of the ECAFE secretariat, many countries of the region nominated liaison officers to work closely with it on problems of industrial development. Direct advisory services were rendered during 1950 by the ECAFE secretariat to Governments in the region, in regard to their general problems of planning, visits being paid by secretariat officials to Burma, Ceylon, Malaya, India, Indochina, Indonesia, Pakistan, Thailand, Japan, the Philippines and Hong Kong, and reports prepared on the basis of discussions with officials and experts in these countries. The ECAFE secretariat also co-operated with the Government of Pakistan, the Bank and FAO, in the organization of a regional training institute on the economic appraisal of development projects. At the request of Ceylon, the Executive Secretary obtained the services of an expert from the Government of India, who, together with the secretariat's steel expert, assisted the Government of Ceylon in appraising its plan for the development of iron and steel industry.

The Committee on Industry and Trade, an Iron and Steel Sub-Committee established in 1949,¹⁰⁴ held its second session (E/CN.11/I & T/18) in April 1950 in Calcutta. It recommended the continuation of the seven projects chosen for study and report at its first session (E/CN.11/I & T/2 & Add.1) in August-September 1948, namely:

Survey, in collaboration with UNESCO, of geological and industrial research laboratories in the ECAFE region and in Australia and New Zealand; provision by countries with such laboratory and research facilities to test the ores of other countries of the region not having such facilities; estimates of requirements of iron and steel projects; production plans and obstacles in their execution; survey of availabilities of auxiliary raw materials; study of methods of utilizing scrap iron; and possibilities of uniform statistical reporting.

In particular, the Sub-Committee emphasized the need for a study of statistical reporting methods on an internationally comparable basis, with a view to the possible introduction of such methods in the region. Studies of present and potential regional and inter-regional trade in the raw materials, semi-finished and finished products of the iron and steel industry were also recommended.

A Progress Report on Coal and Iron Ore Studies, with an Annex on Coal and Iron Ore Resources of the ECAFE region, was presented (E/CN.11/I & T/16) to the second session of the Committee on Industry and Trade. The report included status of surveys, extent of known coal and iron ore resources, survey programme contemplated, and obstacles in carrying out additional surveys in the countries visited.

Top priority for the examination of possible sources for obtaining geologists, the existing facilities for training and the possibilities of extending them, were among the other recommendations made by the Committee.

The Committee's report and recommendations (E/CN.11/239) were generally approved at the sixth session of the Commission.

(b) TRADE AND FINANCE

The Committee on Industry and Trade, at its second session, considered a note on trade and balance of payments presented by the International Monetary Fund, and welcomed the close working relations established between the Fund and the secretariat. At the request of the Fund, and in connexion with the above study, the secretariat prepared two reports in 1950 entitled Trade and Financial Agreements in the ECAFE Region and Import/Export Estimates for Countries of the Region, 1949 to 1951. The Committee also considered a working paper (E/CN.11/I & T/24 & Annexes A & B) on the problem of dollar shortage, measures taken or contemplated, and measures required.

A statement on the role of the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development in providing capital for the region was submitted by the Bank (E/CN.11/I & T/19). The Committee expressed the desire for an expanded volume of Bank loans for productive purposes in the region, and further suggested that the Bank should consider ways of speeding up its operations and of cultivating closer relations with its members.

The Committee approved a report (E/CN.11/I & T/25 & Add.1) on the laws and regulations governing the treatment of foreign investment in countries of the region, including the remittance of dividends, interest and profits, and taxation, and requested the secretariat to publish this information in the annual economic survey or otherwise, and to make it available to bona fide inquirers. The report was brought up to date, revised, published in printed form in 1950 and widely circulated. The Committee recommended that a complementary study be undertaken by the Headquarters Secretariat, for distribution in the region, of the laws and regulations of capital exporting countries.

Reports on the trade of the ECAFE region with Japan (E/CN.11/I & T/5 & 21) were also presented to the Committee. At the sixth session (E/1710), the Commission, while advocating the development of trade between the ECAFE countries and Japan, considered it important to avoid suggesting measures which might have the effect of retarding the progress of national industrial development programmes of the ECAFE countries.

The first country studies on the means of mobilizing domestic financial resources for industrial development (E/CN.11/I & T/14/Add.2) were available at the sixth session. Several other individual country studies were completed later in the year, some prepared by the International Monetary Fund, and these formed the basis of a regional report to be completed in 1951.

An analysis of the budgets of ECAFE Governments, based on a scheme of economic reclassification of budgets, was undertaken in the last quarter of 1950. The analysis will include: the magnitude and impact of Government expenditure on national income and capital formation, the difference between current and capital expenditures, enterprises and governmental functions, and the sources of finance such as taxes, earnings and other revenues, voluntary and involuntary borrowings. Preliminary work on the budgets of Burma, Hong Kong, India, the Philippines and Thailand was begun in consultation with Governments.

A provisional report entitled Trade Promotion Facilities, first issued in 1949, was revised and published in final form in March 1950 (E/CN.11/237). The report indicated Government commercial services within and outside the region, principal trade organizations, and trade publications most commonly used as standard references. A periodical, Trade Promotion News, was launched in March 1950.

To help meet the shortage of personnel trained in the techniques of trade promotion both for Government service and for international trade in the region it was agreed that training in the techniques of trade promotion should be accepted as falling within the scope of the United Nations fellowships programme,¹⁰⁵ and candidates were subsequently nominated by several countries. Universities in the region were also encouraged by the ECAFE secretariat to include foreign trade courses in their economic curricula and to hold foreign trade seminars.

The sixth session of the Commission approved (E/1710) a proposal to hold a regional conference of commercial attaches and businessmen in 1951.

A consultant was recruited in June 1950 as a result of the Commission's recommendation at the sixth session, that an expert be engaged to bring to ECAFE countries increased knowledge of hard currency markets for handicrafts and to advise them, after examination of their production techniques, as to methods of improving the marketability of their handicraft products. The consultant visited Burma, Ceylon, Hong Kong, India, Indochina, Malaya, Pakistan, the Philippines, Singapore and Thailand. Following his visit, the Philippines requested technical assistance to improve its handicrafts industry. Assistance was also given to the Government of Burma in connexion with its proposal to obtain the services of Japanese technicians in building up its cottage industries.

In April-September 1950, a travel consultant made trips to Burma, Ceylon, Hong Kong, India, Indonesia, Japan, Pakistan, the Philippines, Singapore and Thailand, holding conferences with government officials, travel agencies, carriers, hotel associations and others interested in the development of the tourist industry as sources of foreign exchange. Specific recommendations were made to each Government based upon on-the-spot observations. In Pakistan and Singapore the consultant also advised on the setting up of national tourist organizations.

The International Union of Official Travel Organizations (IUOTO), at its General Assembly Conference in October 1950, decided to set up an IUOTO Regional Travel Commission for Asia and the Far East, with instructions to explore the possibilities of opening a regional office. This action stemmed directly from the Commission's resolution recommending such steps.

Asian Travelways, a monthly periodical, growing out of the travel section of Trade Promotion News, was issued in July 1950, implementing one of the recommendations arising from the resolution on travel adopted at the Commission's fifth session. In addition, a series of information papers on tourist travel was prepared and distributed.

The Joint ECAFE-UNESCO Working Party to study economic measures to increase the availability of educational, scientific and cultural materials in the region held its second meeting in December 1950 (E/CN.11/266). At the first meeting in December 1949, it had been decided that the first phase of the work should cover only scientific materials and equipment and audiovisual aids for education, and that Governments of the region should be requested to supply certain limited information regarding import needs arising from key shortages of these items and export availabilities. At the second meeting, the Working Party considered a number of working papers, prepared by the two secretariats, in consultation with the secretariat of ECE, and approved a report and recommendations for submission to the seventh session of the Commission.

(2) Problems of Food and Agriculture

Close liaison was maintained during 1950 between the secretariat of the Commission and the regional office of FAO in Bangkok. A notable example of this co-operation was the preparation of a joint study on the production and use of chemical fertilizers (E/CN.11/I & T/33). Material for this study was collected in the course of an extensive field investigation into soil fertility practices which was undertaken by FAO for the International Rice Commission. A member of the ECAFE secretariat participated in this investigation.

ECAFE was represented at the first session of the Forestry and Forest Products Commission for Asia and the Pacific held in October 1950. Assurances were given of ECAFE's readiness to co-operate in joint tasks concerning industrial, transport and other aspects affecting the Commission, and the secretariat agreed to take up, with the appropriate United Nations body, the question of excessive shipping rates for forest products.

In collaboration with the Government of India, FAO and the United Nations conducted during 1950 an institute for the training of persons to be employed in agricultural and population census work. ECAFE was a joint sponsor of the institute.

Under the sponsorship of the Government of Pakistan, FAO, the International Bank, ECAFE, and the Secretariat, a training centre on the formulation and economic appraisal of development projects was established in Lahore, Pakistan, during the latter part of 1950. Members of the ECAFE secretariat were among the lecturers.

(3) Problems of Technical Assistance and Technical Training

Pursuant to a decision of the Commission at its fourth session, a report was prepared in conjunction with UNESCO and ILO, on fields of economic development handicapped by lack of trained personnel (E/CN.11/I & T/39 & Annexes). The inquiry was confined to the industrial field, with special reference to each country's current plans of economic development.

At the sixth session of ECAFE, it was generally considered that the countries of the region, in particular, required technical assistance, both in agriculture and in industry, especially in preparing and executing industrial development plans. The Commission recommended that "specialists be made available under the technical assistance programme to maintain liaison with ECAFE, advise countries of the region on the formulation of proposals for technical assistance and otherwise assist them".

In line with this recommendation, the ECAFE secretariat rendered assistance to several countries, at their request, in the formulation of their applications for technical assistance, and kept Governments informed of developments in the United Nations programme. It also assisted the Technical Assistance Administration by providing comments on the nominations for fellowships and scholarships submitted by Governments of the region. Secretariat representatives also took part in technical assistance exploratory missions to Indonesia and Korea.

The secretariat also co-operated in the organization of a regional training institute on the economic appraisal of development projects, held in Pakistan in 1950. In addition, it provided various forms of advisory service direct to Governments on such matters as flood control; trade and financial problems; trade promotion; statistics; handicraft marketing; tourist travel facilities; planning machinery and techniques; geological survey problems; development of mineral resources; management procedures; development of iron and steel industries; and development of small-scale and cottage industries, in some cases under the Technical Assistance Programme. It also helped Governments by recommending experts from within the region in connexion with their stated needs for specific types of assistance.

(4) Problems of Inland Transport

The Ad Hoc Committee of Inland Transport Experts, which met in Bangkok from 24 October to 4 November 1950 (E/CN.11/262 & Add.1), considered studies by the secretariat on specific short-term road, rail and waterway problems, arrangements for the collection and dissemination of transport statistics, the establishment of a regional library service for the distribution of technical transport literature, and the establishment of an Inland Transport Committee to meet the need for continuous and co-ordinated action in the field of transport. The meeting included experts representative of countries of the region and of the various fields of transport.

Recommendations made by the Ad Hoc Committee for submission to the seventh session of the Commission included the establishment of the following machinery to undertake the programme:

- (i) a standing Committee on Inland Transport to deal with general policy matters and common problems;
- (ii) a Sub-Committee to deal with inland waterway problems; and
- (iii) certain ad hoc working parties to deal with problems in the field of highways and road transport. The Committee also recommended the establishment of a non-governmental Association of Railways in the region to consider technical railway problems.¹⁰⁶

The Committee considered that railway problems should be handled at two levels: on a Governmental level to deal with matters of principle and Governmental policy; on a non-governmental level to deal with the technical aspects of problems that either Governments or railway administrations themselves might wish to be investigated. Various recommendations were made on technical railway problems. The Committee recommended that a further joint study be undertaken by the secretariat, in co-operation with FAO, on the economic use of firewood as fuel, and that, pending the establishment of an Asian and Far Eastern Railway Association, the secretariat undertake preparatory work on other aspects of the best uses of available types of fuel. The Committee also recommended that the secretariat make preliminary investigations and collect information on modern telecommunication systems and improved operation of terminals and of single line sections of railways. Furthermore, it recommended that Governments should make available to the secretariat main operating statistical data normally prepared by railway administrations, in order that tables of common operating statistics might be prepared and circulated for information of Governments. The secretariat was also advised to explore the possibility of undertaking, with the International Labour Organisation, a joint study on the improvement of the productivity of labour and the training of technical personnel including diesel mechanics. With regard to the standardization of railway equipment, the Committee recommended that this problem should be referred in its entirety to the proposed Railway Association.

¹⁰⁶ At the 7th session of the Commission, held in Feb.-Mar. 1951, it was decided to establish an Inland Transport Committee, with the recommendation that it set up sub-committees on railways and inland waterways, and empowered to set up a sub-committee on roads. It was recommended that the proposal for a non-governmental Association of Railways be referred to the Sub-Committee on Railways, when established.

The problems of establishing international railway connexions and rehabilitating existing ones, promotion of transit and through railway traffic between countries interlinked by rail, including simplification of customs formalities, simplification and unification of terms and conditions of transport, including rates and fares and their apportionment, and the establishment of regulations for the exchange of rolling stock, were among other recommendations made by the Committee for studies to be taken up by the Inland Transport Committee.

In regard to roads and road transport, and in particular with reference to the secretariat's study, The Most Economic Methods for the Construction, Repair and Maintenance of Roads Including Standardization and Other Characteristics and Comparative Methods of National Financing, the Ad Hoc Committee (E/CN.11/262 & Add.1) stressed the importance of a long-term over-all planning of highway development and the need for increased adoption of mechanical methods of construction and repair. It recommended that initial steps be taken for the preparation of a long-term master plan of highway development and that, to this end, countries should undertake national surveys of the availability of road-building equipment and technical manpower resources. The Committee took special note of the recent increase in the incidence of road accidents in the region and recommended that immediate further study of the problem be undertaken by an ad hoc working party of experts interested in highway safety, which should formulate specific proposals for improvement of existing practices in traffic control systems and recommend measures for improved accident prevention. The Committee felt that part of the solution of the problem of improved utilization of existing road transport equipment depended on improved repair facilities as well as better technical training of mechanics. It therefore decided that an ad hoc working party of experts should be established, in consultation with ILO, to study this problem.

The Committee recommended that Governments, faced with the problem of damage to roads caused by the iron-tired wheels of country carts, encourage the use of pneumatic tires on country carts in constant use in level country and, in other areas, promote improvements in the design of wheels and axles so as to minimize road wear. Long-term problems affecting road and road transport were referred to the Inland Transport Committee for consideration.

In regard to the development of inland waterways, the Ad Hoc Committee discussed a secretariat report dealing with the problem as a whole, and agreed with the conclusion that many countries had problems in common which were likely to benefit from a joint approach. The Committee recommended, inter alia, that the secretariat should continue its study on the fuller utilization of country boats; investigate the possibility of arranging for a pilot project covering craft design and operation under the auspices of the United Nations Technical Assistance Programme; prepare a study of the use of pusher craft in Indonesia, and of towing methods in the Associated States of Indochina and in Thailand; and discuss with Governments and the United Nations Technical Assistance Administration the possibility of arranging for a team of experts, drawn from countries of the region, to study abroad the technological advances in inland water transport methods. The Committee also agreed on a recommendation regarding the principles for measurement of craft.

The Committee recommended the establishment of a Sub-Committee on Waterways of the proposed Inland Transport Committee to deal with these problems, while other long-term problems regarding inland water transport were referred to the proposed Inland Transport Committee.

The first issue of a Transport Bulletin appeared in September 1950. It contained topical articles, transport news of the region, and transport documentation. This was also discussed by the Ad Hoc Committee, which recommended its publication as a quarterly in 1951.

(5) Problems of Flood Control

Following the approval, by the Commission at its fifth session (E/1710), of the work programme for 1950 of the Bureau of Flood Control, experts of the Bureau conducted a number of field investigations of the major rivers of the region. The rivers included the Irrawaddy and the Sittang rivers of Burma, the Kelani, Gin, Mahaveli and Kalu Ganga of Ceylon, the Cauvery, Damodar, Ganges, Godavary, Kistna and Mahanadi of India, the Mekong and Red of Vietnam, the Brantas of Indonesia, the Agno and Pampagna of the Philippines, the Indus of Pakistan and the Mekong of Thailand. These investigations enabled the Bureau to make detailed studies of the existing flood control methods employed on the major rivers, particularly the river deltas of the region, with a view to comparing the existing methods and recommending improvements.

These studies are included in the Flood Control Series published by the Bureau. The first number of the series entitled Flood Damage and Flood Control Activities in Asia and the Far East was published in December 1950. In addition, the Bureau published four issues of the Flood Control Journal in 1950, describing flood control activities and the latest developments in flood control works of the region.

To promote the exchange of technical information, the Bureau has secured the co-operation of many technical organizations of the region, in particular the Central Board of Irrigation in India, in supplying publications on flood control for distribution by the Bureau among countries of the region.

Following the views on the importance of a programme of experiment and study on the silt problem repeatedly stressed by the Commission, the Bureau initiated a joint study with the Punjab Irrigation Research Institute of India in January 1950.

In response to a request by Ceylon, the Bureau sent experts to draw up a flood control scheme for the Kalu Ganga, one of the main rivers of the island, whose floods frequently threaten two towns and damage extensive areas of paddy fields. The experts conducted an over-all investigation during May-June 1950 and a comprehensive report was submitted to the Government of Ceylon in December 1950.

In August 1950, at the request of the Royal Irrigation Department of Thailand, the Bureau assisted in conducting the first hydraulic model tests in the country in connexion with the Chao Phya Barrage Project, a joint irrigation and flood control scheme.

Before the outbreak of the war in Korea, the Republic of Korea sought the advice of the Bureau in joint research and planning of flood control for South Korean rivers.

Late in 1950, two of the Bureau's experts were invited by India to serve on the Assam Committee, which investigated the flood damage caused by the Brahmaputra in Assam, following the earthquake. Recommendations made by the Committee are to be implemented by the authorities concerned.

The Bureau has also helped various countries of the region in recruiting technical personnel for flood control and allied works during the year.

At its sixth session (E/1710), ECAFE approved the Bureau's work programme and priorities for the remainder of 1950 and for 1951.

d. ECONOMIC SURVEY OF ASIA AND THE FAR EAST, 1949

The Economic Survey of Asia and the Far East¹⁰⁷ was published in June 1950. Part I deals with economic developments in the ECAFE region during the year and Part II is devoted to the factors and problems underlying the post-war economic development of the region.

The Survey reported that the year 1949 may have marked the end of the first phase of slow and painful post-war recovery, and that, in the light of changes in the year, the economic situation of ECAFE countries might be considered encouraging. Mineral and industrial production had improved. So also had transport and, to a lesser degree, agricultural production. Inflationary pressures had been arrested and, in some countries, the measures taken had produced deflationary conditions, if not actual deflation. As a result of the reversal of the recession in the United States, exports of the region had recovered both in quantity and price. Devaluation of most currencies of the region, following the devaluation of the pound sterling, exerted a favourable influence, although it was too early to trace the full effects.

However, against the over-all improvement, the most disquieting feature of the post-war economic conditions in the region still persisted, namely, the low level, both relative and absolute, of agricultural output. Food was still the basic need of Asia and the Far East, one of the poorest nutritional areas in the world, and the post-war years had witnessed a serious decline in the region's position as a producer and supplier of foodstuffs, as well as of fibres.

According to preliminary reports, agricultural production had increased 2 per cent as compared with 1948, which was, however, still 8 per cent below pre-war production.

Marked improvement was noted in industrial and mineral production despite a decline in most categories in China and a fall in textile production in India. In electric power, coal, iron and steel production rose 8 to 9 per cent over 1948.

Transport showed an improvement over the pre-war position, but this was due more to greater exploitation of existing resources than to increased supplies. The strain on transport systems continued. Air transport expanded more rapidly than in previous years, but the prospects of further expansion were not very favourable.

The year 1949 registered a further advance over 1948 in international trade. Excluding China, Nepal and the British Borneo territories, the total value of trade of the ECAFE region was 6 per cent above that of 1948. A significant change in the composition of the region's trade in 1949 was the increase in imports of machinery from Japan by about ten times, from the United States by 11 per cent and from the United Kingdom by 13 per cent, as compared with 1948.

Large increases in the import surpluses of ECAFE countries in the first half of 1949 contributed to the success in curbing inflation. However, they had led to a serious drain on foreign exchange holdings. Contributing to the increase in the balance of payments deficit of the ECAFE region, was a marked increase in dollar deficits, to which India, among the sterling area countries, and the Philippines, among the non-sterling countries, contributed the major share. Various measures were taken in 1949 to relieve the dollar deficits, principally by devaluation, and by export, import and exchange controls. But in view of the limited effectiveness of measures so far taken, continuance of external aid seemed to be necessary.

The current financial resources of the countries of the region were being stretched nearly to their limit. Aspirations for development and for social welfare were much in evidence. Plans for economic development, which had been somewhat unrealistic in the past, had been reviewed by most countries in 1949, and great interest was being shown in the United Nations expanded programme of technical assistance and in the United States programme of aid.

Without external aid, the Survey discounted the possibility of increasing agricultural and industrial production and employment opportunities more rapidly than the continuous increase of population, which exceeded a rate of 1 per cent per year.

In the latter half of 1950, a quarterly Economic Bulletin for Asia and the Far East was started. Three issues were published covering the first, second and third quarters of 1950, respectively. The Bulletin is designed primarily to give up-to-date information on economic developments in the region and Japan in the intervals between publication of the annual Economic Surveys. It contains reviews of the more important developments during the quarter in the fields of agricultural and industrial production, trade, finance, and price movements, and articles on economic problems of the region. It also contains a comprehensive statistical section, "Asian Economic Statistics", including series on production, transport, trade, finance and prices.

Preparatory work was started in connexion with the first Regional Conference of Statisticians, to be convened pursuant to a resolution of the fifth session. Documents were prepared on problems of availability and utilization of trade statistics, customs statistical procedure, estimation of balance of payments, and statistical organization of countries of Asia and the Far East.

e. CONSIDERATION BY THE ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL

(1) Action taken at the Council's Tenth Session

At its tenth session in February-March 1950, the Council considered a report (E/1578) by the Secretary-General on action arising out of certain resolutions adopted by the Commission at its fifth session (E/1710). These resolutions, the Secretary-General stated, might be regarded by the Council as necessitating action at its tenth session and would require additional resources if they were to be undertaken in 1950.

The Council considered the question at the 81st and 82nd meetings of its Economic Committee on 9 February and at its 349th plenary meeting on 13 February 1950.

The debate concentrated on the Commission's resolutions on inland transport, technical assistance, date and place of the next session of ECAFE, and the financial implications of these resolutions. The Council also considered the Commission's resolution on implementation of Commission recommendations.

The Commission's resolution on inland transport had endorsed, in general, the intensive programme with regard to railways, roads and inland waterways outlined by the Conference of Inland Transport Experts held in October 1949 (E/CN.11/204), and had proposed that an ad hoc Committee of Experts on Inland Transport should review the results of studies undertaken in the meantime and recommend further intra-regional measures of co-operation. Some representatives, among them those of Brazil, Chile, China and India, were of the opinion that inland transport problems were of considerable importance in the region, and that the Commission's resolution on this subject should be given urgent attention; the secretariat, they held, should especially be authorized to start proposed activities as soon as possible. Other representatives, including those of Australia, the United Kingdom and the United States, while recognizing the urgent character of the problem, did not consider it necessary to request additional appropriations for the current year, and thought it proper that the matter should be considered at the time of the preparation of the 1951 budget estimates.

In its resolution on technical assistance, the Commission had urged its members to make full use of the technical assistance available under General Assembly resolution 200(III) and under the Expanded Programme. It asked the Council to consider ways in which ECAFE could participate in specific aspects of the programme. It also recommended that technical assistance under resolution 200(III) should be extended to certain associate members of ECAFE.

During the Council's discussion of this resolution, some representatives, including those of Canada and the United States, expressed their appreciation of the action of ECAFE in requesting the guidance of the Council concerning the role it should play in this field. Some representatives, including those of Brazil and India, noted with satisfaction the policy of the Secretary-General, as expressed in his third report on activities under General Assembly resolution 200(III) (E/1576), namely, that the secretariats of the regional economic commissions should play a full and active role in the development of the technical assistance programme and should have an important part in stimulating and developing its implementation. Several representatives, including those of Brazil, India, the United Kingdom and the United States, expressed the view that every advantage should be taken of the expert knowledge and experience in the field of economic development acquired by the secretariats of the regional economic commissions through their normal activities in their areas of operation. It was felt, however, by some representatives, including those of Australia, France, Pakistan, the United Kingdom and the United States, that it would be advantageous for the work to be centralized, at the outset at any rate, in the secretariat of the United Nations at Headquarters. The representative of the United States stated that the regional commissions, which were composed of Government representatives meeting only once or twice a year to consider specific problems, should not act as operating groups and should not determine the technical assistance to be granted to individual countries. The representatives of Peru, the United Kingdom and Pakistan stressed the importance of promoting trade relations between Asia and the Far East and other parts of the world.

A major issue concerned the availability of technical assistance for non-member countries which are associate members of ECAFE. Some representatives, including those of Brazil, Chile and India expressed themselves strongly in favour of the ECAFE recommendations, and a motion was put forward by the representative from Chile (E/AC.6/L.1 & Corr.1) recommending adoption by the General Assembly of a draft resolution which would amend General Assembly resolution 200(III) by including non-member countries which are responsible for their international relations and which participate as associate members in the work of any of the regional economic commissions of the United Nations, but are not now eligible to request technical assistance under that resolution. The representatives of Australia, Peru, the United Kingdom and the United States considered that an amendment of resolution 200(III) would raise several complicated policy issues and thought that the matter should be deferred. An Australian oral proposal, to defer consideration of the question to the eleventh session, was adopted at the 82nd meeting of the Economic Committee, by 9 votes to 3, with 3 abstentions. It was, however, pointed out during the discussion that non-member countries would be eligible to request technical assistance under the expanded programme, by joining any one of the participating specialized agencies.

As to the resolution of implementation of Commission recommendations, it was generally considered that any action by ECAFE should conform with the recommendations contained in the report to the Council of the Ad Hoc Committee on Implementation of Recommendations on Economic and Social Matters (E/1585); that unnecessary duplication in requesting Governments for information in respect of implementation of recommendations should be avoided, and that the matter should be watched in direct collaboration between Headquarters and regional secretariats. Many members of the Council expressed the opinion that all inquiries of a general character should be undertaken by the Council itself.

As the question of an additional appropriation resulted from the fact that regular sessions of the Commission used to meet at the time of or after sessions of the General Assembly, the Council paid special attention to the calendar of Commission sessions. At its fifth session ECAFE had resolved "to convene its sixth session at any time between 15 October and 15 November 1950, and to meet as a Committee of the Whole in May 1950 in Bangkok for the sole purpose of considering and adopting a report for the Economic and Social Council". During the debate, members of the Council agreed that in the future ECAFE should avoid requests for funds other than as provided for in the regular budget, and that the calendar of meetings should be adjusted so that the annual sessions would be held in the early part of the year, and the financial implications of its resolutions could be incorporated in the regular annual budget.

The Economic Committee, at its 82nd meeting, unanimously adopted two resolutions proposed by India (E/AC.6/L.2), after the first had been amended to meet points raised by Council members, and one resolution proposed by the United States (E/AC.6/L.4). The three resolutions were unanimously adopted by the Council at its 349th plenary meeting on 13 February, without further discussion (resolution 270 A, B, C (X)).

In resolution 270 A (X), the Council took note of the report by the Secretary-General; considered it important that the proposed expansion of activities in the field of inland transport and technical assistance be started without delay; and recommended that the necessary funds be allocated for the purpose of implementing the Commission's 1950 programme of high priority work should the 1950 budget prove inadequate. In resolution 270 B (X) the Council asked the Secretary-General to send to the Commission the records of its discussions on implementation of recommendations.¹⁰⁸ It called the Commission's attention to the arrangements adopted for the review of implementation, and it asked the Secretary-General to take all possible steps to avoid duplication in requesting information from Governments on implementation. The Council also recommended (270 C (X)) that the Commission hold a session of a Committee of the Whole in a plenary session at Bangkok in May 1950 and a plenary session at Lahore in January 1951.

(2) Action Taken at the Council's Eleventh Session

At its eleventh session, the Council had before it the annual report of ECAFE (E/1710 & Add.2) covering the period from 6 April to 20 May 1950. The report also included an account of the proceedings and discussions of the fifth and sixth sessions of ECAFE, a statement assessing the work of the Commission and its secretariat, and a work programme for 1950-51 including an assignment of priorities to the proposed tasks. The Council also had before it a note by the Secretary-General of the financial implications involved (E/1710 & Add.1).

In the debate at the 402nd and 403rd plenary meetings on 8 August, members of the Council were unanimous in appreciating the considerable progress achieved by the Commission during the period under review. Several representatives emphasized that this progress was achieved by concentration of efforts on specific problems and avoidance of broad generalization, and was facilitated by the operations of several subsidiary bodies of the Commission established at an earlier stage of its activities. The methods of inquiry and study were generally commended, and the progress achieved in collecting statistical information on economies of the countries in the region on a comparable basis was fully appreciated.

The development of advisory services rendered by the secretariat to the Governments of members was fully discussed in the light of the Commission's report and various representatives, including those of Australia, Brazil, the United Kingdom and the United States, expressed the opinion that these services should be developed in the future. In this connexion, some delegations, including those of Brazil, Canada, Chile, France, India and the United States, emphasized that the ECAFE secretariat should co-operate fully with the Headquarters secretariat and with the specialized agencies in the execution of the technical assistance programme.

The desirability of intensifying the activities of the Commission in the field of trade expansion, along the lines proposed in the co-operative project of the Economic Commission for Europe and the Economic Commission for Latin America, was also pointed out.

In connexion with the activities of the Bureau of Flood Control, several representatives, including those of Australia, Chile, India and the United States, considered that these activities should not be limited to flood control but should jointly deal with such problems as pure and industrial water supply, irrigation, drainage, etc., in order to secure co-ordinated river system development.

The Council discussed, in the light of the Economic Survey of Asia and the Far East, 1949, the economic conditions of this region where great and widespread poverty, aggravated by the war, continued. It was emphasized that there was but little chance to secure political security without social and economic security. The need of the countries in the region for international and foreign assistance to improve standards of living of their people and encourage balanced economic development and industrialization was generally considered by members of the Council as a highly urgent problem.

Finally, in resolution 302 (XI), adopted unanimously, as proposed by the Commission, the Council took note of the annual report of the Commission and of its work programme and priorities, and recommended that the necessary funds be allocated for the purpose of implementing the Commission's 1951 programme of work.

I. HUMAN RIGHTS

1. Draft First International Covenant on Human Rights and Measures of Implementation
- a. CONSIDERATION AT THE SIXTH SESSION OF THE COMMISSION ON HUMAN RIGHTS

At its sixth session, held from 27 March to 19 May 1950, the Commission on Human Rights had before it comments and observations received from the Governments of Australia, Denmark, France, India, Israel, Netherlands, Norway, Philippines, USSR, United Kingdom, United States and Yugoslavia (E/CN.4/353 & Addenda) in answer to an invitation it had addressed to Member Governments at its fifth session¹⁰⁹ (a) to comment on the draft international Covenant, including proposals for additional articles and the proposals concerning measures of implementation, and (h) to reply to a questionnaire on implementation.

The Commission also had before it documentation referred to it by the General Assembly and the Council relating to trade union rights (E/CN.4/164 & Add.1; E/CN.4/156); the survey of forced labour and measures for its abolition (E/CN.4/157 & Add.1); and the draft Convention on Freedom of Information (E/CN.4/360 & Corr.1 & 2); the recommendations of the Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities (E/CN.4/351 & 358); proposals on measures of implementation made at the fifth session of the Commission (E/1371, Annex III); communications from the World Health Organization (E/CN.4/359); and the International Labour Office (E/CN.4/403); and a survey of the activities of bodies of the United Nations other than the Commission on Human Rights, and of the specialized agencies, in regard to matters within the scope of articles 22 to 27 (economic, social and cultural articles)¹¹⁰ of the Universal Declaration on Human Rights (E/CN.4/364 & Corr.1-3).

The session was attended by representatives of the Commission on the Status of Women, and of ILO, IRO, UNESCO, and WHO, as well as observers from non-governmental organizations having consultative relationship.

The Commission took as a basis for its work on the draft Covenant the text adopted at its fifth session (E/1371) and examined it article by article. It transmitted to the Council, without discussion, articles 24 and 25 of that text, which became articles 43 and 44 and concerned the federal and territorial application clauses. At the same time, it requested the Secretary-General to submit to the Council a report on these articles, dealing with the legal aspect of previous action taken by the United Nations and its specialized agencies in this connexion.

The Commission discussed the question of including in the draft Covenant additional articles on economic, social and cultural rights (E/1681, Annex III). Some representatives thought that such rights were a prerequisite for the enjoyment of other rights already drafted and that they should be included in the Covenant. The majority view was, however, that more detailed discussion was necessary than would be possible at the sixth session, and that this should include full consultation with the specialized agencies, especially with ILO and UNESCO. Two resolutions were adopted on the question.

In the first, the Commission stated that it considered that the draft Covenant relating to some of the fundamental rights of the individual and to certain essential civil freedoms was the first of the series of covenants and measures to be adopted in order to cover the whole of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, and decided to proceed at its next session with the consideration of additional covenants and measures dealing with economic, social, cultural, political, and other categories of human rights. It decided also to consider the additional articles proposed which had not been examined at the sixth session and the importance of which it fully recognized, together with any other articles which Governments might propose. It requested the Council to confirm this decision. It was agreed that, at the seventh session of the Commission, economic and social rights would be taken up first (E/1681, Annexes III, IV).

In the second resolution, the Commission stated its resolve to begin at once with the preparation of the execution of its programme of work for 1951 with a view to assuring to everyone the enjoyment of economic, social and cultural rights as set forth in articles 22 to 27 of the Universal Declaration. After taking note of the survey prepared by the Secretary-General regarding the activities of other bodies of the United Nations and of the specialized agencies in matters within the scope of these articles—and referring to the significance of measures already taken or planned by such bodies and by the specialized agencies, as well as the desirability of promoting and supplementing their activities—the Commission took note with gratitude of the readiness of ILO and UNESCO to assist in preparing the draft texts to be considered at its next session. It recommended to the Council that the latter should instruct the Secretary-General to take the necessary steps to secure similar co-operation from other United Nations organs and specialized agencies, and it requested him to submit to it, before its first session of 1951, the documents thus assembled, together with any others which he might deem useful (E/1681, Annex IV).

On the question of implementation (E/1681), the Commission decided unanimously that some machinery should be included in the draft Covenant. It was understood, however, that this did not prejudice the possibility of the submission of further measures of implementation, such as the possibility of petitions filed by individuals and non-governmental organizations, by members of the Commission for inclusion in a separate protocol to the Covenant. It decided that the measures of implementation to be included in this draft First Covenant should include provisions for the consideration of complaints by States, but rejected a proposal for the consideration of complaints from non-governmental organizations and of petitions from individuals.

As regards the machinery of implementation the Commission decided in favour of the establishment of a permanent Human Rights Committee to be elected by the States parties to the Covenant. Its functions would be to ascertain the facts in cases of alleged violations brought to its attention by a State party to the Covenant, and to make available its good offices to the States concerned, with a view to a friendly solution of the matter on the basis of respect for human rights as defined in the Covenant. The Committee would, normally, be empowered to act only after available domestic remedies had been invoked and exhausted.

The Commission adopted a resolution stating that it considered it desirable that the Committee should be able to obtain advisory opinions from the International Court of Justice on questions of law arising in the course of its work. It asked the Secretary-General to report to the Council on how this might be arranged, in conformity with the United Nations Charter (E/1681).

It also submitted a draft resolution to the Council for consideration, with a view to its adoption by the General Assembly. The draft resolution would have the Assembly state that Member States of the United Nations had pledged themselves to take joint and separate action in co-operation with the Organization for the achievement of the purposes set forth in Article 55 of the Charter, and in particular to encourage and promote "universal respect for, and observance of, human rights", and that the United Nations has subsequently proclaimed the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, and request the Council to instruct the Commission on Human Rights to draw up, subject to the approval of the Council, a scheme providing for the compilation of annual reports by States in conjunction with the publication of the Yearbook on Human Rights. The draft resolution would have the Assembly recommend Member States to agree to act in the spirit of the scheme by forwarding annually to the Secretary-General, in particular with a view to the preparation of the Yearbook, a report on the manner in which they have promoted respect for, and the progress of, human rights in the course of the preceding year (E/1681, Annexes IV, V).

The Commission completed its work on the draft Covenant after a second reading of all the articles, including the measures of implementation.

It decided to submit to the Council for consideration at its eleventh session the draft First Covenant on Human Rights with the draft measures of implementation, together with the summary records of the 198th and 199th meetings of the Commission.

b. CONSIDERATION BY THE ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL AT ITS ELEVENTH SESSION

The Economic and Social Council considered the report of the sixth session of the Commission on Human Rights (E/1681 & Corr.1 & Add.1) at its eleventh session. Those parts of the report dealing with the draft covenant and measures of implementation were discussed at the 139th to 155th and 157th meetings of the Social Committee from 17-31 July and at the 377th, 379th and 404th plenary meetings on 4-5 July and 9 August 1950. The Council decided, at its 379th plenary meeting on 5 July, by 8 votes to 6, with one abstention, to examine the draft covenant in its broad aspects with a view to its transmission, together with the relevant summary records and documentation, to the General Assembly for consideration. It was agreed that the report as a whole should be submitted to the Social Committee.

In addition to the report of the Commission on Human Rights, the Council had before it two reports which the Commission had requested the Secretary-General to submit it. The first, the report on the federal and colonial clauses (E/1721 & Corr.1), dealt with the discussions and decisions taken in United Nations bodies and specialized agencies and the actual texts used in various conventions. The second, the report on the means by which the proposed Human Rights Committee might be able to obtain advisory opinions from the International Court of Justice (E/1732), dealt with the question of whether the "Human Rights Committee" could be authorized to request such opinions, either directly or through the intermediary of a United Nations organ.

The Council also had before it:

Certain observations by the Secretary-General on the first international Covenant on Human Rights (E/L.68), which contained comments made by members of the Commission included in the Commission's report (E/1681); a report by the Director-General of UNESCO on regulations concerning economic and social rights in the Covenant (E/1752) and statements by the following non-governmental organizations in consultative status—the International League for the Rights of Man (E/C.2/254/Add.1 & E/C.2/276), the World Jewish Congress (E/C.2/259) and the Pax Romana International Catholic Movement for Intellectual and Cultural Affairs (E/C.2/268).

(1) Discussion in the Council on the Draft Covenant

The Social Committee agreed to a full discussion under the following main headings: (1) the general substance of the first eighteen articles; (2) the problem of implementation; (3) the inclusion of clauses dealing with the application of the covenant to federal and colonial territories; and (4) general observations and specific articles.

(a) THE GENERAL SUBSTANCE OF THE FIRST EIGHTEEN ARTICLES

When the Committee discussed the general substance of the first eighteen articles, the view was expressed by some representatives, among them those of China, France, Pakistan and the United States, that the draft Covenant had already become an adequate framework on which to conduct further study, though there was some difference of opinion on how this could best be achieved (see below). The representatives of Belgium and China, among others, said that the draft Covenant failed to protect certain rights which they regarded as important and that these omissions should be corrected. Though it was generally felt that there was a lack of precision in the definition of the rights formulated in the covenant and some representatives, including those of Belgium, Canada and the United Kingdom, expressed their dissatisfaction both with its form and substance; others including the representatives of France and India, emphasized that the Commission, in drafting the covenant, had felt that the text should be at once sufficiently conservative to command ratifications from the largest number of States and sufficiently progressive to promote human rights without delay and to leave no loopholes.

(b) THE PROBLEM OF IMPLEMENTATION

Discussion by the Committee on articles 19-38 of the draft Covenant (the articles relating to measures of implementation) centred in the question of who should have the rights to lay complaints before the proposed Human Rights Committee. Unanimity appeared to have been reached on the principles that States parties to the covenant should have that right. There seemed to be a majority feeling that, in the current state of international atmosphere and organization, it would not be practical to confer the right of petition on individuals, though some members felt that this matter should be considered further, especially with regard to the possibility of allowing complaints from certain restricted non-governmental organizations.

During the discussion, members of the Committee stated what they considered to be the defects of the articles relating to measures of implementation. For example, the representative of France called attention to the danger that the election of members to the Human Rights Committee might assume a political character and the representative of Belgium observed that the provision of article 39, under which an individual was obliged to exhaust all means of remedy in his own country, would involve the individual in much loss of time and money.

(c) THE INCLUSION OF ECONOMIC, SOCIAL AND CULTURAL RIGHTS

While representatives generally were agreed on the need for promoting the observance of fundamental economic and social rights, their inclusion in the Covenant was considered premature by a number of representatives, including those of Denmark, India, Pakistan, United Kingdom and the United States. These representatives felt that, although the inclusion of the articles was desirable, the difficulties of their incorporation at that time were great. On the other hand, the immediate or subsequent incorporation of such articles was advocated by seven representatives (those of Australia, Belgium, Brazil, Chile, France, Mexico and Peru). The representatives of Chile, France and Mexico said that the omission of certain fundamental rights in the draft covenant would constitute a failure to affirm and recognize these rights. Though there was support for this view, it was felt by some representatives that a detailed listing of such rights was not necessary but that certain general principles relating to them should be included.

(d) THE INCLUSION OF FEDERAL AND COLONIAL CLAUSES

Discussion in the Social Committee on the desirability of including clauses defining the application of the Covenant to federal States and colonial powers centred on the difficulties experienced by Governments facing such problems in becoming parties to international obligations.

Support for the inclusion of a federal State article was given in the Committee by the representatives of Australia, Canada and the United States. It was stressed by the representatives of Denmark, India and Pakistan, on the other hand, that if such a clause were included it should not provide an opportunity for any States with federal constitutions to evade their international obligations. Two further points of view were expressed: first (by the representative of India), that the failure to include such a clause might delay ratification of the draft Covenant by some federal States and thus their peoples might be deprived of all protection of the covenant; and second (by the representative of Pakistan), that it should be possible for any federal Governments to consult their constituent parts.

The inclusion of a colonial clause in the draft Covenant was opposed in the Committee by the representatives of Chile, China, India, Mexico and Peru, mainly on the ground that it would allow the possibility of discrimination, without the colonial people having any vote in the matter. Among those who urged the inclusion of such a clause, on the other hand, were the representatives of Australia, Belgium, Canada, Denmark, France, Iran and the United Kingdom. It was suggested by the United States representative that it might be preferable to describe the clause as a "territorial" clause rather than as a "colonial" clause. This might help to remove some of the stigma attaching to a colonial clause and would also imply a recognition of the different degrees of self-government reached by the territories in question and the different types of territories covered, such as the Trust Territories. The representative of Belgium, referring to the varying levels of development reached by the populations of Non-Self-Governing Territories, observed that this should be taken into account in drafting such a clause.

(e) GENERAL OBSERVATIONS AND SPECIFIC ARTICLES

Apart from views expressed on particular aspects of the draft Covenant (see above), a number of representatives made general observations and referred to the text of individual articles. In the Social Committee, the representatives of Australia, Belgium, Brazil, Denmark, France, India, Pakistan, United Kingdom and the United States criticized the text of the draft Covenant as being too vague in its definitions. Several representatives pointed out that the Commission had not had time for the completion of a difficult and complex task. Some, including those of Australia and Belgium, indicated that they would urge that the draft Covenant should be returned to the Commission for further study, while others, including those of Chile, China, France, Mexico, Pakistan and the United States, felt that it should be sent to the General Assembly for consideration. The representatives of India and the United States expressed the view that the Commission had already achieved much on an important document and warned against undue haste. The representatives of France and Mexico felt that the draft Covenant should be circulated to Member Governments for their comments. These two views were incorporated in two draft resolutions which later came before the Committee.

(2) Draft Resolutions before the Council

The first (E/AC.7/L.50 & Add.1), submitted by the representative of France, would refer the Covenant to the Commission to review the first eighteen articles in the light of the Council's discussion; to revise other articles in the light of this discussion; to consider the desirability of including federal and colonial clauses; and to consider further the question of economic and social rights. Further, the draft resolution would have the Commission report back to the Council on these matters at the thirteenth session of the Council. The Council would then submit to the sixth session of the General Assembly proposals to facilitate the adoption by the General Assembly of final texts.

The second draft resolution (E/AC.7/L.51), proposed jointly by Chile, Peru and the United States, sought to refer the question to the General Assembly on the ground that certain basic policy decisions with regard to the content of the draft covenant should be made by all Members of the United Nations; only in such a way could the covenant be completed. The discussion that followed showed that there was a division of opinion on whether the draft Covenant should be referred to the Commission or to the General Assembly; a drafting committee was then set up, in an attempt to reduce the alternatives before the Committee.

(3) Resolution Adopted by the Council

The proposals of the drafting committee (E/AC.7/L.58) were discussed at the 157th meeting of the Social Committee on 31 July 1950, and after a series of votes on paragraphs of the draft resolution and the alternatives it offered, the resolution as a whole was adopted by 11 votes to 2, with 2 abstentions.

The resolution proposed by the Committee was adopted as a whole by the Council (303 I (XI)), at its 404th plenary meeting on 9 August 1950, by 11 votes to none with 4 abstentions. In this resolution, the Council concluded that further progress on the Covenant could not be made without basic policy decisions being taken by the General Assembly on the following matters:

- (1) the general adequacy of the first eighteen articles;
- (2) the desirability of including special articles on the application of the covenant to federal States and to Non-Self-Governing and Trust Territories;

- (3) the desirability of including articles on economic, social and cultural rights;

- (4) the adequacy of the articles relating to implementation.

The Council also transmitted the draft Covenant, together with records of its discussions, to the General Assembly at its fifth session with a view to reaching policy decisions on these matters and asked the Commission on Human Rights to reconsider the draft Covenant—bearing in mind the directives of the General Assembly and the views expressed by the Council—and to submit a revised draft at the Council's thirteenth session. It also asked the Secretary-General to transmit the Council's resolution, together with records of its debate, to Member States with a view to obtaining their observations after the fifth session of the General Assembly for transmission to the Commission on Human Rights.

(4) Other Questions Relating to the Draft Covenant

(a) CONSIDERATION OF ADDITIONAL COVENANTS

The Commission on Human Rights also sought the Council's approval of its decision, taken at its sixth session (E/1681), to proceed at its seventh session with the consideration of additional covenants and measures dealing with economic, social, cultural, political and other categories of human rights, and consider additional proposed articles included in its report of its sixth session, together with any other articles which might be further proposed by Governments. After support for the Commission's decisions had been voiced by the representatives of Chile, Denmark, France, India, Pakistan and the United States, the Committee, at its 140th meeting on 18 July, and the Council, without discussion, at its 404th plenary meeting on 9 August 1950, adopted resolution (303 C (XI)), by 14 votes to none, with 1 abstention, approving these decisions.

(b) COLLABORATION WITH SPECIALIZED AGENCIES AND OTHER UNITED NATIONS ORGANS

The Committee, at its 141st meeting on 18 July and the Council, without discussion, at its 404th plenary meeting, unanimously adopted (resolution 303 D (XI)) the amended text of a draft resolution submitted by Belgium (E/AC.7/L.46) which outlined procedure for studies and collaboration with ILO and UNESCO, and other organs of the United Nations and specialized agencies on the subject of economic, social and cultural rights. The Committee heard statements on co-operation from representatives of ILO and UNESCO at its 140th and 141st meetings respectively.

(c) ANNUAL REPORTS TO BE SUBMITTED BY STATES

The Commission on Human Rights recommended (E/1681) that the Council ask the General Assembly to authorize the preparation by the Commission of a scheme providing for annual reports to be submitted by States in conjunction with the publication of the Yearbook on Human Rights. It also asked that the General Assembly recommend that Member States agree to act in the spirit of the scheme by reporting annually, in particular with a view to the preparation of the Yearbook, a report on the manner in which they had promoted respect for human rights in the preceding year.

During the discussion in the Committee several representatives, including those of Canada, Denmark and the United States, expressed the view that the draft resolution should be referred back to the Commission for further consideration; other representatives, among them those of China, France and India, felt that though they agreed with the principle embodied in the draft resolution, they were not satisfied with the form of the resolution itself, which had changed from the original proposal made in the Commission. It was also felt by certain representatives (including those of the United Kingdom and the United States) that progress in the promotion of human rights would best be shown by legislation adopted and judicial decisions protecting human rights which would be amply reported in the Yearbook on Human Rights. At its 143rd meeting on 19 July, the Committee adopted a resolution submitted orally by the representative of Denmark, which proposed that the draft resolution submitted by the Commission be returned for further consideration, together with the records of the discussions in the Council. This draft resolution (E/1808) was unanimously adopted by the Council, without discussion, at its 404th plenary meeting, as resolution 303 E (XI).

GENERAL ASSEMBLY

At the fifth session of the General Assembly the question of the draft Covenant and measures of implementation was considered by the Third Committee at its 287th to 316th and 318th meetings, from 18 October-1 November, and at the 317th plenary meeting, on 4 December 1950.

(1) Discussion in the Third Committee

The Committee examined each of the four questions referred by the Council for policy decisions: (1) the general adequacy of the first eighteen articles; (2) the desirability of including special articles on the application of the covenant to federal States and to Non-Self-Governing and Trust Territories; (3) the desirability of including special articles on economic, social and cultural rights; and (4) the adequacy of the articles relating to implementation.

(a) THE GENERAL ADEQUACY OF THE FIRST EIGHTEEN ARTICLES

In considering this question the Committee discussed two major questions put before it by the Secretary-General (A/C.3/534): (a) whether the catalogue contained in the first eighteen articles of rights to be provided for in the Covenant was adequate, and (b) whether the existing articles as drafted were adequate to protect the rights to which they related.

Some representatives, including those of the Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, India, Iraq, Poland, Saudi Arabia, Turkey, the USSR and Yemen, considered that there were important omissions from the catalogue of rights which should be corrected. Others, among them the representatives of Afghanistan, Brazil, Canada, Chile, Egypt, El Salvador, Ethiopia, France, Lebanon, the Netherlands, the United Kingdom, the United States, Uruguay and Yugoslavia, felt, generally speaking, that the scope of the first eighteen articles was adequate although reservations were made on the form of the articles and certain amendments were suggested. Representatives expressed differing points of view as to the adequacy of the definitions and limitations contained in individual draft articles and cited particular provisions which, in their view, should either be deleted, added to or changed, but were, on the whole, agreed that the articles needed revision.

(b) FEDERAL AND COLONIAL ARTICLES

The Committee decided to deal separately with the question of the application of the Covenant to federal States on the one hand and to Non-Self-Governing and Trust Territories on the other.

During the discussion on the federal clause, it was pointed out that in certain federal States not all matters relating to human rights were within the jurisdiction of the federal Power, but were the concern of State, provincial or cantonal authorities. It was explained that it was the purpose of the federal clause to enable federal Governments to accept obligations concerning those matters which were within their jurisdiction and to recommend favourably to the State, provincial or cantonal authorities those which fell within their jurisdiction. Support for the inclusion of a federal clause was given during the discussion by the representatives of Australia, Brazil, Canada, France, Greece, the Netherlands, New Zealand, the United Kingdom and the United States, among others. Opposition was voiced by, among others, the representatives of the Byelorussian SSR, Colombia, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, the Dominican Republic, India, Iraq, Mexico, Pakistan, Poland, the Ukrainian SSR and Uruguay. Some of the representatives opposing the inclusion of the article declared that its acceptance would have the same effect as a reservation and would provide an escape clause, which would mean, in effect, that different States parties to the covenant would undertake different obligations. To meet this objection, it was suggested by the representatives of India, Lebanon, Norway, Turkey and Yugoslavia that if a federal clause were adopted, it should contain certain guarantees. The representatives of China and Egypt expressed the view that federal authorities should be able to ensure the acceptance by their constituent parts of obligations undertaken by the federal Power. The representative of Pakistan suggested that the objection raised by federal States could be met by their reaching prior agreement with the constituent units.

The inclusion in the Covenant of a special clause to provide for its application to Non-Self-Governing and Trust Territories was favoured by Australia, Belgium, Brazil, Canada, France, Greece, New Zealand, the United Kingdom and the United States. In support of this view, it was advanced that some Non-Self-Governing Territories had reached a stage in their development toward self-government which placed them in a position to enact, through their own autonomous organs, the laws covering those matters dealt with in the draft Covenant, and that the metropolitan Powers could not therefore automatically adhere to the Covenant on behalf of such territories under their administration without consulting these legislative organs. The majority of the Committee, however, were in favour of the principle of the universal application of the Covenant and doubted whether such territories really exercised the powers to which reference was made. Members holding this view included: the Byelorussian SSR, Chile, China, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Egypt, Ethiopia, India, Indonesia, Iraq, Mexico, Pakistan, the Philippines, Poland, Saudi Arabia, Syria, the Ukrainian SSR, the USSR and Yugoslavia.

(c) ARTICLES ON ECONOMIC, SOCIAL AND CULTURAL RIGHTS

When the Committee took up the question, almost all participants in the debate were in favour of international instruments, to be adopted under the auspices of the United Nations, defining and guaranteeing such rights. There was some difference of opinion, however, on the feasibility of including articles on these rights in the existing draft Covenant. Some representatives felt that the incorporation at that time might delay the drafting and coming into effect of the covenant; others felt that it would be desirable to incorporate such articles in a separate covenant as the nature of these rights and their implementation posed special problems, and that their inclusion should be considered later. Among representatives who spoke against the immediate inclusion of economic, social and cultural rights in the draft covenant were those of Canada, Denmark, the Dominican Republic, France, Greece, Israel, the Netherlands, New Zealand, the United Kingdom and the United States. Among those who urged that such articles were an essential part of human rights and should be incorporated in the Covenant were the representatives of Afghanistan, Argentina, Belgium, Brazil, the Byelorussian SSR, Chile, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Egypt, India, Iran, Iraq, Mexico, Poland, Saudi Arabia, Syria, the USSR and Yugoslavia.

Many speakers emphasized the necessity of the United Nations being assisted in this task by the specialized agencies. The Committee, in this connexion, heard statements by representatives of ILO and UNESCO.

(d) ADEQUACY OF THE ARTICLES RELATING TO IMPLEMENTATION

When this question was discussed in the Committee, several representatives, among them those of Brazil, Chile, the Netherlands, Turkey and the United States, expressed the view that the articles were generally adequate, though certain drafting changes might be necessary. The opposite view, however, was expressed by the representatives of Ethiopia, the USSR and Uruguay, among others. There was some divergence of opinion, also, on whether an implementation system restricted to State-to-State complaints was satisfactory: some representatives, including those of Brazil, India, the Netherlands, Sweden, Syria and Uruguay, held that complaints from individuals in respect of the violation of human rights should also be considered, and the representatives of Chile and Israel thought that petitions might also be entertained from certain non-governmental organizations contributing to the work of the United Nations. It was suggested by the representative of the United States, among others, that provisions on the admissibility and handling of petitions should be included in a separate protocol. Some favoured machinery which could be linked with the United Nations and not be based on a group of States. As regards the proposed Human Rights Committee, it was suggested that it should submit annual reports on its work to the General Assembly and that provision should be made for the Committee to have recourse to the International Court of Justice for advisory opinions.

(e) DRAFT RESOLUTIONS BEFORE THE COMMITTEE

At the conclusion of the debate on the above four questions, the Third Committee had before it one draft resolution dealing with the territorial application clause: a draft resolution by the Philippines and Syria (A/C.3/L.71/Rev.1), according to which the provisions of the Covenant would extend or be applicable to a signatory metropolitan State as well as to all the territories administered or governed by it, whether Non-Self-Governing, Trust or Colonial Territories.

The Committee also had before it two general draft resolutions on the matters on which the Commission on Human Rights and the Economic and Social Council had asked for guidance: one submitted jointly by Brazil, Turkey and the United States (A/C.3/L.76), to which amendments were suggested by Ethiopia and France, jointly (A/C.3/L.78), by France (A/C.3/L.82) and by Greece and New Zealand, jointly, (A/C.3/L.83), and one submitted by the USSR (A/C.3/L.77/Rev.1).

The joint draft resolution would state that the General Assembly, commending the Commission on Human Rights for the important work it had so far accomplished, called upon the Economic and Social Council to request the Commission:

- (a) to continue to give priority in its work to the completion of the draft Covenant and measures of implementation so that the General Assembly, at its sixth session, might have before it the revised draft of this Covenant;
- (b) to take into consideration in its revision the views expressed in the General Assembly at its fifth session and the Economic and Social Council at its eleventh session;
- (c) to study the federal State article and to prepare, for consideration by the General Assembly at its sixth session recommendations designed to meet the constitutional problems of federal States;
- (d) to study the article dealing with the territorial application of the draft Covenant and to make similar recommendations on this matter;
- (e) to proceed with the consideration of additional instruments and measures dealing with economic, social, cultural and other human rights not included in the draft Covenant, taking into account the work of other organs of the United Nations and of specialized agencies in this connexion;

(f) to take steps necessary for the co-operation of these bodies in considering such rights;

(g) to proceed with consideration of separate protocols for the examination of petitions from individuals and organizations with respect to alleged violations of the Covenant;

(h) to report to the thirteenth session of the Economic and Social Council on these matters. Under the joint draft resolution the Secretary-General would be requested to invite Member States to submit their views by 15 February 1951 concerning the draft Covenant, as revised by the Commission at its sixth session.

The joint Ethiopian-French amendment proposed to insert a provision to the effect that preparation should be made for the establishment of an implementation body which, by its very composition, would offer all possible guarantees of independence and competence and be responsible, in accordance with precise terms of reference, for examining all charges of violations of the Covenant.

The French amendment would add to the draft a request to the Economic and Social Council to give consideration at its twelfth session to the methods by which the specialized agencies might assist the work of the Commission on Human Rights with regard to economic, social and cultural rights.

The joint Greek-New Zealand amendment would add a request to the Commission on Human Rights to proceed with the consideration of additional instruments and measures dealing with economic, social, cultural and other human rights not included in the First International Covenant on Human Rights, only after the completion of work on the First International Covenant.

The USSR draft resolution would state in the preamble that the first eighteen articles of the draft Covenant did not correspond to the aims envisaged either in the rights enumerated or in the guarantees provided; that the Covenant omitted a number of essential provisions; that it was essential that provisions should be included rendering it obligatory for States to take the necessary steps, including legislation, to guarantee to everyone a real opportunity of enjoying the rights and freedoms provided; that it should be recognized that the implementation of the Covenant fell entirely within the domestic jurisdiction of States. In its operative part, the draft resolution recommended: that the Commission on Human Rights should be instructed to include in the draft Covenant additional provisions covering the right to participate in the government of one's country, the right to national self-determination, the protection of minorities, the right to freedom of expression, the prohibition of propaganda on behalf of Fascist or Nazi views, the prohibition of incitement to hatred among peoples as well as the prohibition of racial discrimination and the dissemination of slanderous rumours. The proposal also contained a comprehensive list of economic, social and cultural rights suggested for inclusion in the Covenant.

In addition, various draft resolutions before the Committee were concerned with particular aspects of the question.

Two draft resolutions dealt with the adequacy of the first eighteen articles:

(1) Yugoslav draft resolution (A/C.3/L.79), which would state that certain basic rights had been omitted from the first eighteen articles and that in their present form they were not adequate to protect the rights to which they referred. The draft resolution also proposed to add to the Covenant the right to universal and equal suffrage, the right of everyone to participate in the administration of his country, the right of every member of a minority to use his own language and develop his culture, and the right of asylum. It would state that the purposes and principles of the United Nations Charter should be logically implemented and properly protected against the abuse of certain rights and that fundamental human rights and freedoms should be based on general principles of the rights acquired by mankind in efforts to promote human welfare and democratic relations between human beings.

(2) Egyptian draft resolution (A/C.3/L.75/Rev.1), which would recommend to the Commission on Human Rights the deletion from the draft Covenant of the right of freedom to change one's religion or belief. The resolution would also add to the list of limitations in the article dealing with freedom of expression (those safeguards necessary for the protection of national security, public order, safety, health or morals, or of the rights, freedoms or reputations of others), the maintenance of peace and friendly relations between States.

One draft resolution, submitted by Yugoslavia (A/C.3/L.80), dealt specifically with economic, social and cultural rights. It proposed that the Assembly decide to include economic, social and cultural rights in the Covenant and invite the Commission on Human Rights to incorporate in the Covenant, in the spirit of the Universal Declaration, a clearly worded provision for such rights, corresponding to the provisions guaranteeing civic and political freedoms.

Three draft resolutions dealt with implementation:

(1) By Uruguay (A/C.3/L.74 & Add.1), which would have the General Assembly recommend that the Commission on Human Rights, in revising the draft articles on implementation, should take into account the proposal for the creation of a permanent agency of the United Nations, to be known as an Attorney-General or High Commissioner for Human Rights.

This agency would initiate proceedings before a standing committee upon receipt of complaints concerning non-observance from Governments parties to the Covenant, individuals or groups of individuals; would act as official plaintiff in these proceedings; would be responsible for the general supervision of the observance of the covenant by signatory States; would have power to make investigations ex officio; and would attempt to secure an amicable settlement before referring the case to the implementation body.

(2) By Chile (A/C.3/L.81), which would have the Assembly recommend that the Economic and Social Council give consideration to the inclusion in the Covenant of a new article or paragraph to the effect that not only a State party to the Covenant might have access to the contemplated Human Rights Committee, but that the right of access to the Committee might also be exercised by non-governmental organizations duly recognized by the United Nations.

(3) By Israel (A/C.3/L.84), which would recommend that the Commission on Human Rights insert in the provisions dealing with implementation, additional provisions to the effect: (a) that the right to bring cases of non-compliance with the provisions of the Covenant to the attention of the Human Rights Committee should be limited to such non-governmental organizations enjoying consultative status as would be included in a list drawn up for this purpose by the Secretary-General in conjunction with the Chairman of the Human Rights Committee; (b) that the Human Rights Committee might (by a majority decision of the members present) be seized of cases of non-compliance with the provisions of the Covenant by parties thereto on its own motion when the facts before the Committee appeared in its view to warrant such consideration; (c) that in urgent cases, the Human Rights Committee might recommend to the State or States concerned the adoption of measures designed to give immediate effect to the provisions of the Covenant and that it should have the right to suggest to the States concerned such remedies as it deemed advisable.

The Committee dealt first with the joint draft resolution submitted by the Philippines and Syria (A/C.3/L.71/Rev.1), which sought to extend the application of the Covenant to all territories, whether Non-Self-Governing, Trust or Colonial Territories, of a metropolitan State signatory to the Covenant. Support for the joint draft resolution was expressed by the representatives of Afghanistan, Argentina, Guatemala, Pakistan and Saudi Arabia, who felt that the inclusion of such a clause in the Covenant would help promote respect for human rights, but the inclusion of such a clause was questioned by the representatives of France and New Zealand. During the discussion, a number of oral amendments were accepted by the sponsors of the draft resolution, which was adopted by a roll-call vote of 30 votes to 11, with 8 abstentions. Later, the representatives of Brazil, Turkey and the United States withdrew from their joint draft resolution (A/C.3/L.76) a paragraph which would conflict with the above decision of the Committee.

The Committee decided, at its 303rd meeting on 3 November 1950, by 28 votes to 13, with 4 abstentions, to adopt as the basic text for its further work, one of the two draft resolutions, namely the joint draft resolution submitted by Brazil, Turkey and the United States (A/C.3/L.76) and the draft resolution submitted by the USSR (A/C.3/L.77/Rev.1), which could be regarded as general resolutions covering the whole range of problems submitted to the General Assembly by the Council for policy decisions. It then decided, by 31 votes to 8, with 10 abstentions, to adopt as the basic text the joint draft resolution submitted by Brazil, Turkey and the United States. Representatives who had submitted draft resolutions and proposals to the Committee then redrafted them in the form of amendments to the basic text of this resolution. (Ethiopian-French amendment, A/C.3/L.78; French amendment, A/C.3/L.82/Rev.1; Greek-New Zealand amendment, A/C.3/L.83/Rev.1; USSR draft resolution, A/C.3/L.96; draft resolution by Yugoslavia, A/C.3/L.92; draft resolution by Uruguay, A/C.3/L.93; draft resolution by Chile, A/C.3/L.81; and draft resolution by Israel, A/C.3/L.91/Rev.1 & Corr.1.)

Broadly speaking, the discussion in the Committee followed the main lines laid down by the proposed amendments, which were later voted on separately.

In so far as it related to the preamble of the joint draft resolution, the amendment by the USSR (A/C.3/L.96) was considered at the 315th meeting of the Committee on 16 November 1950. The Committee adopted, by 16 votes to 15, with 12 abstentions, the proposals which would declare that it was essential that provisions should be included in the draft Covenant rendering it obligatory for States to take the necessary steps, including legislation, to guarantee everyone a real opportunity of enjoying the rights and freedoms provided. It rejected, by 20 votes to 8, with 11 abstentions, a proposal which would state in the preamble that the first eighteen articles did not correspond to the aims envisaged, either in the rights enumerated or the guarantees provided. It also rejected, by 32 votes to 5, with 14 abstentions, a proposal which would recognize that the implementation of the Covenant fell entirely within the jurisdiction of States. The Committee also felt unable to adopt further proposals made by the USSR.

The first, which recommended that the Commission be instructed to include in the draft Covenant additional provisions covering the right to participate in the government of one's country, the right to national self-determination, the protection of minorities, the right to freedom of expression, the prohibition of propaganda on behalf of Nazi or Fascist views, the prohibition of incitement to hatred among peoples as well as the prohibition of racial discrimination and the dissemination of slanderous rumours, was rejected by the Committee by roll-call vote at its 305th meeting on 6 November 1950, by 28 votes to 17, with 4 abstentions.

A proposal to include in the Covenant a comprehensive list of economic, social and cultural rights was rejected as a whole by 26 votes to 8, with 15 abstentions at the 313th meeting of the Committee on 14 November.

At its 314th meeting on 15 November, the Committee also rejected, by roll-call vote of 29 to 5, with 12 abstentions, a proposal that the articles on implementation should be deleted from the draft International Covenant on Human Rights on the ground that their inclusion would constitute an attempt at intervention in the domestic affairs of States and would encroach on their sovereignty.

As far as the amendments by Chile, Ethiopia and France, Israel and Uruguay were concerned, the Committee, at its 314th meeting on 15 November 1950, adopted as a whole, by 28 votes to 9, with 8 abstentions, an oral amendment by Mexico which would have the General Assembly call upon the Council to request the Commission to take into consideration the proposals presented by these representatives.

The French amendment, which would add to the draft a request to the Council to consider at its twelfth session methods by which the specialized agencies might assist the Commission with regard to considering economic, social and cultural rights, was adopted by the Committee, at its 315th meeting on 16 November, by 36 votes to none, with 1 abstention.

The Greek-New Zealand amendment was not put to the vote, in view of the Committee's decision concerning economic, social and cultural rights.

The Committee adopted, at its 307th meeting on 8 November 1950, by 25 votes to 16, with 9 abstentions, the Yugoslav amendment, in so far as it referred to the statement that certain rights had been omitted from the first eighteen articles. It further adopted, at its 307th meeting on 8 November, by 48 votes to none, with 2 abstentions, a revised text of the amendment, declaring that in their present form these articles were not adequate to protect the rights to which they referred. It rejected, however, by 24 votes to 18, with 5 abstentions, at its 305th meeting on 6 November, the proposals to add to the Covenant the right to universal and equal suffrage, the right of everyone to participate in the administration of his country and the right of every member of a minority to use his own language and develop his own culture, and the right of asylum.

In so far as the Yugoslav amendment sought to add to the joint draft resolution the statement that the purposes and principles of the United Nations Charter should be implemented in the draft Covenant, the Committee adopted, by 43 votes to none, with two abstentions, at its 309th meeting on 9 November, a joint amendment by the United States and Yugoslavia (A/C.3/L.101) to the Yugoslav amendment. The joint amendment would have the General Assembly state that it considered that, in drafting the Covenant, account should be taken of the principles and purposes of the Charter, and that these should be "consistently applied and assiduously protected".

The Committee also adopted, by 23 votes to 17, with 10 abstentions, at its 313th meeting on 14 November, the part of the Yugoslav amendment which would have the General Assembly call upon the Council to request the Commission to include in the Covenant a clear expression of economic, social and cultural rights in a manner which related them to the civic and political freedoms to be proclaimed by the Covenant.

The Egyptian draft resolution, seeking, inter alia, the deletion from the draft Covenant of the right of freedom to change one's religion and belief, was incorporated in a joint amendment by Egypt, United Kingdom and United States (A/C.3/L.99), which asked that the Commission take into consideration views expressed during the discussion in the General Assembly, including those relating to the articles on freedom of thought, conscience and religion and freedom of expression, and those views relating to the rights set forth by the USSR in document A/C.3/L.96 and Yugoslavia in document A/C.3/L.92. The joint amendment was adopted by the Committee, at its 306th meeting on 7 November 1950, by 25 votes to 18, with 6 abstentions.

Among the additional proposals dealt with by the Committee were the following:

The Committee, at its 311th meeting on 10 November, adopted by roll-call vote of 31 to 16, with 5 abstentions, a joint amendment by Afghanistan and Saudi Arabia (A/C.3/L.88), urging the study by the Commission of the problem of the right of peoples and nations to self-determination. The Committee rejected, by a roll-call vote of 16 to 7, with 28 abstentions, a proposal by Lebanon (A/C.3/L.104), whereby the General Assembly would decide to include in the agenda of its sixth session, as a separate item, the question of the study of ways and means which would ensure the right of nations to self-determination.

With regard to the federal clause, the Committee, at its 309th meeting on 9 November, considered three proposals. The first, proposed by the USSR, suggesting that the General Assembly declare its intention to extend the provisions of the Covenant without restrictions to all parts of federal States, was rejected by roll-call vote of 21 to 6, with 21 abstentions. The Committee also rejected, by a roll-call vote of 21 to 12, with 13 abstentions, an amendment by Mexico (A/C.3/L.89/Rev.1), which would have the Council request the Commission "to study the problem of the so-called federal clause in order to obtain a formula that will definitely preclude the possibility of the non-application of the Covenant in any one or more of the territories forming a federation". An amendment by Lebanon (A/C.3/L.86), which would seek provisions to secure the maximum extension of the Covenant to constituent units of federal States, was adopted by roll-call vote of 27 to 6, with 16 abstentions.

An amendment by Iraq (A/C.3/L.106), which would add a clause to the joint draft resolution giving "an explicit recognition of men and women in related rights, as set forth by the Charter of the United Nations", was adopted by the Committee by 34 votes to none, with 13 abstentions, at the 313th meeting on 14 November.

A joint amendment by Lebanon and the United Kingdom (A/C.3/L.94/Rev.1), asking for consideration of the view that it was desirable to define the rights set forth in the Covenant and the limitations thereto with the greatest possible precision, was adopted by the Committee, by 39 votes to none, with 10 abstentions, at the 307th meeting on 8 November.

The consolidated text (A/C.3/L.111) of the joint draft resolution of Brazil, Turkey and the United States (A/C.3/L.76) was adopted as a whole by 29 votes to 5, with 13 abstentions, at the 318th meeting of the Committee on 17 November 1950, and later by the General Assembly in plenary session (see below).

(2) Discussion by the General Assembly in Plenary Meeting

At its 317th plenary meeting on 4 December 1950, the General Assembly discussed the report of the Third Committee on the draft Covenant and measures of implementation, together with the draft resolutions submitted by the Committee (A/1559 & Corr.1).

Criticisms of aspects of the draft resolutions were made by a number of delegations, including those of Australia, the Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, France, Guatemala, Greece, Lebanon, Mexico, Poland, the Ukrainian SSR, the USSR and the United Kingdom. These delegations considered, generally speaking, that the recommendations on the future work of the Commission were inadequate as precise replies to the Commission on Human Rights and to the Economic and Social Council, which had asked for decisions of policy in carrying out their task in drafting the Covenant, and that proposals concerning the implementation did not meet the needs of the situation. Certain representatives, including those of the Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, Poland, the Ukrainian SSR and the USSR considered that certain minimum rights should be guaranteed; that certain fundamental rights had been omitted from the draft Covenant, and that it was the duty of the General Assembly to point out these deficiencies and to recommend concrete measures for remedying them. Accordingly, the representative of the USSR proposed an amendment (A/1576 & Corr.1) to the draft resolution dealing with the future work of the Commission on Human Rights, which sought amendments to five paragraphs of the Committee's draft resolution and which enumerated a series of thirteen economic, social and cultural rights, including trade union rights, to be specifically included in the* draft Covenant. The amendments were voted on separately and each was rejected.

The draft resolution proposed by the Third Committee on the future work of the Commission was voted on in parts and adopted as a whole (421(V)) by the General Assembly, at its 317th plenary meeting on 4 December 1950, by 38 votes to 7, with 12 abstentions. It read as follows:

The General Assembly,

Appreciating the priority which, in accordance with General Assembly resolution 217(III), the Commission on Human Rights during its 1949 and 1950 sessions gave to the preparation of a draft International Covenant on Human Rights and measures for its implementation,

Noting the decision of the Economic and Social Council at its eleventh session to transmit the draft Covenant together with the relevant documentation and records of the discussion in the Council to the General Assembly at its fifth session for consideration with a view to reaching policy decisions on the points listed in Economic and Social Council resolution 303 I (XI),

Considering it essential that the Covenant should include provisions rendering it obligatory for States to promote the implementation of the human rights and fundamental freedoms proclaimed in the Covenant and to take the necessary steps, including legislation, to guarantee to everyone the real opportunity of enjoying those rights and freedoms,

Having considered the draft Covenant prepared by the Commission on Human Rights, particularly with reference to certain basic policies,

1. Commends the Commission on Human Rights for the important work it has thus far accomplished;

2. Calls upon the Economic and Social Council to request the Commission on Human Rights to continue to give priority in its work to the completion of the draft Covenant and measures for its implementation in order that the General Assembly may have before it at its sixth session the revised draft of this Covenant;

B

3. Considers:

(a) That the list of rights in the first eighteen articles of the draft Covenant does not contain certain of the most elementary rights;

(b) That the present wording of some of the first eighteen articles of the draft Covenant should be improved in order to protect more effectively the rights to which they refer;

(c) That in the drafting of the Covenant account should be taken of the Purposes and Principles of the Charter of the United Nations and that these Purposes and Principles should be consistently applied and assiduously protected;

4. Calls upon the Economic and Social Council to request the Commission on Human Rights to take into consideration in its work of revision of the draft Covenant:

(i) The views expressed during the discussion of the draft Covenant at the fifth session of the Economic and Social Council, including those relating to articles 13 and 14 of the draft Covenant and, with a view to the addition in the draft Covenant of other rights, those relating to the rights set forth by the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics in document A/C.3/L.96 and Yugoslavia in document A/C.3/L.92;

(ii) The view, expressed during the discussion of the draft Covenant at the fifth session of the General Assembly and at the eleventh session of the Economic and Social Council, that it is desirable to define the rights set forth in the Covenant and the limitations thereto with the greatest possible precision;

5. Calls upon the Economic and Social Council to request the Commission on Human Rights to study a federal State article and to prepare, for the consideration of the General Assembly at its sixth session, recommendations which will have as their purpose the securing of the maximum extension of the Covenant to the constituent units of federal States, and the meeting of the constitutional problems of federal States;

D

6. Calls upon the Economic and Social Council to request the Commission on Human Rights to study ways and means which would ensure the right of peoples and nations to self-determination, and to prepare recommendations for consideration by the General Assembly at its sixth session;

E

Whereas the Covenant should be drawn up in the spirit and based on the principles of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights,

Whereas the Universal Declaration regards man as a person, to whom civic and political freedoms as well as economic, social and cultural rights indubitably belong,

Whereas the enjoyment of civic and political freedoms and of economic, social and cultural rights are interconnected and interdependent,

Whereas, when deprived of economic, social and cultural rights, man does not represent the human person whom the Universal Declaration regards as the ideal of the free man,

7. (a) Decides to include in the Covenant on Human Rights economic, social and cultural rights and an explicit recognition of equality of men and women in related rights, as set forth in the Charter of the United Nations;

(b) Calls upon the Economic and Social Council to request the Commission on Human Rights, in accordance with the spirit of the Universal Declaration, to include in the draft Covenant a clear expression of economic, social and cultural rights in a manner which relates them to the civic and political freedoms proclaimed by the draft Covenant;

(c) Calls upon the Economic and Social Council to request the Commission on Human Rights to take such steps as are necessary to obtain the co-operation of other organs of the United Nations and of the specialized agencies in the consideration of such rights;

(d) Requests the Economic and Social Council to consider, at its twelfth session, the methods by which the specialized agencies might co-operate with the Commission on Human Rights with regard to economic, social and cultural rights;

F

8. Calls upon the Economic and Social Council to request the Commission on Human Rights to proceed with the consideration of provisions, to be inserted in the draft Covenant or in separate protocols, for the receipt and examination of petitions from individuals and organizations with respect to alleged violations of the Covenant; and to take into consideration in its studies of questions relating to petitions and implementation of the proposals presented by Chile (A/C.3/L.81), Ethiopia and France (A/C.3/L.78), Israel (A/C.3/L.91/Rev.1) and Uruguay (A/C.3/L.93);

G

9. Calls upon the Economic and Social Council to request the Commission on Human Rights to report to the Economic and Social Council at its thirteenth session concerning the above matters;

H

10. Requests the Secretary-General to invite Member States to submit, by 15 February 1951, their views concerning the draft Covenant as revised by the Commission on Human Rights at its sixth session, in order that the Commission may have such views before it during its further consideration of the draft Covenant at its seventh session.

With regard to the draft resolution seeking to extend the provisions of the draft Covenant automatically to the Non-Self-Governing, Trust and Colonial Territories of a signatory metropolitan State, submitted to the General Assembly by the Third Committee, the Assembly heard divergent views from the representatives of Australia, Greece and the United Kingdom, on the one hand, and from Czechoslovakia and Guatemala on the other. Opposing the draft resolution, the representative of the United Kingdom said that his Government would adhere, in the case of the Covenant, to the normal practices and procedures which regulated the constitutional relationship between the United Kingdom and the territories for whose international relations it was responsible. The effect of a decision by the General Assembly to delete a colonial application clause from the Covenant might be to delay unduly the accession of the United Kingdom Government to the Covenant and the application of the Covenant to several territories. The representative of Australia told the Assembly that no real account had been taken of the constitutional difficulties which would face certain countries in the application of the Covenant to the territories for which they were responsible. The representative of Greece said that although the draft resolution expressed a cherished ideal, the necessary measures had not yet been taken to ensure its application, and, without them, the resolution would be purely academic.

Supporting the draft resolution, the representative of Czechoslovakia stated that it contained an unequivocal directive to the Commission on Human Rights and in this way corresponded to the demands for basic policy decisions. The representative of Guatemala said he saw no reason why the provisions of the Covenant should not be applicable to all States, whether self-governing or not; States which had had difficulty in ratifying the Covenant on behalf of Non-Self-Governing Territories which they administered had other ways of achieving the desired result.

The General Assembly adopted the draft resolution as submitted by the Third Committee, at its 317th plenary meeting on 4 December 1950, by 36 votes to 11, with 8 abstentions. It read as follows (resolution 422 (V)):

The General Assembly

Requests the Commission on Human Rights to include the following article in the International Covenant on Human Rights:

"Article

"The provisions of the present Covenant shall extend to or be applicable equally to a signatory metropolitan State and to all the territories, be they Non-Self-Governing, Trust or Colonial Territories, which are being administered or governed by such metropolitan State."

2. Yearbook on Human Rights

The Economic and Social Council at its tenth session, at the 119th meeting of the Social Committee on 13 February and the Council's 354th plenary meeting on 17 February 1950, discussed the form which should be adopted for the Yearbook on Human Rights.

The Council had before it certain recommendations (E/1371, Annex IV) made by the fifth session of the Commission on Human Rights, held from 9 May to 20 June 1949. The Commission recommended that as soon as circumstances permitted, summaries of the decisions or the decisions in extenso of the highest court in every country relevant to human rights of international interest should be included in a special chapter of the Yearbook on Human Rights and that, in exceptional cases, summaries or full reports of decisions by other courts should be included in the Yearbook, if the information were of value to other countries. The Commission recommended also that, as of 1949, the Yearbook should be published in Chinese, Russian and Spanish and that the Secretariat should collect and include in the Yearbook all the texts of laws on human rights in respect of Non-Self-Governing and Trust Territories.

A draft resolution was presented to the Social Committee by the United Kingdom (E/AC.7/L.3) which sought to refer to the Commission for further consideration, in the light of discussions at the tenth session of the Council, the form which the Yearbook might take. The United Kingdom draft resolution received general support during the discussion and the view that further study by the Commission was desirable was expressed by the representatives of Canada, Chile, China, Denmark, India, Mexico, Pakistan and the United States of America. Some representatives, including those of Chile, India and Pakistan, felt that the cost of publishing the Yearbook in Chinese, Russian and Spanish, as recommended by the Commission, would involve great expense. The United Kingdom draft resolution was adopted by the Committee, after a drafting change, by 13 votes to none, with 2 abstentions.

The draft resolution (E/1613), with the addition of two amendments proposed by India (E/L.13), was unanimously adopted by the Council. The Indian amendments provided that

(1) nothing in the resolution would be interpreted as postponing the publication of Yearbooks in preparation and (2) texts of basic laws on human rights in Non-Self-Governing and Trust Territories should be included. In its resolution (275 C (X)), the Council therefore stated:

Considering that the question of the form which the Yearbook might take in future years should be given further consideration, provided that nothing in this resolution should be interpreted as postponing the publication of Yearbooks at present in preparation;

The Council:

Requests the Commission on Human Rights to examine this question in the light of the discussions at the tenth session of the Council, and Decides that in all publications of the Yearbook, texts of basic laws on human rights in respect of Non-Self-Governing and Trust Territories should be included in the same manner as may be done in respect of self-governing territories.

At its sixth session, held from 27 March to 19 May 1950, the Commission on Human Rights considered resolution 275 C (X) of the Council and discussed in some detail the form and character of the Yearbook. It was felt that, without losing its present form and character as an annual work of reference, the Yearbook could be of greater use to Governments and experts and could also reach a wider public if it devoted less space to reproduction of original texts and treated in each volume the application, in as many countries as possible, of a particular right or group of closely-related rights set forth in the Universal Declaration—on the basis of material to be supplied by Governments. The Yearbook should contain references to, summaries of, and (in cases of special importance), quotations from new constitutions and statutory provisions, national legislation, court decisions and international instruments concerning human rights; it should, however, avoid the reproduction of material otherwise available to experts.

A draft resolution adopted by the Commission (E/1681, Annex IV) asked the Council to request the Secretary-General to continue annually the compilation and the publication of the Yearbook and that it should be compiled along the lines indicated, beginning as soon as possible, but not later than with the Yearbook for 1951. The Yearbook, the Commission further recommended, should also include texts or summaries of basic laws on human rights in respect of Non-Self-Governing and Trust Territories.

Consideration was given to the recommendations of the Commission by the Council at its eleventh session, at the 142nd and 143rd meetings of the Social Committee on 19 July, and at the 404th plenary meeting on 9 August 1950.

The Social Committee accepted the substance of the Commission's recommendations, but, in addition to drafting changes, adopted: (1) an Australian oral amendment, adopted by 10 votes to 2, with 2 abstentions, to have the Secretary-General's plan indicating which right or group of rights should be treated each year considered by the Commission; and (2) a United States amendment, adopted by 12 votes to none, with 2 abstentions, adding a paragraph to invite Governments to supply the Secretary-General, at the request of the Commission on Human Rights, with the relevant information on the points noted in the resolution, either directly or through correspondents appointed for this purpose. It was also decided to include, in respect of Non-Self-Governing and Trust Territories, not only basic laws, but also other relevant texts, in the same manner as for independent countries. The draft resolution recommended by the Social Committee (E/1613) was adopted unanimously and without discussion by the Council as resolution 303 H (XI). It read as follows:

The Economic and Social Council,

Having requested the Secretary-General, in its resolution 2/9 [Section 4, paragraph (a)] of 21 June 1946 to make arrangements for the compilation and publication of a Yearbook on Law and Usage relating to Human Rights;

Having considered the reports of the fifth and sixth sessions of the Commission on Human Rights relating to the question of the Yearbook;

Having considered the Yearbooks on Human Rights for 1946, 1947 and 1948 compiled and published by the Secretary-General;

Requests the Secretary-General to continue annually the compilation and publication of the Yearbook on Human Rights which, beginning as soon as possible but not later than with the Yearbook for 1951, shall be compiled on the following general lines:

(a) Each volume of the Yearbook shall contain a compilation concerning the application, and so far as necessary, the evolution in as many countries as possible of one of the rights or of a group of closely related rights set forth in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. This compilation shall be prepared from information supplied by Governments and may include digests of this information prepared by the Secretary-General and shall be documented by reference to legislative enactments and other authoritative sources;

(b) For this purpose, the Secretary-General shall draw up a plan for the consideration of the Commission on Human Rights indicating, for a number of years ahead, which right or group of rights should be treated in each year;

(c) The Yearbook shall continue to record international and national developments concerning human rights which have taken place during the year, and for this purpose shall contain:

(i) A report on the work of the United Nations in the field of human rights;

- (ii) Relevant texts or summaries of international instruments in this field, including decisions of international courts and arbitral tribunals;
- (iii) Texts or summaries of or sufficient references to constitutional and statutory provisions which constitute important developments in the field of human rights during the year;
- (iv) Summaries of or sufficient references to decisions of national courts where these decisions constitute important developments in the field of human rights;

(d) The Yearbook shall also include texts or summaries of, or sufficient references to, basic laws on human rights in respect of Non-Self-Governing and Trust Territories, together with other relevant texts in respect of such territories in the same manner as indicated in paragraph (c) above;

(e) The Yearbook shall include adequate references to the sources of any texts or summaries which appear in it. It shall be produced in a form which is easy to handle and at a moderate price, and the reproduction of constitutional or statutory texts shall be confined within the limits imposed by these requirements; and Invites Governments to supply to the Secretary-General, either directly or through correspondents appointed for this purpose at the request of the Commission on Human Rights, relevant information on the points noted above.

While discussing the Yearbook, the Council also considered a recommendation of the Sub-Commission on Freedom of Information and of the Press that a special section should be included in the Yearbook, which would contain excerpts from or summaries of new national legislation concerning freedom of information, to be furnished to the Secretary-General by the correspondents appointed by Governments. The Council, however, decided not to include a special section on freedom of information.

The Yearbook on Human Rights for 1948, which appeared in 1950, expanded the scope of the Yearbooks for 1946 and 1947, and introduced a number of new features. Part I of the Yearbook contained all constitutional provisions on human rights promulgated throughout the world during 1948 and legislative texts enacted in that year, with a selection of constitutional and legislative provisions relating to electoral law. International treaties and agreements recorded in Part II included basic agreements of specialized agencies, agreements concluded under the auspices of specialized agencies or by other inter-governmental organizations, regional treaties, and agreements and bilateral treaties. Part III reflected the expanded programme of the United Nations in a diverse range of human rights activities, including the action taken during 1948 in connexion with the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the Convention on the Prevention and the Punishment of the Crime of Genocide. Two chapters recorded the preliminary developments in the preparation of the Draft International Covenant on Human Rights and measures of implementation. Other chapters dealt with United Nations activities in the fields of freedom of information, the status of women, the prevention of discrimination and the protection of minorities, questions of human rights in certain territories and some specific questions involving stateless persons, the right of asylum, trade union rights, old age rights, the rights of the child and suppression of traffic in women and children.

3. Communications Concerning Human Rights

At its fifth session, held from 9 May to 20 June 1949, the Commission on Human Rights recommended¹¹¹ certain amendments to paragraphs (a), (b) and (e) of Council resolution 75 (V), concerning the procedure for dealing with communications relating to human rights (E/1371).

These proposals were considered by the Council at its tenth session, and adopted at the 119th meeting of the Social Committee on 13 February by 13 votes to none, with 3 abstentions, and at the 354th plenary meeting on 17 February without objection, as resolution 275 B (X).

Under the amended paragraphs (a) and (b) adopted by the Council, the Secretary-General was requested to compile two lists of communications concerning human rights: (a) a non-confidential list containing a brief indication of the substance of each communication, however addressed, dealing with the principles involved in the promotion of universal respect for and observance of human rights, the identity of the authors of such communications to be divulged unless they wished their names to remain confidential; and (b) a confidential list containing a brief indication of the substance of other communications concerning human rights, however addressed, this list to be furnished to members of the Commission, in private meeting, without divulging the identity of the authors of such communications, except in cases where they had stated that this had already been done or that they had no objection to their names being divulged. The amendment to paragraph (e) provided that in the future the Secretary-General would furnish each Member State concerned with a copy of any communication concerning human rights which referred explicitly to such State or to territories under its jurisdiction, without divulging the identity of the author as provided for in paragraph (b) above.

At its sixth session, held from 27 March to 19 May 1950, the Commission on Human Rights took note of the lists of communications on human rights prepared by the Secretary-General in accordance with Council resolution 75 (V), as amended by resolution 275 B (X) (E/CN.4/CR.14 & Add.1; E/CN.4/CR.16 & Add.1).

The Commission also took note of Council resolution 240 C (IX), relating to the establishment of a procedure by which the Sub-Commission on Freedom of Information and of the Press¹¹² would deal with communications concerning freedom of information. It noted, also, the recommendations of its Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities on the handling of petitions, but was of the opinion that until the Commission had decided upon measures of implementation of the International Covenant on Human Rights, it would be premature to sanction any procedure for dealing with complaints or petitions by a Sub-Commission other than at present in force for dealing with communications concerning human rights (E/1681).

4. Human Rights Day

At the fifth session of the General Assembly, the United States proposed (A/C.3/L.102), at the 315th meeting of the Third Committee on 16 November 1950, that Governments of Member States designate 10 December of each year as United Nations Human Rights Day and observe this day in recognition of the adoption of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights by the General Assembly on 10 December 1948. The United States draft resolution requested that the anniversary of this event be "appropriately celebrated in all countries as part of a common effort to bring the Declaration to the attention of the peoples of the world."

The Third Committee also had before it, at its 315th meeting, a memorandum by the Secretary-General regarding the steps which 42 countries had taken the previous year to celebrate the adoption of the Universal Declaration. The report reproduced a letter sent by the Secretary-General to Member States on 20 October 1950, asking them to set aside 10 December every year in comin memoriam of its proclamation. The representative of the United States, introducing the draft resolution, said that its aim was to have this request backed by a formal recommendation by the General Assembly.

General support for the United States draft resolution was expressed by members of the Committee, including the representatives of China, Dominican Republic, Guatemala, Lebanon, Mexico and the USSR. During the discussion at the 315th and 316th meetings of the Committee on 16 November, however, several representatives sought to widen the scope of the draft resolution and to extend its application.

In addition to a number of proposed drafting changes, the following suggestions were made:

(1) The representative of China, stating that he considered it important not only to recall the anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights but also to encourage Governments and peoples to pursue their efforts to make the Declaration a living reality, proposed orally that the Secretary-General should be asked to report each year to the General Assembly on steps taken in various countries to publish the Declaration as widely as possible. This suggestion was supported by the representative of the United Kingdom and accepted by the United States at the 315th meeting.

(2) An addition to the preamble of the draft resolution, which would emphasize that the General Assembly considered the Declaration marked a distinct step forward in the march of human progress, was proposed orally by the representative of the Philippines and adopted, by 41 votes to none, with 9 abstentions, at the 315th meeting.

(3) An oral amendment by the representative of Afghanistan, who said that States which were not Members of the United Nations had also helped to make the Declaration known throughout the world and that the preamble should express special appreciation of the efforts of those countries, was adopted at the 315th meeting, by 19 votes to 2, with 14 abstentions.

(4) The representative of Mexico suggested at the 315th meeting that, instead of making a recommendation only to Member Governments, the draft resolution should also invite non-member States to adopt 10 December as Human Rights Day. This suggestion was accepted by the United States.

(5) Some representatives, including those of Chile, France and Greece, urged the further extension of the draft resolution to make it applicable to organizations. This was accepted by the United States at the 316th meeting and, when a separate vote on this addition was called for by the representative of Canada, was adopted by 20 votes to 12, with 16 abstentions.

(6) An oral amendment by the USSR to the draft resolution, seeking to make 24 October each year Human Rights Day, on the ground that a celebration honouring both the Declaration and the Charter would give added meaning to United Nations Day, was rejected at the 316th meeting, by 24 votes to 9, with 12 abstentions.

The draft resolution as amended was adopted by the Committee at the 316th meeting on 16

November 1950, by 44 votes to none, with 4 abstentions. The General Assembly, at its 317th plenary meeting on 4 December 1950, accepted an amendment to the last paragraph of the resolution, made orally by the representative of Australia. The amendment, which concerned the clause inviting reports from "all States and interested organizations" on the observance of Human Rights Day, sought to eliminate the words "and interested organizations". The amendment was adopted without discussion, by 25 votes to 10, with 19 abstentions, and the draft resolution, as amended, was adopted (resolution 423(V)), also without discussion, by 47 votes to none, with 5 abstentions.

The resolution, as adopted by the General Assembly, read:

The General Assembly,

Considering that on 10 December 1948 the General Assembly proclaimed the Universal Declaration of Human Rights as a common standard of achievement for all peoples and all nations,

Considering that the Declaration marks a distinct forward step in the march of human progress,

Considering that the anniversary of this event should be appropriately celebrated in all countries as part of a common effort to bring the Declaration to the attention of the peoples of the world,

Expressing its appreciation to all those countries Members or non-members of the United Nations which have already celebrated this anniversary,

1. Invites all States and interested organizations to adopt 10 December of each year as Human Rights Day, to observe this day to celebrate the proclamation of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights by the General Assembly on 10 December 1948, and to exert increasing efforts in this field of human progress.

2. Invites all States to report annually through the Secretary-General concerning the observance of Human Rights Day.

5. Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities

a. CONSIDERATION BY THE COMMISSION AT ITS SIXTH SESSION

The Commission on Human Rights, at its sixth session held from 27 March to 19 May 1950, considered the reports of the second and third sessions of its Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities (E/CN.4/351 & Corr.1 & 2 & E/CN.4/358), held in June 1949 and January 1950 respectively.

It considered in particular the recommendations made by the Sub-Commission concerning:

(a) a request for information from Governments relating to legal measures to prevent discrimination and protect minorities;

(b) educational measures for the prevention of discrimination;

(c) a definition of minorities for the purposes of protection by the United Nations, and interim measures to be taken for their protection (E/1681).

With regard to question (a), the Commission asked the Council to request the Secretary-General to invite Governments of Members of the United Nations, as well as of non-members, to supply:

(i) examples (with appropriate citations, where possible) of legislation, judicial decisions, and other types of action which have been found to be specially useful in their countries in preventing discrimination in one or more fields covered by the Universal Declaration of Human Rights;

(ii) full information regarding the protection of any minority within their jurisdiction by legislative measures and in the light of the provisions of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights;

(iii) in particular, such information as could serve for the establishment of a definition of minorities. The Commission also asked that the information received in response to this invitation should be distributed to the members of the Sub-Commission prior to its fourth session.

On the question of educational measures, the Commission recommended the adoption by the Council of a resolution which would affirm its conviction that the principal goals of education should be to abolish all forms of discrimination and to eradicate such prejudices as might lead to the commission of any unlawful acts of discrimination. The draft resolution:

(i) drew the attention of Member States to the urgent necessity of taking steps to eliminate all forms of discrimination in the schools;

(ii) emphasized the part which private educational establishments and non-governmental organizations must play in combating prejudice and discrimination;

(iii) referred to the activities of UNESCO, inviting it to give due emphasis to those practical activities in the field of education which are likely to lead to the eradication of prejudice and the elimination of discrimination and, in this connexion, to bear in mind the opportunities of progress afforded by adult educational activities;

(iv) noted with pleasure certain resolutions adopted by UNESCO in 1950 concerning the importance of textbooks and teaching materials, the conduct of educational seminars and the publication and distribution of selected materials from each seminar;

(v) referred to UNESCO's forthcoming statement on race from the viewpoint of present scientific knowledge,¹¹³ and recommended that it should proceed as soon as practicable with the preparation, publication and dissemination of simple and readable books and pamphlets, based on scientific facts, explaining the fallacies of mistaken race theories and religious and other prejudices;

(vi) invited Member States to distribute such books or pamphlets widely among all their peoples, and to disseminate these ideas through their public education programmes.

On question (c), after considering the definition of the term "minority" recommended by the Sub-

Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities, and the interim measures suggested for the protection of minorities, the Commission decided that it was premature to forward these resolutions to the Council. It recognized that the Sub-Commission would consider the protection of minorities by international agreement at its fourth session, when it would have additional information from the Governments of Member States regarding minorities, which it proposed to consider before completing its recommendations for their protection by international agreement. It decided, accordingly, not to forward them to the Council so that the Sub-Commission might use them, if necessary, for the development of its further proposals on minorities, and it drew the attention of the Sub-Commission to the discussions in the Commission.

The Commission on Human Rights, at its sixth session, examined also the study which, in accordance with Council resolution 116 C (VI), had been prepared on the question of the continuing validity of the minorities treaties and declarations (E/CN.4/367). It was felt, however, that the study required careful consideration by Governments, and that the Commission should postpone consideration of the matter until its seventh session. It noted the study, and transmitted it to the Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities for its information.

b. CONSIDERATION BY THE COUNCIL AT ITS ELEVENTH SESSION

Accordingly, at its eleventh session, held from 3 July to 16 August 1950, the Council had before it, in the report of the Commission on Human Rights (E/1681), two draft resolutions, one dealing with legal measures, the other with educational measures for the prevention of discrimination. These two draft resolutions (see above) were considered by the Social Committee at its 141st-145th meetings, from 18-20 July 1950, and at the 404th plenary meeting of the Council on 9 August.

(1) Legal Measures

The draft resolution dealing with legal measures found general support in the Social Committee at its 141st meeting, although some representatives, including those of Belgium and Canada, pointed out that there were countries whose constitutions had for a long time been extremely liberal in the matter of human rights and that in these cases there would be no point in raising problems of discrimination which did not exist. The draft resolution, with certain minor amendments was unanimously adopted by the Committee at the same meeting and by the Council (resolution 303 F (XI)), at its 404th plenary meeting on 9 August 1950, unanimously and without discussion. It was understood that in transmitting the request for information to Governments, the Secretary-General would also send the tentative definition of the term "minority" which the Sub-Commission had suggested.

(2) Educational Measures

In discussing the second draft resolution proposed by the Commission, members of the Council expressed general agreement with the principles expressed in it, but considered that some re-drafting of the resolution was necessary. Suggested revised texts by India (E/AC7/L.47) and Belgium (E/AC7/L.48) were considered by the Social Committee, but a number of representatives felt that the original text was to be preferred, and a drafting committee consisting of the representatives of Belgium, China, India and the United States was appointed. After lengthy discussions on drafting changes, the Committee adopted a revised text in paragraph by paragraph votes, and, as a whole, by 14 votes to none, with 1 abstention.

The representative of China had suggested that some reference should be made in the resolution to the dissemination and promotion of moral values as well as the dissemination of information based on scientific facts. He proposed the insertion of a phrase to have the Council urge UNESCO to base its pamphlets on "generally accepted moral principles" as well as on scientific facts, but this was rejected by the Committee, by 11 votes to 1, with 3 abstentions.

At the Council's 404th plenary meeting, however, Belgium, China and France introduced a joint amendment (E/L.87) to the same effect.

The sponsors of the amendment maintained that, whereas books and pamphlets based on scientific knowledge could help to eliminate the fallacies of racial theories, they alone could not eliminate those fallacies and the other forms of religious and racial prejudice which lead to discrimination. The representatives of Mexico, Peru and the United States supported the joint amendment. It was opposed by a number of representatives, including those of Canada, Denmark, India, Pakistan and the United Kingdom who, however, emphasized that in opposing the amendment, they were not expressing opposition to moral principles. The view was expressed by the representative of Pakistan that the amendment was not only imprecise but could be opposed on other grounds: (1) there were many different concepts of moral principles; (2) morality was itself a kind of prejudice which gave rise to discrimination; and (3) if UNESCO were faced with what it considered to be a conflict between science and generally accepted morality, the amended paragraph would give it no indication of how it should deal with such a conflict. An amendment proposed orally by the representative of Denmark, which sought to define the moral principles referred to as those contained in the Charter of the United Nations and the Declaration of Human Rights, was adopted by the Council, by 10 votes to 3, with 2 abstentions. The Council adopted the amended draft resolution by 12 votes to none, with 3 abstentions.

In this resolution 303 G (XI), the Council stated its belief that education plays a great part in the prevention of discrimination and that positive and lasting results are obtainable in educational establishments. It confirmed its conviction that one of the principal goals of education should be to eliminate all forms of discrimination and to eradicate such prejudices as may lead to the commission of acts of discrimination. It emphasized that considerable assistance might be given by non-governmental organizations and private institutions, and noted with satisfaction the initiative taken in this field by UNESCO in the improving of textbooks and teaching materials, in the conduct of educational seminars, the training of teaching personnel and the preparation of the statement on race from the viewpoint of present scientific knowledge. The resolution contained recommendations to Member States and to UNESCO. It asked the latter to give emphasis to such practical educational activities as are likely to eradicate prejudice and discrimination, bearing in mind the opportunities afforded through adult education, and to undertake, as soon as practicable, the preparation and the widest possible dissemination of information through suitable books and pamphlets based on scientific knowledge as well as general moral principles contained in the Charter of the United Nations and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, and designed to expose fallacies on race theories and to combat prejudices which give rise to discrimination. The Council recommended that Member States should adopt measures to be applied in educational estabishments designed to eliminate discrimination, should distribute the books and pamphlets to be prepared by UNESCO as widely as possible among all their peoples, and should introduce into their educational programmes, in so far as possible, the ideas contained in the books or pamphlets.

6. Trade Union Rights

By resolution 239 (IX), adopted on 2 August 1949 during its ninth session, the Economic and Social Council requested the International Labour Organisation (ILO) to proceed on behalf of the United Nations as well as on its own behalf, with the establishment of a Fact-Finding and Conciliation Commission on Freedom of Association in connexion with the question of safeguarding of trade union rights. By the same resolution, the Council requested the Secretary-General and the Director-General of ILO to consult together with a view to exchanging information and formulating procedures for making the services of the Commission available to the appropriate organs of the United Nations with respect to Members of the United Nations which are not members of ILO. The Council also requested the Secretary-General and the Director-General to report progress to its tenth session.

This progress report on the establishment of the Commission (E/1566) was presented to the Council at its tenth session, held from 7 February to 6 March 1950. The report contained the text of a memorandum by the Director-General of ILO of 17 November 1949, dealing with questions relating to Freedom of Association, which was to be presented to the 110th session of the Governing Body of ILO in January 1950. The report also contained the comments of the Secretary-General on the memorandum.

The report was considered by the Social Committee at its 120th-123rd meetings on 14-15 February and by the Council at its 355th plenary meeting on 17 February, together with comments on the report received from the Governments of Canada, Greece, Lebanon, Netherlands, Pakistan, Philippines, the USSR and the United States of America (E/1605 & Add.1-5), and a note from the International Labour Office (E/1595). The ILO note stated that the Governing Body, after examining proposals and comments at its 110th session, decided on 6 January 1950 to establish the Fact-Finding and Conciliation Commission on Freedom of Association. It stated further that the Governing Body had approved certain arrangements for the working of the Commission and made suggestions, for the consideration of the Council, concerning the manner in which the services of the Commission might be made available to the appropriate organs of the United Nations. The Governing Body, the note reported, had confirmed the terms of reference of the Commission as follows:

It would be open to the Governing Body (of the International Labour Office) to refer to the Commission for impartial examination, any allegations of infringements of trade union rights which the Governing Body, or the Conference acting on the report of the Credentials Committee, considers it appropriate to refer to the Commission for investigation. It would also be open to any Government against which an allegation of the infringement of trade union rights is made to refer such an allegation to the Commission for investigation. The Commission would be essentially a fact-finding body, but would be authorized to discuss situations referred to it for investigation with the Government concerned with a view to securing the adjustment of difficulties by agreement.

The Social Committee, at its 120th meeting on 14 February 1950, heard statements concerning the protection of trade union rights from representatives of the American Federation of Labor (AF of L) and the World Federation of Trade Unions (WFTU), and, at its 121st meeting on the same day, from the representative of the International Federation of Christian Trade Unions.

A draft resolution submitted by the representative of Denmark (E/AC.7/L.10), which expressed approval of the decisions taken by the Governing Body of ILO and sought to define the relationships between the United Nations and ILO in making use of the services of the Commission, came before the Social Committee at its 120th meeting. The draft resolution provided that the Council:

- (1) accept on behalf of the United Nations the services of the Commission as established;
- (2) refer to the Commission, through the Governing Body of ILO, all allegations against ILO member States;
- (3) before acting upon complaints regarding any Member of the United Nations which was not a member of the ILO, seek the consent of the Government concerned, but where such consent was not forthcoming, the Council would consider further action to safeguard the rights relating to freedom of association involved in the case;
- (4) upon receiving such consent it would then transmit to the Commission, through ILO, any complaints regarding Members of the United Nations which were not members of ILO, received from Governments or trade union or employers' organizations which it might consider suitable.

The draft resolution would also recommend that the General Assembly refer complaints regarding trade union rights to the Council for action.

Two amendments were presented to this draft resolution—by Australia (E/AC.7/L.13) and the United States (E/AC.7/L.14). The amendment by Australia sought decisions by the Council that:

(1) the Commission would have jurisdiction to, consider allegations against a country of infringements of trade union rights embodied in international conventions or other agreements to which that country was a party;

(2) the Commission might entertain an allegation against a country only if the country had accepted an obligation in respect of the right said to have been infringed and then only to the extent of the obligation accepted;

(3) countries might notify the Secretary-General or the Director-General of ILO that they would accept the jurisdiction of the Commission in respect of the whole or parts of a convention or agreement to which they were not a party. The United States amendment was concerned chiefly with certain drafting changes.

General support for the amendment submitted by Denmark was expressed by a number of representatives, including the representatives of Belgium, Brazil, Canada, Chile, France, India, Pakistan, Peru, United Kingdom and the United States, though certain reservations were made during the discussions at the 120th-123rd meetings of the Social Committee on 14-15 July 1950. The representative of Australia expressed doubt as to whether the Commission had the authority to enforce trade union rights which had not already been clearly defined and guaranteed by international agreement. Some representatives argued that Member States had accepted obligations to respect trade union rights under the general terms of the Charter, the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and several resolutions of the Assembly and the Council. The representatives of Canada and Chile pointed out that articles 24-34 and, in particular, article 26 of the Constitution of ILO provided that the International Labour Office could hear allegations of failure by States to fulfil their undertakings under international labour conventions. It was also contended that the terms of reference of the Fact-Finding and Conciliation Commission as well as the name of the Commission showed that it was not an instrument of enforcement. Further objection was raised by some representatives that the procedure suggested by the draft resolution would give too much authority to the International Labour Office and would make the function of the Council in these matters that of a forwarding agency. The representatives of India and Belgium were among those who questioned the distinction, drawn by the draft resolution, between States which were members of ILO and those which were not. Most representatives, however, were in favour of accepting the procedure for dealing with cases concerning members and non-members of the ILO, suggested in the draft resolution. The Social Committee, after setting up a drafting Committee to present a joint draft resolution incorporating suggestions and amendments proposed during the discussion, adopted as a whole, at its 123rd meeting on 15 January 1950, by 12 votes to 2, with 1 abstention, a draft resolution (E/1615) which was adopted by the Council at its 355th plenary meeting on 17 February 1950 (see below). At that meeting, the representative of India stated that if a fact-finding and conciliation commission operated in the name of the United Nations, the United Nations should be able to follow the same procedure in considering allegations, whether the States against which the allegations were made were members of the ILO or not. India also felt that the Council could not give the Commission instructions directly, except on the question whether or not it should investigate any particular complaint. He submitted two amendments (E/L.17) which sought decisions on these lines.

The Indian amendments were rejected by 9 votes to 1, with 5 abstentions, and by 10 votes to 1, with 3 abstentions, respectively. An alternative amendment by India (E/L.17), which would have the Council invite the ILO to include in its annual report to the Council adequate details regarding the allegations against ILO members and their disposition was rejected by 8 votes to 4, with 3 abstentions. The Council then adopted, by 12 votes to 1, with 2 abstentions, the draft resolution proposed by the Social Committee.

In this resolution (277(X)), the Council noted with approval the decision taken by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to establish a Fact-Finding and Conciliation Commission on Freedom of Association; it considered that this action corresponded to the intent of Council resolution 239 (IX) and was likely to prove the most effective way of safeguarding trade union rights; it decided to accept, on behalf of the United Nations, the services of the International Labour Office and the Fact-Finding and Conciliation Commission; it decided also to forward to the Governing Body, for its consideration as regards referral to the Commission, all allegations regarding infringement made by trade union organizations against States members of the International Labour Organisation, with special provisions devised for Members of the United Nations which were not members of ILO; it invited ILO to include in its annual report to the United Nations an account of the work of the Commission; it finally recommended that the General Assembly refer allegations regarding trade union rights to the Council for action in accordance with procedures laid down in the resolution.

The Governing Body of ILO, at its 111th session in February-March 1950, noted (E/1659) the decision of the Council and indicated its adoption of measures to implement the Council's decision.

At the eleventh session of the Council, the Agenda Committee had before it communications received, in February, March and May 1950, by the Secretary-General from the World Federation of Trade Unions, from the Central Council of the Trade Unions Confederation of Yugoslavia, from the confederation generale du Travail of France, from the Great Lakes Licensed Officers' Organization-Foreman's Association of America, and from the Secretary of the third Mazdoor Sabha, alleging that trade union rights were being infringed in certain countries (E/C.2/250, E/1648 & Add.1 & 2).

The Council, at its 376th plenary meeting on 3 July 1950, unanimously decided, as proposed by its Agenda Committee (E/1739) that, as the allegations all referred to States which were members of ILO, the item be referred to ILO without discussion.

7. Forced Labour

Concern over charges of forced labour in certain Member States was first expressed at the eighth session¹¹⁴ of the Economic and Social Council and, at the request of the Council (resolution 195(VIII)), the Secretary-General approached Governments to ascertain in what manner they would co-operate in an impartial inquiry. The replies, which were reported to the ninth session of the Council in July and August 1949, did not, the Council felt, appear to provide the conditions under which a commission of inquiry could operate effectively, and the Secretary-General was urged (resolution 237(IX)) to ask Governments which had not yet stated that they would be prepared to co-operate in such an inquiry whether they could so state before the tenth session of the Council.

Accordingly, the Secretary-General reported (E/1587, E/1588 & E/1636) to the Council's tenth session that, in accordance with resolution 237(IX), he had sent further communications to Governments on 14 and 16 September 1949. Twenty-six Member and four non-member States had, up to 27 February 1950, stated that they were prepared to assist the inquiry in some manner.

The Council considered the question at its 365th and 366th plenary meetings on 27-28 February. It heard statements from representatives of the American Federation of Labor (AF of L) and the World Federation of Trade Unions (WFTU). Charges and counter-charges of forced labour in certain countries were made and the view was again expressed that some form of impartial inquiry was desirable.

Members of the Council felt that in general the new answers received showed that the situation had not essentially changed since the Council's ninth session, but they did not wish to delete the item from the agenda. The representative of the United States orally proposed that consideration of the question should be postponed to the Council's twelfth session. The proposal to defer consideration was supported by the representatives of the United Kingdom and Canada. The representative of Mexico suggested that meanwhile the Secretariat might continue its work on the basis of information supplied by Member States so that the Council, when it came to make a recommendation, would be better equipped. The representatives of Belgium, Brazil and Chile spoke in favour of retaining the item on the agenda.

The United States proposal was adopted unanimously by the Council, after a Danish amendment to have the question considered at the Council's eleventh session had been rejected, by 8 votes to 3, with 4 abstentions.

The Commission on Human Rights, at its sixth session from 27 March to 19 May 1950,¹¹⁵ adopted article 5 of the draft International Covenant on Human Rights (E/1681, annex I), which dealt with slavery, servitude and forced labour. Section 3 of the article contained the provision that "no one shall be required to perform forced or compulsory labour". The provision was considered not to preclude the imposition of "hard labour" after a sentence to punishment of this kind by a competent court in countries where such sentences are imposed as punishment for a crime. Moreover, certain cases were cited in the article to which the term "forced or compulsory labour" should not be applied.

At its eleventh session, held from 3 July to 16 August 1950, the Council had before it a communication (E/1671) from the Director-General of the International Labour Office on the discussion of forced labour which had taken place at the 111th session of the Governing Body of ILO, in February-March 1950. The Governing Body had considered the report of its International Organizations Committee, which had recommended that the Governing Body, without waiting for further discussion by the Council, should itself establish an ILO commission to carry out an impartial inquiry into the nature and extent of forced labour. The Committee had considered that the establishment of such a commission should not prejudice the possibility of setting up joint machinery with the United Nations, should the Council subsequently decide in favour of the establishment of a joint commission of inquiry. The Governing Body decided at its 111th session that the record of its discussion should be transmitted to the Council.

A note by the Secretary-General (E/1636/Rev.1), dated 20 June, came before the Council at its eleventh session. It reported that a total of 31 Member States (Argentina, Australia, Belgium, Bolivia, Brazil, Burma, Canada, China, Colombia, Cuba, Denmark, Egypt, Ethiopia, France, Greece, Iceland, India, Iran, Guatemala, Lebanon, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Pakistan, Philippines, Sweden, Syria, Thailand, Turkey, United Kingdom and the United States) and, in addition, six non-member States (Austria, Federal Republic of Germany, Italy, Japan, Nepal and Switzerland) had reported that they were prepared to collaborate in an impartial inquiry or to render assistance in some manner. Five countries (Chile, Saudi Arabia and the Union of South Africa, as well as the non-member States of Ceylon and Finland) had made no comment on the question of an inquiry. The Government of the USSR had reiterated its views as embodied in its proposals submitted to the eighth session of the Council¹¹⁶ and the Byelorussian SSR had supported these. The USSR proposals were for a comprehensive international mission, composed of 110 to 125 representatives of national and international trade union federations, to conduct an inquiry. The Government of Yugoslavia, the Secretary-General reported to the Council, had submitted its own proposals. The Governments of Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia and Iraq had stated that they were unable to co-operate.

The Council discussed the question at its 413th plenary meeting on 15 August 1950. It had before it a joint draft resolution (E/L.104) by the representatives of the United Kingdom and the United States of America, which proposed that the Council invite ILO to participate in the establishment of an ad hoc committee on forced labour to be composed of not more than five independent members, to be appointed jointly by the Secretary-General of the United Nations and the Director-General of ILO. The task of the committee would be:

- (1) to survey the field of forced labour, especially systems of "corrective labour" employed as a means of political coercion or punishment for holding or expressing political views; or which are on such a scale as to constitute an important element in the economy of a given country;
- (2) to assess the nature and extent of this problem at the present time;
- (3) to report to the Council and the Governing Body of ILO.

In the discussion on this joint draft resolution, charges of the existence of forced labour in certain countries which had been made at previous sessions were repeated and new evidence was brought forward to substantiate the accusations.

The representative of Canada said that the main problem confronting the Council was how it could bring nearer the prevention of such examples of forced labour cited during the discussion. He said that the establishment of a committee as proposed in the joint draft resolution should be very carefully considered by Governments, as the Council should not set up machinery of this kind unless it were convinced that such machinery would be effective. In the hope that Member Governments would give the draft resolution careful consideration, he proposed that the Council adjourn its debate on the matter until its twelfth session. The proposal was adopted by 8 votes to none, with 7 abstentions.

At its 113th session in November 1950, the Governing Body of ILO rejected a proposal that it should postpone its decision on the action to be taken on forced labour pending further consideration of the subject by the Economic and Social Council (E/1884). It noted the United Kingdom-United States proposal made at the eleventh session of the Council, expressed its willingness to co-operate in the manner suggested by the proposal, and authorized the Director-General of ILO to co-operate in this manner in the event of its approval by the Council.

8. The Problem of Slavery

Acting upon the request made by the General Assembly in its resolution 278(III) of 13 May 1949, the Economic and Social Council, at its ninth session, decided (resolution 238(IX)) on 20 July 1949 to study the problem of slavery.¹¹⁷ It instructed the Secretary-General, after consultation with the bodies having special competence in this field, to appoint a small ad hoc committee of not more than five experts to survey the field of slavery and other institutions resembling slavery, to assess the nature and extent of these problems and suggest methods for attacking them, as well as an appropriate division of responsibility in connexion with this subject among the various bodies within the framework of the United Nations. It was to report to the Council within twelve months of its appointment. Accordingly, the Secretary-General appointed a committee of four members, which held its first session from 13 February to 23 March 1950.

The Ad Hoc Committee had before it several documents, including several memoranda by the Secretary-General, of which the most important were: one, dealing with the work of the League of Nations for the suppression of slavery (E/AC.33/2), another with the suppression of slavery and the slave trade by means of international agreement (E/AC33/3).

The Committee agreed that first priority should be given to the preparation of the survey which the Council had requested, and decided to submit to Member and non-Member Governments a questionnaire on slavery "and institutions and customs analagous thereto". It drew up and adopted, in closed session, a questionnaire (E/1617) which referred not only to slavery and the slave trade as defined in article 1 of the International Slavery Convention of 1926, but also to several practices which are restrictive of the liberty of the person and which tend to subject that person to a state of servitude, as for instance:

- (1) Serfdom (compulsory and hereditary attachment to land accompanied by obligations to render service to the landlord);
- (2) Traditional forms of involuntary unpaid service exacted by landowners and other employers of labour;
- (3) Debt bondage;
- (4) Pledging and pawning of third persons as security for debt;
- (5) Exploitation of children under the form of adoption;
- (6) Purchase of wives and inheritance of widows by the heir of the deceased husband, involving involuntary subjection of a woman to a man not of her choice;
- (7) Forms of prostitution of women and children involving exercise of ownership over them.

The Committee recommended to the Council (E/1617) that Governments should be asked to reply to the questionnaire by 15 August 1950, and that the Committee should hold a second session in August-September 1950 and a third session in January-February 1951 to consider the information received and to prepare its final report.

To enable the Economic and Social Council to consider the matter at its tenth session, the Ad Hoc Committee submitted an interim report (E/1617) before it had completed its first session. The Council reviewed the interim report at its 372nd-374th plenary meetings from 3-6 March 1950, and although a number of representatives, including those of Belgium, China, France, United Kingdom and the United States, congratulated the Committee on its work in what was generally recognized to be a complicated task, some criticism of the definition of the questionnaire was voiced. It was also pointed out by some representatives, including those of Belgium, France, the United Kingdom and the United States, that questions concerning forced labour and trade union rights were being dealt with as separate items on the agenda of the Council and that they should be considered as distinct from slavery. Opinion on when a subsequent session or sessions of the Ad Hoc Committee should be held was divided: the representatives of Belgium and France felt that the Committee could meet early if it required to do so, the United States representative considered that the Committee should delay meeting in order to have further information at its disposal and the representative of China urged that a decision on this matter be postponed. A United States suggestion, that sessions of the Ad Hoc Committee should be closed sessions, found some support, but certain representatives, including those of France and the United Kingdom, considered that no special instructions on this point need be given to the Committee. On the ground that the views expressed by Council members in favour of closed meetings would be taken into account by the Committee, the United States representative withdrew his proposal.

The Council adopted, with certain drafting amendments, a resolution proposed by the United States (E/L.43). It rejected, by 7 votes to 1, with 6 abstentions, a Peruvian amendment (E/L.44), which would have the Committee resubmit the revised questionnaire to the Council before transmitting it to Governments. In the resolution (276(X)), adopted as a whole at the 374th meeting on 6 March by 13 votes to none, with 2 abstentions, the Council noted that it had examined otherwise, or had referred to other bodies for action or report, such issues as forced labour and trade union rights. It returned to the Ad Hoc Committee the questionnaire on slavery and institutions or customs analagous thereto, with the request that it revise it in the light of the discussions at the tenth session and in keeping with resolution 276(X). It authorized the Committee to transmit the questionnaire, when revised, to the Governments of Members and non-members of the United Nations, subject to resolution 39(I) of the General Assembly.¹¹⁸ It considered that the next session of the Committee should be held not earlier than November 1950, with a view to the submission of a final report to the Council in 1951.

The Ad Hoc Committee duly revised the questionnaire, and asked the Secretary-General to transmit it to Governments with the request that they reply before 1 October 1950.

The Committee also decided that other methods of securing information for the survey should also be used and, for this purpose, approached non-governmental organizations, research institutions, religious organizations and other bodies, as well as individual experts with special knowledge or competence in the field of slavery and other forms of servitude. It also submitted a special request for information to the International Labour Organisation. It assigned to each of its members responsibility for undertaking the survey of conditions of slavery or institutions and customs resembling slavery, in a particular area of the world.

The Committee held preliminary discussions on the other questions it was asked to consider, but did not formulate any final decisions or recommendations pending the collection of adequate information on which to base its survey. It asked the Secretary-General to arrange for a second session to be held in November 1950, principally for the purpose of examining and evaluating the replies received to the questionnaire and the information obtained from the other sources, and of preparing any supplementary requests for information which might be considered necessary. It requested, also, that a third session be scheduled for April-May 1951, for the preparation of the final report to the Council. These requests were contained in the report of the Committee's first session (E/1600), which came before the Council at its eleventh session at the 407th plenary meeting on 11 August 1950.

Members of the Council, generally speaking, recognized the difficulty and the magnitude of the task before the Committee. Several representatives, including those of Belgium, Peru and the United States, expressed the opinion that, in view of the great amount of material which the Committee was attempting to collect, the holding of a session in November might be premature. It was also stated that Governments should be given more time to reply to the questionnaire.

The representative of Peru, accordingly, submitted to the Council an amendment (E/L.96) to the Committee's proposals, seeking to defer until 1951 the meeting of the Committee. By resolution 307 (XI), adopted by 12 votes to none, with 3 abstentions, the Council took note of the Committee's report on its first session and decided that the session of the Committee planned for November 1950 should take place in the first half of 1951. It further requested the Committee to submit its final report to the Council at its thirteenth session.

J. FREEDOM OF INFORMATION

1. Draft Convention on Freedom of Information

a. CONSIDERATION BY THE ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL

The Economic and Social Council, at its tenth session, held from 7 February to 6 March 1950, had before it General Assembly resolution 313-(IV) of 20 October 1949, recommending that the Council should request the Commission on Human Rights to include adequate provisions on freedom of information in the draft International Covenant on Human Rights, taking into account the work done on the draft Convention on Freedom of Information at the United Nations Conference on Freedom of Information and at the third and fourth sessions of the General Assembly.¹¹⁹

At the same time, the Assembly decided to postpone further action on the draft Convention to its fifth regular session, pending receipt of the draft International Covenant on Human Rights, or a progress report on it.

The resolution of the General Assembly came before the Council at its 348th plenary meeting on 13 February 1950. The Council had before it a draft resolution prepared by the Secretary-General (E/1560) on the basis of the Assembly recommendation, which would have the Council transmit the Assembly's resolution to the Commission on Human Rights "for the action contemplated therein". It also had before it a draft resolution by Chile (E/L.4), which would state that the Council, having considered the General Assembly resolution, "requests the Commission on Human Rights to include adequate provisions in the draft International Covenant on Human Rights, taking into account the work done on the draft Convention on Freedom of Information at the United Nations Conference on Freedom of Information and at the third and fourth regular sessions of the General Assembly". A further draft resolution, submitted jointly by France and India (E/L.6), would have the Council instruct the Commission to consider the inclusion in the Covenant on Human Rights of basic principles of freedom of information only, bearing in mind that the action on the draft Convention on Freedom of Information had not yet been completed by the General Assembly. It would also recommend that the Assembly complete its consideration of the draft Covenant as early as possible.

¹¹⁸ This resolution referred to relations between United Nations Members and Spain; see Y.U.N., 1946-47, p. 67.

The sponsors of the joint draft resolution emphasized that the Council should specify to the Commission on Human Rights what action it should take in this respect. It was desirable that a clause restricted to basic principles should be included in the draft Covenant and this action would not prejudice any decision by the General Assembly in respect of the Convention. Among those who spoke in favour of the joint draft resolution were the representatives of Belgium and Iran. The representative of Chile said that he would not press for a vote on his draft resolution.

The representative of the United States, on the other hand, opposed the joint draft resolution, stating that he felt that the Council should not go beyond its authority in transmitting the resolution by the General Assembly to the Commission on Human Rights and stated that he would sponsor the draft resolution prepared by the Secretary-General (see above). Support for this draft resolution was expressed by the representatives of Australia, Brazil, Canada, Mexico, Pakistan, Peru and the United Kingdom.

The French-Indian joint draft resolution, after a paragraph-by-paragraph vote, was rejected as a whole by 7 votes to 1, with 6 abstentions. The United States draft resolution was then adopted by the Council by 12 votes to 1, with 2 abstentions, at the 348th plenary meeting on 13 February 1950. By this resolution (278(X)), the Council transmitted resolution 313(V) of the General Assembly to the Commission "for the action contemplated therein".

At its sixth session, held from 27 March to 19 May 1950, the Commission on Human Rights considered the resolutions of the General Assembly and the Council, while discussing the article on freedom of information in the draft Covenant on Human Rights. In its report (E/1681), it recommended to the Council that the latter should recommend to the General Assembly to proceed, at its fifth session, with the elaboration of a special convention on freedom of information as a means of ensuring adequately this freedom throughout the world.

When this recommendation was discussed at the Council's eleventh session, at the 139th meeting of the Social Committee on 17 July 1950, it was opposed on the ground that it was for the General Assembly to decide the action it wished to take concerning the draft Convention on Freedom of Information in the light of its consideration of the relevant article in the draft Covenant on Human Rights. This view was expressed by the representatives of the United Kingdom and the United States. The representatives of Brazil, France, India and Mexico, on the other hand, urged the adoption of the recommendation of the Commission, which was composed of experts and competent jurists who had reached the conclusion that the article in the Covenant could not replace the whole Convention on Freedom of Information. The Social Committee decided, by 8 votes to 5, with 1 abstention, to adopt the recommendation of the Commission.

The decision of the Committee, however, was not adopted by the Council at its 404th plenary meeting on 9 August 1950. The representative of the United States expressed the opinion at this meeting that it would be wrong for the Council to impose a particular course of action on the Third Committee of the General Assembly. Similar views were expressed by the delegations of Canada, Chile and the United Kingdom, while the representatives of Brazil, France, India and Mexico urged the adoption of the draft resolution submitted by the Social Committee (E/1808). An oral amendment by the representative of Iran, which sought to avoid the adoption by the Council of a resolution which might prejudge the action of the General Assembly, was debated at some length but was rejected by the Council by 8 votes to 5, with 2 abstentions. The Council also rejected the draft resolution proposed by the Committee by 7 votes to 6, with 2 abstentions. Thus the Council at its eleventh session adopted no resolution with respect to the Draft Convention on Freedom of Information.

b. CONSIDERATION BY THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY

At the fifth session of the Assembly, the draft Convention was considered at the 320th-324th meetings by the Third Committee from 20 to 22 November 1950. The Committee had before it a draft resolution submitted jointly by Chile, Cuba, Egypt, France and the Netherlands (A/C.3/L.110/Rev.1), which would provide for the appointment by the General Assembly of an ad hoc committee consisting of the representatives of fifteen countries to prepare, at a meeting to be held not later than 1 March 1951, a draft convention on freedom of information. It further proposed that the Economic and Social Council be recommended to convene a conference of plenipotentiaries to meet not later than 1 August 1951 with a view to the framing and signature of a Convention on Freedom of Information, based on the draft prepared by the ad hoc committee and on observations solicited from Governments.

During the general debate, the representatives of Afghanistan, Brazil and Mexico expressed the opinion that the drafting of the Convention on Freedom of Information should be proceeded with at the current session of the General Assembly. No formal proposal to that effect was, however, introduced.

The following amendments to the joint draft resolution were submitted:

(1) By the United States (A/C.3/L.113): This amendment proposed that the operative part of the joint draft resolution be deleted, and that the General Assembly decide to postpone further consideration of the draft Convention on Freedom of Information until it had taken definite action on the draft Covenant on Human Rights.

(2) By Lebanon (A/C.3/L.116): This amendment included, among others, the following proposals: (a) to insert a provision requesting the ad hoc committee to report to the Economic and Social Council on the result of its work and to submit recommendations, particularly with regard to the advisability of convening a conference of plenipotentiaries as proposed in the joint draft resolution; (b) to change the wording of a paragraph of the joint draft resolution; and (c) to replace the recommendation for the convening of a conference of plenipotentiaries by a provision recommending the Economic and Social Council to consider the report of the ad hoc committee and "if it thinks fit in the light of the ad hoc committee's recommendations and the observations of Governments" to convene a conference not later than 1 August 1951.

The Committee also had before it sub-amendments to the Lebanese amendment by Mexico (A/C.3/L.117). They proposed the deletion of the request to the ad hoc committee to submit recommendations to the Economic and Social Council with regard to the advisability of convening a conference. It was proposed to delete the words "if it thinks fit in the light of the ad hoc committee's recommendations and the observations of Governments" and to change the wording of the amendment to the effect that the draft resolution should take into account the possibility of several drafts being prepared by the ad hoc committee.

Two sub-amendments by Chile were accepted by the representative of Lebanon. The first sub-amendment would have the Economic and Social Council take into consideration, also, the General Assembly's wish that one or more conventions to ensure freedom of information in the world should be adopted as soon as possible (A/C.3/L.116/Rev.1). The second Chilean sub-amendment proposed orally was to change the timing of the proposed conference from "not later than 1 August 1951" to "as soon as possible and not later than 1 February 1952".

The sponsors of the joint draft resolution urged its adoption to avoid further postponement of action on this question, which had been delayed by various obstacles, including the failure to agree on an appropriate method for guaranteeing freedom of information.

The representative of France considered that the absence of a convention in the field of freedom of information, one of the essential democratic freedoms, might have serious consequences. It would be desirable for the draft Covenant on Human Rights to cover all aspects of freedom of information, but the question was undoubtedly a complex one and could not be dealt with in a single article. The Commission on Human Rights had itself decided that a provision on freedom of information in the draft Covenant would not suffice to settle the problem and that a convention was essential. In the opinion of the representative of Cuba the effect of the adoption of the United States amendment would be to postpone the question indefinitely. The representative of Lebanon also urged that the study of the draft convention should not be postponed again.

The representative of the United States, on the other hand, stating that the draft Convention on Freedom of Information was closely related to the draft Covenant on Human Rights, expressed the view that since the Commission had not yet completed the draft Covenant, no final decision on the draft Convention could yet be taken. The United States delegation considered that a decision should be taken as to the form of the article on freedom of information in the draft Covenant before consideration was given to the drafting of a convention.

The debate which followed in the Third Committee showed a division of opinion among Members as to whether it was desirable to proceed with consideration of the draft Convention on Freedom of Information before the completion of the draft Covenant on Human Rights, which would contain an article on freedom of information. Support for the joint draft resolution or the amendments to the joint draft resolution submitted by Lebanon and Chilean and Mexican sub-amendments to the Lebanese amendment was voiced by the representatives of El Salvador, Ethiopia, India, Poland, Saudi Arabia, Turkey, Union of South Africa and Yugoslavia, though in many cases reservations were made in respect of certain aspects. Among representatives who spoke in favour of the United States amendment, on the other hand, were those of Australia, Canada, Greece, New Zealand and the United Kingdom.

At the 322nd meeting of the Committee on 21 November 1950 the United States amendment was rejected, by roll-call vote of 25 to 14, with 10 abstentions, and the Committee then voted, paragraph by paragraph, on the joint draft resolution and the amendments.

The Committee decided not to adopt either of the Mexican amendments to the Lebanese amendment. In a roll-call vote on the first amendment proposed by Mexico, there were 17 votes in favour and 17 against, with 15 abstentions. The Committee rejected, by 23 votes to 18, with 6 abstentions, the second Mexican proposal. It decided, however, to adopt each of the three parts of the Lebanese amendment to the joint draft resolution—by a roll-call vote of 25 to 13, with 11 abstentions; by 46 votes to none, with 3 abstentions; and by 31 votes to 8, with 8 abstentions, respectively. It adopted the unamended parts of the joint draft resolution, paragraph by paragraph, by votes ranging from 41 votes to 2, with 6 abstentions, to 30 votes to 1, with 17 abstentions.

After voting on the joint draft resolution and the amendments, it was pointed out by the Chairman that the committee would have to decide on the membership of the proposed ad hoc committee before it could vote on the draft resolution as a whole.

At its 323rd meeting on 22 November 1950, the Committee took two secret ballots to determine the composition of the Committee referred to in the draft resolution. As a result of the first ballot, the following Member States obtained the required majority: Cuba, Egypt, France, India, Lebanon, Mexico, the Netherlands, the Philippines, the USSR, the United Kingdom and the United States. At the second ballot, the following Member States obtained the required majority: Ecuador, Pakistan, Saudi Arabia and Yugoslavia. When the names of these fifteen States had been inserted in the draft resolution, it was adopted as a whole by a roll-call vote of 35 votes to none, with 15 abstentions.

The resolution adopted by the Committee was adopted by the General Assembly (resolution 426(V)) at its 325th plenary meeting on 9 August 1950, without discussion, by 44 votes to none, with 12 abstentions. It read:

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolution 313(IV) of 20 October 1949, the recommendation of the sixth session of the Commission on Human Rights regarding freedom of information and the discussion concerning that recommendation at the eleventh session of the Economic and Social Council,

Considering that freedom of information and the Purposes of the United Nations are indivisible,

1. Appoints a Committee consisting of the representatives of the following fifteen countries: Cuba, Ecuador, Egypt, France, India, Lebanon, Mexico, the Netherlands, Pakistan, the Philippines, Saudi Arabia, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, the United States of America and Yugoslavia, which shall meet at the Headquarters of the United Nations as soon as possible, but not later than 1 March 1951, to prepare a draft Convention on Freedom of Information, taking into consideration the draft approved by the United Nations Conference on Freedom of Information held at Geneva from 23 March to 21 April 1948; the text voted during the second part of the third session of the General Assembly; article 14 of the provisional text of the draft First International Covenant on Human Rights; and the observations contained in the summary records of the meetings of the Third Committee dealing with the question;

2. Requests the Committee to report to the Economic and Social Council at its thirteenth session on the results of its work and to submit recommendations, in particular, with regard to the advisability of convening a conference of plenipotentiaries with a view to the framing and signature of a Convention on Freedom of Information;

3. Requests the Secretary-General to submit the Committee's report, together with the draft or drafts of the Convention prepared by the Committee, to the various governments concerned for their consideration;

4. Invites the governments so consulted to transmit their suggestions and observations to the Secretary-General by 15 June 1951;

5. Recommends the Economic and Social Council to consider the Committee's report at its thirteenth session and if it thinks fit, in the light of the Committee's recommendations and the observations of governments, and also taking into consideration the General Assembly's wish that one or more conventions to ensure freedom of information in the world should be adopted as soon as possible, to convene a conference of plenipotentiaries to meet as soon as possible and not later than 1 February 1952, with a view to the framing and signature of a Convention on Freedom of Information, based on the draft or drafts prepared by the above-mentioned Committee and on the observations of governments.

2. The Adequacy of News and Obstacles to the Free Flow of Information

At its fourth session, held in Montevideo from 15-26 May 1950, the Sub-Commission on Freedom of Information and of the Press discussed and made recommendations to the Council relating to the adequacy of news available to the peoples of the world and the obstacles to the free flow of information to them. These recommendations concerned, in particular:

- (1) interference with radio signals;
- (2) freedom of information in a state of emergency;
- (3) dissemination of information through newsreels;
- (4) agreements between Governments and the United Nations and the specialized agencies concerning free access of news personnel and their families to countries where meetings of the United Nations and the agencies are held;
- (5) the supply of newsprint;
- (6) discrimination against foreign news personnel.

These recommendations were discussed by the Council at its eleventh session, at the 135th to 139th meetings of the Social Committee, 12-17 July, and at the 405th plenary meeting on 9 August 1950.

The first two of these questions were also considered by the General Assembly at its fifth session, at the 317th to 319th meetings of the Third Committee on 17-18 November and at the 325th plenary meeting on 14 December 1950.

a. INTERFERENCE WITH RADIO SIGNALS

(1) Recommendation of the Sub-Commission

In a resolution on this subject, the Sub-Commission stated that it considered that duly authorized radio-operating agencies in the USSR were deliberately interfering with the reception, by the people of the USSR, of certain radio signals originating beyond the territory of that country. It declared these types of interference to be a violation of the accepted principles of freedom of information; condemned all measures of this nature as a denial of the right of all persons to be fully informed concerning news, opinions and ideas regardless of frontiers; and requested the Council to transmit the resolution to the General Assembly, recommending that it should call upon the Governments of all Member States to refrain from such interference with the right of their peoples of freedom of information.

(2) Discussion in the Council at Its Eleventh Session

The Council's Social Committee in discussing this recommendation had before it an amendment to the Sub-Commission's draft proposed by India (E/AC.7/L.33) which, in the preamble, would, among other things, refer to interference by "duly authorized radio operating agencies in certain countries" with radio signals from abroad and, in the operative part would declare such interference a violation of the accepted principles of freedom of information and condemn all measures of this kind as a denial of the right of all persons to be fully informed concerning news, opinions and ideas regardless of frontiers. A sub-amendment by the United States (E/AC.7/L.42) sought to add a paragraph to the Indian amendment to provide for the transmission to the General Assembly the records of the Council's discussions on the subject. An Australian amendment (E/AC.7/L.40), suggested the deletion of the paragraph of the Sub-Commission's resolution condemning the practice of interference as a violation of the accepted fundamental human right of all persons to be fully informed.

In the Committee's discussion, various representatives, including those of France, India and Pakistan, urged that it was inappropriate to make specific mention in such a resolution of a particular Member State; the opposing view was expressed by the United States representative. The majority view was that this reference in the Sub-Commission's resolution should be deleted, and the Indian amendment was put to the vote, paragraph by paragraph. The United States sub-amendment to the Indian amendment was unanimously adopted and the Indian proposal, as amended, was adopted, as a whole, by 11 votes to none, with 2 abstentions. The Committee, accordingly, did not vote on the resolution proposed by the Sub-Commission or the Australian amendment to it.

When the Council considered the draft resolution of the Committee (E/1785, draft resolution B) at its 405th plenary meeting on 9 August 1950, the representative of the United Kingdom said that, in the opinion of his delegation, the question of interpretation of the International Telecommunication Convention, referred to in the draft resolution (see below), was a matter which fell within the competence of the International Telecommunication Union (ITU) and should not be included in a Council resolution. He requested, therefore, that a separate vote should be taken on that particular paragraph. This view was opposed by the representative of the United States, who stated that to delete the paragraph would greatly weaken the draft resolution. He emphasized that ITU had an agreement with the United Nations and that the Atlantic City Convention was an important instrument and basic to the orderly development of international communications.

The paragraph referred to was put to the vote separately and adopted by the Council by 12 votes to 2, with 1 abstention. Part B of the resolution, as a whole, was adopted unanimously by the Council (resolution 306 B (XI)), as follows:

Whereas the General Assembly in its resolution 59(I) authorizing the holding of the United Nations Conference on Freedom of Information declared that freedom of information is a fundamental human right and is the touchstone of all the freedoms to which the United Nations is consecrated,

Whereas freedom to listen to radio broadcasts regardless of source is embodied in article 19 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, which reads: "Everyone has the right to freedom of opinion and expression" and whereas this right includes freedom to hold opinions without interference and to seek, receive and impart information and ideas through any media and regardless of frontiers,

Whereas article 44 of the International Telecommunication Convention, Atlantic City, 1947, provides that "All stations whatever their purpose, must be established and operated in such a manner as not to result in harmful interference to the radio service or communications of other members or associate members . . . [and that] Each member or associate Member undertakes to require the private operating agencies which it recognizes, and the other operating agencies duly authorized for this purpose, to observe the provisions of the preceding paragraph," and

Considering that the duly authorized radio operating agencies in some countries are deliberately interfering with the reception by the people of those countries of certain radio signals originating beyond their territories,

Declares this type of interference to be a violation of the accepted principles of freedom of information; condemns all measures of this nature as a denial of the right of all persons to be fully informed concerning news, opinions and ideas regardless of frontiers;

Transmits to the General Assembly the records of the discussion on this subject in the Council; and Recommends to the General Assembly that it call upon all Member Governments to refrain from such interference with the right of their peoples to freedom of information.

When it considered the report of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO), the Economic and Social Council, at its 405th plenary meeting on 9 August 1950, adopted resolution 331 B (XI), by which it requested the Secretary-General to prepare for the Council, in collaboration with the Director-General of UNESCO, a report delimiting the respective activities of the United Nations and of UNESCO, with a view to their co-ordination, in particular comparing the terms of reference and programme of the Sub-Commission on Freedom of Information and of the Press with the constitution and programme of UNESCO.¹²⁰

(3) Discussion in the General Assembly at Its Fifth Session

The Council's resolution 306 B (XI) was considered by the Assembly at the 317th-319th meetings of the Third Committee on 17-18 November and at the 325th plenary meeting on 14 December.

The representative of Chile submitted a draft resolution (A/C.3/L112), whereby the General Assembly would adopt as its own the declaration in the Council's resolution and invite the Governments of all Member States to refrain from interference of the kind mentioned.

During the debate in the Committee, charges and counter-charges concerning interference with radio signals were made by a number of representatives, including those of the Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, Poland, the Ukrainian SSR and the USSR on one hand, and Cuba, Lebanon, the United Kingdom, the United States and Yugoslavia on the other. The representative of Chile, urging the adoption of his draft resolution, recalled that in 1947 the General Assembly had adopted resolution 110 (II)¹²¹ condemning all propaganda likely to jeopardize friendly relations among nations. The First Committee had reiterated (A/1532) that condemnation by its adoption, by 43 votes to none, with 8 abstentions, of a draft resolution condemning all propaganda against peace, and recommending the free exchange of information and ideas.¹²² Moreover to comply with resolution 290(IV),¹²³ and to meet the request of the Sub-Commission on Freedom of Information and of the Press which had been endorsed by the Economic and Social Council, the Third Committee was, he considered, bound to condemn the policy of interference and to submit a draft resolution to that effect to the General Assembly. Such action was also dictated by the need to protect the work of the United Nations for peace. All propaganda against peace and all information capable of disturbing friendly relations among people should, he considered, be condemned. Similar views were expressed by the representatives of Afghanistan and Egypt, who supported the principle of a resolution which would be couched in general terms and could be regarded as being in the true interests of freedom of information.

Oral amendments to the Chilean draft resolution (A/C.3/L.112) were submitted jointly by the representatives of India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Mexico, the Philippines and Saudi Arabia. In submitting these amendments to the Committee the representative of Saudi Arabia said that the reason for submitting these amendments, as he had been able to ascertain from personal experience, was that the major Powers employed radio broadcasting for propaganda purposes. The smaller nations, he said, did not want to become involved in any ideological struggle, whatever its nature. If the Third Committee and the General Assembly decided to request the major Powers to endeavour to disseminate their culture, art and literature and refrain from insisting upon their political interests, a great service would be rendered to the cause of peace. The joint oral amendments proposed to add a paragraph to the preamble which would have the General Assembly declare that it considered peace amongst nations rested on the goodwill of all peoples and Governments and that tolerance and understanding were prerequisites for establishing goodwill in the international field. It would also add to the operative part of the Chilean draft a paragraph which would have the Assembly invite all Governments "to refrain from such radio broadcasts as would offend the sensibilities of the peoples everywhere and in so doing conform strictly to an ethical conduct in the interests of world peace by reporting facts truly and objectively".

Some members of the Committee pointed out that as a result of the joint oral amendments two separate aspects of the question were now under consideration—interference with radio signals and the actual nature of radio broadcasts—though others considered the two matters interrelated. Some representatives were in favour of a single resolution embracing both aspects, others felt that they should be dealt with separately.

The representative of Chile, however, accepted the joint oral amendments in respect of the preamble. He criticized the phrasing of the amendment to the operative part of the draft resolution as being too vague and not strong enough to condemn any broadcasts but was willing to incorporate in it the phrase "that would mean unfair attacks or offensive slanders against other peoples anywhere" in place of the words "as would offend the sensibilities of peoples everywhere". He also proposed the addition to his draft resolution of a paragraph which would have the General Assembly also invite Member States to give every possible facility so that the people might know objectively the activities of the United Nations in promoting peace and, in particular, to facilitate the reception and transmission of the United Nations official broadcasts.

Following the acceptance by the representative of Chile of the suggested amendments, the Committee considered various suggestions for drafting changes. It rejected, by 16 votes to 13, with 15 abstentions, a Saudi Arabian proposal to reinsert in the designation of the types of broadcasts from which the General Assembly would invite all Governments to refrain, those broadcasts which would offend the susceptibilities of peoples anywhere. It also rejected by 12 votes to 8, with 22 abstentions, a Lebanese oral amendment to add a paragraph, having the General Assembly invite the Governments of all Member States to take the necessary steps within their competence to prevent the diffusion of false or distorted reports likely to injure friendly relations between States.

The Committee then voted on the amended Chilean draft resolution, paragraph by paragraph. The first two operative paragraphs of the draft resolution were adopted in roll-call vote by 38 votes to 5, with 1 abstention, and by 36 votes to 5, with 3 abstentions, respectively. The draft resolution as a whole was adopted by the Committee at its 319th meeting on 18 November 1950, by 39 votes to 5.

The resolution was subsequently adopted (resolution 424(V)) by the General Assembly at its 325th plenary meeting on 14 December, without discussion, by 49 votes to 5. It read as follows:

The General Assembly,

Whereas freedom to listen to radio broadcasts regardless of source is embodied in article 19 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, which reads: "Everyone has the right to freedom of opinion and expression" and whereas this right "includes freedom to hold opinions without interference and to seek, receive and impart information and ideas through any media and regardless of frontiers",

Whereas article 44 of the International Telecommunication Convention, Atlantic City, 1947, provides that "All stations, whatever their purpose, must be established and operated in such a manner as not to result in harmful interference to the radio service or communications of other members or associate members . . . [and that] Each member or associate member undertakes to require the private operating agencies which it recognizes and the other operating agencies duly authorized for this purpose, to observe the provisions of the preceding paragraph",

Considering that the duly authorized radio operating agencies in some countries are deliberately interfering with the reception by the people of those countries of certain radio signals originating beyond their territories, and bearing in mind the discussion which took place in the Economic and Social Council and in the Sub-Commission on Freedom of Information and of the Press on this subject,

Considering that peace among nations rests on the goodwill of all peoples and governments and that tolerance and understanding are prerequisites for establishing goodwill in the international field,

1. Adopts the declaration of the Economic and Social Council contained in its resolution 306 B (XI) of 9 August 1950 to the effect that this type of interference constitutes a violation of the accepted principles of freedom of information;

2. Condemns measures of this nature as a denial of the right of all persons to be fully informed concerning news, opinions and ideas regardless of frontiers;

3. Invites the governments of all Member States to refrain from such interference with the right of their peoples to freedom of information;

4. Invites all governments to refrain from radio broadcasts that would mean unfair attacks or slanders against other peoples anywhere and in so doing to conform strictly to an ethical conduct in the interest of world peace by reporting facts truly and objectively;

5. Invites also Member States to give every possible facility so that their peoples may know objectively the activities of the United Nations in promoting peace and, in particular, to facilitate the reception and transmission of the United Nations official broadcasts.

b. FREEDOM OF INFORMATION IN A STATE OF EMERGENCY

The Sub-Commission on Freedom of Information and of the Press at its fourth session recommended (E/1672) that the Council request the General Assembly to adopt a resolution concerning freedom of information in a state of emergency. Though some criticism of the draft resolution proposed by the Sub-Commission was voiced at the eleventh session of the Council in the Social Committee by the representatives of Australia, Belgium, Chile and France and the resolution was described both as vague and of little force, it was adopted by the Committee without change by 6 votes to 5, with 4 abstentions, at its 137th meeting on 14 July and without discussion by the Council at its 405th plenary meeting on 9 August 1950 by 11 votes to 2, with 2 abstentions, as resolution 306 C (XI).

In this resolution the Council would have the General Assembly declare, in the preamble, that it considered that freedom of information and of the Press was a fundamental human right and should be advanced and safeguarded "in all circumstances" and that limitations had been placed on this right in emergencies or on the pretext of emergencies.

In the operative part of the resolution, the Assembly would recommend to all Members that when they were compelled to declare a state of emergency they should limit freedom of information and of the Press only in the most exceptional circumstances and then only to the extent required by the situation.

The question was considered at the Assembly's fifth session at the 318th meeting of the Third Committee on 17 November 1950. The Committee decided to take as its basic text the Economic and Social Council's draft resolution (306 C (XI)). It agreed, however, at the suggestion of the representative of Egypt to redraft the preamble.

Further drafting changes were adopted on the suggestion of Saudi Arabia and the Philippines. The Committee also adopted by 17 votes to 16, with 11 abstentions, a Saudi Arabian amendment, to delete the words "in all circumstances" from the first part of the preamble. The draft resolution as amended, was adopted by the Committee by 38 votes to 5, with 5 abstentions, and by the General Assembly at its 325th meeting on 14 December 1950, without discussion, by 41 votes to 5, with 2 abstentions, as resolution 425 (V). It read as follows:

The General Assembly,

Considering that freedom of information and of the Press is one of the fundamental freedoms and should be advanced and safeguarded,

Considering that limitations might be placed on this freedom in emergencies or on the pretext of emergencies, Recommends to all Member States that, when they are compelled to declare a state of emergency, measures to limit freedom of information and of the Press shall be taken only in the most exceptional circumstances and then only to the extent strictly required by the situation.

c. NEWSREELS

In a resolution concerning the free circulation of newsreels, the Sub-Commission on Freedom of Information and of the Press at its fourth session (E/1674) proposed that the Council should appeal to all Governments:

(1) to permit movement within their territories of personnel engaged in the gathering, transmission and dissemination of information through the medium of newsreels;

(2) not to seize, impound or otherwise place restrictions or hindrances without justifiable legal cause on newsreel equipment used by them;

(3) not to confiscate or censor newsreels or portions of newsreels unless this was absolutely essential on grounds relating directly to public morals or national defence.

This matter was discussed at the eleventh session of the Council by the Social Committee at its 137th meeting on 14 July and by the Council at its 405th plenary meeting on 9 August 1950.

The Social Committee had before it two amendments to the recommendations by the Sub-Commission: one by Australia (E/AC.7/L.40), another by India (E/AC.7/L.39). The Australian amendment would (1) add the phrase "to the extent compatible with international security" in the appeal to Governments to allow the free movement of personnel; and (2) widen the application of provision dealing with the grounds for confiscation by having the Council appeal to all Governments not to confiscate or censor newsreels except on grounds relating to national security, public order, public morals and decency, the avoidance of blasphemy and the maintenance of friendly international relations. The Indian amendment similarly, would add to the conditions for confiscation grounds relating to the maintenance of cordial international relations.

The representative of Australia stated that the principles contained in his amendment had already been incorporated in the Draft Convention on the International Transmission of News and the Right of Correction,¹²⁴ which had been approved by the General Assembly (resolution 277 C (III)). The representative of India said that if the Australian amendments were accepted, he would withdraw his amendment.

The United Kingdom representative considered it inappropriate for the Council to adopt a resolution singling out one method of collecting and disseminating news when the draft Convention on the International Transmission of News and the Right of Correction already covered all existing methods. He therefore suggested that no action be taken on the Sub-Commission's draft resolution. Support for this view was expressed by the representatives of France and Mexico; the United States representative, on the other hand, supported the Sub-Commission's recommendations. The representative of Mexico drew the attention of the Committee to resolution 17 adopted by the Conference on Freedom of Information, which, he stated, unlike the resolution of the Sub-Commission contained all the basic principles covering the free circulation of newsreels. It recommended Member States to adopt a whole series of practical and economic measures, whereas the Sub-Commission's experts had focussed their attention exclusively on the political aspect of the problem.

The Committee adopted by 9 votes to 2, with 3 abstentions, a United Kingdom proposal that the Committee's report recommend to the Council that, having considered the draft resolution, no action be taken thereon.

This action was endorsed by the Council at its 405th plenary meeting on 9 August 1950.

d. AGREEMENTS WITH THE UNITED NATIONS AND THE SPECIALIZED AGENCIES

The Sub-Commission, in another resolution adopted at its fourth session, referred to the existence of agreements between Governments and the United Nations and between Governments and specialized agencies which made special reference to freedom of access for representatives of Press, radio, film and other information agencies accredited to the United Nations and the specialized agencies. It drew the attention of the Council to the absence of any provisions for facilitating the entry into such countries of the wives and families of accredited news personnel. It pointed out that this situation, especially in the event of long-term assignments, hinders the work of news personnel through hardship and the disruption of families, and it recommended that the Council should take such action as it considered necessary in the circumstances.

The Social Committee noted that the resolution of the Sub-Commission was not drawn up in the form of a draft resolution for adoption by the Council, which was asked to take such action as it considered necessary. As no resolution was formally moved, the Committee agreed, at its 137th meeting on 14 July to take no action, and this decision was endorsed by the Council at its 405th plenary meeting on 9 August 1950.

The Sub-Commission recommended also that a model agreement be drawn up to serve as a basis for future agreements between the United Nations and countries where meetings of the United Nations are held, and between the specialized agencies and such countries. This model agreement would deal with access for news personnel to meetings of the United Nations and its specialized agencies, and would contain provisions for the adequate protection of the rights and privileges of news personnel. It recommended that the Council should request the Secretary-General to prepare the draft of such an agreement to be considered at the fifth session of the Sub-Commission with a view to eventual approval by the General Assembly.

The Social Committee noted at its 137th meeting on 14 July that a similar recommendation had been made previously and had been before the General Assembly at its fourth session. The action which the General Assembly had decided to take was incorporated in its resolution 314 (IV), under which Member States were urged to grant accredited news personnel free access to countries where meetings of the United Nations or specialized agencies or any conferences convened by them were taking place, for the purposes of covering such meetings. The Council therefore at its 405th plenary meeting on 9 August 1950, on the recommendation of the Social Committee, decided to take no action on the recommendation of the Sub-Commission.

e. THE SUPPLY OF NEWSPRINT

A further recommendation by the Sub-Commission on the adequacy of news concerned the sale and purchase of newsprint. It considered that, for economic reasons, serious problems have arisen in various countries with regard to the supplies of newsprint, and that this situation had caused certain Governments to intervene officially in the sale and purchase of newsprint, either by restricting the amount of foreign currency allocated for its importation or by rationing it among the various organs of the Press, or by confiscating it. It considered also that governmental interference in these matters might lead to arbitrary and discriminatory action, which it was desirable to avoid and, further, that one of the functions of the Sub-Commission was to make recommendations to the Council with regard to the economic, political and other obstacles to freedom of the Press. The Sub-Commission accordingly recommended the cessation of these practices in so far as was compatible with the economic situation. It requested the Council to invite Member States to put an end to confiscatory measures and discriminatory actions as being contrary to freedom of the Press.

When this recommendation was considered by the Council at its eleventh session, two amendments were presented to the Social Committee at its 137th meeting on 14 July.

One, submitted by Australia (E/AC.7/L.40), sought to substitute for the reference to the possibility of governmental interference leading to discriminatory action the statement that the Council considered it desirable that governmental action should diminish as the economic situation improved. The Australian amendment also proposed the deletion of the last paragraph, which would have the Council invite all Member States to put an end to confiscatory measures and discriminatory actions as being contrary to the freedom of the Press.

The Australian representative explained that the aim of his amendment was to dispel the impression which might be created by the draft resolution that any restrictions taken on the grounds of economic necessity were automatically wrong and that all Governments were guilty of confiscatory measures and discriminatory actions. He later withdrew his amendment in favour of drafting changes suggested by the United Kingdom representative.

An amendment proposed by France (E/AC.7/L.41) sought to incorporate in the preamble the statement that the Council considered intervention by Governments included regulation of the use by press enterprises of the newsprint placed at their disposal; the representative of France considered the list of restrictive measures incomplete without this addition, pointing out that this method of regulation had been used.

The representative of Mexico said that although his delegation had always held that Governments should not interfere in the distribution of newsprint, it would nevertheless vote against the draft resolution as it did not possess any information or details regarding Governments guilty of the type of interference mentioned.

The changes proposed by the United Kingdom and the French amendment were incorporated in the draft resolution, which was submitted to a paragraph-by-paragraph vote. The Committee agreed by 6 votes to 3, with 5 abstentions, to delete a paragraph of the draft resolution which, the United States representative had said, could be interpreted as justifying discriminatory practices on the ground of economic necessity. The draft resolution, as amended, was adopted as a whole by 12 votes to none, with 3 abstentions, by the Committee at its 137th meeting on 14 July, and by the Council at its 405th plenary meeting on 9 August without discussion, by 13 votes to none, with 2 abstentions. By this resolution (306 D (XI)), the Council, after considering that for economic reasons serious problems had arisen in various countries of the world with regard to the supply of newsprint; that this situation had caused certain Governments to intervene officially in the sale and purchase of newsprint either by restricting the amount of foreign currency allocated for its importation, or by rationing it among the various organs of the Press, or by regulating the use by Press enterprises of the newsprint placed at their disposal; and that governmental interference in these matters had led in certain cases to confiscation or other forms of arbitrary and discriminatory action which it was desirable to avoid, invited the Member States concerned to put an end to such confiscatory measures and discriminatory actions as being contrary to the freedom of the Press.

f. DISCRIMINATION AGAINST FOREIGN INFORMATION PERSONNEL

The last recommendation of the Sub-Commission on the adequacy of news was contained in a resolution which required no action by the Council. The Sub-Commission declared the practice of discriminating against or mistreating foreign information personnel, which exists in certain countries, to be a serious interference with the right of the peoples to freedom of information and condemned it as a violation of the accepted fundamental human rights of all persons to be fully informed.

g. PROPAGANDA AGAINST PEACE AND THE FREE EXCHANGE OF INFORMATION

At its 308th plenary meeting on 17 November, during its discussion of the report of the First Committee (A/1490), the General Assembly adopted without discussion by 49 votes to none, with 7 abstentions, resolution 381 (V). By this resolution, the Assembly reaffirmed its resolutions 110(II) and 290(IV), which condemned all propaganda against peace and recommended the free exchange of information and ideas as one of the foundations of good-neighbourly relations between peoples. The resolution further declared that such propaganda included incitement to conflicts or acts of aggression; measures tending to isolate the peoples from any contact with the outside world, by preventing the Press, radio and other media of communication from reporting international events, and thus hindering mutual comprehension and understanding between peoples; and measures tending to silence or distort the activities of the United Nations in favour of peace or to prevent their peoples from knowing the views of other States Members.¹²⁵

3. Draft International Code of Ethics

The Sub-Commission drew up and adopted a draft international code of ethics, containing a preamble and four articles. It recommended to the Council that it request the Secretary-General (a) to transmit to all Governments this draft code of ethics, together with available texts of existing codes of ethics and other relevant information; (b) to request Governments to refer such working material to information enterprises and professional associations in their respective territories for comment and suggestions, to be returned to the Secretary-General; and (c) to analyse the comments received and to submit them to the fifth session of the Sub-Commission in order that the latter might examine the draft in the light of these comments and adopt a text to be presented to an international professional conference which could be convoked at a later date pursuant to resolution 36 of the United Nations Conference on Freedom of Information.

This recommendation was discussed during the Council's eleventh session at the 138th meeting of the Social Committee on 17 July and at the 405th plenary meeting on 9 August 1950.

The representative of Mexico submitted an amendment (E/AC.7/L.43) in the Social Committee to delete the provisions for transmitting the codes of ethics through Governments. He pointed out that resolution 36 of the United Nations Conference on Freedom of Information stated that it was preferable that journalists should be consulted directly on an international code of ethics and that a conference of international journalists should be convened to see whether an international code of ethics could be adopted.

The Committee also had before it amendments by Australia (E/AC.7/L.40) to provide that the draft international code of ethics should be submitted in the first instance to Governments and, after preliminary consideration by them, should be referred to the national bodies concerned which should be asked, in addition, to comment on the usefulness of such a code. The representative of Australia accepted a modification suggested by the United States representative, by which the Sub-Commission, after its examination of the comments received, would recommend what action it considered desirable.

The representatives of France, the United States, Brazil and India expressed agreement with the view of the representative of Mexico that the question of establishing a code of ethics was, at the present stage of its study, essentially the concern of journalists. The representative of France considered that an international conference might be convened to draw up an international code of ethics if it saw fit, but some Members thought that the drafting of such a code did not alone constitute sufficient reason for calling such a conference, and that the Council should not commit itself at that stage to convening one.

The Committee agreed, by 9 votes to 2, with 4 abstentions, to incorporate in the Mexican amendment that part of the Australian amendment requesting from professional associations to comment on the usefulness of such a code, and adopted the first part of the Mexican amendment, as amended, by 13 votes to none, with 1 abstention. The first part of the Australian amendment, which would have the code submitted first to Governments was rejected by 9 votes to 2, with 4 abstentions. The paragraph referring to recommendations by the Sub-Commission was adopted, with amendments suggested by the United States, by 12 votes to none, with 2 abstentions.

The resolution as a whole, as amended, was adopted by 12 votes to none, with 2 abstentions. At its 405th plenary meeting on 9 August, the Council adopted the resolution with certain drafting changes, by 13 votes to none, with 2 abstentions, as resolution 306 E (XI). In this resolution the Council decided to request the Secretary-General to communicate to information enterprises and national and international professional associations, for comment and suggestions (including comments on the usefulness of such a code) the draft international code of ethics formulated by the Sub-Commission on Freedom of Information and of the Press, together with the relevant section of its report. It requested him also to analyse the comments received, and submit them to the Sub-Commission, at its fifth session, in order that it might re-examine the draft in the light of these comments and recommend any further action it might deem necessary, including the possibility of convening an international professional conference.

4. Other Recommendations of the Sub-Commission

a. WAR PROPAGANDA AND FALSE REPORTS

On the question of war propaganda and false and distorted reports, the Sub-Commission at its fourth session adopted a resolution asking the Secretary-General to submit to its fifth session a full report on the measures or actions taken by Governments pursuant to resolutions 2 and 3 of the United Nations Conference on Freedom of Information (condemning war propaganda and the spreading of false and distorted reports) on the basis of the information received from Governments on this matter, as well as on the publicity already given these resolutions by the United Nations. This recommendation required no action by the Council.

b. DATA RELATING TO FREEDOM OF INFORMATION

The Sub-Commission recommended to the Council (E/1674) that a special section should be included in the Yearbook on Human Rights¹²⁶ containing excerpts from, or summaries of, new national legislation concerning the freedom of information, to be furnished by correspondents appointed by Governments. The Sub-Commission further requested that the Council should ask the Secretary-General to (a) continue to approach Governments with a view to obtaining regularly from them the new legislative and administrative measures which they may deem it necessary to take with regard to freedom of information and of the Press; (b) in accordance with paragraphs 2 and 3 of Council resolution 240 B (IX), obtain from the enterprises or associations mentioned therein any reports or surveys that they may compile concerning the current status of freedom of information in any part of the world; and (c) compile all pertinent data, analyse all information received, conduct appropriate research and prepare studies thereon for submission to the Sub-Commission on Freedom of Information and of the Press at each session.

This matter was discussed at the Council's eleventh session by the Social Committee at its 138th meeting on 17 July and by the Council at its 405th plenary meeting on 9 August 1950.

The Committee had before it an Australian amendment (E/AC.7/L.40) which would (1) delete the preamble to the resolution; and (2) provide that the suggested addition to the Yearbook on Human Rights should be made in conjunction with the recommendations of the Commission on Human Rights on the Yearbook. The Committee agreed to consider the inclusion of a special section on Freedom of Information in the Yearbook when it considered the Yearbook as a whole.¹²⁷

The United States representative supported the Australian proposal to delete the preamble of the Sub-Commission's draft resolution, but supported the retention of the three sub-paragraphs of the draft resolution as they stood, since, he stated, his delegation considered it most important that the Sub-Commission should keep in touch with the actual situation and deal with practical problems. Support for this view was expressed by the representative of Chile.

The representative of Mexico, on the other hand, said that the information asked for in part of the resolution was fundamentally of a political character. He considered that a harmful precedent might be established by requesting a report from an enterprise or association on the current status of information. He proposed an oral amendment to cover this part.

The representative of Peru suggested that the information from news enterprises or associations should be obtained through Governments, as had been done in the trade union rights.

The Committee adopted by 14 votes to none, with 1 abstention, the Australian proposal to delete the preamble. After separate votes on individual paragraphs, the draft resolution, as amended, and subject to the subsequent decision on the first operative paragraph (referring to information to be included in the Yearbook on Human Rights), was adopted by 9 votes to 4, with 2 abstentions.

When the matter was discussed by the Council at its 405th plenary meeting on 9 August 1950, the United Kingdom representative said that the question of the first paragraph of the resolution was dependent on action by the Council on the Yearbook on Human Rights. The Council had invited Governments to supply information to the Secretary-General on all matters concerning human rights for inclusion in the Yearbook on Human Rights. It was therefore, he stated, unnecessary to adopt an additional provision dealing specifically with measures concerning freedom of information. He asked that a separate vote be taken on the first paragraph. The first paragraph was adopted by the Council by 7 votes to 6, with 2 abstentions, and the resolution as a whole was adopted by 7 votes to 2, with 6 abstentions. By this resolution (306 F (XI)), the Council decided to request the Secretary-General to continue to approach Governments with a view to obtaining regularly from them the new legislative and administrative measures which they may deem it necessary to take with regard to freedom of information and of the Press: to obtain from the enterprises or associations mentioned therein, in accordance with paragraphs 2 and 3 of Council resolution 240 B (IX) any reports or surveys that they may compile concerning the current status of freedom of information in any part of the world; and to compile all pertinent data, analyse all information received, conduct appropriate research and prepare studies thereon for submission to the Sub-Commission on Freedom of Information and of the Press at each session.

It also decided (resolution 306 A (XI)) at its 405th meeting on 9 August in adopting a formal resolution taking note of the report of the Sub-Commission (E/1672), to request the Secretary-General to transmit to the Sub-Commission the records of the relevant discussions at the eleventh session of the Council.

At its eleventh session the Council devoted its 135th and 136th meetings on 12 July to a general discussion on the report of the fourth session of the Sub-Commission on Freedom of Information and of the Press (E/1672) which had been held at Montevideo from 15 to 26 May 1950.

Several representatives, including those of Australia, Brazil, Chile, Denmark, France, United Kingdom and the United States, expressed the view that the Sub-Commission, which was an expert body, should devote more attention to practical technical problems rather than to somewhat academic recommendations.

A number of representatives, in voicing general criticism of the work of the Sub-Commission, referred to particular aspects of the recommendations (see above). The representative of Australia, who described the Sub-Commission's work as disappointing, said that his criticism should not be taken to indicate opposition to all aspects of the report. The representative of China said that he was sure that the Sub-Commission would take note of the remarks which had been made in the Committee.

Regret that the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) had not been able to contribute very effectively to the work of the Sub-Commission was expressed by the representative of the United States. The United Kingdom representative said in this respect that there appeared to be some danger of overlapping between the Sub-Commission and the Mass Communications Department of UNESCO. He asked whether it might not be desirable for the Council to request the Secretary-General to prepare for it, in collaboration with the Director-General of UNESCO, a report delimiting the respective activities of the two organizations with a view to their co-ordination, including a comparison of the terms of reference and programme of the Sub-Commission on Freedom of Information and of the Press with the constitution and programme of UNESCO. After the Social Committee had heard at its 136th meeting, a statement from the representative of UNESCO dealing with UNESCO's activities in the field of freedom of information, the Chairman expressed the view that the point raised by the United Kingdom might be discussed by the Co-ordination Committee. This suggestion was supported by the representative of UNESCO and the representative of Denmark.

In this connexion, two resolutions were adopted by the Social Committee and later by the Council. By resolution 306 A (XI), adopted at the 405th plenary meeting on 9 August 1950, the Council took note of the report of the Sub-Commission and requested the Secretary-General to transmit to it the records of the Council's discussions. By resolution 331 B (XI), adopted unanimously and without discussion at the same meeting during the consideration by the Council of the report of the Co-ordination Committee (E/1800) on the report of UNESCO (E/1688), the Council requested the Secretary-General to prepare for it, in collaboration with the Director-General of UNESCO, a report delimiting the general activities of the two organizations with a view to their co-ordination. The report was to include a comparison of the terms of reference and programme of the Sub-Commission on Freedom of Information and of the Press with the constitution and programme of UNESCO.

e. ENCOURAGEMENT OF INDEPENDENT DOMESTIC AGENCIES

On 15 August 1949¹²⁸ the Economic and Social Council adopted resolution 240 D (IX), by which it noted the resolution of the Sub-Commission on Freedom of Information and of the Press relating to the adequacy of the news available to the peoples of the world and the obstacles to the free flow of information to them and also to the encouragement of independent domestic agencies (E/1369) and referred this resolution to the proposed Technical Assistance Committee of the Council (TAC) for consideration. The Committee, which held its first meeting on 2 August 1950, had before it notes (E/TAC/R.2) prepared by the Secretary-General on resolution 240. D (IX), and reported (E/1833) on 15 August 1950 to the Council. The report stated that the Committee had decided that if a request for technical assistance in connexion with the development of domestic information agencies in an under-developed country was received from a Government, the Technical Assistance Board would give it consideration in the normal manner and report to the Technical Assistance Committee.

K. STATUS OF WOMEN

The Commission on the Status of Women held its fourth session at Lake Success from 8 to 19 May 1950.

The report of the session was considered by the Economic and Social Council during its eleventh session at the 132nd-134th meetings of its Social Committee, 10-11 July 1950, and at its 388th and 389th plenary meetings, 14 and 17 July 1950.

The Council, by a unanimous vote, in resolution 304 A (XI), took note of the report of the Commission.

The following is a summary of the matters considered by the Commission and the action taken by the Council.

1. Political Rights

The Commission considered the question of the political rights of women under four headings, following recommendations made at its third session:

- (i) a report of the Secretary-General on discrimination based on sex, in the field of political rights;
- (ii) the status of women in Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories;
- (iii) the possibility of proposing a convention on the political rights of women;
- (iv) effective programmes of political education of women who have recently acquired the right to vote.

¹²⁸ See Y.U.N., 1948-49, pp. 570-71.

The Commission took note of the Secretary-General's report on discrimination based on sex in the field of political rights (E/CN.6/131 & Corr.1). The report, using as a basis constitutional or other legal provisions regulating women's right to vote and be elected to public office, aimed at showing the extent to which women enjoy these rights equally with men. The Commission noted the recent wider extension of the political rights of women in Costa Rica, Greece and Syria. It also took into consideration the memorandum of the Secretary-General on constitutions, electoral laws and other legal instruments relating to the franchise of women and their eligibility to public office and functions (A/1163) and invited the Secretary-General to continue his valuable annual reports on this subject. It suggested that in future reports he should include also pertinent information on the political rights of women in Trust Territories drawn from annual reports of the Administering Authorities, and also information which might be communicated to him by the Administering Authorities of Non-Self-Governing Territories.

The Commission had before it two reports by the Secretary-General (E/CN.6/137, E/CN.6/138 & Corr.1) on the status of women in Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories respectively, which were based on information contained in the annual reports of the administering countries and on replies to the Questionnaire on the Legal Status and Treatment of Women. The Commission noted with interest the information contained in the reports and requested the Secretary-General to continue to present information of this nature to it at future sessions, including it, if possible, in the annual reports on the political rights of women circulated to Member States under Council resolution 120 A (VI).¹²⁹

The Commission also had before it a report by the Secretary-General (E/CN.6/143) examining the possibility of proposing a convention on political rights for women. The report pointed out that, if adopted, a convention could serve a dual purpose: (a) enfranchise women who had not yet acquired the right to vote; and (b) prevent the disenfranchisement of women who already enjoyed the right to vote.

The Secretary-General also indicated that no technical difficulty would be involved in drawing up such a convention.

Members of the Commission were somewhat divided as to the desirability and importance of formulating a convention on political rights of women at this time. The Commission, however, adopted a resolution in which it noted that the Charter of the United Nations was signed in 1945, but that twenty countries were still listed as denying equal political rights to women. It referred to the fact that women in Chile and Costa Rica had been granted equal political rights after the signing of the Convention on the political rights of women at Bogotá in 1948, by the Governments of these countries.

It further considered that its four years' investigation of the status of women in various fields clearly revealed discrimination against women in the political field. The Commission therefore requested the Secretary-General to prepare for submission to its fifth session a draft convention on the granting to women of equal political rights with men.

The proposal for this draft convention was considered on the basis of the Commission's report (E/1712) at the 132nd and 133rd meetings of the Social Committee on 10 and 11 July, and at the 388th plenary meeting of the Council on 14 July. The majority expressed their support for the principle of equal political rights for men and women, but the representatives of Australia, Brazil, Chile, Denmark, Pakistan, the United Kingdom and the United States doubted whether a convention was an appropriate method of dealing with the problem. The point was made by the representative of Chile that only Governments which had already granted political rights to women would accede to such a convention, and that those countries which still deny women these rights would not adhere to it. It was suggested by the representative of Australia that the Commission should wait to observe the effects of the Bogota convention of 1948, noting the number of ratifications and the progress made. The representatives of Australia, Chile, Denmark, Pakistan, the United Kingdom and the United States endorsed the view that propaganda and education were likely to prove more effective than a convention. It was noted by the representative of the United States that the Commission itself had emphasized the importance of educational measures, and had suggested the preparation and publication of annual reports as one method of attempting to secure equality in the enjoyment of political rights.

The Social Committee, at its 133rd meeting, by 11 votes to 2, with 1 abstention (E/1674), and the Council at its 388th plenary meeting unanimously adopted a resolution (304 B (XI)) which drew the attention of the Commission, in connexion with its consideration of a draft convention on the political rights of women, to the opinions expressed in the relevant summary records of the Council.

The Commission, in considering effective programmes of political education of women who have recently acquired the right to vote, had before it a report from the Secretary-General (E/CN.6/141) on activities undertaken to date in this field.

Members of the Commission expressed the view that information collected by the Secretariat should be disseminated for the education of new women voters by showing the practical results which they could achieve by exercising their political rights. The Commission adopted a resolution expressing its appreciation of the work done by non-governmental organizations in the field of political education, and noted that such education cannot be undertaken as extensively as desired, in certain regions, by non-governmental organizations without further assistance. It requested the Council to instruct the Secretary-General to make available the information already collected, in the form of a study-guide or pamphlet to be used by organizations working for the political education of women in countries where women have recently acquired the right to vote or are beginning to participate in public affairs.

When the Council considered the Commission's resolution at its eleventh session, the representatives of Chile and France expressed the view, at the 133rd meeting of the Social Committee on 11 July, that such a study-guide would meet no existing need, and the representative of France further pointed out that separate political education for women might imply discrimination against them. The Chairman of the Committee, however, pointed out that the proposed pamphlet would simply indicate the way women could best make use of their civil rights, and the Committee, by 11 votes to 2, with 1 abstention, adopted a resolution approving the proposals of the Commission. This was unanimously adopted by the Council at its 388th plenary meeting on 14 July, as resolution 304 C (XI).

2. Nationality of Married Women

When considering the item on nationality of married women, the Commission, at its fourth session, decided that in view of the many difficulties involved in drafting a convention on this subject, it would restrict itself to setting forth general principles to be used as the basis for a convention. Three principles were suggested: (1) that there should be no distinction, based on sex, as regards nationality in the legislation or in the practices of the parties to a convention; (2) that neither marriage, nor its dissolution, should affect the nationality of either husband or wife; (3) that, in the transmission of nationality to a child under the doctrine of jus sanguinis,¹³⁰ there should be no distinction as between the father and the mother of the child.

The Commission requested the Council to take appropriate measures, as soon as possible, to ensure the drafting of a convention on the nationality of married women, embodying the first two principles.

Most members of the Commission thought it would be inadvisable to include the third principle in such a convention, and that the nationality of children was a matter to be dealt with by other bodies within the framework of the United Nations. The Commission noted the work already undertaken in this field by other organs of the United Nations, particularly by the Social Commission. It decided not to recommend the third principle for inclusion in the convention, but to request the Council to instruct the appropriate bodies of the United Nations to give consideration to the problem of the transmission of nationality to the children from either the father or the mother on the basis of equality.

The Commission further considered various alternative procedures which might be followed in drafting the proposed convention, but it decided to leave the decision on this matter to the Council itself, and made no specific recommendation.

The recommendations of the Commission (E/-1712) were considered at the 133rd and 134th meetings of the Social Committee on 11 July and at the 389th plenary meeting of the Council on 17 July. It was pointed out that the draft resolution which had been proposed by the Commission raised very complicated legal questions. The representative of Denmark expressed the view that the nationality of the children of parents of different nationalities was a question quite separate from the nationality of married women, and was not within the terms of reference of the Commission on the Status of Women.

Discussion on the question of drafting a convention on the nationality of married women centred on two main proposals as regards the procedure to be followed:

(a) That the Council should request the Secretary-General: to undertake a study of the terms of a draft convention, applying the principles advanced by the Commission; to submit the findings of the study to Member Governments; and to report to the Council on the outcome of its procedure.

(b) That the Council should propose to the International Law Commission that it should undertake as soon as possible the drafting of a convention to embody the principles recommended by the Commission, and should request the Law Commission to determine at its current session whether it deemed it appropriate to proceed with this proposal, and to inform the Council as to the approximate time when it might initiate action.

The representatives of Australia and France, who supported the first proposal, thought that an immediate decision to start drafting a convention would be premature, and that the placing of two nationalities on a basis of equality in the case of a mixed marriage would involve the revision of most national legislations, and would cause serious difficulties. The representatives of Belgium, Chile, Peru and the United States were in favour of referring the matter to the International Law Commission. It was explained to the Council by the representatives of Belgium and the United States that the International Law Commission would be competent to proceed with a study on a request from the Council, although in accordance with article 17 of its Statute it would not be bound so to proceed as it would in the case of a request from the General Assembly. It could, however, submit an interim report directly to the Council.

The representatives of Mexico and Pakistan thought it preferable to request the General Assembly to transmit the recommendation of the Commission on the Status of Women to the International Law Commission, so that it would undertake as soon as possible the drafting of a general convention. The representatives of Brazil, Canada, Denmark and the United Kingdom thought that before the drafting of a convention was undertaken, Member States should be consulted as to whether they desired one. The representative of the United Kingdom pointed out that only thirteen Governments had replied to the Secretary-General's questionnaire concerning the conflict of national laws and the desirability for a convention.

The representative of the United States argued, however, that if the International Law Commission were requested to draft a convention it would, under article 17 of its Statute, circulate a request for comments to Member States, and that it was urgently necessary that action regarding the nationality of married women be pressed forward.

The Social Committee, at its 134th meeting on 11 July, by 8 votes to none, with 6 abstentions, adopted a draft resolution (E/1764) which was adopted in slightly amended form by the Council at its 389th meeting on 17 July, by 7 votes to none, with 8 abstentions. In this resolution (304 D (XI)) the Council, after noting the recommendations of the Commission on the Status of Women, and the fact that the International Law Commission, at its first session, had included among the topics selected for study and codification the subject of nationality, including statelessness, proposed that the International Law Commission should undertake as soon as possible the drafting of a convention to embody the principles recommended by the Commission on the Status of Women. The Council further requested the International Law Commission to determine at its present session (second session, June-July 1950) whether it deemed it appropriate to proceed with this proposal, and if so, to inform the Council as to the time when the International Law Commission might proceed to initiate action. Finally, the Council invited the Secretary-General to transmit its resolution to the International Law Commission, together with the recommendation of the Commission on the Status of Women.

The Secretary-General transmitted the resolution (304 D (XI)) and the recommendation of the Commission on the Status of Women (E/1712) to the International Law Commission on 18 July 1950, and these were considered by that Commission on 19 July 1950. The Commission decided to entertain the proposal of the Council in connexion with its contemplated work on the subject of "nationality, including statelessness", and proposed to initiate that work as soon as possible (E/1786).

3. Property Rights of Married Women

The Secretary-General submitted to the fourth session of the Commission on the Status of Women parts II and III of the questionnaire on the legal status and treatment of women, which concerned property rights of women and family law (E/CN.6/W.1/Add.2, Rev.1; E/CN.6/W.2/Add.3, respectively). After examining these parts of the questionnaire and suggesting certain minor changes, the Commission requested the Secretary-General to circulate them to Governments asking them to reply, not later than 31 December 1951 in the case of part II, and 30 June 1952 in the case of part III. It also requested the Secretary-General to forward copies, together with simplified questions based on parts II and III, to specialized agencies and non-governmental organizations and to ask for their comments by 31 December 1950. Further, the Secretary-General was asked to prepare, for the fifth session of the Commission, a survey of various legal systems based on documentation available on the subjects included in these two parts of the questionnaire, together with an analysis of the replies received from Governments and of the comments by specialized agencies and non-governmental organizations. He was also asked to prepare, for the fifth session of the Commission, a compilation and analysis of the information contained in replies already supplied by Governments to section C of the questionnaire, on public services and functions; section E on civil liberties; and section F on fiscal laws, supplementing this information from other sources as necessary to ensure a complete and accurate picture.

The Council at its eleventh session noted that no action on the part of the Economic and Social Council appeared to be necessary with regard to this recommendation.

4. Participation of Women in the Work of the United Nations

In considering this question, the Commission had before it a report (E/CN.6/132) by the Secretary-General which described the nature and proportion of the posts occupied by women in the Secretariat of the United Nations and gave some information on their conditions of employment. It also contained information on the extent to which Member States had included women in their delegations to meetings of organs of the United Nations and of the specialized agencies.

It was emphasized in the Commission's debates that, whereas the Secretary-General had taken a liberal attitude on working conditions for women staff members, there appeared to be a disproportionately high percentage of women in subordinate positions and a very low percentage of women occupying policy-making posts and serving as consultants. It was pointed out, also, that only a small percentage of women had been included in delegations to meetings of United Nations organs and of the specialized agencies. It was, however, made clear that the Commission did not suggest that posts be given to other than qualified women or that the requirements of geographical distribution within the Secretariat should be disregarded.

The Commission adopted a resolution which, after referring to the Secretary-General's report and to Article 8 of the Charter, and noting the present situation, suggested that the Council should draw the attention of Member States to the desirability of greater participation of women in delegations. Further, the resolution asked the Secretary-General to examine and report upon the reasons why women had not yet been able to take up more of the important posts in the Secretariat. It invited him to take the necessary steps to give promotion to qualified women staff members and to appoint more women to higher posts which they are competent to fill, in order to secure equality between the sexes in the Secretariat and participation of women in all capacities in United Nations organs.

These recommendations (E/1712) were considered at the 134th meeting of the Social Committee on 11 July 1950. The representatives of Denmark and France expressed the view that as far as the participation of women in the delegations of Member States was concerned, that question was a matter which should be left up to the discretion of the various Governments which were responsible for making up their delegations in accordance with the system laid down in the Charter. It was also pointed out by the representatives of Belgium and the United Kingdom that staff questions were the province not of the Commission on the Status of Women but of the Secretary-General, and that, further, on the question of principle, Article 8 of the Charter could hardly be improved upon.

The Council decided not to put the draft resolution to a vote, but rather to transmit the summary record of the discussion to the Governments of Member States and to the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions.

5. Application of Penal Law to Women

The Commission on the Status of Women had before it at its fourth session a report (E/CN.6/139) from the Secretary-General concerning the application of penal law to women which contained an analysis of the information supplied by inter-governmental and non-governmental organizations specializing in the field of penal law. It also considered a report (E/CN.6/134) prepared by the International Labour Office which concerned the protection of women workers by labour legislation carrying penal sanction. The Commission took note of the action taken by the Social Commission in this field and of the work done by the United Nations on the prevention of crime and treatment of offenders. It adopted a resolution in which it (i) noted the report of the Secretary-General" on the application of penal law to women, and that the Social Commission had undertaken a comprehensive study of problems concerning the prevention of crime and treatment of offenders; (ii) considered that certain aspects of these problems are of direct interest to the work of the Commission on the Status of Women, in particular the importance of adequate and appropriate measures for the care and the social and vocational rehabilitation of women offenders; and (iii) requested the Council to ask the Social Commission:

(a) to bear in mind in its study the concern of the Commission on the Status of Women that there should be no discrimination against women in penal law and in its application; and that provision should be made for the particular needs of women in all parole, probation, welfare, educational training and rehabilitation services;

(b) to refer to the Commission on the Status of Women for its consideration and comments any question arising in the special field referred to in (a) above.

The resolution proposed by the Commission (E/1712) was adopted without discussion by 13 votes to none, with 1 abstention, by the Social Committee at its 134th meeting on 11 July 1950, and unanimously by the Council at its 388th meeting on 14 July 1950, as resolution 304 E (XI).

6. Principle of Equal Pay for Equal Work

The Commission in considering this item had before it a memorandum of the Secretary-General (E/CN.6/135) which set forth the work carried on by the International Labour Office in this field.

It noted that ILO, in its study, had taken account of the suggestions made at the third session of the Commission, especially as regards the inclusion in its definition of equal pay for equal work of the concept of "wage rates based on content".

In view of the study being undertaken by ILO, the Commission decided that no specific resolution was necessary at this time. It expressed its appreciation of the work of ILO, and decided to include the subject in the agenda of its fifth session.

7. Technical Assistance Programme in Relation to the Status of Women

During its consideration of the technical assistance programme, the Commission had before it a memorandum by the Secretary-General (E/CN.6/145) outlining the development of the technical assistance programme of the United Nations and of the specialized agencies and the projects already undertaken or contemplated. In the Commission's discussion it was emphasized that the contribution of women to the general programme was essential.

The Commission expressed belief that the status of women would be improved through the operation of technical assistance programmes directed towards economic development, including the improvement of standards of living and family welfare. It recommended to the Council that attention should be given to the part that women might play in these programmes (for example, as doctors, nurses, teachers and technical advisers) both as regards the eligibility of women in the countries concerned, for employment in technical, professional and administrative posts, and to their consideration as trainees.

Finally, the Commission recommended that, in areas in the process of economic development, attention should be given by Governments, in co-operation with ILO and other specialized agencies interested in the matter, to the need of safeguarding women workers against exploitation, and of promoting equal pay for equal work.

When the Council considered the Commission's recommendations (E/1712) at its eleventh session, the United States, at the 134th meeting of the Social Committee on 11 July 1950, proposed a draft resolution (E/AC.7/L.36) to provide that the Secretary-General should transmit copies of the Commission's resolution to the appropriate bodies of the United Nations and to the specialized agencies, for consideration in connexion with the development of technical assistance. This draft resolution was unanimously adopted without discussion by the Committee, and by the Council at its 388th plenary meeting on 14 July 1950, as resolution 304 F (XI).

8. Educational Opportunities for Women

In discussing educational opportunities for women, the Commission had before it a memorandum prepared by UNESCO (E/CN.6/146) containing statistical data on illiteracy, school registration and attendance, by age and sex, in various countries, together with an account of limitations imposed on the education of women.

The Commission expressed its appreciation to UNESCO for its assistance in the study of educational opportunities for women throughout the world, and requested the Secretary-General of the United Nations and the Director-General of UNESCO to pursue jointly their work in this field and, in particular:

- (a) to complete the survey with such additional and later information as is available;
- (b) to promote, throughout the world, opinion in favour of equal opportunities of access to education for both sexes;
- (c) to direct attention to the development of fundamental education and adult education in agricultural and less-developed countries, with special emphasis on such techniques as would encourage the social advancement of women.

Finally, the Commission requested the Secretary-General to invite ILO to collaborate in the study and promotion of measures for the development of vocational guidance and technical education among women.

The Commission's draft resolution (E/1712), with minor drafting changes, was unanimously approved by the Council at its eleventh session, at the 134th meeting of the Social Committee on 11 July 1950, and at the 388th plenary meeting on 14 July 1950, as resolution 304 G (XI).

9. Problem of Greek Mothers Whose Children Have Not Yet Been Repatriated

The Commission, at its 78th meeting, heard a detailed statement by the representative of Greece describing the tragic situation of Greek mothers whose children had been abducted but had not yet been repatriated, and of the hardships to which they had been subjected.

Members of the Commission expressed their concern and sympathy for the Greek mothers in this situation, and adopted the following resolution, which the Council was asked to transmit to the General Assembly:

The Commission on the Status of Women,

Having heard the statement presented by the representative of Greece concerning the plight of the Greek mothers who were deprived of their children more than two years ago,

Considering that the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, adopted by the General Assembly of the United Nations in December 1948, specifically refers to the family as "the natural and fundamental group unit of society and is entitled to protection by society and the State",

Taking into account General Assembly resolutions 193 C (III) of 27 November 1948, and 288 B (IV) of 18 November 1949, and more particularly the announcement of the League of Red Cross Societies on 13 May 1950, that despite continuous efforts "no Greek child has so far been returned to Greece", and that "even elementary indications indispensable for solution of the problem have not been furnished by the Governments concerned",

Appreciates the endeavours of the Secretary-General of the United Nations and of the international Red Cross organizations for the repatriation of these children;

Expresses the hope that the result of the continuing activities of the Secretary-General on this matter, in co-operation with the international Red Cross organizations, will be the prompt repatriation of the children, so as to put an end to the agony of the Greek mothers;

Expresses its confidence that the Secretary-General will submit to the General Assembly the urgent necessity of finding new ways for the solution of this very important question, in case the countries detaining the children have not returned them.

The Council at the 134th meeting of the Social Committee and the 388th plenary meeting, after certain members expressed their sympathy for the Greek people in this matter, unanimously adopted a resolution (304 H (XI)) transmitting the Commission's resolution to the General Assembly.¹³¹

10. Communications Concerning the Status of Women

The Commission requested the Economic and Social Council to amend paragraphs (a), (b) and (e) of the Council resolution 76(V)¹³² governing the treatment of communications concerning the status of women, to bring it into conformity with the amendments made in resolution 275 (X) relating to communications concerning human rights.¹³³

The Commission's recommendations (E/1712), with minor drafting changes, were unanimously adopted at the 134th meeting of the Social Committee and the 388th plenary meeting of the Council, in resolution 304 I (XI), as follows:

The Economic and Social Council

Decides to amend paragraphs (a), (b) and (e), of resolution 76(V) of the Economic and Social Council to read as follows:

"The Economic and Social Council,

¹³¹ For action taken by the Assembly on the repatriation of Greek children, see pp. 378-81.

¹³² See Y.U.N., 1947-48, p. 599.

"Requests the Secretary-General:

"(a) To compile and distribute to members of the Commission on the Status of Women, before each session, a non-confidential list containing a brief indication of the substance of each communication, however addressed, which deals with the principles relating to the promotion of women's rights in the political, economic, civil, social and educational fields, and to divulge the identity of the authors of such communications, unless they indicate that they wish their names to remain confidential;

"(b) To compile, before each session of the Commission, a confidential list containing a brief indication of the substance of other communications concerning the status of women, however addressed, and to furnish this list to members of the Commission in private meeting without divulging the identity of the authors of communications, except in cases where the authors state that they have already divulged or intend to divulge their names or that they have no objection to their names being divulged;

"(e) In the future, to furnish each Member State concerned with a copy of any communication concerning the status of women which refers explicitly to that State, or to territories under its jurisdiction, without divulging the identity of the author, except as provided for in paragraph (b) above."

11. Plight of Survivors of Concentration Camps

At its fourth session, 8-19 May 1950, the attention of the Commission on the Status of Women was drawn to the plight of women survivors of concentration camps who were subjected, during the Nazi regime, to so-called medical experiments. It was pointed out that many of these victims were now stateless persons who could not count on the legal protection of any Government, and were therefore unable to obtain compensation for the sufferings to which they had been subjected. The attention of the Commission was also called to the tragic situation of a number of university women still in displaced persons' camps (E/1712).

The Commission requested the Council (E/L.47) to call the attention of the Social Commission, the World Health Organization (WHO), or other appropriate agencies, to the plight of these war victims who were compelled by force to reside in Germany during the war, or at least to the plight of those who might be unable to obtain compensation from any country, and to keep the Commission informed of any action taken in this respect.

The Commission's request was discussed by the Social Committee of the Economic and Social Council at its 134th meeting on 11 July 1950, when representatives expressed their sympathy for the plight of survivors of concentration camps. The Committee had before it an amendment (E/AC.7/L.32) by the representative of France, which sought to replace the draft resolution submitted by the Commission: it asked the Council to take note of the report of the Commission on this matter and to request the Secretary-General to study ways and means of alleviating the plight of these victims as quickly as possible, and to keep the Commission informed on steps taken.

A Danish oral amendment, to ask that the Council and not the Commission on the Status of Women should be kept informed of these steps, was accepted by the representative of France, who told the Committee that there were still, in hospitals in Paris, a few isolated survivors of concentration camps who had been subjected to so-called medical experiments and who had never properly recovered. Every effort, he said, had been made to alleviate their plight, but without success. Their tormentors had been condemned by various bodies (for example, the Nürnnberg Tribunal) but the sentences had not stipulated compensation for the victims. He asked that the Secretary-General should be requested to study the question in co-operation with all organizations in a position to help: reference of the matter to the Social Commission and WHO, as requested by the Commission, might cause embarrassment.

Support for the views of the representatives of France and Denmark was given by the representative of the United Kingdom who asked the Committee, however, to defer action in the matter, in order not to prejudice current negotiations for compensation between the Allied High Commission for Germany and the German Federal Government. The representative of France amended his draft resolution accordingly, and the Committee, on the understanding that any delegation desiring to do so could raise the question again, adopted these proposals by 6 votes to 4, with 5 abstentions.

The Council considered the matter further at its 388th plenary meeting on 14 July 1950. Views expressed in the Social Committee by the representatives of Denmark, France and the United Kingdom were repeated in the Council. A new amendment (E/L.60), asking the Council to request the Secretary-General to consider, "with the competent authorities and institutions", means for alleviating the plight of these victims was presented by the representative of France with the aim of taking into account views expressed in the Committee and with a desire not to disturb the negotiations in progress. This amendment found general support in the Council, but the representative of the United Kingdom asked that the provisions of the draft resolution should apply to "both male and female" victims, on the ground that men had also been victims of the so-called medical experiments. The Council unanimously adopted the resolution, as amended (305 (XI)), as follows:

The Economic and Social Council,

Taking note of the report of the fourth session of the Commission on the Status of Women referring to the tragic fate of survivors of concentration camps who, under the Nazi regime, were the victims of so-called scientific experiments,

Requests the Secretary-General to consider as soon as possible, with the competent authorities and institutions, means for alleviating the plight of such victims, both male and female, and to inform the Economic and Social Council of the action taken.

L. PRISONERS OF WAR

The Assembly considered the "Complaint of failure of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics to repatriate or otherwise account for prisoners of war detained in Soviet territory" at the 271st, 316th, 338th-340th and 342nd-345th meetings of its Third Committee, 27 September, 16 November, 6-9 and 11 December, respectively; at the 282nd meeting of its Fifth Committee on 13 December; and at its 284th, 285th and 325th plenary meetings on 26 September and 14 December 1950.

1. Consideration by the Third Committee

During the discussions in the Third Committee, by a vote of 26 to 5, with 8 abstentions, it was decided to circulate communications from the Governments of Germany, Japan and Italy concerning the question of prisoners of war (A/C.3/552, 553 & 554). Two cables from the International Committee of the Red Cross and from the League of Red Cross Societies (A/C.3/555) concerning this question were also circulated.

The Assembly had before it an explanatory note (A/1339) from the three delegations which submitted the item, in which they stated that, at the end of hostilities in Europe and the Far East in 1945, large numbers of military personnel of various nationalities were in the hands of the Allied Powers and that prompt repatriation of these prisoners was demanded by accepted international practice as well as by the elementary principles of humanity. The Allied Powers had recognized this responsibility and had entered into agreements to repatriate prisoners of war, but as yet the USSR had not complied fully with these agreements.¹³⁴ Efforts to obtain information from the USSR had failed, and evidence existed to show that the announcements by Tass (Telegraphic Agency of the USSR) on 22 April and 5 May 1950 that the USSR had completed repatriation of all Japanese and German prisoners of war were untrue.

The Assembly also had before it a copy of a note (A/1339/Add.1) from the Soviet Government to the United Kingdom Embassy in Moscow, dated 30 September 1950, in which it was stated that the repatriation of German prisoners of war had been completed at the beginning of 1950, with the exception of 9,717 convicted of serious war crimes, 3,815 being investigated for war crimes, and fourteen temporarily detained owing to illness. In view of these facts the USSR had stated that it regarded the British Government's renewed communications on this question as a desire to exploit the question of German prisoners of war for propaganda purposes.

During the discussion in the Third Committee, the United Kingdom representative charged that the USSR had not only violated specific agreements but had also infringed the general principle to which it had subscribed by signing the Geneva Convention relative to the Treatment of Prisoners of War of 12 August 1949. While it was true that the USSR had not ratified that Convention and was therefore not legally bound by it, its signature must be regarded as indicating approval of the principles which it contained. He recalled Mr. Molotov's statement at the Moscow Conference in 1947 that 890,532 German prisoners of war remained to be repatriated. Subsequently Tass had announced that 58,103 additional German prisoners of war had been discovered between 1947 and 1949 among prisoners of war of other nationalities found in the Soviet Union thus bringing the total of German prisoners of war remaining to be repatriated to 1,952,609. A voluntary registration carried out by the Government of the Federal Republic of Germany between 1 and 11 March 1950 had led to the listing of 53,820 war prisoners from whom messages had been received from Soviet prison camps. In addition 8,972 had been listed in a registration by inhabitants of the Soviet Zone of occupation. The Federal Government had a total of 1,154,029 names who as of 1 March 1950 were still missing. The last news of some 923,000 of that figure had come from the USSR or areas occupied by Soviet troops. The Austrian Government had produced evidence of 1,635 prisoners of war still in Soviet territory. He considered the Soviet note of 30 September 1950 had created an impasse and that a further exchange of notes was useless. The facts must be ascertained and suitable action must follow.

With regard to the repatriation of Japanese military forces, the representative of Australia claimed that the best estimates at the time of the Potsdam Declaration had been that approximately 2,700,000 Japanese were in Soviet controlled territory. Tass had stated on 20 May 1949 that 95,000 Japanese nationals remained to be repatriated. At the end of 1949, according to the Japanese Government and the Supreme Command, at least 376,939 prisoners were unaccounted for. No reply had been received to notes sent by the Australian Government asking for an impartial investigation by an international humanitarian organization.

The United States Government had received a brief note on 16 July 1950 to the effect that the facts had been fully presented by Tass on 22 April and 9 June 1950. The gist of this information had been that no more than 594,000 Japanese had at any time been captured, 510,409 had been repatriated to Japan, 70,880 released immediately in the zone of combat operations, 1,487 detained in connexion with war crimes, nine temporarily detained for medical treatment and 971 placed at the disposal of the Chinese People's Government of the People's Republic of China in connexion with war crimes. The representative of Australia pointed out that even on the basis of these figures, some 10,000 of the 594,000 had not been accounted for.

According to the original figures, 369,382 Japanese were still unaccounted for. This number included many women and children as well as others who in the strict sense of the word were not and never had been prisoners of war.

The representative of the United States stated that the Soviet Government had announced in 1943 that it had 115,000 Italian prisoners. After the war it had stated that 20,096 had been repatriated. Despite this discrepancy, the USSR now claimed that there were no Italian prisoners in the Soviet Union. Moreover, a large number of Hungarian and Romanian prisoners were also missing.

The representatives of Australia, the United Kingdom and the United States emphasized the humanitarian aspects of the question, as did the majority of members of the Committee. These representatives also felt that the United Nations could not let the matter rest simply with the assertion by the USSR that all war prisoners had been repatriated. It must seek to determine if the assertion were true. Mental anguish existing on such a huge scale could not be ignored. They therefore had proposed (A/C.3/L.145) that an impartial commission should be established to find out what had happened to prisoners and to assist in repatriating those still alive. They further stressed that the purpose of this action was not to censure the Soviet Government for its conduct but merely to resolve the conflicting assertions. The representative of Australia also considered that his delegation would expect the commission not to make an artificial distinction between prisoners of war and civilians, but to find out about all who had been unaccounted for.

The representatives of the Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, Poland, the Ukrainian SSR and the USSR considered that the question of prisoners of war was, by virtue of Article 107¹³⁵ of the Charter, outside the competence of the United Nations.

The representative of the USSR repeated the assertion, as stated by Tass, that repatriation of prisoners of war had long since been completed. Allegations that Japanese and German prisoners of war still remained in Soviet territory were, he said, being made to divert the attention of the world from the policy pursued by the United States and its followers of the political and economic subjugation of Germany and Japan and of their militarization in anticipation of a new war. The representative of Poland stated that the proposed resolution was obviously for the purpose of political propaganda and, as such, should be rejected.

The USSR representative stated that the figures quoted by the representative of Australia were estimates and in his opinion fabricated statistics. Moreover, they had originated not with the Japanese Government but with General MacArthur. The total figures, he continued, according to General MacArthur's official reports in 1946 had grown by some 700,000 from one month to the next. A year later General MacArthur had officially recognized that it was impossible to estimate with any accuracy the number of Japanese troops caught in Manchuria at the time of surrender. He claimed that under the influence of General MacArthur the Japanese had actually set quotas of unrepatriated prisoners for various districts of Japan, and the local authorities had been told to prepare lists of certain numbers of prisoners who had not returned to their homes, adding up to a total previously decided upon. Naturally in those circumstances persons who had been killed in action, who were missing, or who had even been repatriated to some other districts, had been reported as Soviet prisoners. He cited several instances where soldiers known to be dead had been included in the lists.

In support of these charges the USSR representative referred to the case of an article in a Japanese newspaper. He stated that, following an announcement by General MacArthur on 31 August 1947 to the effect that repatriation had been completed, this newspaper declared that half a million people had vanished without a trace in the United States and United Kingdom zones of operation. Both the United Kingdom and the United States had "repatriated" a considerable number of prisoners to their own territories for hard labour; A number had also been used to combat the Malayan independence movement; others had been used by Chiang Kai-shek in China and by the Netherlands in Indonesia.

The USSR, he maintained, not the United Kingdom and the United States, had initiated the consideration of repatriation at the Moscow Conference, and the United Kingdom and the United States had concurred in the proposal that repatriation should be carried out in accordance with a plan to be worked out by the Control Council. That plan had never been worked out because the United Kingdom, the United States and France had decided to retain large numbers of prisoners on the grounds that they were gainfully employed.

The representative of the United States pointed out that if there was any intent to deceive, as charged by the USSR, it should be exposed. By questioning the statistics available, the USSR had only made the establishment of an impartial body more necessary. In fact, the USSR ought to be among the sponsors of the draft resolution. She stated that while the United States contested the merit of the accusations it was willing to allow an impartial body to conduct an inquiry into the matter.

The United Kingdom representative considered that Article 107 in no way implied that any act committed by the signatory Powers was justified. Its sole purpose was to prevent enemy States from bringing complaints against them. The present complaint was being made not by enemy States but by signatory States.

The representative of the Union of South Africa held that Article 107 could not be invoked in this instance, since the draft resolution was concerned not with an act taken or authorized as a result of the war by the Governments having responsibility for such action, but was concerned with a breach of international commitments.

The representative of France preferred direct negotiations but would consider other proposals, in particular the proposal to establish a commission, although he would have preferred to have the Secretary-General deal with the matter.

The representatives of Egypt, India, Lebanon, Saudi Arabia, Syria and Venezuela, among others, considered that if the USSR would not allow the commission into its territory, and that seemed evident, it would be futile to establish it.

The representative of Saudi Arabia considered, therefore, that a conciliation body might be set up either within or outside the United Nations to contact all countries which had prisoners of war in their territories and deal with them on a humanitarian basis. The representatives of India and Iraq (A/C3/L.149) thought that the International Red Cross should establish a commission. The Secretariat at the request of the Committee had brought these amendments and the text of the joint resolution to the attention of the International Red Cross. Following a reply by the International Red Cross that it could only act if all Governments concerned agreed to the Assembly resolution, the representatives of India and Iraq withdrew the amendment.

The joint proposal by Australia, the United Kingdom and the United States (A/C3/L145) would have the General Assembly express its concern at the evidence presented that prisoners of war had been neither repatriated nor otherwise accounted for; call upon Governments still having control over such persons to give them an unrestricted opportunity of repatriation; and establish a United Nations Commission on Prisoners of War, to be composed of three qualified and impartial individuals to be appointed by the Secretary-General, which would collect information regarding prisoners and assist in their repatriation.

The representatives of Australia, the United Kingdom and the United States revised the joint draft resolution (A/C.3/L.145/Rev.1) to incorporate the following amendments:

(1) Amendments submitted by Afghanistan (A/C.3/L.148) to (a) entitle the resolution "Measures for the peaceful solution of the problem of prisoners of war"; (b) delete specific reference in the draft resolution to "evidence"; (c) include a statement that any persons whose good offices the Commission would be authorized to use should be "qualified and impartial"; and (d) delete the statement authorizing the Secretary-General to incur the necessary expenditure, since such a recommendation was not within the Third Committee's competence

(2) Amendments jointly suggested by Lebanon and Syria (A/C.3/L.146) and a Philippine sub-amendment (A/C.3/L.147) to the effect that (a) the Governments should supply the names of persons still held and places where detained; (b) particulars of crimes, if any; (c) names of those who have died in prisoner of war camps, as well as date and cause of death; and (d) manner and place of burial.

In the light of the discussion, the representatives of Australia, the United Kingdom and the United States drew up a second revision of their draft resolution (A/C.3/L.145/Rev.2) which retained the amendments incorporated in the first revision and included an Ethiopian amendment (A/C.3/L.150) to the effect that the Commission should be an ad hoc body. The revised proposal thus provided for two successive steps: (a) a request for information from the Governments concerned, and (b) the establishment of an ad hoc Commission on Prisoners of War to examine and evaluate this information and to take certain specified action if the Commission considered the information inadequate.

The sponsors of the draft resolution then accepted an amendment by France (A/C.3/L.152) which requested that the Secretary-General establish a Commission composed of qualified and impartial persons appointed by the International Red Cross, or, failing that, by the Secretary-General himself. An oral suggestion, by the representative of the United Kingdom, that the proposed Commission should be an ad hoc body and that it should be composed of three members, was accepted by the representative of France.

The Third Committee at its 345th meeting adopted by 45 votes to 5, with 4 abstentions, a French amendment (A/C.3/L.152) to insert a paragraph urgently requesting all Governments to make the greatest possible effort to search for prisoners of war whose absence had been reported and who might be in their territories.

The following amendments were rejected:

(1) Suggestion by India and Iraq (A/C.3/L.149), to delete the reference in the preamble to specific agreements between the Allied Powers concerning prisoners, rejected by 24 votes to 11, with 15 abstentions

(2) Oral amendment by Iraq, to express concern at information which tended to show that a large number of prisoners had "(a) not been repatriated, (b) not been accounted for" rather than state had "neither been repatriated nor otherwise accounted for", rejected by 19 votes to 13, with 19 abstentions

(3) Oral amendment by Iraq, to raise the number of members on the proposed commission to five, rejected by 18 votes to 14, with 21 abstentions

(4) Oral amendment by Iraq, to delete the provision permitting the Secretary-General to appoint the Commission failing action by the International Red Cross, rejected by 31 votes to 12, with 7 abstentions.

The joint draft resolution (A/C.3/L.145/Rev.2) as a whole, as amended, was adopted by the Committee by 43 votes to 5, with 8 abstentions (A/1690), at its 345th meeting on 11 December (see below for text).

2. Consideration by the Fifth Committee

The Fifth Committee at its 282nd meeting on 13 December considered the financial implications of the draft resolution proposed by the Third Committee (A/1690). The Committee had before it estimates submitted by the Secretary-General (A/C.5/444), together with the observations of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions (A/1686).

The Secretary-General pointed out that no basis existed for an accurate estimation of costs. He believed, however, that expenditure would amount to approximately $45,000," which sum included provision for the payment of fees in addition to travelling and subsistence expenses of the members of the proposed ad hoc Commission. The Advisory Committee had expressed the view that the principles concerning travelling and subsistence expenses, originally laid down in General Assembly resolution 231 (III)¹³⁶ and reaffirmed in resolution 459(V)¹³⁷ precluded the payment of fees to members of such a commission. The Advisory Committee had further considered that such payment would create an undesirable precedent and that, in any case, no difficulty need be anticipated in securing the services of qualified and impartial persons willing to serve as a matter of honour and obligation on the terms approved by the General Assembly for expert bodies of the United Nations. On this basis, it had recommended that no provision should be made for payment of fees and that, instead, the rate of daily subsistence allowance should be raised from $12.50 to $25 at Headquarters and $20 in the field. Accordingly, the Advisory Committee recommended that provision should be made for $35,000 in the 1951 budget estimates.

In the course of the discussion of the Advisory Committee's recommendations, the United States representative stated that he felt obliged to support, in principle, the payment of fees in the case of the proposed ad hoc Commission, because of new decisions taken by the General Assembly and by the Fifth Committee with respect to certain other expert bodies. However, the representatives of Australia, Denmark and the United Kingdom, among others, agreed with the Advisory Committee and suggested that persons appointed to the ad hoc Commission should not be regarded as experts within the meaning of General Assembly resolution 231(III). Still others, including the representatives of Brazil, Canada and France, felt that the policy regarding remuneration of experts required re-examination. The representative of France requested that, in future, the Secretary-General should furnish an annex to the budget document giving full details of payments made to members of various expert bodies.

The representative of the USSR explained that his delegation had clearly stated its position in the Third Committee and maintained that the item had been raised for purposes of propaganda. He was therefore opposed to any appropriation of funds for carrying out the draft resolution. An oral proposal by the representative of the USSR to that effect was defeated by 25 votes to 4, with 4 abstentions.

The Fifth Committee approved (A/1718) the recommendation of the Advisory Committee by 24 votes to 4, with 5 abstentions, and informed the Assembly that adoption of the draft resolution would require a budgetary provision in 1951 in the amount of $35,000.

3. Resolution Adopted by the General Assembly

The General Assembly at its 325th plenary meeting on 14 December 1950 considered the reports of the Third Committee (A/1690) and the Fifth Committee (A/1718) and adopted, without further discussion, by 43 votes to 5, with 6 abstentions, the draft resolution proposed by the Third Committee as resolution 427(V). It read as follows:

The General Assembly,

Mindful that one of the principal Purposes of the United Nations is to achieve international co-operation in solving international problems of a humanitarian character and in promoting and encouraging respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms for all,

Considering that the General Assembly may recommend measures for the peaceful adjustment of any situation, regardless of origin, which it deems likely to impair the general welfare or friendly relations among nations,

Believing that all prisoners having originally come within the control of the Allied Powers as a consequence of the Second World War should either have been repatriated long since or have been otherwise accounted for, that this is required both by recognized standards of international conduct and the Geneva Convention of 1949 for the protection of war victims, and by specific agreements between the Allied Powers,

1. Expresses its concern at the information presented to it tending to show that large numbers of prisoners taken in the course of the Second World War have neither been repatriated nor otherwise accounted for;

2. Calls upon all governments still having control of such persons to act in conformity with the recognized standards of international conduct and with the above-mentioned international agreements and conventions which require that, upon the cessation of active hostilities, all prisoners should, with the least possible delay, be given an unrestricted opportunity of repatriation and, to that end, to publish and transmit to the Secretary-General before 30 April 1951:

(a) The names of such prisoners still held by them, the reasons for which they are still detained and the places in which they are detained;

(b) The names of prisoners who have died while under their control as well as the date and cause of death, and the manner and place of burial in each case;

3. Requests the Secretary-General to establish an Ad Hoc Commission composed of three qualified and impartial persons chosen by the International Red Cross or, failing that, by the Secretary-General himself, with a view to settling the question of the prisoners of war in a purely humanitarian spirit and on terms acceptable to all the governments concerned. The Commission shall convene at a suitable date after 30 April 1951 to examine and evaluate, in the light of the information made available to the fifth session of the General Assembly, the information furnished by governments in accordance with the terms of the preceding paragraph. In the event that the Commission considers that this information is inadequate or affords reasonable ground for believing that prisoners coming within the custody or control of any foreign government as a consequence of military operations of the Second World War have not been repatriated or otherwise accounted for, the General Assembly:

(a) Requests the Commission to seek from the governments or authorities concerned full information regarding such prisoners;

(b) Requests the Commission to assist all governments and authorities who so desire in arranging for and facilitating the repatriation of such prisoners;

(c) Authorizes the Commission to use the good offices of any qualified and impartial person or organization whom it considers might contribute to the repatriation or accounting for of such prisoners;

(d) Urges all governments and authorities concerned to co-operate fully with the Commission, to supply all necessary information and to grant right of access to their respective countries and to areas in which such prisoners are detained;

(e) Requests the Secretary-General to furnish the Commission with the staff and facilities necessary for the effective accomplishment of its task;

4. Urgently requests all the governments to make the greatest possible efforts, based in particular on the documentation to be provided, to search for prisoners of war whose absence has been reported and who might be in their territories;

5. Directs the Commission to report as soon as practicable the results of its work to the Secretary-General for transmission to the Members of the United Nations.

M. REFUGEES AND STATELESS PERSONS

1. Statelessness and Related Problems

a. CONSIDERATION IN THE ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL AT ITS ELEVENTH SESSION

At its eleventh session the Economic and Social Council dealt with the question of refugees and stateless persons¹³⁸ in two parts. It examined the report of the Ad Hoc Committee on Statelessness and Related Problems (E/1618 & Corr.1) and took action, as requested in General Assembly resolution 319(IV), concerning the provisions for the functioning of a High Commissioner's Office for Refugees.

(1) Report of the Ad Hoc Committee on Statelessness and Related Problems¹³⁹

The Ad Hoc Committee on Statelessness and Related Problems, established by the Council in accordance with resolution 248(IX) of the Economic and Social Council, met from 16 January to 16 February 1950. Its task, as outlined in the resolution, was to:

(a) consider the desirability of preparing a revised and consolidated convention relating to the international status of refugees and stateless persons and, if they consider such a course desirable, draft the text of such a convention;

(b) consider means of eliminating the problem of statelessness, including the desirability of requesting the International Law Commission to prepare a study and make recommendations on this subject;

(c) make any other suggestions they deem suitable for the solution of these problems, taking into consideration the recommendations of the Secretary-General.

The Committee recommended (E/1618) an international convention as the most effective approach to the solution of the problems referred to the Council. It decided, in view of the urgency of the refugee problem and the responsibility of the United Nations in this field, to address itself first to the problem of refugees, whether stateless or not.

The Committee prepared a draft Convention relating to the status of refugees, which consisted of a preamble and forty articles covering general provisions, legal status, gainful occupation, welfare, administrative measures, implementation and transitory provisions and final clauses. It provided in article 1 a definition of the term "refugee". The Committee also prepared and submitted to the Council its observations and comments on the draft Convention. Although the Committee did not feel that it could draw up a separate draft convention relating to the status of stateless persons, it considered the possibility of applying certain of the articles to stateless persons who were not refugees and, in this connexion, prepared a draft Protocol relating to the status of stateless persons, by which the provisions of certain articles of the Convention would be applied mutatis mutandis to stateless persons not covered under the Convention.

The Committee requested the Secretary-General, in accordance with resolution 248 B (IX), to submit its report to Governments and to invite them to forward their comments on it by 1 May 1950, in order that the report, along with the comments received, might be submitted to the Council at its eleventh session. The Committee also recommended that the Council consider the report and the comments and submit them, together with its recommendations, to a diplomatic conference, to be convened for the purpose of reviewing further the draft Convention and the Protocol to it, and at which these would be opened for signature.

The Committee decided that it was not practicable to examine the complex problem of the elimination of statelessness in great detail or draft a convention on the subject. It reviewed the basic causes of statelessness, including failure to acquire nationality at birth, loss of nationality through marriage or dissolution of marriage, voluntary renunciation of nationality, and deprivation of nationality. It discussed the responsibilities of various organs of the United Nations in this field, including the International Law Commission and the Commission on the Status of Women.

The Committee decided to recommend to the Council the adoption of a resolution inviting Member States to re-examine their nationality laws with a view to reducing as far as possible cases of statelessness which arise from the operation of such laws, and recommending to the Member States involved in changes of territorial sovereignty that they include in the arrangements for such changes the necessary provisions for the avoidance of statelessness. The resolution, further, invited Member States to contribute to the reduction of the number of stateless persons by extending to persons in their territory an opportunity to be naturalized. It requested the Secretary-General to seek information from Member States with regard to the carrying out of the resolution, and to report to the Council. The Committee further recommended that considering that progress in the elimination of statelessness required joint international action and that the conclusion of an agreement or agreements for this purpose was necessary, the Council should request the International Law Commission to prepare the necessary draft documents at the earliest possible date.

No specific reference to the statelessness of women resulting from marriage or dissolution of marriage was included in the resolution proposed to the Council, as the nationality of married women was being considered on a broader basis by the Commission on the Status of Women.¹⁴⁰

(2) Discussion of the Report in the Council

The report of the Ad Hoc Committee was considered at the 156th-161st and 165th-170th meetings of the Social Committee, 31 July-3 August and 5-10 August respectively, and at the Council's 399th and 406th-407th plenary meetings, 2 and 11 August 1950. In addition to the report, the Council had before it comments from the Governments of Australia, Austria, Canada, Chile, Egypt, France, India, Israel, Italy, Lebanon, Poland, the United Kingdom and the United States (E/1703 & Add.1-7). Comments of a general nature and related to individual articles in the draft Convention had also been received from the International Refugee Organization (E/1704 & Corr.1 & 2).

The first point under discussion in the Social Committee at its 156th and 157th meetings was primarily a procedural matter: whether to transmit the Ad Hoc Committee's report to the General Assembly's fifth session, meanwhile reconvening the Ad Hoc Committee at Geneva for a further review of the draft Convention and Protocol, or whether to call a diplomatic conference to revise the draft international agreements. The majority supported the proposal to reconvene the Committee and to submit the report to the Assembly. They were of the opinion that the question of refugees was urgent and should be dealt with as quickly as possible. Moreover, the Convention would be the principal instrument through which the High Commissioner for Refugees would exercise his functions for protecting refugees. It was therefore highly desirable, they held, that the Convention should be available when he assumed his duties in January 1951.

Other representatives favoured the proposal, included in the Ad Hoc Committee's report, to call a diplomatic conference. One of the main advantages, they stressed, would be that in a diplomatic conference those non-member States to which the problem was of great importance could also be represented. While agreed that the refugee problem was urgent, these representatives saw no reason why the High Commissioner could not begin his work before a Convention was concluded.

On the basis of a United States proposal (E/L.79 & Add.1) the Social Committee on 31 July, and, on the Committee's recommendation, the Council on 2 August, decided (1) to transmit the report to the Assembly's fifth session and (2) to reconvene the Ad Hoc Committee in Geneva to revise the draft Convention and Protocol. It decided that the name of the Committee should be changed to "Ad Hoc Committee on Refugees and Stateless Persons". Following this interim decision, the United States draft resolution, as amended to take account of other decisions by the Council and to provide for the hearing by the Ad Hoc Committee of the views of non-member States, was adopted by the Social Committee at its 169th meeting by 12 votes to none, with 3 abstentions, and by the Council at its 406th plenary meeting by 9 votes to none, with 6 abstentions.

In this resolution (319 B.I (XI)) the Council took note of the report of the Ad Hoc Committee on Refugees and Stateless Persons including, in particular, the draft agreements contained therein, and of the comments of Governments thereon, which - it transmitted to the General Assembly. The Council requested the Secretary-General to reconvene the Ad Hoc Committee in order that it might prepare revised drafts of the agreements in the light of comments of Governments and specialized agencies and the discussions and decisions of the Council at its eleventh session, which should include the definition of "refugee" and preamble approved by the Council, making such other revisions as appeared necessary. It also requested him to submit the revised drafts to the General Assembly at its fifth session.

The Council drew the attention of the Committee to the fact that, under rules 75 and 77 of the rules of procedure of the Council, it was authorized to hear statements from Member States not members of the Committee and from such specialized agencies as might wish to participate, without vote, in the deliberations of the Committee. It decided, in addition, that the Committee was authorized to hear statements from such non-member States as might, because of their special interest in the problem, wish to participate as observers, without vote, in the deliberations of the Committee.

Finally, the Council recommended to the General Assembly that it approve international agreements on the basis of the draft agreements prepared and revised by the Committee, taking into account the comments of Governments and the views expressed at the eleventh session of the Council.

(a) DEFINITION OF THE TERM "REFUGEE" IN ARTICLE 1 OF THE DRAFT CONVENTION ON REFUGEES

Meanwhile, the Social Committee at its 158th-161st and 165th-166th meetings had discussed the definition of the term "refugee" in article 1 of the draft Convention prepared by the Ad Hoc Committee.¹⁴¹ This definition had been based on categories. This principle, though not necessarily the definition itself, was supported by the representatives of Australia, Brazil, China, France and the United States. Among other things, they maintained that in any instrument involving definite legal obligations categories should be precisely defined. Such a definition would also be more generally acceptable and more easily implemented than a global definition, to which they considered a number of countries would be reluctant to subscribe. The broader the definition, they thought, the narrower the protection that nations would be willing to give. The representative of the United States also pointed out that under too broad a definition the High Commissioner, when implementing the Convention, would be overwhelmed with applications from people who did not merit or require international protection. The Assembly had stated that the Commissioner's work should relate as a rule to groups and categories of refugees. Both States and the High Commissioner should know exactly to whom the Convention applied.

On the other hand, the representatives of Belgium, Canada, Pakistan and the United Kingdom felt that the definition should concern itself with all refugees and not merely with certain prescribed and limited categories of refugees. The Convention should not be an instrument of restricted application. Moreover, a limited classification, they stated, would not be adequate or useful for a lasting international convention on refugees.

In addition, the representatives of Belgium, Chile, France and the United Kingdom, among others, held that the definition used in the Convention and in the Statute for the High Commissioner's Office need not be the same, although, as pointed out by the representative of the United States, there was a definite link between them, i.e. if the Convention were approved, the definition of the term "refugee" would form part of the High Commissioner's terms of reference, since implementation of the Convention was to be one of his principal functions.

The representatives of Belgium and the United Kingdom had submitted substitute texts (E/AC.7/L.59; E/AC.7/L.63) for Article 1. Both of these were designed to give a broad, global definition to the term "refugee". However, at the 159th meeting on 1 August, it was decided by 8 votes to 2, with 4 abstentions, to proceed with a definition of "refugee" based on categories. Therefore, the Belgian and United Kingdom amendments were withdrawn. Several representatives, among them those of Canada, Mexico,

Pakistan and the United Kingdom, reserved the position of their Governments on this aspect of the question in respect to future stages of discussion.

Taking as a basis for discussion a French amendment (E/L.82) to the Ad Hoc Committee's proposed text for article 1, the Social Committee discussed in detail the proposed definition of the term "refugee", and referred certain sections for re-drafting to a sub-committee composed of the representatives of China, Chile, France, the United Kingdom and the United States.

Among its decisions were:

(1) To omit a section stipulating the rights of Contracting States to extend the definition of refugees to persons in other categories as recommended by the Assembly and their right to conclude independently private agreements to extend the benefits of the Convention to categories of refugees not covered by it. The Committee felt that this statement was unnecessary and misleading, since it implied that States might have to await Assembly approval before extending the definition of refugees. Its deletion was proposed by France, and adopted by 13 votes to none, with 2 abstentions.

(2) To broaden the definition of refugees to include those who "for reasons other than personal convenience" were unwilling to return to their home countries. The United States representative, in proposing the amendment, drew attention to the position of refugees who were not afraid of actual persecution in their home countries, but were unwilling for psychological reasons to return. The amendment was adopted by 11 votes to none, with 4 abstentions.

(3) To substitute for a statement that no Contracting State would apply the benefits of the Convention to any person who in its opinion was guilty of "any . . . acts contrary to the Purposes and Principles of the United Nations" a clause stating that no Contracting State would be obliged to grant refugee status to any person it had "serious reasons to consider as falling under the provisions of article 14 (2) of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights."¹⁴² Various members of the Committee considered that the original statement was vague and might lead to discrimination, and that it was doubtful if individuals could be guilty of acts contrary to the Charter, since its responsibilities devolved only on States. The amended phrase was proposed by France and adopted by 7 votes to none, with 8 abstentions.

(4) To add a section making it clear that the Convention would not apply to a refugee who had no nationality but had voluntarily returned to the country he had left or outside which he had remained owing to fear of persecution. This was proposed by the United States and adopted by 13 votes to none, with 2 abstentions.

The amended definition of the term "refugee" was adopted as a whole by the Social Committee on 7 August by 7 votes to 1, with 7 abstentions, and by the Council at its 406th plenary meeting on 11 August 1950, by 10 votes to 2, with 3 abstentions, in resolution 319 B,II (XI). It read as follows:

(Chapter I, Article 1)

A. For the purposes of this Convention, the term "refugee" shall apply to any person

(1) Who in the period between 1 August 1914 and 15 December 1946 was considered a refugee under the Arrangements of 12 May 1926 and 30 June 1928 or under the Conventions of 28 October 1933 and 10 February 1938, and the Protocol of 14 September 1939;

(2) Who has been accepted by the International Refugee Organization as falling under its mandate;

(3) Who has had, or has, well-founded fear of being the victim of persecution for reasons of race, religion, nationality or political opinion, as a result of events in Europe before 1 January 1951, or circumstances directly resulting from such events, and, owing to such fear, has had to leave, shall leave, or remains outside the country of his nationality, before or after 1 January 1951, and is unable, or, owing to such fear or for reasons other than personal convenience, unwilling, to avail himself of the protection of the government of the country of his nationality, or, if he has no nationality, has left, shall leave, or remains outside the country of his former habitual residence.

The decision as to eligibility taken by the International Refugee Organization during the period of its activities shall not prevent the status of refugees being recognized in the case of persons who otherwise fulfil the conditions of this Article.

B. This Convention shall not apply to any refugee enjoying the protection of a Government because

(1) He has voluntarily re-availed himself of the protection of the government of the country of his nationality;

(2) Having lost his nationality, he has voluntarily re-acquired it;

(3) He has acquired a new nationality and enjoys the protection of the government of the country of his nationality;

(4) He has voluntarily re-established himself in the country which he left or outside which he remained owing to fear of persecution;

(5) As a former member of a German minority, he has established himself in Germany or is living there.

C. No contracting State shall apply the benefits of this Convention to any person who, in its opinion, has committed a crime specified in Article VI of the London Charter of the International Military Tribunal. No contracting State shall be obliged, under the provisions of this Convention, to grant refugee status to any person whom it has serious reasons to consider as falling under the provisions of article 14 (2) of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

(b) PREAMBLE TO THE DRAFT CONVENTION

The Preamble to the Convention was considered at the 160th, 167th and 170th meetings of the Social Committee on 2, 7 and 10 August and at the 406th plenary meeting of the Council on 11 August.

The Ad Hoc Committee had prepared a Preamble which would have the Contracting States

¹⁴² Which states that the right of asylum "may not be invoked in the case of prosecutions genuinely arising from non-political crimes or from acts contrary to the purposes and principles of the United Nations".

(1) refer to the concern of the United Nations for the protection of human rights without discrimination as expressed in the Declaration of Human Rights, and the profound concern for the rights of refugees as evinced in various resolutions, especially in General Assembly resolution 319 A (IV),¹⁴³ and (2) refer to the desirability of revising and consolidating previous international agreements relating to the protection of refugees, of extending the scope of such agreements to additional groups of refugees and of increasing the protection accorded by these instruments.

The representative of France stated that the principle of the Preamble was not in dispute but that, while ideally refugees should be placed on an equal footing with citizens of the countries receiving them, this was not possible. He proposed an amendment (E/L.81) which would, among other things, have the Preamble:

(1) state that refugees should be assured of the "widest possible exercise of the fundamental rights and liberties"; (2) recognize that the right of asylum placed an undue burden on certain countries because of their geographical situation and that the problem because of its international scope could not be solved without international co-operation "to help distribute refugees throughout the world";

(3) refer to the High Commissioner for Refugees, who would be called upon to supervise the application of the Convention and to endeavour, with international co-operation, to improve it; and finally,

(4) express the hope that countries would be guided by the Convention in granting the rights and advantages contained in it to refugees not covered by its provisions.

There was considerable discussion as to whether or not the idea expressed in point (2) above should be included in the Preamble. The representative of Belgium thought the point should be made in the Convention itself, while the representatives of Canada, India and the United States thought it might be better to include it in an Assembly resolution introducing the Convention. This paragraph was deleted at the Committee's 167th meeting on 7 August by 5 votes to 5, with 5 abstentions, but the Council reinstated the paragraph in slightly different form (E/L.94) at its 406th plenary meeting (see below).

The representatives of Belgium, Canada, the United States and Pakistan objected to the last paragraph, which they thought implied that the Convention was not wide enough in scope. It was also inconsistent with the Committee's previous decision that the Convention should apply to certain defined categories of refugees rather than to all refugees in a territory. Following the adoption of the paragraph in slightly amended form by 5 votes to 4, with 6 abstentions, the representatives of Belgium and the United States reserved the right to raise the question again.

The Committee, after accepting certain technical amendments of a legal nature (A/C.7/L.71), adopted, in separate paragraph votes, the remainder of the French amendment (E/L.81) with an additional French sub-amendment designed to express more precisely the status and powers of the High Commissioner in relation to the Convention. It also decided, by 14 votes to 1, to include the reference proposed by the Ad Hoc Committee (see above) to the desirability of revising, consolidating and extending the scope of previous international agreements. The amended draft Preamble was adopted as a whole by the Committee by 10 votes to none, with 3 abstentions.

The Council, at its 406th plenary meeting on 11 August, after accepting by 9 votes to none, with 6 abstentions, a French proposal (E/L.94) to reinstate a paragraph (see paragraph 5 below) referring to the international scope of the problem, adopted the Preamble by 12 votes to none, with 3 abstentions, in resolution 319 B,II (XI). It read as follows:

PREAMBLE

1. Considering that the Charter of the United Nations and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights establish the principle that human beings shall enjoy fundamental rights and freedoms without discrimination;

2. Considering that the United Nations has, on various occasions, and most recently in General Assembly resolution 319 A (IV), manifested its profound concern for refugees and endeavoured to assure refugees the widest possible exercise of these fundamental rights and freedoms;

3. Considering that, in the light of experience, the adoption of an international convention would appear to be one of the most effective ways of guaranteeing refugees the exercise of such rights;

4. Considering further that it is desirable to revise and consolidate previous international agreements relating to the protection of refugees, to extend the scope of such agreements to additional groups of refugees, and to increase the protection accorded by these instruments;

5. Considering, however, that the exercise of the right of asylum may place unduly heavy burdens on certain countries, and that a satisfactory solution of a problem of which the United Nations has recognized the international scope and nature cannot therefore be achieved without international co-operation;

6. Considering that the High Commissioner for Refugees will be called upon to supervise the application of this Convention, and that the effective implementation of this Convention depends on the full co-operation of States with the High Commissioner and on a wide measure of international co-operation;

7. Expressing the hope, finally, that this Convention will be regarded as having a value as an example exceeding its contractual scope, and that without prejudice to any recommendations the General Assembly may be led to make in order to invite the High Contracting Parties to extend to other categories of persons the benefits of this Convention, all nations will be guided by it in granting to persons who might come to be present in their territory in the capacity of refugees and who would not be covered by the following provisions, treatment affording the same rights and advantages.

(c) ELIMINATION OF STATELESSNESS

The resolution recommended by the Ad Hoc Committee on the elimination of statelessness¹⁴⁴ was discussed at the 167th and 168th meetings of the Social Committee on 7 and 8 August and at the 406th and 407th plenary meetings of the Council on 11 August 1950.

The following were among the views expressed: The representatives of Australia, Belgium, France and the United Kingdom considered that the suggestion that Member States should extend to stateless persons in their territory the opportunity to be naturalized was too general and tended to place a stateless person in a more privileged position than other aliens with regard to naturalization. The United States representative explained that the paragraph in question was merely meant to ensure that a stateless person was included in the general group of persons eligible for naturalization.

The representative of Mexico considered that statelessness could only be handled as an integral part of the problem of nationality and presented an amendment (E/L.95) suggesting that the Assembly request the International Law Commission to prepare a draft general convention on nationality, including measures to eradicate the problem of statelessness. The representatives of the United States and the United Kingdom criticized this on the ground that it would bind the International Law Commission to one course of action. The Commission might see fit to deal with statelessness in any one of several different ways, and should be free to do so. The amendment was rejected in the Committee by 6 votes to 6, with 3 abstentions, and in the Council by 6 votes to 5, with 4 abstentions.

The representative of the United States suggested that any invitation or request for action should be directed to States and not specifically to Member States. The representative of Chile expressed the view that a small group of legal experts could draw up the draft convention provided that Governments first accepted at least some of the following principles: (1) that no one may lose his nationality of origin without acquiring a new nationality; (2) that women retain their nationality of origin on contracting marriage or on its dissolution; (3) that nationality, once acquired, is definitive and may not be withdrawn even as a penalty; and (4) that it is essential that agreement be reached between jus soli and jus sanguinis countries with regard to the nationality of children.¹⁴⁵

Since a number of representatives had declared their intention of abstaining from voting on the Ad Hoc Committee's draft resolution, the representative of France suggested an alternative draft which, with some additions and technical modifications, was adopted as a whole by the Social Committee (E/1814) at its 168th meeting on 8 August by 7 votes to 3, with 5 abstentions.

After having adopted amendments to replace the word "drawbacks" by "problems" and the word "sources" by "causes" in the fourth paragraph of the preamble, and to add a sentence to the fourth operative paragraph noting with satisfaction that the International Law Commission intended to initiate work on the subject of nationality, including statelessness, the Council adopted the revised resolution by 8 votes to 1, with 6 abstentions, at its 407th plenary meeting. It read as follows (319 B,III (XI)):

The Economic and Social Council,

Recalling its concern with the problem of statelessness as expressed in its resolution 248 B (IX) of 8 August 1949, in which it established an ad hoc committee to study this problem,

Having considered the report of the Ad Hoc Committee and its recommendations concerning the elimination of statelessness,

Taking note of article 15 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights concerning the right of every individual to a nationality,

Considering that statelessness entails serious problems both for individuals and for States, and that it is necessary both to reduce the number of stateless persons and to eliminate the causes of statelessness,

Considering that these different aims cannot be achieved except through the co-operation of each State and by the adoption of international conventions,

Recommends to States involved in changes of territorial sovereignty that they include in the arrangements for such changes provisions, if necessary, for the avoidance of statelessness;

Invites States to examine sympathetically applications for naturalization submitted by stateless persons habitually resident in their territory and, if necessary, to re-examine their nationality laws with a view to reducing as far as possible the number of cases of statelessness created by the operation of such laws;

¹⁴⁴ See pp. 569-70.

¹⁴⁵ Under jus soli a child takes its nationality from the country in which it is born; under jus sanguinis it takes the nationality of its parents.

Requests the Secretary-General to seek information from States with regard to the above-mentioned matters and to report thereon to the Council;

Notes with satisfaction that the International Law Commission intends to initiate as soon as possible work on the subject of nationality, including statelessness, and urges that the International Law Commission prepare at the earliest possible date the necessary draft international convention or conventions for the elimination of statelessness;

Invites the Secretary-General to transmit this resolution to the International Law Commission.

b. REPORT OF THE AD HOC COMMITTEE ON REFUGEES AND STATELESS PERSONS

The Ad Hoc Committee on Refugees and Stateless Persons reconvened from 14 to 25 August 1950 in Geneva, as requested by the Economic and Social Council (319 B,I (XI)).

The Committee in its report to the General Assembly (E/1850) stated that it considered its function to be primarily that of revising the draft Convention and draft Protocol for the consideration of the General Assembly. The drafts which it had prepared represented a consensus. They did not, however, commit the Governments which were represented.

The Committee stated that it had given careful consideration to the discussions in the Economic and Social Council, to the views expressed by observers at the meetings of the Committee and to the comments submitted by Governments and specialized agencies. Some of the observations, it was pointed out, had dealt with problems peculiar to the country in question. The Committee had, however, concentrated on establishing a standard generally acceptable and leaving it to individual nations who might not feel able to subscribe to that standard to note particular reservations.

To meet the criticism that, in some respects, the draft Convention originally prepared was not self-sufficient but relied too heavily on interpretation in the comments, the Committee had dispensed with a formal set of comments and had instead introduced some of the ideas previously contained in them into the text of the Convention. It had clarified instances in which there appeared to be conflicts between the comment and the plain language of the text.

Among the points commented upon by the Committee in its report were the following:

(1) The Committee had retained the pattern whereby refugees would enjoy at least the same treatment as aliens generally in regard to most provisions, but preferred treatment—either that of nationals of a most favoured nation or that of nationals of the Contracting State—in regard to certain other rights. It had also added a provision establishing the general principle that, where no other provision was contained in the Convention, refugees were to enjoy the same treatment as aliens generally. It had also endeavoured to make it clear that the adoption of the Convention should not impair any greater rights which refugees might enjoy prior to or apart from this Convention.

(2) The Committee had revised the text concerning the requirement of reciprocity because it considered that this was open to different interpretations in different countries. The revised text preserved rights based on reciprocity for those refugees who were entitled to enjoy them on the date on which the Convention came into force in a particular State. The Committee, however, expressed the hope that States would give sympathetic consideration to extending rights, as far as possible, to all refugees without regard to reciprocity, particularly where the rights had no relation to the requirements of residence, as, for example, compensation for war damages and persecution. But it felt that a legal obligation in this sense would be acceptable only in regard to refugees who had resided in the country "for a certain period", using this phrase on the understanding that the General Assembly would be better able to prescribe a definite period, if desirable. It was the understanding of the Committee that article 4, paragraph 2 (which provided for the preservation under the Convention of rights previously based on reciprocity), did not apply to rights conferred by treaty on nationals of a particular country only.

(3) The Committee considered that article 18, which provided that Contracting States should accord refugees the same treatment as their nationals with respect to public relief and assistance, conformed fully to the provisions of the resolution on migration adopted by the Economic and Social Council on 13 July 1950.¹⁴⁶ The Committee expressed its understanding that, despite the provisions of article 3 (B) requiring refugees to satisfy the conditions required of a national in order to enjoy the same treatment, refugees should not be required to meet any conditions of local residence or affiliation which may be required of nationals.

(4) The Committee decided not to incorporate any change in the text of Article 26, providing for the exemption from penalties of a refugee who illegally enters a country but who presents himself to the authorities and shows cause for his illegal entry. It noted that in some countries freedom from penalties on account of illegal entry was also extended to those who gave assistance for humanitarian reasons to such entrants.

(5) The Committee decided, after long discussion, to maintain the provision in article 27 that Contracting States were not to expel a refugee lawfully in their territory "save on grounds of national security or public order". While several members expressed dissatisfaction with the vagueness of the term "public order", and with the different interpretations given to the term in different countries, it was felt necessary to take into account the jurisprudence which this term had acquired in certain systems of law. The Committee felt that this provision would permit the deportation of aliens who had been convicted of certain serious crimes where in that country such crimes were considered violations of "public order". The phrase "public order" would not, however, permit the deportation of aliens on "social grounds" such as indigence or illness. The Committee clarified the procedural safeguards accorded to refugees: expulsion should be only following a decision "reached in accordance with due process of law"; and the refugee would have the right to submit evidence and to appeal to and be represented before competent authority.

(6) While some question was raised as to the possibility of exceptions to article 28, which prohibited expulsion in any manner to the frontiers of territories where the life or freedom of a refugee was threatened on account of race, religion, nationality or political opinion, the Committee felt strongly that the principle there expressed was fundamental and that it should not be impaired.

(7) With regard to reservations, the Committee noted that under article 36 of the draft Convention reservations were permitted to most of its provisions, but stated that several of these were fundamental and not subject to reservations. It expressed the hope that there would be few reservations and considered that Governments might not find it necessary to reserve an article as a whole when it would be sufficient to reserve exceptional cases of special circumstances in connexion with the application of that article.

c. CONSIDERATION BY THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY AT ITS FIFTH SESSION

The General Assembly had before it, inter alia: Economic and Social Council resolutions 319 A & B (XI); the report of the Ad Hoc Committee on Refugees and Stateless Persons (second session) (E/1850), which contained the revised draft Convention and the draft Protocol relating to the status of stateless persons; and a memorandum by the Secretary-General (A/1385), containing both the provision for the functioning of the High Commissioner's Office¹⁴⁷ adopted by the Economic and Social Council, and the Council's definition of "refugee" for article 1 of the Convention.

(1) Draft Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees

The General Assembly discussed the procedure to be followed with respect to the draft Convention and the draft Protocol at the 324th, 328th, 330th, 332nd, 337th and 338th meetings of the Third Committee, 22-27 and 30 November and 1 and 6 December, and at its 325th plenary meeting on 14 December 1950.

The views expressed as to whether the General Assembly should complete the Convention or whether it should be referred to a conference of plenipotentiaries were primarily those expressed in the Economic and Social Council.¹⁴⁸ Although a number of representatives indicated that they would have preferred to have the Convention completed during the Assembly's session, they agreed, generally, that there was insufficient time for this.

Accordingly, the Committee at its 337th meeting adopted, by 26 votes to 7, with 12 abstentions, a draft resolution proposed by the United Kingdom revised to incorporate oral amendments suggested by Lebanon, Venezuela, France and Canada (A/C.3/L.68/Rev.1). These amendments provided for reference in the draft resolution to the draft Convention prepared by the Ad Hoc Committee and the Economic and Social Council, the Protocol relating to stateless persons, and the definition of the term "refugee" as adopted by the Council. The Committee also adopted by 37 votes to 5, with 4 abstentions, a New Zealand amendment (A/C.3/L.140) to add a paragraph calling on the High Commissioner to participate in the work of the Conference.

The representative of Australia, who considered that the final drafting of the Convention should be done in the Assembly, even if it meant waiting until the sixth session, had presented an alternative draft resolution (A/C.3/L.136) which would refer the draft Convention and Protocol back to the Economic and Social Council with a request that it should be resubmitted with recommendations to the sixth session of the General Assembly. Following the adoption of the United Kingdom draft resolution, as amended by New Zealand, no vote was taken on the Australian proposal.

After a brief discussion with regard to its financial implication a Belgian-French proposal (A/C.3/L.143) to hold the Conference in Geneva was adopted by the Committee at its 338th meeting by 18 votes to 9, with 18 abstentions.

The draft resolution adopted by the Third Committee (A/1682) was discussed at the General Assembly's 325th plenary meeting on 14 December. After having adopted, by 29 votes to 7, with 14 abstentions, a Venezuelan amendment (A/1725) to specify in the resolution that the meeting would be held in Geneva, the Assembly adopted resolution 429 (V), as a whole, by 41 votes to 5, with 10 abstentions, as follows¹⁴⁹:

The General Assembly,

Considering that, by its resolution 362 (IV) of 22 October 1949, it approved the recommendation of the Special Committee on Methods and Procedures that the General Assembly might decide to convene a conference of plenipotentiaries to study, negotiate, draft, and possibly sign conventions that had been drawn up by conferences in which all Members of the United Nations had not been invited to take part, ¹⁴⁷ See pp. 583 ff.

¹⁴⁹ The annex to the resolution, containing article 1 of the draft Convention, was included in this vote. For text of the article, as adopted, see pp. 579-80.

Considering the desirability of enabling the governments of States not Members of the United Nations to participate in the final stages of the drafting of the Convention relating to the Status of Refugees, as prepared by the Ad Hoc Committee on Refugees and Stateless Persons and the Economic and Social Council,

1. Decides to convene in Geneva a conference of plenipotentiaries to complete the drafting of and to sign both the Convention relating to the Status of Refugees and the Protocol relating to the Status of Stateless Persons;

2. Recommends to governments participating in the conference to take into consideration the draft Convention submitted by the Economic and Social Council and, in particular, the text of the definition of the term "refugee" as set forth in the annex hereto;

3. Requests the Secretary-General to take the steps necessary for the convening of such a conference at the earliest possible opportunity;

4. Instructs the Secretary-General to invite the governments of all States, both Members and non-members of the United Nations, to attend the said conference of plenipotentiaries;

5. Calls upon the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, in accordance with the provisions of the Statute of his Office, to participate in the work of the Conference.

(2) Definition of the Term "Refugee" in the Draft Convention

The definitions of the term "refugee" to be included in the Convention and in the Statute of the High Commissioner's Office¹⁵⁰ were discussed together by the General Assembly at the 324th-332nd, 334th and 335th meetings of the Third Committee, 22-30 November and 1, 4 and 5 December, and at the 325th plenary meeting on 14 December 1950.

In general, two different views were again expressed. The representatives of France, Venezuela, Israel and the United States, among others, stressed the importance of a precise definition of the term "refugee" so that those to be afforded protection could be clearly identified. The Council, they argued, had enumerated clearly those in need of international protection. Other categories of refugees, such as those created by the transfer of populations, enjoyed the same rights and privileges as nationals in their countries and were not in need of international protection. The main purpose of the United Nations should be to prevent refugees from becoming a liability to the international community.

Among others, the representatives of Belgium, Canada, the Netherlands, Turkey, the United Kingdom and Yugoslavia favoured a broad definition. The representative of Australia stated that, although in the Council his delegation had supported the definition by categories, he now felt that the general definition might be preferable in the Statute. The representatives of Chile and the Union of South Africa supported the insertion of a general definition in the Convention and a limited one in the Statute for the High Commissioner's Office.

The representatives of the United Kingdom and Belgium, in sponsoring broader definitions in both cases, stressed particularly that the definition should not be limited to apply only to European refugees. The representative of Belgium further pointed out that under the Council definition a large number of persons had been refused refugee status and victims of the Nazi or fascist regimes had been granted such status. This seemed unjustified, as apparently nothing prevented these refugees from obtaining legal protection from the authorities currently administering Western Germany and Austria.

The representatives of Poland and Czechoslovakia expressed the opinion that the proposed definition was designed to enable certain countries to continue to use refugees as agents to provoke political disorder in their countries of origin. If the United Nations adopted the proposal to apply the term "refugee" to all who renounced their nationality of their own free will, it would protect persons co-operating with the intelligence services of the countries waging war against the Governments of the "peoples' democracies".

At the 329th meeting of the Committee on 29 November an informal working group was formed, composed of the representatives of Belgium, Canada, France, Israel, Turkey, the United Kingdom, the United States and Venezuela. The Group took into consideration the amendments and resolutions presented by the following States: Yugoslavia (A/C.3/L.122); France (A/C.3/L.123 & 129); Israel (A/C.3/L.124); Venezuela (A/C.3/L.125 & 126); Egypt, Lebanon and Saudi Arabia (A/C.3/L.128); Belgium, Canada, Turkey and United Kingdom (A/C.3/L.130).

At the 332nd meeting on 1 December, the Informal Working Group presented revised joint "compromise" amendments (A/C.3/L.131/Rev.1).¹⁵¹ The amendment concerning the definition of "refugee" to be included in the draft Convention was as follows:

I. Substitute the following text for Chapter I, Article 1 of the draft Convention on the Status of Refugees, (document E/1850):

¹⁵⁰ For consideration by the Assembly of the definition of "refugee" to be included in the Statute, see pp. 583 ff.

"A. For the purposes of this Convention, the term 'refugee' shall apply to any person who:

"(1) Since 1 August 1914, has been considered a refugee under the Arrangements of 12 May 1926 and 30 June 1928 or under the Conventions of 28 October 1933 and 10 February 1938, the Protocol of 14 September 1939 or the Constitution of the International Refugee Organization;¹⁵²

"Decisions as to eligibility taken by the International Refugee Organization during the period of its activities shall not prevent the status of refugee being accorded to persons who fulfil the conditions of paragraph 2 of this article;

"(2) As a result of events occurring before 1 January 1951 and owing to well-founded fear of being persecuted for reasons of race, religion, nationality or political opinion, is outside the country of his nationality and is unable, or owing to such fear or for reasons other than personal convenience is unwilling, to avail himself of the protection of that country; or who, not having a nationality and being outside the country of his former habitual residence, is unable, or owing to such fear or for reasons other than personal convenience, is unwilling to return to it;¹⁵³

"In the case of a person who has more than one nationality, the above term 'the country of his nationality' shall mean any of the countries of which he is a national, and a person shall not be deemed to be lacking the protection of the country of his nationality if, without any valid reason based on well-founded fear, he has not availed himself of the protection of one of the countries of which he is a national;¹⁵⁴

"B. This Convention shall cease to apply to any person falling under the terms of Section A if:

"(1) He has voluntarily re-availed himself of the protection of the country of his nationality; or

"(2) Having lost his nationality, he has voluntarily re-acquired it; or

"(3) He has acquired a new nationality, and enjoys the protection of the country of his new nationality;¹⁵⁵ or

"(5) He can no longer, because the circumstances in connexion with which he has been recognized as a refugee have ceased to exist, claim grounds other than those of personal convenience for continuing to refuse to avail himself of the protection of the country of his nationality. Reasons of a purely economic character may not be invoked;¹⁵⁶ or

"(6) If, being a person who has no nationality, he can no longer, because of circumstances in connexion with which he has been recognized as a refugee have ceased to exist, and he is able to return to the country of his former habitual residence, claim grounds other than those of personal convenience for continuing to refuse to return to that country;¹⁵⁷

"C. (1) The provisions of this Convention shall not apply to any person with respect to whom there are serious reasons for considering that (a) he has committed a crime specified in Article VI of the London Charter of the International Military Tribunal; or (b) he falls under the provisions of Article 14, paragraph 2, of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights;

"(2) This Convention shall not apply to a person who has entered a country with whose nationals he has close ties of ethnic and cultural kinship and, because of such kinship, enjoys the rights and privileges usually attached to the possession of the nationality of such country;

"(3) This Convention shall not apply to persons who fall under the auspices of other organs or agencies of the United Nations, other than the International Refugee Organization¹⁵⁸

"D. The Contracting States may agree to add to the definition of the term 'refugee' contained in this article persons in other categories, including such as may be recommended by the General Assembly."¹⁵⁹

As regards part I of the Working Group's proposals—concerning the definition of "refugee" to be inserted in article 1 of the draft Convention—the Committee at its 332nd meeting on 1 December took the following decisions.

(1) It rejected, by 34 votes to 1, with 11 abstentions, a motion of the Chairman that the text be binding on the proposed conference of plenipotentiaries. In discussing the procedure to be followed, it had been generally conceded that sovereign States, whether or not United Nations Members, should have the right to make the final decision and that the Assembly should only recommend a definition.

¹⁵⁶ This paragraph and section C(2) below were added by the Working Group. It also deleted the paragraph inserted by the Council which would exclude members of a former German minority from coming within the terms of the definition if they had established themselves in Germany or were living there. It was the opinion of the Committee that the inclusion of such a provision would have a discriminatory connotation. The General Assembly, however, in plenary session adopted an amendment which would cover such persons but not specify their ethnic origin (see p. 579).

¹⁵⁸ This paragraph was added by the Working Group, based on an amendment proposed jointly by Lebanon, Egypt and Saudi Arabia (A/C.3/L.128). As the revised definition, if adopted, would no longer refer to Europeans only, this paragraph was suggested to exclude from the application of the Convention Palestine refugees as long as they were receiving aid and protection from other United Nations sources.

(2) It adopted, by 14 votes to 6, with 18 abstentions, a Saudi Arabian proposal to delete section C(2), which had provided that the Convention should not apply to a person entering a country "with whose nationals he has close ties of ethnic and cultural kinship" and on account of this enjoyed privileges usually attached to the possession of nationality. It was felt that the words "close ties of ethnic and cultural kinship" were too vague and incapable of precise definition. It was also not clear why these persons, presumably not nationals of the country referred to, should enjoy the same rights and privileges as the country's nationals. Moreover, the inclusion of the paragraph was considered dangerous. Persons fleeing from a neighbouring state, for example, should not be excluded from the application of the Convention because they happened to speak the same language as those of the country in which they sought refuge.

(3) It adopted, by 22 votes to 5, with 12 abstentions, an Australian amendment (A/C.3/L.133) to section C(3) to have it read: "This Convention shall not apply to persons who are at present receiving from other organs of the United Nations protection or assistance." The amendment aimed at avoiding the vagueness of a reference to persons "who fall under the auspices of other organs or agencies of the United Nations . . .".

(4) It rejected, by 14 votes to 6, with 2 abstentions, an Australian amendment (A/C.3/L.133) to reword section C(1). This paragraph provided that the Convention should not be applicable to any persons there were serious reasons for considering guilty of a crime under Article VI of the Charter of the International Military Tribunal or as falling under the provision of article 14, paragraph 2, of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. The representative of Australia, supported by the representative of Chile, stressed the vagueness of the provisions and their inappropriateness in a convention which would be legally binding. For example, Article 14 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights stated that the right to asylum "may not be invoked in the case of prosecutions genuinely arising from non-political crimes or from acts contrary to the purposes and principles of the United Nations". While this type of language belonged in a declaration which proclaimed moral principles, it could easily be used to deprive many persons of the benefits which they might otherwise enjoy under the draft Convention.

The Third Committee adopted the definition in part I, as a whole, as amended, by 12 votes to 6, with 21 abstentions, at the 332nd meeting on 1 December (see below for text).

The General Assembly considered the report of the Third Committee (A/1682) at its 325th plenary meeting on 14 December. It adopted by 41 votes to 5, with 10 abstentions, resolution 429(V) relating to the status of refugees and the proposed definition to be included in the Convention, which it annexed to the resolution.

Before voting on the text, it adopted by 38 votes to 6, with 10 abstentions, an amendment presented by France, the United Kingdom and the United States (A/1685) to reinstate in a revised form a paragraph, proposed by the Economic and Social Council but rejected by the Third Committee's Informal Working Group,¹⁶⁰ to exclude from the definition former members of a German minority if they had established themselves in Germany. The new text did not, however, specify the ethnic origin of such persons, as it was thought that this would show discrimination (see paragraph D, below).

The text of the recommended definition of the term "refugee" in article 1 of the draft Convention as annexed to resolution 429(V) read as follows:

ANNEX

DRAFT CONVENTION RELATING TO THE STATUS OF REFUGEES

CHAPTER I

Article 1

A. For the purposes of the present Convention, the term "refugee" shall apply to any person who:

(1) Since 1 August 1914 has been considered a refugee under the Arrangements of 12 May 1926 and 30 June 1928 or under the Conventions of 28 October 1933 and 10 February 1938, the Protocol of 14 September 1939 or the Constitution of the International Refugee Organization;

Decisions as to eligibility taken by the International Refugee Organization during the period of its activities shall not prevent the status of refugee being accorded to persons who fulfil the conditions of paragraph 2 of the present article;

(2) As a result of events occurring before 1 January 1951, and owing to well-founded fear of being persecuted for reasons of race, religion, nationality or political opinion, is outside the country of his nationality and is unable or, owing to such fear or for reasons other than personal convenience, is unwilling to avail himself of the protection of that country; or who, not having a nationality and being outside the country of his former habitual residence, is unable or, owing to such fear or for reasons other than personal convenience, is unwilling to return to it;

In the case of a person who has more than one nationality, the above term "the country of his nationality" shall mean any of the countries of which he is a national, and a person shall not be deemed to be lacking the protection of the country of his nationality if, without any valid reason based on well-founded fear, he has not availed himself of the protection of one of the countries of which he is a national.

B. The present Convention shall cease to apply to any person falling under the terms of section A if:

(1) He has voluntarily re-availed himself of the protection of the country of his nationality; or

(2) Having lost his nationality, he has voluntarily re-acquired it; or

(3) He has acquired a new nationality, and enjoys the protection of the country of his new nationality; or

(4) He has voluntarily re-established himself in the country which he left or outside which he remained owing to fear of persecution; or

(5) He can no longer, because the circumstances in connexion with which he has been recognized as a refugee have ceased to exist, claim grounds other than those of personal convenience for continuing to refuse

to avail himself of the protection of the country of his nationality. Reasons of a purely economic character may not be invoked; of

(6) Being a person who has no nationality, he can no longer, because the circumstances in connexion with which he has been recognized as a refugee have ceased to exist and he is able to return to the country of his former habitual residence, claim grounds other than those of personal convenience for continuing to refuse to return to that country.

C. The present Convention shall not apply to persons who are at present receiving from other organs or agencies of the United Nations protection or assistance.

D. The present Convention shall not apply to a person who is recognized by the competent authorities of the country in which he has taken residence as having the rights and obligations which are attached to the possession of the nationality of that country.

E. The provisions of the present Convention shall not apply to any person with respect to whom there are serious reasons for considering that (a) he has committed a crime specified in article VI of the London Charter of the International Military Tribunal; or (b) he falls under the provisions of article 14, paragraph 2, of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

F. The Contracting States may agree to add to the definition of the term "refugee" contained in the present article persons in other categories, including such as may be recommended by the General Assembly.

2. Provisions for the Functioning of the High Commissioner's Office

a. CONSIDERATION BY THE ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL AT ITS ELEVENTH SESSION

The Economic and Social Council discussed the provisions for the functioning of the High Commissioner's Office for Refugees at the 169th-173rd meetings of its Social Committee on 31 July, 8, 10 and 12 August, and at the 414th plenary meeting on 16 August 1950.

In its resolution 319 A (IV) of 3 December 1949, the General Assembly had established as of 1 January 1951 a High Commissioner's Office for Refugees,¹⁶¹ and had asked the Secretary-General to submit to the Council, and the Council to submit to the Assembly's fifth session, draft provisions for the functioning of the Office, in accordance with the provisions set forth in the annex to the Assembly's resolution. The Council had also been requested to transmit to the Assembly such recommendations as it might deem appropriate regarding the definition of the term "refugee" to be applied by the High Commissioner.

The Secretary-General submitted for the Council's consideration a draft resolution (E/1669) containing detailed provisions for implementing the Assembly's resolution. The Assembly had proposed, in the annex to its resolution, that, in the first place, the persons coming under the competence of the High Commissioner's Office should be refugees and displaced persons as defined in annex I to the Constitution of the International Refugee Organization (IRO).¹⁶²

The Secretary-General pointed out that this definition differed from that contained in article 1 of the draft Convention relating to the Status of Refugees prepared by the Ad Hoc Committee on Statelessness and Related Problems (E/1618),¹⁶³ and suggested that the definition of those coming under the competence of the High Commissioner's Office should be the same as that contained in the draft Convention.

The Council also had before it a resolution of the IRO General Council which stated that certain sections of parts I and II of annex I to its Constitution¹⁶⁴ had been adopted in 1946 and were no longer applicable with respect to the furnishing of protection. The General Council suggested to the Economic and Social Council that it consider recommending that the Assembly instruct the High Commissioner for Refugees not to apply these provisions in the performance of his function of affording protection to refugees, and not to apply any decisions previously made by the General Council or the administration of IRO restricting the services of the Organization to refugees and displaced persons, such as the "freeze-order"¹⁶⁵ and date-lines, which had been adopted by IRO for purely financial or administrative reasons (E/1668).

Comments on the draft resolution prepared by the Secretary-General were submitted to the Council at its eleventh session by the Governments of Belgium (E/1767), Italy (E/1767/Add.1; E/1703/Add.6) and the Philippines (E/1801).

¹⁶² See Y.U.N., 1946-47, pp. 815-17, for definition of refugees and stateless persons coming within the scope of IRO. Broadly speaking, these were to be (1) persons outside their country of nationality or of former habitual residence (whether they have retained this nationality or are de jure stateless) who belong to any of several specified categories commonly recognized as having a refugee status; and (2) persons outside their country of nationality or former habitual residence who as a result of events subsequent to the outbreak of the Second World War are unable or unwilling to avail themselves of the protection of the Government of their country of nationality or (in the case of stateless persons) of former nationality.

¹⁶⁵ For explanation, see Y.U.N., 1947-48, pp. 958f.

At its eleventh session the Council also had before it statements from the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (E/C.2/261), the Friends' World Committee for Consultation (E/C.2/273), the International Social Service (E/C.2/274), the International Students Service (E/C.2/275), the Commission of the Churches on International Affairs (E/C.2/267) and the Consultative Council of Jewish Organizations (E/C.2/260).

The Social Committee at its 169th meeting decided to use a French proposal (E/AC.7/L.60) as the basis for its discussions. The representative of France explained that his primary aim had been to unite in one text everything relating to measures of implementation in the Assembly resolution and in the document prepared by the Secretary-General. He had endeavoured to divide the Statute into four main chapters, (1) dealing with general principles; (2) dealing with organization—including sections on the High Commissioner's Office, an advisory committee for refugees and the headquarters of the Office; (3) dealing with the powers, functions and competence of the High Commissioner; and (4) containing certain general provisions relating to administrative and budgetary matters.

The Committee discussed each chapter in some detail, but paid particular attention to the definition of the refugees who would fall under the competence of the Office. Most members thought that the definition contained in the Statute should be the same as that contained in article 1 of the draft Convention relating to the status of refugees. Those representatives (Belgium, Canada, Pakistan, United Kingdom), however, who had wanted a broad definition to be included in the draft Convention¹⁶⁶ expressed the view that such a definition was even more necessary in the Statute of the High Commissioner's Office. They stated that, as the expenses of the Office would be borne by all Members of the United Nations, it should extend protection to all groups of refugees. It was pointed out, however, by the representatives of France and the United States, that the arrangements for the High Commissioner's Office were designed to protect refugees who, through lack of any legal status, were in need of international protection and that, while there were many refugees all over the world in urgent need of relief, such refugees enjoyed the protection of Governments and were therefore outside the scope of the arrangements as at present envisaged. The representative of the United States also argued that the High Commissioner would find himself in a confusing situation if the definition of refugees falling under his competence differed from that contained in the draft Convention, and, furthermore, the Council had decided that the Convention should contain a definition by categories.¹⁶⁷

The Social Committee at its 173rd meeting on 12 August, by 8 votes to 3, with 3 abstentions, adopted with slight amendments a definition suggested by the United States (E/AC.7/L.73), the French text having been withdrawn in its favour. Under the recommended definition, refugees falling under the competence of the High Commissioner's Office were to be those defined in the Convention as approved by the General Assembly, and such other persons as the Assembly might from time to time determine. It was left to the High Commissioner to determine which cases were excluded from his mandate in accordance with paragraph c of Article 1 of the Convention.¹⁶⁸ It was also recommended that the High Commissioner might intercede with Governments on behalf of other categories of refugees, pending consideration by the General Assembly as to whether to bring such categories within his mandate.

The Committee rejected by roll-call vote of 6 to 5, with 3 abstentions, a proposal by the United Kingdom representative to define refugees in much broader terms.

The Council also paid considerable attention to the suggestion under chapter II of the French working paper that an advisory council should be set up to give advice on all questions submitted by the High Commissioner, and that such a council should be composed of representatives of States, whether Members of the United Nations or not, which were devoted to the cause of refugees and desired to support the High Commissioner's work. The representatives of Canada, China, Denmark, Mexico and the United Kingdom, among others, stated that they were not opposed, in principle, to the establishment of an advisory body but did not think that it should be set up at this time. It was pointed out by the United States representative that an advisory council could provide the High Commissioner with advice, as opposed to directives, on extremely difficult problems with which he would have to deal. The majority view was, however, that the High Commissioner should have some experience before a final decision was taken on this question. It was therefore decided by 12 votes to none, with 2 abstentions, at the 171st meeting of the Committee, to provide for the possibility of setting up an advisory body, but to recommend that its establishment should be deferred until the High Commissioner had expressed his views on the subject.

The Social Committee unanimously agreed also to delete the paragraph in chapter III which provided that the High Commissioner would convene the Advisory Council by agreement with the Secretary-General. Should the Council decide that an advisory body should be established, it could then, the Committee felt, establish its terms of reference.

Among other decisions taken by the Social Committee during its detailed consideration of the Statute were the following:

(1) The Committee unanimously agreed that more emphasis should be placed on the High Commissioner's duty to assist Governments and voluntary agencies, subject to Government approval, in repatriating and assimilating refugees in new national communities. It therefore adopted a United States amendment (E/AC.7/L.73), further amended by France, to this effect.

(2) The representative of France accepted a United States proposal (E/AC.7/L.73) to broaden the provision for policy directives and bring them into keeping with the formula agreed on by the Assembly. The amended paragraph provided that these directives would be given to the High Commissioner by the United Nations, according to methods determined by the Assembly.

(3) The Committee by 12 votes to none, with 1 abstention, adopted a United States proposal to have the Assembly approve the appointment of the High Commissioner on the Secretary-General's nomination. It was agreed that this provision would be more definitive and in keeping with the decision taken by the Assembly than the French text under which the Secretary-General was to draw up the Commissioner's contract. The representative of China, both in Committee and in plenary meeting, stated that he could not agree that the High Commissioner should be elected on the nomination of the Secretary-General since it might create a dangerous precedent. He, therefore, at the 414th meeting of the Council, reserved the right of his delegation to raise the matter in the General Assembly.

(4) The Committee unanimously adopted a United States amendment which, in keeping with the Assembly's formula, would specify that the High Commissioner was not to appeal to Governments for funds or make a general appeal without the prior approval of the General Assembly. On the United Kingdom's recommendation, the Committee also unanimously agreed that the High Commissioner should report on these activities annually.

The Social Committee adopted the Statute, as amended, by 11 votes to none, with 4 abstentions, at its 173rd meeting on 12 August.

To introduce the Statute the representative of France had earlier proposed a draft resolution

(E/AC.7/L.60) which would have the General Assembly, in view of resolution 319 (IV), adopt the Statute prepared by the Council.

The Committee, by 14 votes to none, with 1 abstention, adopted a United Kingdom proposal to add to the resolution, in an amended form, a section from the Secretary-General's proposed resolution (E/1669), calling on Governments to co-operate with the High Commissioner in specific ways.

A proposal by the representative of Belgium (E/AC.7/L.75) which would have the Assembly allocate special funds to the High Commissioner for the purpose of granting material aid on a temporary basis to refugees in dire need was rejected by 10 votes to 1, with 4 abstentions.

The draft resolution, as a whole, was adopted by the Social Committee at its 173rd meeting by 9 votes to none, with 6 abstentions (see below).

The Council considered the Social Committee's report (E/1831) at its 414th plenary meeting on 16 August 1950 and, after a brief discussion, adopted resolution 319 A (XI) by 9 votes to none, with 6 abstentions.

The representatives of Belgium, Canada, China, Denmark, Pakistan and the United Kingdom reserved the right either to support any move to enlarge the definition of a "refugee" or to raise the issue in the General Assembly.

By resolution 319 A (XI) the Council drew up a draft resolution for the General Assembly by which the Council would adopt the text annexed to the resolution as the Statute of the High Commissioner's Office for Refugees. The Assembly, as provided in the resolution, would call upon Governments to co-operate with the High Commissioner in the performance of his duties concerning refugees falling under the competence of his Office, especially by:

- (a) becoming parties to and implementing the provisions of the pertinent international conventions;
- (b) entering into special agreements with him;
- (c) admitting refugees, including the most destitute, to their territories;
- (d) promoting voluntary repatriation of refugees;
- (e) promoting their assimilation, especially by making naturalization less difficult;
- (f) providing refugees with travel and other necessary documents which would facilitate resettlement and, in particular, continuing to issue and accept documents under the 1946 London refugee travel agreement until it is superseded;
- (g) permitting the necessary transfer of assets;
- (h) providing the High Commissioner with information concerning the number and condition of refugees and laws and regulations concerning them.

b. CONSIDERATION IN THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY AT ITS FIFTH SESSION

The General Assembly had before it Economic and Social Council resolutions 319 A & B (XI) and a memorandum by the Secretary-General (A/1385), containing both the provisions for the functioning of the High Commissioner's Office adopted by the Council and the Council's definition of a refugee proposed for inclusion in article 1 of the Convention.¹⁶⁹

The definition of the term "refugee" to be included in the Convention and in the Statute were discussed together by the General Assembly at the 324th-332nd, 334th, and 335th meetings of the Third Committee, 22-30 November and 1, 4 and 5 December and at the 325th plenary meeting on 14 December, 1950.

The discussion centred "on the question of whether to include a broad or a precise definition in both the Statute and the Convention. The representatives of France, Venezuela, Israel and the United States, among others, were in favour of a precise definition, while the representatives of Belgium, Canada, the Netherlands, Turkey, the United Kingdom and Yugoslavia, among others, were in favour of a general definition. The representative of Australia favoured a general definition for the Statute, but the representatives of Chile and the Union of South Africa supported a limited definition, while favouring a general one for the Convention."¹⁷⁰

At the 329th meeting of the Committee on 29 November an informal working group was formed, composed of the representatives of Belgium, Canada, France, Israel, Turkey, the United Kingdom, the United States and Venezuela. The Group took into consideration the amendments and resolutions presented by the following States: Yugoslavia (A/C.3/L.132); France (A/C.3/L.123 & 129); Israel (A/C.3/L.124); Venezuela (A/C.3/L.125 & 126); Egypt, Lebanon and Saudi Arabia (A/C.3/L.128); Belgium, Canada, Turkey and United Kingdom (A/C.3/L.130).

At the 332nd meeting on 1 December the Informal Working Group presented revised joint "compromise" amendments (A/C.3/L.131/Rev.1).¹⁷¹ Part I of this text dealt with the definition of the term "refugee" to be applied under the Convention relating to the status of refugees.¹⁷²

The amendments concerning the definition to be included in the Statute were as follows:

II. Amend the Statute of the High Commissioner's Office for Refugees, Chapter I,¹⁷³ General Principles

(A/1385, page 7), by inserting a new paragraph to be (I), the present four paragraphs to be renumbered II, III, IV and V:

"The High Commissioner acting under the authority of the General Assembly shall perform the function of providing international protection under the auspices of the United Nations, to refugees who fall within the scope of this Statute, in that connexion, he shall have the general power to intervene on their behalf. In the exercise of his functions, more particularly when difficulties arise, and for instance with regard to any controversy concerning the international status of these persons, the High Commissioner shall request the opinion of the Advisory Council¹⁷⁴

III. Amend Chapter III,¹⁷⁵ Section C, "Competence", as follows:

"1. The persons to whom the competence of the High Commissioner extends shall include:

"(a) persons who are refugees within the terms of Parts A and B of article 1 of the draft Convention relating to the Status of Refugees, as established in document A/C.3/L.131/Rev.1; and

"(b) any other person, who is outside the country of his nationality or, if he has no nationality, the country of his former habitual residence, because he has or had well-founded fear of victimization by reason of his race, religion, nationality or political opinions and is unable or, because of such fear, is unwilling to avail himself of the protection of the government of the country of his nationality or, if he has no nationality, to return to the country of his former habitual residence;

"2. Provided that the competence of the High Commissioner as defined in paragraph 1 above shall not extend to:

"(a) a person who is a national of more than one country unless he satisfies the provisions of the preceding paragraph in relation to each of the countries of which he is a national; or

"(b) a person who has entered a country with whose nationals he has close ties of ethnic and cultural kinship and because of this kinship enjoys the rights and privileges usually attached to the possession of the nationality of such country; or ¹⁶⁹ See p. 572.

¹⁷¹ The amendments, as originally proposed, except for those involving only drafting and procedural changes, are indicated in footnotes. Italics in the proposed text indicate revised phraseology.

¹⁷² See pp. 577-78.

Many of these proposals, including some suggested by Venezuela (A/C.3/L.126) and France (A/C.3/L.129) were automatically met by the decision to extend the competence of the High Commissioner's Office to those categories of refugees defined in article 1 of the draft Convention.

"(c) a person who, on 1 January 1951, came under the auspices of other organs or agencies of the United Nations, other than the International Refugee Organization; or

"(d) a person in respect of whom there are serious reasons for considering that he has committed a crime covered by the provisions of treaties of extradition or a crime mentioned in Article VI of the London Charter of the International Military Tribunal or by the provisions of article 14, paragraph 2, of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights."

Part II of the Working Group's text was discussed at the Third Committee's 335th meeting on 5 December. The following were among the decisions taken by the Committee:

(1) It rejected by 29 votes to 12, with 3 abstentions, a Yugoslav amendment (A/C.3/L.132) to delete all references to an advisory council. The representative of Yugoslavia, in presenting the amendment, had stated there was no practical use for such a council and, in addition, it was potentially dangerous since it might gain sufficient power to circumscribe the High Commissioner's freedom of action.

(2) It adopted, by 34 votes to 2, with 10 abstentions, a Chilean proposal to insert after the references to the advisory council the words "if it is created".

(3) It adopted by 23 votes to 11, with 11 abstentions, an Australian proposal (A/C.3/L.133) to delete the sentence "In that connexion [i.e. with regard to the refugees falling within the scope of the Statute] he [the High Commissioner] shall have the general power to intervene on their behalf".

Part II, as a whole, was adopted by 31 votes to 5, with 8 abstentions.

The Third Committee discussed part III concerning the Competence of the High Commissioner's Office at its 334th meeting on 4 December.

(1) The Committee, by 33 votes to none, with 9 abstentions, adopted a New Zealand proposal for a new text of section 2 (b). The original paragraph stated that the High Commissioner's competence should not extend to a person entering a country with whose nationals he had close ethnic and cultural ties and on this account enjoyed privileges usually attached to the possession of nationalities. The new text provided that the High Commissioner's competence should not extend to a "person who is recognized by the competent authorities of the country in which he has taken residence as having the rights and obligations which are attached to the possession of the nationality of that country".

(2) It adopted, by 20 votes to 5, with 4 abstentions, an Australian amendment (A/C.3/L.133) to reword section 2 (c) which had excluded those "who on 1 January 1951, came under the auspices of other organs or agencies of the United Nations, other than the International Refugee Organization". The Australian amendment substituted the words "a person who is receiving from other organs or agencies of the United Nations protection or assistance".

(3) The Committee rejected by 14 votes to 11, with 15 abstentions, an Australian proposal (A/C.3/L.133) to delete all references in section 2(d) to crimes mentioned in the International Military Tribunal or in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

Part III of the text was adopted, as a whole, by 15 votes to 5, with 17 abstentions.

The remaining provisions of the Statute as formulated by the Council (A/1385) were discussed by the Third Committee at its 335th-337th, 341st and 342nd meetings, 5, 6, 8 and 11 December, and at the 325th plenary meeting, 14 December 1950.

A number of amendments to the Statute and to the resolution introducing it were submitted orally and in writing and were for the most part accepted by the Committee.

The following were among the substantive amendments to the Statute adopted by the Committee:

(1) By 33 votes to 4, with 9 abstentions, it adopted a United Kingdom amendment (A/C.3/L.118) to specify that directives would be given to the High Commissioner by the General Assembly or the Economic and Social Council. The original paragraph provided that he would be given directives by the United Nations, according to methods determined by the General Assembly.

(2) A Yugoslav amendment (A/C.3/L.132) to indicate in the Statute that the High Commissioner's work would be "humanitarian and social" was adopted by 36 votes to 5, with 1 abstention. In adopting this amendment the Committee agreed that the Statute itself should thus indicate that the work of the High Commissioner was not to be political in character.

(3) In slightly modified form the Committee adopted by 18 votes to 7, with 14 abstentions, an Israeli proposal (A/C.3/L.139 & Corr.1) that the High Commissioner should also provide for the protection of refugees by: promoting their admission to States, not excluding the most destitute refugees; obtaining permission for the transfer of their assets, especially those necessary for resettlement; and obtaining from Governments information with regard to their number and conditions and laws and regulations concerning them.

With regard to the draft resolution proposed by the Council, the Committee adopted the following substantive amendments:

(1) By 17 votes to 8, with 12 abstentions, it adopted an Israeli proposal (A/C.3/L.139 & Corr.1) to delete the reference to the inter-governmental travel agreement of London. The representative of Israel had pointed out that it was to be presumed that the parties to an instrument applied it in good faith and that the necessary travel documents would be provided.

(2) By 27 votes to 5, with 8 abstentions, the Committee adopted a further Israeli amendment which would ensure that the resolution would be brought to the notice of States not Members of the United Nations.

The remaining amendments did not deal with the substance of the Statute and resolution and were, for the most part, concerned with procedural and drafting changes.

At the 341st meeting of the Committee on 8 December the agreed text of the draft Statute, which included the definition of the term "refugee", was rearranged and in part re-drafted (A/C.3/L.151) by a Drafting Sub-Committee consisting of representatives of Canada, France, Israel, Lebanon, Pakistan, the United Kingdom, the United States and Venezuela.

The draft resolution, as amended (A/C.3/L.142), together with the annex containing the draft Statute (A/C.3/L.151) as amended,¹⁷⁶ was adopted at the 344th meeting of the Committee by 26 votes to 5, with 2 abstentions.

Meanwhile, during the 324th to 328th meetings of the Third Committee on 22 to 27 November, the representatives of the Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, Poland, the Ukrainian SSR and the USSR had again stated their objections, which they had held in the past when the subject had been discussed, to the High Commissioner's Office and the general policy being undertaken. His Office, they claimed, would not solve the refugee problem or enable effective assistance to be given to the hundreds of thousands of people who, six years after the war, were still in camps or scattered around the world. The High Commissioner's Office was intended to perpetuate the problem which dated back to the refusal by the West and IRO to carry out Assembly directives for repatriation. Charges were again made and defended that the refugees were being used for cheap and slave labour, for spying and subversive activities, and that the Office would merely be another centre for the exchange of slave labour and would serve no worthwhile purpose.

A Byelorussian SSR proposal (A/C.3/L.120), under which the General Assembly would invite all Member States to conform to the provisions of resolution 8(I) of 12 February 1946 and request the Governments of Member States in whose territories there were still refugees and displaced persons to submit to the Secretary-General full information regarding such refugees and displaced persons, was rejected paragraph by paragraph at the 326th meeting on 24 November 1950. Therefore no vote was taken on the whole.

The General Assembly at its 325th plenary meeting on 14 December 1950, on the recommendation of the Third Committee (A/1682), adopted resolution 428(V) by 36 votes to 5, with 11 abstentions. On the same day the Assembly elected, by secret ballot, Mr. G. J. van Heuven Goedhart as High Commissioner. Resolution 428(V) read:

The General Assembly,

In view of its resolution 319 A (IV) of 3 December 1949,

1. Adopts the annex to the present resolution, being the Statute of the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees;

2. Calls upon governments to co-operate with the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees in the performance of his functions concerning refugees falling under the competence of his Office, especially by:

(a) Becoming parties to international conventions providing for the protection of refugees, and taking the necessary steps of implementation under such conventions;

(b) Entering into special agreements with the High Commissioner for the execution of measures calculated to improve the situation of refugees and to reduce the number requiring protection;

(c) Admitting refugees to their territories, not excluding those in the most destitute categories;

(d) Assisting the High Commissioner in his efforts to promote the voluntary repatriation of refugees;

(e) Promoting the assimilation of refugees, especially by facilitating their naturalization;

(f) Providing refugees with travel and other documents such as would normally be provided to other aliens by their national authorities, especially documents which would facilitate their resettlement;

(g) Permitting refugees to transfer their assets and especially those necessary for their resettlement;

(h) Providing the High Commissioner with information concerning the number and condition of refugees, and laws and regulations concerning them;

3. Requests the Secretary-General to transmit the present resolution, together with the annex attached thereto, also to States non-members of the United Nations, with a view to obtaining their co-operation in its implementation.

ANNEX

STATUTE OF THE OFFICE OF THE UNITED NATIONS HIGH COMMISSIONER FOR REFUGEES

GENERAL PROVISIONS

1. The United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, acting under the authority of the General Assembly, shall assume the function of providing international protection, under the auspices of the United Nations, to refugees who fall within the scope of the present Statute and of seeking permanent solutions for the problem of refugees by assisting governments and, subject to the approval of the governments concerned, private organizations to facilitate the voluntary repatriation of such refugees, or their assimilation within new national communities.

In the exercise of his functions, more particularly when difficulties arise, and for instance with regard to any controversy concerning the international status of these persons, the High Commissioner shall request the opinion of an advisory committee on refugees if it is created.

¹⁷⁶ Drafting changes only.

2. The work of the High Commissioner shall be of an entirely non-political character; it shall be humanitarian and social and shall relate, as a rule, to groups and categories of refugees.

3. The High Commissioner shall follow policy directives given him by the General Assembly or the Economic and Social Council.

4. The Economic and Social Council may decide, after hearing the views of the High Commissioner on the subject, to establish an advisory committee on refugees, which shall consist of representatives of States Members and States non-members of the United Nations, to be selected by the Council on the basis of their demonstrated interest in and devotion to the solution of the refugee problem.

5. The General Assembly shall review, not later than at its eighth regular session, the arrangements for the Office of the High Commissioner with a view to determining whether the Office should be continued beyond 31 December 1953.

Chapter II

FUNCTIONS OF THE HIGH COMMISSIONER

6. The competence of the High Commissioner shall extend to:

A. (i) Any person who has been considered a refugee under the Arrangements of 12 May 1926 and 30 June 1928 or under the Conventions of 28 October 1933 and 10 February 1938, the Protocol of 14 September 1939 or the Constitution of the International Refugee Organization;

(ii) Any person who, as a result of events occurring before 1 January 1951 and owing to well-founded fear of being persecuted for reasons of race, religion, nationality or political opinion, is outside the country of his nationality and is unable or, owing to such fear or for reasons other than personal convenience, is unwilling to avail himself of the protection of that country; or who, not having a nationality and being outside the country of his former habitual residence, is unable or, owing to such fear or for reasons other than personal convenience, is unwilling to return to it.

Decisions as to eligibility taken by the International Refugee Organization during the period of its activities shall not prevent the status of refugee being accorded to persons who fulfil the conditions of the present paragraph;

The competence of the High Commissioner shall cease to apply to any person defined in section A above if:

(a) He has voluntarily re-availed himself of the protection of the country of his nationality; or

(b) Having lost his nationality, he has voluntarily re-acquired it; or

(c) He has acquired a new nationality, and enjoys the protection of the country of his new nationality; or

(d) He has voluntarily re-established himself in the country which he left or outside which he remained owing to fear of persecution; or

(e) He can no longer, because the circumstances in connexion with which he has been recognized as a refugee have ceased to exist, claim grounds other than those of personal convenience for continuing to refuse to avail himself of the protection of the country of his nationality. Reasons of a purely economic character may not be invoked; or

(f) Being a person who has no nationality, he can no longer, because the circumstances in connexion with which he has been recognized as a refugee have ceased to exist and he is able to return to the country of his former habitual residence, claim grounds other than those of personal convenience for continuing to refuse to return to that country;

B. Any other person who is outside the country of his nationality or, if he has no nationality, the country of his former habitual residence, because he has or had well-founded fear of persecution by reason of his race, religion, nationality or political opinion and is unable or, because of such fear, is unwilling to avail himself of the protection of the government of the country of his nationality, or, if he has no nationality, to return to the country of his former habitual residence.

7. Provided that the competence of the High Commissioner as defined in paragraph 6 above shall not extend to a person:

(a) Who is a national of more than one country unless he satisfies the provisions of the preceding paragraph in relation to each of the countries of which he is a national; or

(b) Who is recognized by the competent authorities of the country in which he has taken residence as having the rights and obligations which are attached to the possession of the nationality of that country; or

(c) Who continues to receive from other organs or agencies of the United Nations protection or assistance; or

(d) In respect of whom there are serious reasons for considering that he has committed a crime covered by the provisions of treaties of extradition or a crime mentioned in article VI of the London Charter of the International Military Tribunal or by the provisions of article 14, paragraph 2, of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

8. The High Commissioner shall provide for the protection of refugees falling under the competence of his Office by:

(a) Promoting the conclusion and ratification of international conventions for the protection of refugees, supervising their application and proposing amendments thereto;

(b) Promoting through special agreements with governments the execution of any measures calculated to improve the situation of refugees and to reduce the number requiring protection;

(c) Assisting governmental and private efforts to promote voluntary repatriation or assimilation within new national communities;

(d) Promoting the admission of refugees, not excluding those in the most destitute categories, to the territories of States;

(e) Endeavouring to obtain permission for refugees to transfer their assets and especially those necessary for their resettlement;

(f) Obtaining from governments information concerning the number and conditions of refugees in their territories and the laws and regulations concerning them;

(g) Keeping in close touch with the governments and inter-governmental organizations concerned;

(h) Establishing contact in such manner as he may think best with private organizations dealing with refugee questions;

(i) Facilitating the co-ordination of the efforts of private organizations concerned with the welfare of refugees.

9. The High Commissioner shall engage in such additional activities, including repatriation and resettlement, as the General Assembly may determine, within the limits of the resources placed at his disposal.

10. The High Commissioner shall administer any funds, public or private, which he receives for assistance to refugees, and shall distribute them among the private and, as appropriate, public agencies which he deems best qualified to administer such assistance.

The High Commissioner may reject any offers which he does not consider appropriate or which cannot be utilized.

The High Commissioner shall not appeal to governments for funds or make a general appeal, without the prior approval of the General Assembly.

The High Commissioner shall include in his annual report a statement of his activities in this field.

11. The High Commissioner shall be entitled to present his views before the General Assembly, the Economic and Social Council and their subsidiary bodies.

The High Commissioner shall report annually to the General Assembly through the Economic and Social Council; his report shall be considered as a separate item on the agenda of the General Assembly.

12. The High Commissioner may invite the co-operation of the various specialized agencies.

Chapter III

ORGANIZATION AND FINANCES

13. The High Commissioner shall be elected by the General Assembly on the nomination of the Secretary-General. The terms of appointment of the High Commissioner shall be proposed by the Secretary-General and approved by the General Assembly. The High Commissioner shall be elected for a term of three years, from 1 January 1951.

14. The High Commissioner shall appoint, for the same term, a Deputy High Commissioner of a nationality other than his own.

15. (a) Within the limits of the budgetary appropriations provided, the staff of the Office of the High Commissioner shall be appointed by the High Commissioner and shall be responsible to him in the exercise of their functions.

(b) Such staff shall be chosen from persons devoted to the purposes of the Office of the High Commissioner.

(c) Their conditions of employment shall be those provided under the staff regulations adopted by the General Assembly and the rules promulgated thereunder by the Secretary-General.

(d) Provision may also be made to permit the employment of personnel without compensation.

16. The High Commissioner shall consult the governments of the countries of residence of refugees as to the need for appointing representatives therein. In any country recognizing such need, there may be appointed a representative approved by the government of that country. Subject to the foregoing, the same representative may serve in more than one country.

17. The High Commissioner and the Secretary-General shall make appropriate arrangements for liaison and consultation on matters of mutual interest.

18. The Secretary-General shall provide the High Commissioner with all necessary facilities within budgetary limitations.

19. The Office of the High Commissioner shall be located in Geneva, Switzerland.

20. The Office of the High Commissioner shall be financed under the budget of the United Nations. Unless the General Assembly subsequently decides otherwise, no expenditure, other than administrative expenditures relating to the functioning of the Office of the High Commissioner, shall be borne on the budget of the United Nations, and all other expenditures relating to the activities of the High Commissioner shall be financed by voluntary contributions.

21. The administration of the Office of the High Commissioner shall be subject to the Financial Regulations of the United Nations and to the financial rules promulgated thereunder by the Secretary-General.

22. Transactions relating to the High Commissioner's funds shall be subject to audit by the United Nations Board of Auditors, provided that the Board may accept audited accounts from the agencies to which funds have been allocated. Administrative arrangements for the custody of such funds and their allocation shall be agreed between the High Commissioner and the Secretary-General in accordance with the Financial Regulations of the United Nations and rules promulgated thereunder by the Secretary-General.

3. Problem of Assistance to Refugees

At its fourth session, the General Assembly had decided (resolution 319 B (IV)) to postpone until "its fifth session the examination of the problems of assistance to refugees raised by the General Council of IRO in its memorandum of 20 October 1949 (A/C.3/528) should these problems still be in existence at that date. The memorandum dealt with the probable situation at the time IRO ceased its operations and indicated the special difficulties IRO was encountering in completing its programme and the Governmental assistance it expected. Among other things, IRO had reported that it had proposed to Member Governments that IRO be continued for an additional period of nine months (to March 1951). IRO had requested the General Assembly to take decisions of principle on the question of the international protection of refugees after the termination of IRO and to make preparations for the establishment of machinery which should come into force not later than 1 January 1951.

The Assembly also had before it at its fifth session another memorandum from the General Council of IRO (A/C.3/540) which provided information to supplement that transmitted to the Assembly in 1949. In presenting the memorandum at the 338th meeting of the Third Committee on 6 December, the representative of the IRO stated that over a period of 38 months IRO had assisted 1,500,000 persons, of whom 70,000 had been repatriated and 832,000 resettled. On 1 October 1950, there remained 293,000 refugees for whom a solution still had to be found through repatriation, resettlement or local settlement.

The General Council had allocated $22,000,000 for those who, owing to age, illness or other considerations, had little or no chance of resettlement. Norway had admitted 200 blind refugees and Belgium and the Netherlands a number of aged persons. France had received 1,000 aged persons and had admitted 1,000 more. Sweden had admitted several groups of tubercular refugees with their families. The United States had undertaken to admit 1,100 physically handicapped and Israel 3,500 ill or aged or invalid refugees. IRO had also established five re-education centres, equipped with prosthetic appliances for invalids, and five special centres for victims of tuberculosis.

The representative outlined IRO's plans for the remaining period of its activities. (IRO had decided to extend the time limit for assistance by it to refugees to 1 October 1951.) The organization would continue its work of repatriation, taking into consideration the wishes of the persons concerned and the principles laid down by the United Nations and the Constitution of IRO. With respect to resettlement, the policy would be, as in the past, to increase the possibilities of resettlement with the aid of Governments and of the refugees themselves. The Organization hoped in that way to resettle another 200,000 persons, mainly in the United States and Australia, before ceasing its activities. About 9,000 ill and aged refugees would remain in need of help at the termination of IRO's activities.

IRO was trying to make arrangements for the resettlement of those who, although not in need of hospitalization or admission to a home for the aged, would not be able, because of poor health, age or family situation, to leave Germany before the end of its activities. If it proved impossible to resettle this group of refugees IRO would try to arrange for their settlement in Germany under the best possible conditions of housing and employment.

The Third Committee, without discussion, adopted a draft resolution (A/C.3/L.141) sponsored by France, the United Kingdom and the United States by 32 votes to 5, with 6 abstentions (A/1682). It was adopted by the General Assembly at its 325th plenary meeting on 14 December 1950 by 40 votes to 5, with 7 abstentions, as resolution 430 (V) as follows:

The General Assembly,

Having taken cognizance of the communication addressed to it by the General Council of the International Refugee Organization on 13 October 1950 in amplification of its memorandum of 20 October 1949 addressed to the fourth session of the General Assembly,

Having noted that the General Council of the International Refugee Organization has decided to continue operations until 30 September 1951,

1. Decides to address an urgent appeal to all States, whether or not Members of the United Nations, calling upon them to assist the International Refugee Organization in its efforts to resettle refugees remaining under its care and particularly those in need of permanent custodial care;

2. Decides, in the absence of definite data, to postpone until its sixth session the examination of the problem of assistance raised by the above-mentioned communications, in the light of a further communication on the subject which the International Refugee Organization is invited to submit and of the observations which the High Commissioner will make in his report to the sixth session of the General Assembly.

N. SOCIAL ACTIVITIES

1. General Work Programme in the Social field

a. CONSIDERATION BY THE SOCIAL COMMISSION AT ITS FIFTH SESSION

The Social Commission at its fifth session in December 1949 (E/1568) recommended long-range work programmes in three fields, viz., family, youth and child welfare, prevention of crime and treatment of offenders, and housing and town and country planning.¹⁷⁷ It annexed to its report a work programme covering all its fields of activity for 1950:

I. Activities which are the primary and principal responsibility of the Social Commission

- A. Activities of direct assistance to Governments
- B. Social services
- C. Family, youth and child welfare
- D. Welfare of special groups
- E. Social defence
- F. Housing and town and country planning

II. Activities in which the Social Commission has a basic responsibility complementary to that of other agencies

- A. Studies regarding standards of living (living conditions)

¹⁷⁷ For details, see respectively pp. 599-600, 607-8, 605-7.

- B. Migration
- C. World social and cultural situation
- III. Routine activities within the field of responsibility of the Social Commission
 - A. Documentation and information services
 - IV. Co-operation with other international organizations and co-ordination of international programmes in so far as this falls within the competence of the Social Commission

b. CONSIDERATION BY THE ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL AT ITS TENTH SESSION

The Council discussed the work programme¹⁷⁸ at the 117th and 118th meetings of its Social Committee on 10 February and at its 354th plenary meeting on 17 February 1950. The Council praised the work of the Social Commission, although several representatives, among them those of Australia, Canada and Chile, advised caution in approving extensions of social activities programmes entailing serious budgetary implications. The representatives of Canada, China and the United States emphasized the importance of establishing an equilibrium between the Council's economic and social activities and expressed their gratification at the progress made in that direction.

Following a brief discussion, the Social Committee at its 118th meeting unanimously adopted (E/1607) a joint draft resolution proposed by Brazil, France, India and the United States (E/AC.7/L.9), which was adopted by the Council at its 354th plenary meeting on 17 February by 14 votes to none, with 1 abstention, as resolution 279 A (X). By this resolution, the Council endorsed, subject to review at its eleventh session, the work programme for 1950 regarding prevention of crime and treatment of offenders; family, youth and child welfare; social aspects of the rehabilitation of the physically handicapped, including the blind, and other social activities. It urged the Social Commission at its sixth session to give urgent attention to the study on the continuing needs of children and to make specific recommendations to the eleventh session of the Council. It was generally agreed that it would be premature at this time to discuss the financial implications (E/1607/Add.I) which would vary between $20,687 to $27,270, including the additional funds for housing.

c. CONSIDERATION BY THE SOCIAL COMMISSION AT ITS SIXTH SESSION

The Economic and Social Council at its sixth session (122 E (VI)) had asked the Commission to set out work programmes in order of priority.¹⁷⁹ At its fifth session in December 1949 the Commission decided that the Secretariat should prepare a comprehensive long-range programme of work, including priorities. Accordingly, at the Commission's sixth session in April-May 1950 the Secretary-General presented a draft of a long-range work programme (E/CN.5/189 & Add.1-3 & Corr.1 & 2).

In the light of this programme, the Commission felt that the advice which it was responsible for giving to the Council should necessarily encompass many social questions with which specialized agencies and other organizations, as well as different organs of the United Nations, were also concerned. The Commission, therefore, gave special consideration to machinery and procedures for consultation at the international, regional and national levels.

At the international level, the calling together of ad hoc groups of individual experts, expert representatives of specialized agencies and representatives of non-governmental organizations, within budgetary limitations, was recommended. The Commission considered that such groups would prove more economical and effective than sub-commissions. It particularly recommended that small ad hoc groups should be called together, as needed, for questions in such fields as community, family and child welfare, community welfare in under-developed areas and rehabilitation of the handicapped. At the regional level, the Commission recognized the usefulness of conferences convened at the desire of the Governments concerned, and also of regional social welfare seminars, as a phase in the development of a programme of direct assistance. At the national level, it commended the establishment of committees consisting of representatives of various ministries, and, when appropriate, of non-governmental organizations, in order to prepare the work of the Commission and bring it to the knowledge of the public.

The Commission recommended that first place among its functions should be accorded to operational services of direct assistance to requesting Governments, thus directing its work programme more and more towards practical measures of "help for self-help". It recognized, however, that the other functions, such as technical information, studies and reports, and recommendations and conventions, which indirectly serve all countries, are basic to an effective operational programme of direct assistance and tend, in fact, to constitute different phases of a single process of development. It therefore proposed that, within each field of activity, the above functions should be exercised on a continuing basis, but that specific work items and changes in areas of work within the scope of these various functions should be reviewed at the regular sessions of the Commission.

Dealing more specifically with the preparation of recommendations or conventions, the Commission felt that recommendations would be most useful if embodying working guides, basic standards or model legislation, although in some cases a declaration in more general terms might be preferable; and that conventions would be most useful if they had a degree of flexibility. In this connexion, the Commission recommended that the advisory social welfare services should be utilized to help give effect to conventions that Governments had signed, recommendations made by the Economic and Social Council and conclusions reached as the result of studies conducted by the Secretariat and transmitted by the Commission to the Council.

Although the Commission recognized the essential unity of the social field and the interdependency of the various areas of work that are to be found within it, for reasons of convenience it grouped these areas under a limited number of headings, namely: planning; organization and administration for social welfare; community, family and child welfare; social defence; social rehabilitation of the physically handicapped; housing and town and country planning. The Commission felt that a system of priorities by function or by area of subject matter would lead inevitably to artificial results. It did, however, feel that community, family and child welfare services constituted the core of its work, and that techniques for planning, organization and administration for social services were essential to the promotion of social progress and development.

The Commission proposed that the Council approve an integrated programme of action in the fields of work outlined in the report, namely: Community, family and child welfare; planning, organization and administration for social welfare; social defence; rehabilitation of the handicapped; and housing and town and country planning; such programme to be carried out through direct assistance to Governments; and through supporting technical services of information, studies and recommendations, and co-operation and consultation with other agencies as appropriate.

The representatives of Australia, Canada, Denmark, the Union of South Africa, the United Kingdom and the United States reserved the position of their Governments with regard to the financial costs of the proposed programme. Others insisted on the prime importance of the programme, and, although their Governments were opposed to undue increases in the budget of the United Nations, they considered that the necessary increases here were small in comparison with the importance of the work.

d. CONSIDERATION BY THE ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL AT ITS ELEVENTH SESSION

The Council considered the Commission's long-term integrated programme of work (E/1678 & Add.1/Rev.1) at the 125th, 126th and 128th-129th meetings of its Social Committee on 5, 6, 7 July and at its 387th plenary meeting on 13 July 1950.

During the discussion, the representatives of Canada and Australia held that to approve "an integrated programme of action in the fields of work outlined in the report" implied approval not only of the programme as a whole, but of all its parts and over a given period. This, they felt, was going too far. The United States representative, while supporting the programme, indicated that her Government could not approve many of the financial implications involved. The representatives of Belgium and the United Kingdom stated that it was essential to stabilize the expenditures of the United Nations and not increase its financial commitments. They also called the Council's attention to the need for avoiding overlapping in the work of the United Nations and the specialized agencies.

After some discussion the Social Committee at its 129th meeting on 7 July unanimously adopted a resolution which had been proposed jointly by Canada, France, the United Kingdom and the United States (E/AC.7/L.24). The representative of the United Kingdom stated that it had been understood by the drafters of the resolution that at this stage the additional financial implications had been neither approved nor disapproved; the resolution merely suggested that the Secretary-General should inform the General Assembly what his requirements were for such purposes, and left the final financial decision to the General Assembly. The resolution approved by the Social Committee (E/1755 F) was adopted without further discussion at the Council's 387th plenary meeting on 13 July as resolution 309 G (XI).

By this resolution, the Council commended the Commission for its orderly and far-sighted approach toward a long-term integrated work programme, approved the general lines of that programme, including the proposed methods of execution, and requested the Secretary-General, within the limits of such appropriations as might be provided by the General Assembly for the purpose, to make the administrative arrangements appropriate to carry out the unified programme, having full regard to the competence of the specialized agencies.

2. Advisory Social Welfare Services

Under the advisory social welfare programme adopted by the General Assembly on 14 December 1946 (58(I)),¹⁸⁰ the Secretary-General had been authorized to make provision for: expert assistance to Governments on welfare services; fellowships for training officials in social welfare; advice, demonstration and instruction in connexion with the manufacture of prosthetic appliances and the vocational training of physically-handicapped persons; the furnishing of demonstration equipment and the provision of technical publications. At its fourth session, in resolution 316(IV) the Assembly authorized the Secretary-General to place these services on a continuing rather than on a year-to-year basis as previously.¹⁸¹

a. CONSIDERATION BY THE SOCIAL COMMISSION AT ITS SIXTH SESSION

The Social Commission at its sixth session, in April-May 1955, had before it three reports by the Secretary-General: one (E/CN.5/193 & Add.1) on the progress of the programme of advisory social welfare services, a second (E/CN.5/194) containing recommendations arising from a series of studies requested by the Commission and the Economic and Social Council to aid in the development of these services, and a third (E/CN.5/196 & Add.1-4) on the training of social workers. The Commission also had before it the Secretary-General's proposals (E/CN.5/195 & Corr.1) for a revision of the terms of resolution 58(I). This revision was necessitated by the placing of the advisory social welfare services on a continuing instead of yearly basis.

(1) Progress Report on Implementation of Resolution 58(I)

In his report on the progress of the programme (E/CN.5/193 & Add.1) the Secretary-General pointed out that during its early stages requests for assistance had come primarily from war-devastated countries which had needed help in reconstructing their welfare organizations and staff. During 1949 and 1950, however, two other categories of countries had also requested and received assistance, those wishing to improve already well-established welfare programmes and those just beginning to organize welfare services. In addition, the under-developed countries had shown an increasing interest in receiving assistance which had been given to them in the form of broad social development surveys to determine social needs and suggestions for ways of improving the general social economy. The report also contained summaries of the requests from Governments for services during 1950. As of 29 March 1950, 39 countries had asked for services, seven had stated that they would not participate in the programme in 1950 and twelve had merely acknowledged receipt of the Secretary-General's note requesting information on the services needed.

The Commission was agreed as to the value of the programme and expressed its satisfaction with the methods used in carrying it out. In providing advisory social welfare services, the Commission felt, the Secretariat should give primary consideration to the need for the development in the requesting country of its own social welfare services. With respect to financing the United Nations advisory social welfare programme, it was agreed that the Secretariat had made good progress in obtaining financial participation from recipient Governments. Some members felt that eventually Governments should, where they were able, bear the full cost of services received.

Some members recommended that the words "suitably qualified social welfare officials" should be interpreted liberally in determining the eligibility of candidates for fellowships, and that the length of the observation period should be flexible.

(2) Recommendations Resulting from Studies under Resolution

The Secretary-General, on the basis of the research studies undertaken at the Council's request, made recommendations (E/CN.5/194) on the furnishing of experts, on the character of the fellowship programme and on the directives governing its administration.

There was considerable discussion regarding the methods to be used in the furnishing of experts to requesting Governments. It was generally agreed that experts should be employed mainly on an ad hoc basis; that they should be selected internationally and on the basis of their qualifications and practical experience; and that, where necessary, exploratory missions of experts might be sent out to help Governments, particularly those of under-developed countries, to determine their needs.

¹⁸² Under Council resol. 43 (IV) the Secretary-General had been asked to gather information and report on (a) the furnishing of information and advice to countries, (b) international training for social welfare and (c) social administration.

The main purpose of regional demonstration centres, it was agreed, should be to acquaint Governments with new methods capable of promoting social progress. The centres would represent a joint programme by the United Nations, specialized agencies and countries concerned, and the resulting expenditure would be divided among all those taking part.

The Commission also discussed the Secretary-General's proposal to expand the present fellowship programme so as to provide grants for the professional training of persons with little or no social welfare experience. While there was general agreement that it was necessary for each country to have a body of trained social workers, there was some difference of opinion as to the best methods of achieving this end. Generally, it was agreed that the training of social workers was primarily a responsibility of Governments and that facilities should be developed to carry on this work within the countries concerned. The majority of the Commission were of the opinion, however, that a programme for training abroad, either in schools or by other means, would greatly assist countries which lacked trained personnel as well as appropriate training facilities. Several members advocated United Nations assistance in establishing regional social work training schools, but felt that participants should not be precluded from receiving professional training outside their own region. Scholarships, it was decided, should be reserved for persons who have completed their basic education, as a general rule, but have not had an opportunity for professional training.

The Commission reaffirmed the conclusion that the training of social workers was an essential step in the development of social welfare programmes. It commended the progress made in studying this problem and asked the Secretary-General to invite Governments to comment on the suggestions contained in his preliminary report (E/CN.5/196). These suggestions included recommendations for professional, national and international action to create the conditions necessary for the effective use of international training assistance. The report described and analysed detailed information, collected on a world-wide basis, concerning the methods of training used in educational institutions of various countries for the professional preparation of social workers, the category of personnel from whom special "social" training was most often required as a condition of entry into the profession.

The Commission unanimously adopted a resolution (E/1678) which requested the Secretary-General to complete before its seventh session (a) the study of agency training programmes (training on the job) and (b) taking into consideration the comments of Governments, the report on the training of social workers (E/CN.5/196).

(3) Review of the Terms of Resolution 58(I)

At the request of the Social Commission, the Secretary-General presented his proposals (E/CN.5/195 & Corr.1) for the revision of the terms of resolution 58(I), necessitated by the placing of the advisory social welfare services on a continuing basis. The proposals were based on previous experience and on the recommendations arising from the social studies under Council resolution 43(IV) (see above). To obtain the extended authority necessary to carry out the programme, the Secretary-General proposed, among other things, that provision be made in the resolution for (1) the use of seminars and films; (2) authorization of "scholarships training" abroad of Governmental candidates; (3) demonstration projects; and (4) removal of restrictions on the supplying of technical literature for social welfare training purposes. (The supply of literature had been restricted to use in war-devastated countries.)

At its sixth session, the Commission (E/1678) examined the Secretary-General's proposals and stressed the following points as relevant for the revision of the terms of General Assembly resolution 58(I):

- (a) There should be close correlation between the advisory social welfare services programme and the general programme of work in the social field recommended by the Commission, and a broad interpretation should be given to the term "social welfare";
- (b) Co-operation among the United Nations, the specialized agencies, and the international non-governmental organizations having consultative status, as well as appropriate national organizations, should be increased;
- (c) Provision should be made for training by scholarships as well as by fellowships, particularly for countries which have no trained personnel eligible for fellowships, nor adequate facilities for training them;
- (d) The authorization with regard to demonstration and equipment should be drafted in more general terms, in order to cover the various phases of social work and to make it possible to associate demonstration projects with the other training opportunities provided under the resolution, such as fellowships and scholarships (the original authorization for demonstrations and equipment had related these activities to rehabilitation work);

(e) Since the regional seminars which had been held and the films which had been produced had shown commendable results, such activities should be included as part of the programme under the revised terms of the resolution. Also, technical publications should be provided to any country requesting them.

The Social Commission therefore recommended for the Council's consideration a draft resolution (E/CN.5/212) which incorporated these revisions. This was later adopted by the Council with minor changes (see below).

b. CONSIDERATION BY THE ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL AT ITS ELEVENTH SESSION

The Council considered the question of advisory social welfare services at the 125th, 126th, 129th and 130th meetings of its Social Committee on 5 and 7 July and at its 388th plenary meeting on 14 July 1950. It had before it, in addition to the Commission's report (E/1678), a report by the Secretary-General (E/1702 & Add.1). The latter contained the resolution proposed by the Social Commission, a list of the requests for services during 1950 (as of 22 May) and an account of the additional expenditure which would be necessary under the proposed revision of resolution 58(I). The report stated that under the revised resolution an additional cost of $158,000 would be needed in connexion with the expansion of the advisory services to include a programme of scholarships and demonstration centres and for broadening of the distribution of technical publications.

During the discussions in the Social Committee, the majority of members supported the draft resolution submitted by the Social Commission. A number of them felt that the revised resolution should specifically state that requesting Governments would be expected to participate financially to the maximum extent possible in the services provided to them. The incorporation of this principle in the draft resolution was proposed in a Canadian amendment (E/AC.7/L.27). It was agreed, however, that aid would not be withheld in any circumstances from countries not in a position to pay.

Several representatives, including those of India, Pakistan, Australia and the United Kingdom, expressed the opinion that the emphasis should now be placed on under-developed areas, but, as stressed by the Australian representative, this did not mean that developed countries should not benefit from the services. The representative of Canada accepted an Indian amendment to add a provision that in furnishing services due regard should be paid to the greater needs of under-developed territories.

The Social Committee at its 130th meeting adopted that part of the Canadian amendment which dealt with these two points of substance by 12 votes to none, with 2 abstentions.

The Committee rejected by 8 votes to 5, with 1 abstention, an oral amendment by the representative of Mexico which would have provided for a definite statement in the resolution that Governments would participate financially only if able to do so.

The Social Committee unanimously agreed to the suggestion of the United States representative that the text of the resolution adopted by the Council should "note the proposals of the Social Commission" on the subject of social welfare services, since the Commission had been responsible for the larger part of work.

The draft resolution (E/1702), as a whole, as amended, was adopted unanimously by the Social Committee (E/1760) at its 130th meeting on 7 July, and by the Council at its 385th plenary meeting on 14 July as resolution 312 (XI).

By this resolution the Council submitted to the General Assembly a draft for the revision of the terms of Assembly resolution 58(I), with the following main suggestions:

- (a) The social welfare training programme would include scholarships as well as fellowships;
- (b) The possibility of creating demonstration centres and pilot projects would be provided for; also, fellowship and scholarship holders would be permitted to benefit from such projects;
- (c) Provision would be made for planning and conducting seminars;
- (d) The furnishing of films would be authorized;
- (e) The authorization to furnish technical publications would be expanded to include all participating Governments, instead of being limited to war-devastated countries.

The resolution also set forth certain policies to be followed in providing services:

- (a) that the Governments concerned would decide the kind of services to be rendered;
- (b) that the Secretary-General would undertake to furnish experts, normally applying to Member States for them, and would base his selection of the grant holders on proposals received from Governments, the latter indicating the host countries preferred;
- (c) that the Secretary-General would decide the amount of services and conditions for furnishing them, with due regard to the greater needs of the under-developed areas and in conformity with the principle that each requesting Government would be expected to participate financially to the maximum possible extent in the services provided to it.

e. CONSIDERATION BY THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY AT ITS FIFTH SESSION

The General Assembly considered the proposed revision (A/1335) of resolution 58(I) at the 272nd to 275th meetings of its Third Committee on 27 September to 2 October and at its 314th plenary meeting on 1 December 1950.

(1) Discussion in the Third Committee

The majority praised the programme of advisory social welfare services and supported, in principle, the Council's recommendations. Several representatives, among them those of Australia, the United Kingdom and the Union of South Africa, stressed the importance of avoiding duplication and overlapping with other departments or organs.

In discussing the financial implications of the proposed revision, the representatives of the United Kingdom, the Byelorussian SSR, Canada, Poland and the USSR held that the funds provided for these services in 1951 should not be increased over those provided for 1950. The representatives of the Byelorussian SSR, Poland and the USSR stated that they would therefore abstain from voting. Moreover, the development of social welfare services, the representative of the Byelorussian SSR pointed out, should be a material as well as moral responsibility of Governments and, therefore, they should be expected to pay for the advisory services. The United States representative suggested that additional funds should be derived from increased local contributions from contributing Governments. A few representatives, among them those of Australia, Belgium and Mexico, reserved their delegations' positions until the Fifth Committee had considered the financial estimates which had been submitted to the Council by the Secretary-General (E/1702/Add.1) (see below).

The Committee also heard various explanations and statements by representatives of the Secretariat. A technical explanation was given of the mechanism for consultation with requesting Governments, for collaboration with specialized agencies in meeting requests for services, for combining various advisory services through demonstration centres, for reinforcing and supplementing these services by means of technical publications and films and for using regional offices as dynamic centres for effectively meeting local needs.

A statement was also made concerning the organizational arrangements within the Secretariat for integrating the administration of the advisory social welfare services with that of other aspects of technical assistance. The Committee noted with approval that the distinctive characteristics of the advisory social welfare programme were to be fully maintained, i.e. it was a continuing programme with wide terms of reference, financially supported from the regular contributions of all Member States, for the stimulation of social progress for its own sake and not only as an aspect of economic development. Moreover, it was to be undertaken on behalf of all people and not only those of under-developed areas.

The Committee understood that the advisory social welfare services would continue to be guided by the Economic and Social Council, on the recommendation of the Social Commission, and subject to the approval of the Assembly.

With a view to clarifying the provisions for participation of requesting countries in the selection of experts and in meeting the costs of the services furnished, the Third Committee adopted two amendments:

(i) Israeli amendment (A/C.3/L.43), to specify that the furnishing of experts and services would be undertaken by the Secretary-General, with due regard to suggestions made by requesting Governments; adopted by 37 votes to none, with 9 abstentions. Although this had been the usual procedure, the majority of the Committee agreed that it should be thus stated in the resolution itself.

(ii) Lebanese amendment (A/C.3/L.42), slightly modified by the representative of France, to provide that Governments would "assume responsibility, as far as possible, for all or part of the expenses connected with the services furnished to it". (The original paragraph had stated that Governments would be expected to participate financially to the maximum possible extent.) The representative of Lebanon accepted a Mexican amendment (A/C.3/L.44) to add the words "either by making a contribution in cash or in the form of services for the purposes of the programme being carried out". The amendment, as amended, was adopted by 37 votes to none, with 7 abstentions. The amended revised resolution was adopted at the 275th meeting of the Third Committee on 2 October by 49 votes to none, with 5 abstentions. A draft resolution (A/C.3/L.41), submitted by the representative of France to introduce the revised resolution, was adopted by a roll-call vote of 47 votes to none, with 5 abstentions. (For text of resolution see below.)

(2) Discussion in the Fifth Committee

The Fifth Committee at its 249th meeting on 17 October unanimously approved the recommendation of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions (A/1312) for an appropriation of $610,500 for advisory social welfare services.

At its 263rd meeting on 10 November, it considered the effect of the draft resolution adopted by the Third Committee (A/1436) on the 1951 budget estimates. The Committee had before it a report by the Secretary-General which stated that, in keeping with the terms of the proposed revised resolution, an additional amount of $158,000 would be needed as follows for 1951: 30 scholarships at $2,000 each—$60,000; operation of one demonstration centre, including cost of equipment—$50,000; supply of technical literature on social welfare to various countries—$48,000.

The Committee also considered a report of the Advisory Committee (A/1488) concerning these estimates. The Advisory Committee had suggested that it would be desirable, irrespective of the merits of the broadened programme, to establish a clear policy governing the continuance of advisory social welfare services. Such a policy decision should, in the Advisory Committee's opinion, take account of:

- (i) the extent to which contributions from recipient Governments should augment the total expenditure for the programme or alternatively decrease the net appropriation to be made by the United Nations;
- (ii) the extent, if any, to which funds for these services might be allocated from the special account for technical assistance; and
- (iii) the extent to which continued expansion of the programme would be consistent with the purposes of resolution 58(I) and proportionate to the financial resources of the United Nations.

The Advisory Committee suggested, with regard to the Third Committee's draft resolution, that a consolidated appropriation covering both scholarships and fellowships should be made. The distribution of funds could then be related to the urgency of the needs. Attention was called to the importance of giving the fullest possible effect to the provision under which requesting Governments were to assume responsibility, as far as possible, for all or part of the expenses. The Advisory Committee also thought that consideration might be given to limiting strictly the duration of advisory missions.

Finally, the Advisory Committee recommended that an attempt should be made to meet the new expenses: (i) by a redistribution of the existing programme; (ii) by increased contributions from requesting Governments; and (iii) by an appropriation from the special account for technical assistance. If, however, the General Assembly should decide to increase the funds available for these services within the United Nations budget, the Committee was of the opinion that under no conditions should the additional provision exceed $80,000.

During the course of the discussion in the Fifth Committee, a number of members pointed out that the objectives which the Third Committee had in mind could not be accomplished by means of a redistribution of the existing programme within the limits of the present budgetary provisions. While it was generally agreed that recipient Governments should participate to the fullest extent practicable in the financing of the programme, several representatives again stressed that this principle should not be applied in a way which would deprive those under-developed countries most in need of assistance of the opportunity of benefiting from it.

It was also agreed that the suggestion for an appropriation from the special account for technical assistance should be considered. However, it was pointed out that this would require amending the relevant Council resolution (on technical assistance). Therefore, in view of the circumstances, the representative of Brazil, supported by the representatives of Mexico, Syria, Venezuela, Bolivia and Yugoslavia, proposed that the full amount, $158,000, should be approved.

The representatives of Canada, the United Kingdom and the Netherlands maintained that the proposed additional activities should be financed within the existing budgetary appropriations. They felt that the United Nations should aim primarily at assisting Governments to initiate and develop their own social welfare services. The United Kingdom representative suggested specifically that technical publications should be furnished only as an integral part of the fellowship programme or as equipment for demonstration purposes; that the costs of the proposed scholarship programme should be borne, first, by increased financial participation of the beneficiary countries, and second, by the transfer of funds earmarked for fellowships; that additional appropriations for the purpose of demonstration centres should not be authorized but that specific projects which might be put forward should be considered on their merits and, if necessary, supplementary appropriations requested; and, finally, that further consideration should be given to the organization of the Secretariat with a view to more effective co-ordination and integration of all technical assistance activities.

The representative of France, while supporting the proposed extension of the advisory social welfare programme, expressed doubts as to the wisdom of adopting a scholarship programme, at this stage, in addition to the existing fellowship programme.

The Fifth Committee at its 263rd meeting on 10 November, by 24 votes to 14, with 8 abstentions, approved (A/1537) the estimates submitted by the Secretary-General. During the second reading of the estimates at its 281st meeting on 13 December 1950 the Fifth Committee recommended to the Assembly (A/1734) a total appropriation of $768,500.

The General Assembly, in approving the budget for 1951 at its 326th plenary meeting on 15 December 1950, approved this amount (resolution 471 (V)).

(3) Resolution Adopted by the General Assembly

The General Assembly at its 314th plenary meeting on 1 December 1950, without discussion, unanimously adopted the draft resolution recommended by the Third Committee (A/1436). The resolution (418(V)) read as follows:

The General Assembly,

Having considered the modifications made, in the light of General Assembly resolution 316(IV), by the Economic and Social Council, in General Assembly resolution 58(I) on advisory and social welfare services,

Approves the following text of resolution 58(I) revised by the Economic and Social Council and amended by the Third Committee:

"Whereas by Articles 55 and 60 of the Charter of the United Nations the Economic and Social Council, under the authority of the General Assembly, is charged with the responsibility for promoting higher standards of living and conditions of social progress and development,

"Whereas by Article 66 of the Charter, the Economic and Social Council may, with the approval of the General Assembly, perform services at the request of Members of the United Nations and at the request of specialized agencies,

"Whereas the General Assembly, after examining the recommendations of the Economic and Social Council and the accompanying report of services rendered for the first three years of operation, approved the recommendations and placed the advisory social welfare services originally authorized by resolution 58(I) on a continuing basis, and requested that a review be made of the terms of that resolution and appropriate recommendations made with respect to desirable or necessary changes (resolution 316(IV)),

"Whereas the General Assembly recognizes that the advisory social welfare services constitute a practical operational programme of direct assistance to governments and that the other activities of the United Nations in the social field should be properly correlated with these services in order to achieve maximum effectiveness, to which end the Social Commission has adjusted its long-range work programme,

"The General Assembly, therefore,

"A. Authorizes the Secretary-General:

"1. Subject to the directions of the Economic and Social Council, to make provision for the under-mentioned functions and services, such provision to be made, where appropriate, with the co-operation of the specialized agencies and in consultation with non-governmental organizations having consultative status:

"(a) For a requisite number of social welfare experts to provide advisory services at the request of governments which show the need for them, and to put into practice, over an appropriate period, new methods in any branch of social welfare;

"(b) For enabling suitably qualified social welfare officials to observe, and familiarize themselves with, the experience and practice of other countries in any branch of social welfare;

"(c) For enabling suitable qualified persons who cannot receive professional training in branches of social welfare in their own country to receive appropriate training in foreign countries having the necessary facilities;

"(d) For planning by appropriate methods projects for experimenting in or demonstrating various phases of social welfare, organizing and participating in these projects, providing the necessary tools and equipment in connexion therewith, and associating with the projects to the extent practicable, the persons referred to in paragraphs (b) and (c) above;

"(e) For furnishing technical publications and films;

"(f) For planning and conducting seminars;

"2. To include in the budgetary estimates of the United Nations the sums necessary for carrying out an effective operational programme based on the provision of the above services;

"B. Instructs the Secretary-General to undertake the performance of the functions listed in paragraph A.1 above, in agreement with the governments concerned, on the basis of requests received from governments and in accordance with the following policies;

"1. The kind of service to be rendered to each country shall be decided by the government concerned;

"2. The furnishing of the experts and services shall be undertaken by the Secretary-General, with due regard to suggestions made by the requesting governments; the Secretary-General shall, normally, make application for experts to States which are Members of the United Nations. The selection of grant-holders shall be made by the Secretary-General on the basis of proposals received from governments, which shall indicate their preferences with regard to host countries;

"3. The amount of services and the conditions under which they shall be furnished to the various governments shall be decided by the Secretary-General with due regard to the greater needs of the under-developed areas and in conformity with the principle that each requesting government shall be expected to assume responsibility, as far as possible, for all or part of the expenses connected with the services furnished to it, either by making a contribution in cash, or in the form of services for the purposes of the programme being carried out;

"C. Requests the Secretary-General to report regularly to the Social Commission on the measures which he takes in compliance with the terms of the present resolution, and requests the Commission to formulate recommendations from time to time concerning the continued action required to carry on the essential advisory activities in the field of social welfare."

d. SOCIAL WELFARE SERVICES FURNISHED DURING 1950

Eighteen social welfare consultants were furnished to eleven Governments and six consultants remained in five countries to finish projects undertaken in 1949. In addition, child welfare experts were on duty in the Far East, Central America and Europe, working in liaison with the United Nations International Children's Emergency Fund. During 1950, 302 fellowships were requested by Governments, of which 184 were awarded to 36 countries, and the fellows proceeded to 23 host countries to study various aspects of social welfare.

Demonstration equipment for the social rehabilitation of physically disabled persons was provided for five Governments and small supplies of technical publications useful in the training of social workers were sent on request to five war-devastated countries.

The United Nations held its second social welfare seminar for the Arab States of the Middle East in Cairo from 22 November to 14 December 1950. At the request of the Government of India, the United Nations organized a three-day conference on physically handicapped children (including the blind, deaf and dumb) at Jamshedpur from 19 to 21 December 1950.

3. Community, Family and Child Welfare¹⁸³

a. DRAFT DECLARATION OF THE RIGHTS OF THE CHILD

The Social Commission at its sixth session in April-May 1950 had before it a note from the Secretary-General (E/CN.5/199) containing a draft preamble and principles of a declaration of the rights of the child. As requested by the Commission at its fourth session,¹⁸⁴ the Secretary-General had taken into account the Geneva Declaration and comments expressed by members of the Commission, Member Governments, specialized agencies, non-governmental organizations and other appropriate sources.

The Social Commission appointed a committee consisting of the representatives of Australia, Brazil, France, Iraq and Yugoslavia to consider the Secretary-General's note and previous documentation and to draw up a draft declaration for submission to the Council. The draft prepared by the Committee (E/CN.5/L.76) was approved by the Commission with certain amendments. The Commission expressed the view that although there was a close relationship between the draft and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights the special needs of the child justified a separate instrument. It considered that the declaration should emphasize broad principles embodying standards which the world should strive to attain, that it was important to include in it the parallel concepts of individual rights and obligations toward society, and that emphasis should be placed on protection against factors likely to foster discrimination and on implanting in the minds of children as well as adults the ideals set out in the declaration. The Commission further emphasized the need for special care of the child's rights to a name, nationality, security, health, education and protection against all forms of exploitation which might prejudice his development.

The preamble to the draft declaration, approved by the Commission (E/1678), refers to the affirmation of human rights as expressed in the Preamble to the United Nations Charter and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, to the statement in the Geneva Declaration of the Rights of the Child that "mankind owes to the child the best it has to give", and, to the special safeguards needed by the child because of his physical and mental immaturity and particular legal status. The Assembly therefore "... recognizes and proclaims the essential Rights of the Child to the end that he may have a happy childhood and be enabled to grow up to enjoy for his own good and for the good of society, the fundamental rights and freedoms, particularly those specified in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, and calls upon men and women as individuals as well as through their local authorities and national Governments to recognize and strive for the observance of those rights through the application of the following principles".

These principles set forth in the draft declaration provide that the child shall be given the means necessary to enable him to develop physically, mentally, morally, spiritually and socially in a healthy and normal manner and in conditions of freedom and dignity. Irrespective of race, colour, sex, language, caste, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, property, birth, legitimacy or other status, he shall have the right to: a name; nationality; social security; adequate nutrition, housing and recreation; free medical services; proper education free of charge; and the opportunity to grow up in economic security, in the care of his own parents whenever possible, and in affectionate and understanding family surroundings.

The child shall in all circumstances, the principles state, be among the first to receive protection and relief. He shall be protected against all forms of neglect, cruelty and exploitation, and any practice which may foster racial or national discrimination or hatred. He shall be brought up in the consciousness that he will achieve his fullest development and satisfaction in the service of others.

The child who is physically, mentally or socially handicapped shall be given special treatment, education and care.

The Social Commission recommended (E/1678) that the Council note the close relationship between the draft declaration and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and ask the Commission on Human Rights for its observations on the draft declaration with a view to its approval by the General Assembly.

The Council discussed the report of the Social Commission (E/1678) at the 125th to 128th meetings of its Social Committee on 5 and 6 July and at its 387th plenary meeting on 13 July 1950.

During the discussion, the representative of Chile expressed total disagreement with the draft preamble and principles, which, he considered, would merely provoke criticism and irony throughout the world. The representatives of Belgium and Canada stated that, while they were in favour of declarations of fundamental rights which affect humanity as a whole, they did not favour separate declarations for any particular group. They pointed out that the Universal Declaration of Human Rights already contained a number of articles concerning the family and several expressly devoted to children, and felt that there should be full consultation with the Commission on Human Rights on whether an additional declaration was necessary.

As regards the procedure to be adopted, it was generally felt that the draft should not be sent back to the Social Commission for further consideration, but some representatives, including those of the United States, Australia and India, considered that it would be premature to submit the draft for the Assembly's approval and that it should be referred to the Commission on Human Rights.

The representative of Mexico thought that the Council should recommend the adoption of a resolution rather than a declaration by the Assembly.

The Social Committee, at its 128th meeting on 6 July adopted, by 12 votes to 1, with 1 abstention, a draft resolution prepared by a drafting committee composed of the representatives of France, India, Mexico and the United States (E/AC.7/L.20) as amended by the United States, orally, and by the United Kingdom (E/AC.7/L.22).

This amended draft resolution was adopted by the Council at its 387th plenary meeting on 13 July by 12 votes to 1, with 2 abstentions. The Council decided not to append the draft declaration to the resolution. It was also pointed out in the Council's discussions that adoption of the resolution did not imply approval of the preamble and principles of the draft declaration.

In its resolution (309 C (XI)), the Council stated its desire that a resolution on the rights of the child should be presented to the General Assembly as soon as possible, referred to the close relationship between the draft Declaration and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, and requested the Commission on Human Rights to consider the draft Declaration on the Rights of the Child at the same time as the Universal Declaration, taking into account the Council's discussions, and to report its observations on the principle and contents of the draft Declaration to the Council's thirteenth session.

b. WELFARE OF THE AGED

The Economic and Social Council at its eighth session (198(VIII))¹⁸⁵ had asked the Secretary-General to prepare, in collaboration with ILO and other appropriate bodies, a report on the welfare of the aged and to submit it to the Social Commission and to the Commission on Human Rights.

The Social Commission examined the Secretary-General's report (E/CN.5/200 & Add.1) at its sixth session. The material submitted covered only a limited number of countries and reflected the information available from ILO and several other European centres. The first part of the report contained a summary of available documentation on measures taken for the benefit of aged persons (e.g. income security, housing, health, institutional care, employment and welfare service—including recreational facilities and organizations); the second part was concerned with the effects of such measures on the standard of living of aged persons. Brief summaries were given of available material, containing both general and statistical information on living conditions of old people.

Material was also included which indicated to some extent the significance of such measures as old age pensions in relation to standards of living of the aged.

Among other things, the Secretary-General pointed out that no international documentation regarding benefits to the aged—except that relating to social insurance—was available at any international centre, even regarding countries with the most developed social institutions. This was particularly true with respect to non-cash services such as housing, institutional care, recreation and health. Nor was information internationally available on the effects of these various measures on the standard of living of aged persons. Little information relating to measures supplementing compulsory insurance, such as might be secured through voluntary provident activities, mutual aid and collective bargaining, was internationally available. Therefore, he was of the opinion that it was premature at the present time to attempt to recommend minimum standards such as might be implied in a declaration of old age rights.

During the discussion the Commission particularly stressed the need for collaboration with Governments which were actively studying old age problems. It agreed that consideration of a declaration of the rights of the aged should be postponed until more information was available and that steps should be taken for the exchange of information on problems of the aged and practical approaches toward their solution. The Commission also agreed that the Secretariat, in collaboration with interested Governments and specialized agencies, should initiate a programme of research studies and action for promoting the welfare of aged persons. It submitted to the Council (E/1678) a draft resolution to this effect.

The Commission's recommendations were considered by the Council at the 125th and 126th meetings of its Social Committee on 5 July and at its 387th plenary meeting on 13 July 1950. During the discussion in the Committee certain representatives, among them those of Chile, Canada and Belgium, opposed the drafting of a special declaration on the rights of the aged, since they considered that the Universal Declaration of Human Rights made this unnecessary. The representatives of Canada and Belgium suggested consultation with the Commission on Human Rights on whether a good reason existed for drafting a special declaration on old age rights or whether it might not perhaps be better to incorporate a specific reference to the subject in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. Those supporting the eventual adoption of a special declaration held that its adoption was important in a world where the old age group was becoming substantially larger.

The draft resolution proposed by the Social Commission was adopted by the Social Committee at its 126th meeting (E/1755), and by the Council at its 387th plenary meeting, without objection, as resolution 309 D (XI). In this resolution the Council requested the Secretary-General, in consultation with the Governments and interested specialized agencies, to initiate an integrated work programme of research, studies and action for promoting the welfare of aged persons, taking into consideration any views expressed by the Commission on Human Rights¹⁸⁶ and the discussions of the Social Commission at its sixth session. The Council deferred any decision on the advisability of drafting a declaration of old age rights until the necessary preparatory studies and reports had been completed.

c. WORK PROGRAMME

The Economic and Social Council at its tenth session had before it the report of the Social Commission's fifth session (E/1568 & Add.1) which had been held in December 1949. The Commission had, inter alia, approved an over-all programme of work in the field of family, youth and child welfare and a specific programme for 1950.¹⁸⁷ Under the latter, the Secretary-General had been asked to prepare a report concerning the organizational arrangements by which essential international long-range activities for children could be rendered by the United Nations and other appropriate inter-governmental organizations.

The Council considered the Social Commission's report at the 117th and 118th meetings of its Social Committee on 10 February and at its 354th plenary meeting on 17 February 1950. At its 118th meeting the Social Committee unanimously recommended (E/1607) that the Council endorse, subject to review at its eleventh session in the light of further consideration by the Social Commission, the work programme for 1950. It also proposed that the Council should note that the Secretary-General had been requested to prepare a report on the continuing needs of children and should request the Commission to give urgent attention to it at its sixth session, and prepare specific recommendations for consideration by the Council at its eleventh session.¹⁸⁸ The Council at its 354th plenary meeting adopted (279 A (X)), by 14 votes to none, with 1 abstention, the Social Committee's recommendation.

At its sixth session in April-May 1950 the Commission took the following action with regard to its work programme in the field of community, family and child welfare.

The Commission considered that the publication, which had grown out of the League of Nations report on child welfare developments, should be extended to cover community, family and child welfare and issued biennially. In view of the preparation of a legislative series, summaries of legislation, it considered, should no longer be included in this publication.

The Commission recommended that the field of community, family and child welfare should be approached from its legal, economic and social aspects.

Concerning the legal aspects, the Commission considered that a series of legal and administrative studies might be undertaken covering such matters as adoption, guardianship, birth registration, desertion, neglect, cruelty, exploitation, divorce and nullity. A study on maintenance obligations and their enforcement abroad, it noted, was already under way.

With regard to the economic aspects, the Commission expressed interest in an inquiry into the social and economic results of economic measures taken in favour of the family, including aged persons and children.

The Commission considered that the social aspects of the problem should be given priority in 1951-52. In this connexion it recommended that priority should be given to a survey of the contributions made by local community organizations in helping people solve their problems in areas at different stages of economic development. In recommending that work should be undertaken on the welfare of handicapped children, priority, it was felt, should be given to the welfare of blind and partially sighted children. Special attention, the Commission held, should be given to the welfare of children and young persons in rural and under-developed areas.

The Commission stated that it had already recommended that an integrated work programme for promoting the welfare of aged persons¹⁸⁹ should be initiated and that with regard to migration,¹⁹⁰ it had specific responsibility, for example, for studies on the social position, rights and benefits, and family and community relationship of immigrants. As other projects were completed in 1951, the Commission decided, the Secretary-General should proceed to study the simplification of administrative procedures for migrants and recommended that priority should also be given to a study of measures taken in various countries to facilitate the integration of immigrants into the national life of their new homelands.

Special Projects for 1950, 1951 and 1952

Maintenance obligations: enforcement abroad (1950-51)

Economic measures in favour of the family (1950-51)

Social and economic results of such measures (1951-52)

Methods of administering assistance to the needy (1950)

Contributions made by local community organizations in helping people solve their problems, in areas at different stages of economic development (1951-52)

Care of children outside their own homes (1950-51)

Welfare of handicapped children, giving priority to blind and partially sighted (1950-51-52)

Welfare of the aged: programme of research, study and action (1951-52)

Assistance to indigent aliens (1950-51)

Measures undertaken in various countries to facilitate integration of immigrants into the national life of their new homelands (1951)

Simplification of administrative procedures for migrants (1951)

Social problems peculiar to unassimilated groups or minorities (1951-52)

Legal and social status of migrants (1952)

The Economic and Social Council at its eleventh session, in approving the general lines of the Commission's general work programme, thereby approved the programme in the field of community, family and child welfare.

4. Social Rehabilitation of the Handicapped

a. WORK PROGRAMME

(1) Consideration by the Social Commission at Its Fifth Session

At its fifth session in December 1949, the Social Commission had before it a memorandum by the Secretary-General (E/CN.5/171) containing detailed proposals for a pilot project in social rehabilitation of the disabled, together with other recommendations (E/CN.5/L.1) submitted by an expert consultant sent to Austria and Poland under the advisory social welfare services programme.¹⁹¹ It also had before it recommendations resulting from an international conference of workers for the blind held at Oxford, England, in August 1949 (E/CN.5/172).

¹⁸⁸ For discussion of long-range activities for children, see pp. 616-21.

¹⁹⁰ See pp. 625-26.

(a) REHABILITATION OF THE PHYSICALLY HANDICAPPED IN GENERAL

It was agreed that the subject should be considered in two parts: the question of the physically handicapped in general and the problem of the blind in particular. It had also been agreed earlier that the subject of handicapped children should be given special emphasis as part of the child welfare programme¹⁹² on the understanding that the problem would be appropriately related to the general problem of social rehabilitation of the handicapped.

Several representatives stressed the importance of keeping in mind the financial implications of any programme which might be undertaken, and of considering proposals for special action in that field in relation to the total work programme of the Division of Social Activities, to the functions of specialized agencies and to the advisory social welfare services programme authorized by resolution 58(I) of the General Assembly.¹⁹³

The representative of the International Labour Office emphasized the interest and concern of his organization in rehabilitation of the physically handicapped. The representative of the World Health Organization associated himself with the views expressed on behalf of ILO, but stressed the importance of prevention as a means to reduce the size of the problem.

The majority of the Commission favoured the development of a programme but expressed the hope that specific proposals would be developed by the Secretariat as a basis for action at the sixth session.

The Commission unanimously adopted a resolution (E/1568) noting the scope and complex nature of the subject which extended into the fields of several specialized agencies. It requested the Secretary-General, after consultation with the specialized agencies, to draft a comprehensive proposal on the total rehabilitation of the physically handicapped, including the blind, for the Commission's consideration at its sixth session. The Commission asked him meanwhile to continue, and as far as possible extend, his activities in this field at the request of Governments as provided in General Assembly resolution 58(I).

(b) REHABILITATION OF THE BLIND

The Social Commission at its fifth session had before it a report (E/CN.5/172) of an International Conference of Workers for the Blind, consisting of executive officers of the most effective welfare organizations for the blind from seventeen countries, which had been held in England in August 1949. The Conference had adopted recommendations concerning registration, responsibility for the blind, rehabilitation and training, employment, special economic provisions, care of the blind at home, homes for the blind, special facilities, education and international organization. With reference to international organization, it had appointed a planning committee for the purpose of establishing an international committee for the welfare of the blind and also a committee to enquire into the possibility of convening a conference to consider problems relating to the education of the blind. The Conference had further suggested that the Social Commission might recommend appropriate action to develop minimum standards for the blind and establish a pilot project according to certain proposals submitted by the Assistant European Director of the American Foundation for Overseas Blind.

The Commission adopted a resolution requesting the Secretary-General, in co-operation with appropriate specialized agencies, to develop a programme of work in the field of social rehabilitation of the blind, including a plan for a demonstration project. It further recommended that the Council should

(1) note the report of the Oxford International Conference of Workers for the Blind and state that it considered this a helpful basis for the development of recommendations for governmental action;

(2) recognize the importance of developing minimum standards for the welfare of the blind;

(3) call the attention of Governments to the advisory social welfare services of the United Nations;

(4) recognize the United Nations' interest in the rehabilitation of the blind.

The representatives of the USSR and of the Union of South Africa stated that they had abstained from voting on this resolution because, while generally in favour of the substance of the resolution, they considered that no division should be made in the subject of rehabilitation of the handicapped.

(2) Consideration by the Social Commission at Its Sixth Session

At its sixth session, the Social Commission considered two reports submitted by the Secretary-General, one on the social rehabilitation of the handicapped in general (E/CN.5/197) and the other on the social rehabilitation of the blind (E/CN.5/198).

The former report briefly summarized the international action in the field of rehabilitation of the physically handicapped then in progress or under consideration. It included detailed information on the number of experts, fellowships and demonstration equipment supplied under the advisory social welfare services programme, and the current activities of the specialized agencies.

It also contained recommendations resulting from the conference held in Geneva, from 26 February to 3 March 1950, which had been attended by representatives of the United Nations Secretariat, ILO, WHO, UNESCO, IRO and the United Nations International Children's Emergency Fund. The Conference, inter alia, had recommended that the co-operation of the non-governmental organizations, including employers' and workers' organizations, should be sought as a part of a composite international programme. Responsibility for a co-ordinated programme, it suggested, could be entrusted to a working group of the Administrative Committee on Co-ordination,¹⁹⁴ which should meet preferably in Europe. The Conference envisaged that, in the initial phase of co-operation, the United Nations and the specialized agencies would provide technical assistance for the rehabilitation of the disabled. As a second phase, the United Nations and the specialized agencies should immediately establish an integrated and comprehensive plan for international action so that it might be submitted to the Council and the Executive Boards of the agencies for implementation in 1952.

The Secretary-General, bearing in mind these recommendations and the suggestions in the memorandum discussed at the Commission's fifth session (E/CN.5/171), included in his report a plan of action for the Social Commission. He recommended that the Commission establish a completely co-ordinated international programme and ensure co-ordination between the United Nations and the specialized agencies through consultations in the Administrative Committee on Co-ordination. The United Nations Secretariat, the report stated, would necessarily have to provide the staff for the administrative machinery and would have to be responsible for organizing an interchange of information and for encouraging the formation of national committees for the rehabilitation of the handicapped. He suggested that the Commission (1) subsequently compile an international list of the best known experts, (2) if it wished, request the Department of Public Information to study the possibility of organizing travelling exhibits and (3) ask the Economic Commission for Europe whether it could study a plan for Europe to facilitate the exchange of scarce materials used in the manufacture of prosthetic appliances for the handicapped.

The majority of the Commission agreed on the need for such a programme and considered it important to establish international standards for the education, treatment, training and placement of the disabled. The importance of including methods for prevention in a comprehensive programme of rehabilitation was also stressed. It was pointed out that the stage of development in each country was a very important factor in determining emphasis. Several members explained that their governments had not had time to consider the long-range implications of the proposed programme.

Concerning the blind, the Secretary-General reported (E/CN.5/198) that he had developed within the general framework of the comprehensive proposal on the total rehabilitation of the physically handicapped, including the blind, a programme of work for social rehabilitation of the blind. Considerations basic to an integrated programme, it was stated, involved (1) general considerations, such as medical aspects, education, industrial and labour aspects and welfare services, and (2) a plan for a demonstration project. A programme of this nature would call for early action with regard to co-operative planning, co-ordinated utilization of available resources, and secretariat machinery. The report also contained, in an annex, recommendations for the blind resulting from the Geneva Conference (see above). Among other things, the Conference had felt that it was essential to establish a section for the welfare of the blind within the Division of Social Activities of the United Nations, and that a demonstration project should be set up to include: home teaching services, pre-vocational rehabilitation, vocational guidance and training, employment and home industries, general social welfare and recreation and a braille printing plant. Moreover, every effort should be made to bring non-governmental agencies within the framework of the programme.

The Social Commission was in general agreement with the proposals in the Secretary-General's report on the blind, although a number of representatives expressed doubts about a demonstration centre.

The representatives of ILO and WHO agreed in principle with the proposals for international action. The ILO representative stated that although his organization was anxious to be of assistance, it could not, for budgetary reasons, commit itself at the present time to participation in a demonstration centre for the blind. The representative of WHO expressed his organization's particular concern with the prevention of blindness.

On the basis of several proposals, the Commission (E/1678), inter alia, recommended that in addition to planning a work programme, the Secretary-General should as a continuing function provide as wide a range of services as possible to Governments, including, more particularly, training materials and appliances. It also recommended that the specialized agencies which are directly concerned with the problem of disability should assist Governments by whatever means they have at their disposal. Governments themselves should be urged, where they have not already done so, to take the initiative, either through their own or other organs, in adopting measures for the readjustment of disabled groups in their communities. (For text of resolution, with minor changes, see below.)

The Social Commission at its sixth session also determined a programme of work for 1950 for the rehabilitation of the handicapped. It pointed out that the main groups among the physically handicapped whose readjustment required special attention were the blind and the partially sighted; the deaf and the hard-of-hearing; orthopaedic cripples, in which group might be included cardiacs, the cerebral-palsied and all those whose power of locomotion was limited by their disability; epileptics; and some types of tuberculosis sufferers. The mentally handicapped would include the sub-normal or retarded mental defectives and those suffering from psychoneuroses and other types of psychiatric disorders which lend themselves to rehabilitative treatment. A programme for the physically handicapped should include minor disabilities which constitute a hindrance to adjustment.

The major item in the work programme for 1950, it indicated, was the development of a co-ordinated plan for effective study and action to rehabilitate the handicapped.

In developing a programme for the disabled, it recommended that the Secretary-General give particular attention to the problem of the blind, more especially in under-developed areas.

The Commission recommended further (E/1678) that the studies and other appropriate action in this field for the years 1951 and 1952 should be:

Development of a co-ordinated plan for submission to the Commission at its next session (1950)

Preparation of training materials (1950-51)

Assistance in providing for the exchange of materials for the manufacture of all types of prosthetic appliances (1950-51)

Rehabilitation of the blind: emphasis on planning of co-operation with a national demonstration project in an under-developed country (1950-51)

Rehabilitation of one or more other handicapped groups (preferably cripples) as the Secretariat, having regard to available technical staff and other relevant considerations, might find expedient and practicable

(3) Consideration by the Economic and Social Council at Its Eleventh Session

The Economic and Social Council considered the question at the 125th and 127th meetings of its Social Committee on 5 and 6 July and at its 387th plenary meeting on 13 July 1950.

During the discussion in the Social Committee the representative of Chile expressed the view that the draft resolution proposed by the Social Commission served no purpose since it merely made recommendations to Governments for action which most of them had already taken. Moreover, the matter could be adequately dealt with under the advisory social welfare services programme. The majority, however, were of the opinion that Governments were aware of the problem but to differing degrees and that there was, therefore, a distinct advantage in having some central place where knowledge could be concentrated.

The representatives of Canada, India and Belgium expressed the hope that the financial estimates could be reduced and expenditures kept at a minimum. The United Kingdom representative supported this view, and stated that he thought there was no case at the moment for a large staff as recommended by the Secretary-General. The present stage, he felt, was only one of joint planning for action and that could be done within the United States Secretariat and the specialized agencies.

The Social Committee agreed that throughout the resolution the word "physically" should be placed before any reference to "handicapped", since the problem of the mentally handicapped should be dealt with at a later stage.

To satisfy the point made by the representative of Chile concerning governmental action, the representative of Belgium submitted an amendment which would indicate that Governments were active and therefore recommend that they continue their efforts. The amendment was adopted unanimously.

The Social Committee also unanimously adopted a United States amendment (E/AC.7/L.19) to add a paragraph requesting the Secretary-General to report to the seventh session of the Commission on the progress made in developing the programme so that the Commission might advise the Council at its thirteenth session regarding further steps to be taken.

The Social Committee at its 127th meeting on 6 July adopted the resolution proposed by the Social Commission (E/1678), as amended, by 11 votes to none, with 3 abstentions (see below).

The question of expense was again raised in the Council's 387th plenary meeting on 13 July. The Secretary-General had submitted an estimate (E/1678/Add.1/Rev.1) which called for an additional expenditure of $21,550 for 1951. The United Kingdom representative thought that it seemed premature to engage staff at such a cost before there was any plan of action. Moreover, he felt that any plan should be carried on by a joint effort of the specialized agencies concerned and the United Nations and not by a special section of the United Nations Secretariat.

The representative of the United States pointed out that the activities had to be co-ordinated from some centre, and that a small staff in the Secretariat would form a nucleus which would be able to provide both the expert knowledge required and the necessary co-ordination of activities of all the agencies in the field.

The Council at the same meeting adopted the resolution, as recommended by the Social Committee (E/1775), by 11 votes to none, with 3 abstentions. Resolution 309 E (XI) endorsed the Commission's views with minor changes. It read as follows:

The Economic and Social Council,

Having considered the report of the Social Commission, based on the recommendations of the Geneva meeting of the Secretariats of the United Nations, the specialized agencies and the United Nations International Children's Emergency Fund, with respect to the desirability of the United Nations, the specialized agencies and the United Nations International Children's Emergency Fund developing a broad, co-ordinated programme of rehabilitation of the physically handicapped, including the blind,

Requests the Secretary-General:

(1) To plan jointly with the specialized agencies and in consultation with the interested non-governmental organizations a well co-ordinated international programme for rehabilitation of physically handicapped persons;

(2) To provide, in so far as the budget permits, the various types of service which are made available from time to time under resolution 58(I) and other available sources such as the expanded programme of technical assistance;

(3) To expand the present facilities for dissemination of information on rehabilitation and the preparation of training materials;

(4) To assist, as appropriate, in providing for the exchange of knowledge and materials for the manufacture of all types of prosthetic devices as well as information on hearing aids;

(5) To include an amount in the budget estimates of the United Nations for 1951 for employing staff to initiate this programme; and

(6) To report to the seventh session of the Social Commission the progress made in developing the programme in order that the Commission may advise the Council at its thirteenth session regarding further steps to be taken in implementing an effective international programme in this field;

Recommends to the specialized agencies concerned that every effort be made to provide Governments, in need of and requesting expert assistance, with help and advice in the field of the social rehabilitation of the physically handicapped, including the blind; and

Recommends to Member Governments that they should continue their efforts in the field of social rehabilitation of physically handicapped persons, including the blind, and in cases where they have not yet done so:

(1) That they consider establishing or encouraging appropriate governmental or other organs to take the lead in studying and solving the problems confronting physically handicapped persons; and

(2) That they consider appropriate measures including legislation for helping physically handicapped persons to solve the special problems with which they are faced.

In approving the general lines of the Social Commission's general work programme (309 G (XI)),¹⁹⁵ the Council thereby approved the projects recommended with regard to the rehabilitation of the physically handicapped, including the blind.

b. ACTIVITIES DURING 1950

A meeting of an ad hoc Technical Working Group of the Administrative Committee on Co-ordination on rehabilitation of the physically handicapped was held in Geneva from 18 to 20 December 1950 to discuss the co-ordination of existing services and programmes for implementation in 1950. The group prepared a report for submission to the Commission at its seventh session in 1951.

Under the provisions of the advisory social welfare services programme, one expert visited Austria and another Yugoslavia. Twelve fellowships were awarded to eight countries and demonstration equipment, mostly for the manufacture and fitting of prosthetic appliances, was supplied to Austria, Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia, Finland; Hungary, Poland and the Philippines.

5. Housing and Town and Country Planning

In resolution 243 D (IX) adopted in August 1949¹⁹⁶ the Economic and Social Council had asked Member Governments to express their views concerning the focus of an international programme in the fields of housing and town and country planning and to specify which of the services listed in a report prepared by the Secretary-General (E/1343) would be of special interest to them. The Council also requested the Secretary-General to arrange for a meeting of experts in 1950 in an appropriate tropical area to consider technical questions relating to housing and town planning for the lower-income groups in the humid tropics (243 C (IX)).

a. CONSIDERATION BY THE SOCIAL COMMISSION AT ITS FIFTH SESSION

At the Social Commission's fifth session reference was made to the necessity for ensuring effective co-ordination between the United Nations and all other interested organizations. The specialized agencies, it was suggested, should be invited to develop their work, in the field of housing, within the framework of the integrated programme as rapidly as possible.

The attention of the Commission was also drawn to the desirability of including studies and projects on housing in the expanded programme of technical assistance when it began its operations.

The Commission felt that it was important to hold the meeting of experts on tropical housing, for which funds had been provided. However, if for organizational or other reasons that was impossible, it recommended that the Council authorize the Secretary-General to use these funds to arrange for groups of visiting experts in the tropical areas concerned.

The Commission proposed (E/1568) that:

1. The basic continuing work programme of the United Nations to which may be added special projects, should include the following items:

(a) Continuation of the Housing and Town and Country Planning Reference and Documentation Centre;

(b) Publication of the bulletin Housing and Town and Country Planning;

(c) Publication of the Legislative and Administrative Series;

(d) Provision at the request of Governments of advisory services, seminars, fellowships and technical assistance in general, particularly to under-developed and tropical areas;

(e) Assisting in developing basic studies and plans for technical assistance programmes.

2. In regard to the meeting of experts on tropical housing and town planning approved by the Economic and Social Council by its resolution 243 C (IX) adopted at its ninth session, the Secretary-General should be authorized, if necessary, to use the funds allocated for that purpose to promote groups of visiting experts in the tropical areas concerned.

3. The 1950 work programme should consist of the following items listed in order of importance:

(a) Continuation and consolidation of the Housing and Town and Country Planning Reference and Documentation Centre;

(b) Publication of the bulletin Housing and Town and Country Planning;

(c) Publication of information relating to organizations and research institutions concerned with housing and town and country planning;

(d) Publication of a study on minimum housing standards enforceable under penalty;

(e) Provision, at the request of Governments, of advisory services and fellowships;

(f) Preparation of study of financing of housing;

(g) Preparation of study of the neighbourhood unit.

4. The work programme after 1950 should include:

(a) Publication of the handbook providing summaries of housing and town and country planning legislation;

(b) Preparation of a film catalogue;

(c) A study of the social, economic and technological factors in various types of urban development.

5. The following topics, set out in the report of the Secretary-General (E/1343), should be covered in 1951 and subsequent years, with the co-operation, as appropriate, of the specialized agencies, by articles, abstracts, bibliographies and other documented information, in the bulletin or otherwise:

(a) Available housing and its condition;

(b) Income and housing costs (other than questions of financing);

(c) Land policies;

(d) Problem of urban development;

(e) Improvement in rural housing and amenities;

(f) Suggestions for improved neighbourhood and dwelling design (for areas other than tropical);

(g) Increasing productivity in construction;

(h) Housing for special categories of persons.

b. CONSIDERATION BY THE ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL AT ITS TENTH SESSION

In view of the fact that only thirteen Governments and the Social Commission had expressed opinions on the proposed integrated work programme (E/1343), the Council's Agenda Committee, at the tenth session, decided that the final decision regarding the programme should be deferred until the Council's eleventh session. However, the Council, when examining the report of the Social Commission's fifth session (E/1568 & Add.1) at the 117th and 118th meetings of its Social Committee on 10 February and at its 354th plenary meeting on 17 February, considered those matters relating to housing and town and country planning, which the Social Commission had judged to be within its own competence and had therefore included in its proposed short-range and long-range work programmes.

During the discussion several representatives, among them the representatives of Chile and the United Kingdom, stressed the importance of the role of the expanded technical assistance programme in matters of housing. The majority supported the proposals of the Social Commission in principle and the Social Committee, at its 118th meeting on 10 February, adopted (E/1607) by 13 votes to none, with 2 abstentions, a draft resolution presented by the representative of Chile (E/AC.7/L.8), and slightly amended by France. The resolution was adopted with minor amendment by the Council (see below).

At its 354th meeting on 17 February the Council also had before it a note by the Secretary-General (E/1607/Add.1) on the financial implications which would result from the adoption of the resolution. The additional costs for carrying out the proposed programme, it was indicated, would be approximately $10,630. It was generally agreed, however, that the Assembly would have to make the final decision on any increase of expenditure in this field. It was also agreed, on the proposal of the United Kingdom representative, that the resolution should be amended to indicate that the Council "recommends" rather than "authorizes" the Secretary-General to use the funds for visits by experts. The Council, at the same meeting, by 13 votes to none, with 2 abstentions, adopted resolution 279 B (X), as recommended by its Social Committee (E/1607). By this resolution, the Council approved the 1950 work programme in the field of housing and town and country planning as adopted by the Social Commission at its fifth session, drawing the attention of the Commission to the Council's discussions and requesting it to establish priorities in favour of a few items from which positive results could be obtained. The Council also requested the Secretary-General to promote and intensify the co-operation already established with the specialized agencies and other international organizations. It recommended, as suggested by the Social Commission, that, in the event that it was impossible to hold the meeting of the experts on tropical housing in 1950, the Secretary-General should use the funds for organizing visits by groups of experts to the tropical areas concerned.

Following consultations with the Governments concerned, a mission of four experts on tropical housing visited India, Indonesia, Malaya, Pakistan and Thailand from November 1950 to January 1951.

c. CONSIDERATION BY THE SOCIAL COMMISSION AT ITS SIXTH SESSION

The Social Commission at its sixth session in April-May 1950 (E/1678) reviewed the continuing programme which it had recommended at its fifth session and noted that the Secretary-General had decided to organize, in 1950, visits by experts on tropical housing to advise Governments in the areas concerned. The Commission included within the work programme for succeeding years all the activities and projects indicated in the integrated programme on housing and town and country planning as falling within the responsibility of the United Nations. It also recommended that certain other projects outlined in this programme should be undertaken after 1952, i.e. problems of urban and rural settlement; collection and analysis of programmes of housing and public construction; community services and tenant co-operation; technical reports on community development and community centres with special reference to rural areas; and collection of information on increasing productivity in construction of housing.

The Commission stated the opinion that some of the studies for which the United Nations had been given prime responsibility in the integrated programme, such as the studies of housing problems of special categories of persons and the studies on housing and economic stability, should be carried out as integral parts of the general social welfare and economic programmes of the United Nations. Therefore, the Commission did not assign any special priority to these studies.

The Commission outlined the following special projects for 1950, 1951 and 1952:

Mission of experts on tropical housing (1950)

Minimum housing standards enforceable under penalty (1950)

Financing of housing (1951)

The neighbourhood unit and improvement of neighbourhood unit design for areas other than tropical (1951)

Social, economic and technological problems of urban planning and development (1951)

Methods of preparing housing programmes (1951-52)

Available housing and present and future housing needs (1951-52)

Housing costs in relation to family income (1951-52)

Improvement of rural dwellings and amenities with special reference to tropical and under-developed areas (1952)

Collection of current information on urban land policies (1952)

The Economic and Social Council at its 387th plenary meeting on 13 July 1950, in approving the general lines of the Commission's general work programme (309 G (XI)),¹⁹⁷ thereby approved the programme in the fields of housing and town and country planning.

d. ACTIVITIES DURING 1950

The Housing and Town and Country Planning Reference Centre at Headquarters during 1950 prepared for publication 1,075 abstracts. At the first General Assembly of the International Council for Building Documentation in Paris in October arrangements were made for the systematic exchange of information between the United Nations Reference Centre, and the Council and its national Documentation Centres. In addition 1,210 bibliographical references were prepared for publication.

Two issues of the Housing and Town and Country Planning bulletin were published in English in February and October 1950¹⁹⁸ and the French texts were to be published early in 1951.

A report on minimum standards enforceable under penalty¹⁹⁹ was published in March 1950, and a preliminary report on low-cost rural housing in tropical areas²⁰⁰ appeared in November 1950.

In addition to consideration of five requests from Governments for expert assistance, an expert was sent to the Fourth West Indian Conference at Curaçao to assist in the formulation of programmes and policy in the field of low-cost rural housing. Eight fellowships were granted to students in housing and town and country planning under the advisory social welfare services programme, and training facilities were provided through the organization in Egypt, in December 1950, of a rural welfare seminar which dealt with, among other things, the problems of rural housing.

6. Social Defence

a. PREVENTION OF CRIME AND TREATMENT OF OFFENDERS

(1) Work Programme

The Social Commission at its fifth session in December 1949 (E/1568)²⁰¹ approved a programme of research and action in this field, which was provisionally endorsed by the Economic and Social Council at its tenth session (279 A (X)). The Commission listed, inter alia, those subjects on which research was in progress: the problem of juvenile delinquency in all its phases, including the study of advanced legislation on the subject; probation and related measures; criminal statistics, with a view to a report on the state of crime; and, in co-operation with the World Health Organization, medical, psychiatric and social examination of offenders, before the final disposition of the case and as a guide to treatment.

In reviewing the work programme at its sixth session, the Commission, in April-May 1950 (E/1678), noted that the final statistical report on the state of crime, 1937-46, would contain proposals for the standard classification of offences and uniform crime statistics and that the final study on probation would contain conclusions indicating internationally attainable standards.

Taking into account that negotiations were proceeding for integrating the International Penal and Penitentiary Commission into the United Nations,²⁰² the Commission recommended that as the work in progress was completed during 1951 and 1952, the Secretary-General should undertake work on the following subjects selected by him from among those which the Commission had recommended for priority at its fifth session. These were: the detention of adults prior to sentence; the indeterminate sentence and other measures designed to adapt the duration of treatment in correctional or penal institutions to the need of the individual offender and to ensure the protection of society; parole and after-care; and the selection and training of personnel for penal and correctional institutions.

During the years immediately following 1952, the Commission recommended that the Secretary-General should first undertake the other studies which the Commission had recommended for high priority, namely: the use of short-term imprisonment and the payment of fines in instalments; habitual offenders; open penal and correctional institutions; and police programmes and activities positively directed at the prevention of crime.

The Economic and Social Council at its 387th plenary meeting on 13 July 1950, in approving the general lines of the Commission's general work programme (309 G (XI)),²⁰³ thereby approved the programme with regard to the prevention of crime and treatment of offenders.

(2) Activities during 1950

A meeting of representatives of specialized agencies and of international non-governmental organizations dealing with the prevention of crime and the treatment of offenders was organized by the United Nations and took place at Geneva from 16 to 18 May 1950. The meeting determined the general lines for the participation of the specialized agencies and the international organizations in the implementation of the United Nations work programme. It established a permanent committee of the interested specialized agencies and international organizations for the primary purpose of maintaining close liaison with the United Nations Secretariat and thereby avoiding duplication of work (E/CN.5/223).

In keeping with the Council's decision in July 1949 (243 F (IX)),²⁰⁴ an International Group of Experts met at Lake Success from 11 to 15 December 1950 to advise the Secretary-General and the Social Commission (E/CN.5/231) in devising and formulating certain policies and programmes. The Group considered the problems of probation and related measures, criminal statistics and detention of adults prior to sentence.

Under the advisory social welfare services programme, five experts on juvenile delinquency took part in a seminar held at Rome in December 1950. The Secretariat also advised the Technical Assistance Administration on possible action to take on fifteen requests for observers' fellowships in social defence.

b. TRAFFIC IN PERSONS

The Social Commission at its sixth session in April-May 1950 (E/1678) recommended that priority should be given to questions concerning the exploitation of the prostitution of others. The Commission recommended that summaries of reports received from Governments on traffic in persons should be published every five years instead of annually and that the Secretary-General should cease to publish the report summarizing Government reports on Traffic in Obscene Publications. The draft questionnaire, which is to serve as a basis for the five-year reports, was revised during the year in the light of government comments.

The Commission at its sixth session also had before it a report from the Secretary-General (E/CN.5/206) on the establishment of a Far Eastern Bureau for the purpose of combating traffic in persons in that area. This report had been prepared in accordance with Council resolution 43(IV) which had asked the Secretary-General to report on the possibility of implementing the League of Nations' proposal to establish a Far Eastern Bureau for this purpose and to inquire into the need for the establishment of other such regional bureaux. The Secretary-General's report was limited to the question of the establishment of a bureau in the East.

The report dealt with: the background and development of the proposal of the League of Nations; action by the United Nations; the current need for an Eastern Bureau; and suggested functions and organizations of the Far Eastern Bureau. In his conclusions, the Secretary-General suggested three possibilities:

(1) That the creation of a bureau in the Far East should be recommended as a timely and necessary measure since, in the light of existing conditions, the problem of prostitution and the traffic in persons had become more acute;

(2) That the decision as to whether or not to recommend the establishment of a Bureau should be postponed in view of the troubled situation existing in many countries of the Far East, which would greatly impede international action, and that the matter should be re-opened as soon as circumstances in that Area permitted a practical solution; or

(3) That the desirability of creating a Far Eastern Bureau should be accepted in principle by the Commission, which should, however, before recommending that the Bureau be established, suggest that an expert adviser be appointed by the Secretary-General to discuss on the spot, with the competent governmental authorities, the practical problems related to the organization and functioning of such a Bureau. The expert, it was proposed, should visit, inter alia, Djakarta, Bangkok, Hong Kong, Manila, Saigon, Singapore, Shanghai and Tokyo. On the basis of a further report from the Secretary-General the Commission could then make its recommendations to the Council. If this recommendation were adopted, the Secretary-General estimated, an amount of $14,560 would be needed for the services of an expert.

During the discussion in the Commission it was agreed that, in view of the radically changed conditions in the Far East, further investigation would be necessary before a decision could be taken in principle as to the setting up of a Far Eastern Bureau.

The Commission, therefore, (E/1678) asked the Secretary-General to consult Governments in the region with a view to the calling of a conference to examine the problem. The conference, it proposed, should be attended by governmental experts and representatives of interested non-governmental agencies and the costs should be borne by the participants. It also asked that an expert consultant in this field should be made available by the Secretary-General to Governments of the Far East which requested these services under the advisory social welfare services programme. The Secretary-General was also asked to study the feasibility of making advisers in this field available in other areas of the world and to report to a future session of the Commission.

7. Report on the World Social Situation

The Economic and Social Council at its ninth session in July-August 1949, at the request of the General Assembly (280(III)), discussed the possibility of preparing periodic surveys of social and cultural conditions throughout the world to assist the United Nations and the specialized agencies in formulating their social welfare and development programmes. The Council (244(IX)) asked the Secretary-General to report on the feasibility of drafting a general report on the world social and cultural situation.

The Secretary-General's memorandum on the subject (E/CN.5/208) was considered by the Social Commission at its sixth session in April-May 1950. The report contained replies received from specialized agencies and non-governmental organizations, as well as the results of consultations held with private scholars.

The Secretary-General reported that, on the basis of comments received from various sources, he was of the opinion that a report on the world social and cultural situation would be feasible if it was conceived as a co-ordination and synthesis of information already available in documents which are prepared for the normal programmes of the United Nations and the specialized agencies. He suggested that the report might be presented in two parts: part I would organize the available data on a regional basis—that is, for each country or region, the various kinds of available statistical data on the country would be grouped together, together with an appropriate commentary; part II would organize the available data on a subject-matter basis—health, education, employment conditions, housing, etc.—so that a world-wide perspective of conditions in each specific subject would be presented. The Secretary-General further stated that he would be prepared to undertake a trial report during 1951. This report might then serve as a basis for a final decision on the feasibility of establishing the project on a permanent basis.

The Social Commission (E/1678) expressed the belief that a trial report along the lines outlined in the memorandum by the Secretariat should be prepared. The Commission recommended that the title of the report should be changed to indicate that it was essentially an international report on social conditions, that it should be completed by the end of 1951, if possible, and that it should serve as a basis for decision as to the feasibility and value of having such reports in the future. Finally, the Commission recommended that the Council should request the Secretary-General to submit to the eighth session of the Social Commission and to the fifteenth session of the Council such a report on the world social situation based on the information at the disposal of the United Nations and its specialized agencies and in accordance with the recommendations on this subject by the Social Commission at its sixth session.

The Council considered these recommendations of the Social Commission at its eleventh session at the 125th, 126th, and 128th meetings of its Social Committee on 5 and 6 July and at its 387th plenary meeting on 13 July 1950.

During the discussions, the representatives of Australia, Canada, Pakistan and the United Kingdom opposed the Social Commission's proposals. Among other things, they held that the subject of the proposed report was too broad and that there would be a danger of its overlapping with the work of specialized agencies. Moreover, the work and expenditure entailed could be used to better advantage elsewhere. The representative of Pakistan also stated that, in his opinion, the inquiry would be of no practical value as world conditions were changing so rapidly.

Those favouring the proposal, among them the representatives of Belgium, Brazil, India, France, Iran, Mexico, Peru and the United States, felt that the proposed inquiry would be feasible since the limits had been defined and restricted to factors which were important in solving urgent practical problems. There was a need, they held, for a synthesis of all the information available on the subject, since this information might otherwise be lost in the archives of the various agencies. The inquiry would also be useful in connexion with the technical assistance programme, since the economic and social aspects of this programme were closely inter-connected. Many international organizations, they said, favoured such an inquiry. Its cost, moreover, should not be exaggerated, and should not impede an action which clearly was in accordance with the principles laid down in the United Nations Charter.

The Social Committee at its 128th meeting on 6 July rejected the recommendations of the Social Commission by 6 votes to 6, with 2 abstentions. These recommendations, however, were approved by the Council at its 387th meeting by 10 votes to 5, without substantial modification, in resolution 309 F (XI).

Following the adoption of this resolution the Secretary-General has begun to compile and organize the relevant information available in the Secretariat. The Secretary-General has also begun discussions with the appropriate specialized agencies regarding the nature of the contributions they might make to the report.

8. Social Problems of the Aboriginal Populations and Other Under-developed Social Groups of the American Continent

At its ninth session in July-August 1949, the Council considered a report of the Secretary-General on the action taken under General Assembly resolution 275(III) and the texts of two resolutions concerning the indigenous populations of the American continent, one adopted by the fourth Labour Conference of American States members of the International Labour Organisation (Montevideo, April-May 1949), and one adopted by the second Inter-American Indigenous Congress (Cuzco, June-July 1949).²⁰⁵

The Council, in resolution 245(IX), requested the Secretary-General to report to the eleventh session of the Council on the progress being made in this field by all parties concerned, and, in particular, to report on the comments received from Governments.

In his report to the eleventh session (E/1691), the Secretary-General informed the Council that no comments nor requests to study the situation of the aboriginal populations and other under-developed social groups of the American continent had been received from any Member States. At the same time, he drew the Council's attention to the resolutions adopted by the Economic and Social Council of the Organization of American States at its session in March-April 1950, calling for the early negotiation of an agreement among the American States with large aboriginal populations for the purpose of requesting jointly from the United Nations and the specialized agencies any international help that could be rendered to improve the living conditions of those populations. Finally, the attention of the Council was called to a resolution adopted by the Population Commission at its fourth session in April 1949 requesting the Secretary-General, in consultation with the relevant specialized agencies, to consider methods for identifying such under-developed social groups, and, when requested by the Governments concerned, to investigate the inter-relationships of the demographic, economic and social characteristics of the groups concerned (E/1313).

The Council considered the matter briefly at its 397th plenary meeting on 24 July 1950. It unanimously adopted resolution 313(XI), proposed by the representatives of Chile, Peru and the United States (E/L.76), underlining the importance of raising the standard of living of the aboriginal populations of the American continent. It requested the Secretary-General to render, in this regard, with the advice and collaboration of the specialized agencies concerned, expert assistance to any governmental body, whether national or international, that might request it, and to report to the Council on this matter whenever necessary.

9. Inter-relationship of the Social and Economic Activities of the United Nations

The Social Commission at its fifth session in December 1949 discussed the question of the inter-relationship of social and economic activities, stressing the importance of co-ordination. The Commission (E/1568) expressed its confidence that the Council, in implementing its several resolutions on technical assistance and economic development and financing, would give due consideration to the desirability and feasibility of studying measures to promote and finance social development as well as economic development. The Commission asked the Secretary-General to report periodically to the Social Commission on any measures which might be adopted to co-ordinate and integrate programmes in the social field with the application of the General Assembly resolutions on technical assistance and economic development.

The Commission also recommended that the Secretary-General undertake an analysis of the experiments carried out under varying local conditions in the establishment of necessary community social services in under-developed areas. He was to present to the sixth session of the Commission a statement outlining the projects he was prepared to provide on the request of Governments as part of technical assistance for economic development.

The Social Commission at its sixth session had before it the Secretary-General's report on "Social Projects to Be Provided by the United Nations under the Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance for Economic Development" (E/AC.5/-209). The report dealt chiefly with the social fields in which the United Nations was prepared to render services:

- I. Background Data on Social Conditions
 - a. Population characteristics and trends
 - b. Standards of living
 - c. Sociological surveys
 - d. Sample surveys of popular attitudes
- II. Housing, Community Development, Town and Country Planning
- III. Migration
- IV. Administration of Social Welfare Services
- V. Social Services for Special Groups
 - a. Aboriginal inhabitants and other unassimilated groups
 - b. Elderly people
 - c. Problems of women
 - d. Physically handicapped persons
 - e. Aliens, refugees, immigrants

- f. Narcotic addicts
- g. Delinquents
- VI. Social Reforms

The Commission was unable to discuss the subject fully but adopted a resolution calling certain aspects of the question (E/1678) to the attention of the Secretary-General. It recommended that the Secretary-General take the appropriate steps to ensure that the Technical Assistance Board give attention to the social aspects of all matters with which it deals. It also asked him to take further steps to assure that economic exploratory missions, where possible, include experts qualified: (a) to study social conditions, including basic cultural factors; (b) to advise on the social effects of proposed economic development projects and on measures to prevent the development of social problems that would interfere with economic development; and (c) to recommend projects to assist countries in dealing with social problems affecting their productive capacities.

The Commission also requested the Secretary-General to:

- (1) report on the work carried out for social development and community welfare in under-developed countries, particularly in rural areas, by indigenous voluntary organizations, noting in particular the basic principles and methods which had been found effective;
- (2) examine and ascertain the ways in which these organizations were seeking to relate social welfare to economic changes presently taking place;
- (3) suggest lines along which United Nations assistance in the social field might relate itself to such indigenous effort;
- (4) outline, from this point of view, any additional social projects he was prepared to provide to under-developed countries at their request as part of the United Nations Technical Assistance Programme;
- (5) report on the experiences of non-indigenous consultants and field workers who have been concerned with the concrete problems and methods of relating developmental programmes to the social conditions, customs and potentialities of under-developed areas.²⁰⁶

O. UNITED NATIONS INTERNATIONAL CHILDREN'S EMERGENCY FUND (UNICEF) AND THE CONTINUING NEEDS OF CHILDREN

1. Activities of the Fund during 1950

In its final report (E/1908) to the Economic and Social Council, the First Executive Board of UNICEF²⁰⁷ covered the activities of the Fund from its establishment on 11 December 1946 to 31 December 1950. The following is a summary of the activities during 1950.

Total accumulated contributions and pledges to the Fund at the end of 1950 amounted to $152,900,000, not taking into account pledges which would become available in 1951 and in future years. Seventy-one per cent had been derived from voluntary contributions of 47 Governments and two territories, 21 per cent from the residual assets of UNRRA and 8 per cent from the United Nations Appeal for Children (UNAC) which had conducted campaigns in 45 countries and more than thirty territories. Included in the 8 per cent were donations from other private sources, almost $100,000 of which was in the form of personal contributions from members of the United Nations and of the specialized agencies staffs.

²⁰⁰ At the seventh session of the Social Commission (19 Mar.—13 Apr. 1951), this resolution was consolidated with four related resolutions into a central project on "community welfare centres".

UNICEF reported the following allocations for assistance to country child care programmes for the year 1950: $5,700,000 to Asia, $700,000 to Europe, $2,500,000 to Latin America and $2,300,000 to the Middle East and North Africa. In addition, $7,250,000 had been allocated for international training courses and operation services, for freight for UNICEF supplies and for administration purposes. By June of 1950 the Fund had received contributions and pledges from other Governments sufficient to draw the full $75,000,000 from the United States on the matching formula of $72 for every $28 equivalent. New United States legislation was enacted in June, authorizing an additional $15,000,000, subject to appropriation and matching.

Of the total contributions to UNICEF since its inception, $151,700,000 had been allocated, and $119,000,000 had been spent by the end of 1950 for the benefit of children in sixty countries and territories. During 1950 the Fund's aid was extended to 22 additional countries in Asia, Europe, Latin America and the Middle East. During the year the Fund continued to devote increasing attention to countries outside Europe.

a. SUPPLEMENTARY FEEDING

In its supplementary feeding programme UNICEF continued during 1950 to supply powdered, skim and whole milk, cod liver oil, margarine, lard and butter, canned and dried meats, fish, cheese, cocoa, sugar grains, rice, dried fruits and jam. In May 1950, at the peak of its programme in Europe, 6,000,000 children, infants and nursing mothers were receiving such assistance, nearly 80 per cent of the recipients being school children. By the end of 1950, 500,000 children in Asia were participating in government feeding programmes, and plans were being undertaken in Latin America for feeding programmes to cover 547,000 school children and 74,000 infants, pre-school children, pregnant women and nursing mothers. During the early part of 1950, about 7,000,000 children and nursing and pregnant mothers were being supplied with an "extra" meal. By the end of the year, the number was somewhat less because, except for Greece, Italy and Yugoslavia, food shipments had ceased to European countries and the UNICEF-assisted feeding programmes in Asia and Latin America were not yet in full swing. FAO advised the Governments in Central America, the Philippines and Thailand in developing these programmes. By the spring of 1951 it was expected that between five and six million would be receiving an extra meal. With regard to the Palestine refugees, the Fund continued its aid, begun in 1948, to approximately half a million mothers and children, for whom it supplied milk, meat, fats, wheat and other foods.

In the course of general aid to child feeding programmes, UNICEF took special steps to meet particular emergencies. For example, in the case of a drought in Bulgaria in the winter of 1949-50, it provided grains (a departure from its usual policy), and in the drought in Yugoslavia in 1950 it increased the number of beneficiaries. In the summer of 1950 it provided dried milk to the victims of an earthquake in Assam (India) and of a flood in West Punjab (Pakistan).

During the year UNICEF also continued its emergency feeding programmes to help those suffering from the effects of the war in Greece. Since the spring of 1950 a considerable proportion of UNICEF supplementary foods was distributed to the refugee children and nursing mothers who had gone back with their families to their home villages, mostly in the mountains.

One of UNICEF's main contributions has been the provision of vitamin-rich liver oils for feeding programmes. In the winter of 1949-50, UNICEF reported, more children benefited from cod liver oil and concentrated fish liver oil capsules than from other foodstuffs sent by UNICEF, and in some countries this was the only assistance supplied.

b. MILK CONSERVATION

To assist in improving the local supplies of milk for the benefit of children, UNICEF during 1950 supplied fluid milk equipment (pasteurizers, cooling units, bottling machines, etc.) to Austria, Finland, Greece, Italy and Malta, milk-drying plants to Bulgaria and Czechoslovakia and both fluid milk and dry milk processing plants to Poland and Yugoslavia. In November 1950 the Executive Board of UNICEF approved a request from Chile for the first UNICEF-assisted milk drying plant in Latin America, as a result of which more than 100,000 children would receive free skim milk daily as a supplementary food distributed mainly through maternal and child health centres.

c. RAW MATERIAL FOR CHILDREN'S CLOTHING AND SHOES

One form of aid furnished by UNICEF has been to supply, mainly in Europe, textile and leather raw materials to recipient countries which in turn bore the costs of manufacturing the finished product. During 1950, Austria, Finland, Germany, Greece, Italy and Poland were given such assistance. By the end of the year UNICEF reported the following products had been made in Europe with UNICEF-supplied materials: 1,850,000 pairs of shoes, 400,000 layettes and 1,300,000 diapers and infant vests, 5,770,000 square metres of cotton piece goods, 850,000 stockings, over 1,000,000 overcoats, underwear, sweaters and dresses, and 67,000 blankets.

In Japan UNICEF raw cotton was supplied in 1949 and 1950 and was used primarily for suits of clothing. The Japanese Government met all the local expenses and distributed without charge the finished products to approximately 467,000 children. UNICEF has also distributed finished or semi-finished goods to meet sudden emergencies. In the winter of 1949-50 it supplied blankets to Greece and to the Palestine refugees and in the winter of 1950-51 it sent about 300,000 for the civilian relief programme in Korea.

In the winter of 1950-51 cloth was sent to the Palestine refugees for manufacture into garments as a co-operative work relief project with the United Nations Relief and Works Agency.

d. AID TO MEDICAL PROJECTS

By the end of 1950, UNICEF had spent $15,700,000 on its medical supply programmes and $1,570,000 on the BCG vaccination programme. For these programmes UNICEF has provided supplies and WHO technical advice and assistance. A Joint UNICEF/WHO Committee was established in 1949 composed of representatives of the Executive Boards of the two bodies. In November 1950 WHO drew the attention of UNICEF to the basic need for large supplies of penicillin and other antibiotics and DDT and insecticides for the improvement of child health in under-developed countries, and suggested that UNICEF aid some production centres while WHO provided technical assistance.

(1) The BCG Anti-Tuberculosis Vaccination Programme

Under this programme, which had been started in March 1948 as a "Joint Enterprise" with the Danish Red Cross and its Scandinavian associates, about 25,000,000 children and young adults had been tested by the end of 1950, and of that number nearly 12,000,000 had been vaccinated. The programme included children and young people in Europe, the Middle East, North Africa, Asia and Latin America. In all instances, these campaigns were conducted by the Governments with the assistance of UNICEF and its associates and in such a way that the countries would be able to continue the work.

In November 1949 the Scandinavian partners of the Joint Enterprise informed the Executive Board of UNICEF that they were unable to extend the services of the Enterprise to countries other than those to which commitments had already been made. After consultations between WHO, UNICEF and the Joint Enterprise, it was decided that until June 1951 the Joint Enterprise would aid the BCG programmes already started, after which WHO and UNICEF would consider all requests for aid for BCG campaigns.

In addition, by mid-1950, over 11,000 children in Europe suffering from miliary tuberculosis, meningitis, and primary tuberculosis infections in early childhood had been treated with streptomycin in specially established demonstration centres. This number included practically all the diagnosed cases of these forms of tuberculosis in the participating countries.

During 1950, aid in the control of tuberculosis through the mass vaccination programme, demonstration treatment centres, or by the provision of tuberculosis diagnostic equipment and BCG production equipment was given to seven countries or territories in Asia, ten in Europe, four in Latin America and eight in the Middle East and North Africa, as well as to the Palestine refugees.

The aid in tuberculosis control given to Latin American countries began in 1950. BCG campaigns in Ecuador and Mexico were aided by UNICEF through the Joint Enterprise. The goal of the Ecuador campaign, the first mass campaign in Latin America to test and vaccinate large numbers of children, was to test over a million children within a year. Because of the value of the campaign as a demonstration, UNICEF financed observation visits of teams of doctors and nurses from other countries. Teams, which were selected on the basis of technical background and the possibilities of working in BCG campaigns in their own countries, went to Ecuador from Costa Rica, El Salvador and Jamaica. UNICEF also helped Mexico and Ecuador to establish production centres for BCG vaccine, and assisted Ecuador in developing a general tuberculosis control project which includes the follow-up of suspected cases and the training of tuberculosis workers from other countries.

(2) Anti-Syphilis and Anti-Yaws Campaigns

The Fund has provided penicillin and supplies to assist Governments in treating mothers and children as part of national, regional or demonstration campaigns against syphilis, yaws and bejel. During 1950 such aid was given to seven countries in Europe, four in Asia, one in Latin America and one in the Middle East as well as to the Palestine refugees.

(3) Immunization Against Diphtheria and Whooping Cough

Both Chile and Colombia started, in 1950, large-scale immunization campaigns against diphtheria and whooping cough along with intensive health education programmes. UNICEF provided vaccines, transport and educational material, and helped to equip laboratories in both countries for production of the vaccine so that within about a year they would have a sufficient supply of their own. Smaller projects involving UNICEF assistance for the production of vaccines and sera were being undertaken in Brazil, Peru, Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia, Poland and Yugoslavia.

(4) Anti-Malaria and Other Insect Control Measures

To reduce infantile mortality, UNICEF began to aid projects for the control of insect-borne diseases and later combined these with malaria control measures previously assisted by UNRRA. By the end of 1950 it had supplied 4,500,000 pounds of DDT for spraying, as well as sprayers and other equipment.

During 1950 malaria-control campaigns were carried on in Europe in Bulgaria, France (Corsica), Poland and Yugoslavia. UNICEF aid in the control of malaria in Asia was limited to three countries—India, Pakistan and Thailand. In Latin America UNICEF provided supplies and equipment for insect-control programmes in Bolivia, the Dominican Republic, Paraguay, Peru and Uruguay.

In Costa Rica, British Honduras, El Salvador, Guatemala and Nicaragua houses and barns were sprayed to destroy disease-carrying insects, particularly mosquitoes.

In Bolivia and Peru campaigns assisted by UNICEF supplies were undertaken to control the typhus-carrying louse through DDT dusting of the bodies, clothing and bedding of the inhabitants of the mountainous areas where typhus is prevalent. In Peru a smallpox vaccination campaign was being carried out at the same time, taking advantage of the organization, staff and equipment mobilized for the typhus programme.

e. MATERNAL AND CHILD HEALTH

Increasing emphasis was placed by UNICEF during 1950 on programmes of assistance to countries for the building and expansion of their basic maternal and child welfare services. This programme has included the provision of equipment and supplies for rural health centres, clinics, laboratories, children's hospitals and wards, child-care institutions and other units of maternal and child welfare services as well as aid in the training of local child care personnel, including the provision of supplies and equipment for the development of training centres. Under this programme, UNICEF assistance in Europe included projects for expanding maternal and child health services, for controlling communicable childhood diseases, for improving specific ante-natal, maternity and post-natal services, for the care and rehabilitation of handicapped children and for the care of health of school children. All these projects were aided by UNICEF with equipment and supplies.

Assistance was also given for the training of child care staff. Following child care training courses in 1948 and 1949, a Swedish paediatric course was repeated in 1950 for 43 fellows. A Swiss contribution to this course took the form of financial aid to permit some 200 paediatricians from Europe, Asia and Latin America to attend the International Paediatric Congress held in Zurich in July 1950 and a seminar on social paediatrics sponsored by WHO in Geneva.

In Asia, UNICEF assistance in developing maternal and child health services, begun in 1949, was continued and extended in 1950. Afghanistan, Burma, Ceylon, China, India, Indonesia, Pakistan, the Philippines, Thailand and the United Kingdom territories in Asia received such assistance, which took the form of equipment for maternal and child health institutions and field centres and of aid in training medical staff at various levels. Generally speaking, both types of assistance were given simultaneously.

In India, for example, the training of nurses and midwives in the New Delhi area was assisted in association with the improvement of both urban and rural field practice areas. UNICEF also assisted three paediatric training centres and provided basic equipment and supplies for a hundred rural maternal and child health centres in various parts of the country. It has also assisted in the establishment in Calcutta of a centre for international training of maternal and child health workers in the Asian region, to be financed equally by UNICEF and the Indian Government.

Projects begun in 1950 included assistance to Ceylon in the training of nurses and assistance to Burma in the training of nurses and midwives as well as the provision of equipment. Equipment and supplies were also sent to Pakistan and Indonesia for maternal and child health centres and to Thailand for maternal and child health demonstration areas in Bangkok.

In connexion with its various programmes in Asia, UNICEF has established 144 fellowships, about one half of which had been taken up at the end of 1950.

UNICEF's assistance for the improvement of general maternal and child health services in Latin America began in 1950. The Fund has undertaken to provide supplies and equipment for maternal and child centres as well as health education supplies in Brazil, Chile, Colombia, El Salvador, Paraguay and Peru. In La Paz, Bolivia, the Fund provided medical supplies and equipment for a 200-bed children's hospital, and in Quito, Ecuador, the complete medical equipment for a maternity hospital, scheduled to open in 1951.

f. INTERNATIONAL CHILDREN'S CENTRE IN PARIS

The group training in social paediatrics in 1948 and 1949, made possible by the contribution of the French Government, was placed on a continuing and expanded basis by the creation of the International Children's Centre in Paris. The Centre is assisted in carrying out its programme and establishing it on a permanent basis by a UNICEF allocation of $1,000,000 for the three-year period 1950-52, to be increased by an additional $660,000, subject to the availability of funds. Group training activities in 1950 took the form of a course in social paediatrics, one on tuberculosis in children, and another on child psychiatry. Approximately 150 paediatricians; public health officers, social workers, psychologists, and educators from 42 countries in Europe, the Middle East, Latin America and Asia participated in these courses. The Paris Centre also took over from UNICEF the operation and further development of the Pilot Station for investigations relating to BCG anti-tuberculosis vaccine.

g. CO-OPERATION WITH OTHER UNITED NATIONS BODIES

In all its health projects UNICEF has co-operated closely with WHO, which has given technical approval to medical and technical standards, plans of operations and individual supply lists and specifications of material supplied by UNICEF, and has provided experts to assist in implementing the programmes and in evaluating and reporting on them.

FAO has advised UNICEF on nutritional questions, and the United Nations Department of Social Welfare has given technical advice on child welfare and has administered UNICEF fellowships in this field.

UNICEF has also co-operated with non-governmental organizations. In addition to the Danish Red Cross, the Norwegian Help for Europe and the Swedish Red Cross, which were its partners in the Joint Enterprise to assist national health authorities in executing the BCG vaccination campaigns, the Fund has carried on combined operations with voluntary agencies engaged in international assistance in Austria, Germany, Greece, Hungary, Poland and Romania. These agencies were the Don Suisse pour les Victimes de la Guerre, its successor agency, Aide Suisse à l'Europe, and the Swedish Committee for International Relief.

International non-governmental organizations represented on an advisory committee, established in the summer of 1949, have distributed to their national affiliates information material supplied by UNICEF and have called the attention of certain Governments to the desirability of programmes for which application might be made to UNICEF, as well assisting in efforts to raise funds for UNICEF.

h. UNITED NATIONS APPEAL FOR CHILDREN

By the end of 1950, UNICEF received approximately $1,470,000 from campaigns undertaken in ten countries during 1949 and 1950. In Afghanistan, Australia, Canada, Liechtenstein and New Zealand these campaigns were for the sole benefit of UNICEF; in Belgium, the Dominican Republic, Italy and Switzerland funds were divided between UNICEF and national welfare organizations; and in the United States an educational campaign was held with provision for acceptance of contributions from individuals and non-governmental organizations.

2. Long-Term Programmes for Children

a. CONSIDERATION BY THE SOCIAL COMMISSION AT ITS SIXTH SESSION

At its tenth session, the Council, in resolution 279 A (X),²⁰⁸ noting that the Secretary-General had been requested by the Social Commission, at its fifth session, to prepare a report concerning the organizational arrangements by which essential international long-range activities for children could be rendered by the United Nations and other appropriate inter-governmental organizations (E/1568), requested the Social Commission, at its sixth session, to give urgent attention to this report and to make specific recommendations to the eleventh session of the Council.

The Secretary-General submitted a report on this question (E/CN.5/201 & Add.1) to the Social Commission at its sixth session.

The report dealt with, inter alia, types of problems which lend themselves to international action on a continuing basis, previous efforts at co-ordination, types and kinds of activities now being carried on and the extent to which these could be expanded, current methods of co-ordination, and suggestions for arrangements for future international action for children and for permanent machinery.

The Social Commission recommended that the Economic and Social Council should take all necessary steps to ensure the uninterrupted continuation and development of the activities of the United Nations International Children's Emergency Fund, both with respect to (a) relief supplies for emergency needs; and (b) the provision of appropriate assistance to Governments, designed to aid them in creating or expanding their permanent child welfare programmes, with particular emphasis on the latter. The resolution enumerated the principles basic to these activities as follows:

(1) the administration of the Fund should be responsible to a United Nations Children's Board, composed of the Governments represented on the Social Commission, and of other Governments designated by the Council;

(2) a Programme Committee of members of the Board should meet as often as necessary to advise the Board;

(3) the Board should take the necessary steps to ensure close co-operation of the Fund with the specialized agencies and non-governmental organizations concerned with children, and to obtain from them the necessary advice and technical assistance;

(4) the administrative services required by the Fund should be provided by the Secretary-General;

(5) the central administrative expenses of the Fund should be covered by appropriations in the normal budget of the United Nations;

(6) operational activities of the Fund, including the costs of field missions, should be financed by voluntary contributions from public or private sources, to be placed in a special account;

(7) the General Assembly should review, at its regular sessions, the financial situation of the Fund and consider the advisability of increasing the money available from voluntary contributions by a sum of money to be shared by Member States in the same proportion as laid down in the scale of contributions to the regular United Nations budget.

The resolution further requested the Council to recommend to the General Assembly, in the light of these principles, that it should reaffirm the relevant provisions of its resolution 57(I)²⁰⁹ incorporating in them the necessary modifications, particularly with regard to the definition of priorities to cover the most urgent needs of all the regions of the world.

b. CONSIDERATION BY THE COUNCIL AT ITS ELEVENTH SESSION

The Council considered the question at the 162nd to 164th meetings of its Social Committee on 3 and 4 August and at its 406th plenary meeting on 11 August 1950. It had before it the report of the Social Commission (E/1678), together with a report by the Secretary-General (E/1725) containing statements regarding the long-term programmes for children under way or contemplated by the Department of Social Affairs as well as by ILO, FAO, UNESCO and WHO, relevant sections of the report of the Administrative Committee on Co-ordination (E/1682) and of the Secretary-General's report on particular co-ordination matters (E/1741), and communications from ILO (E/1731), FAO (E/1745) and WHO (E/1730) transmitting to the Council the texts of resolutions adopted on the question by their governing organs. The Council also considered a report by the Executive Board of UNICEF on the development and activities of the Fund (E/1738).²¹⁰

The Council also had before it a joint draft resolution (E/AC.7/L.64) by the representatives of Brazil, France, India, Iran and the United States. The joint draft resolution differed from the proposals of the Social Commission in the following principal ways:

²¹⁰ For activities of the Fund undertaken in 1950, see pp. 611-15.

(1) It provided for a continuation of the activities of UNICEF under the name "United Nations International Children's Endowment Fund" for the purpose of "(a) providing supplies, training services, and advisory assistance in support of the recipient countries' permanent programmes for children, and (b) meeting relief needs in cases of serious emergencies",

(2) It provided that the Social Commission as well as the Council would be concerned with determining the over-all principles of operation,

(3) It provided for development and technical approval by the specialized agencies concerned and the United Nations of all assistance programmes before presentation to the Programme Committee and Board,

(4) It provided that the administration of the Fund would form an integral part of the United Nations Secretariat,

(5) It provided for certain changes in structure and organization necessary to meet the requirement for continuing long-term operations; these included a provision for an advisory committee composed of representatives of the United Nations and the specialized agencies concerned to co-ordinate the procedures of co-operation and to exchange information,

(6) It recommended that resolution 57(I), establishing the Children's Fund, should be amended to incorporate the relevant changes.

The representative of the United States in presenting the joint draft resolution stressed that increasing emphasis should be placed on helping countries to help themselves.

The majority spoke in favour of the joint draft resolution. During the discussion the representative of Canada stated the opinion that, basically, the special problem of children should be approached through the United Nations programme for under-developed areas. Her delegation could not support the joint resolution in its present form because it placed too great an emphasis on the provision of material supplies. The main emphasis in any long-term programme, she stated, should be on training programmes. Relief activities should be confined to emergency situations and carried out at specific requests from the General Assembly, the Security Council or the Economic and Social Council.

The representative of France pointed out that material aid would have to be given to the world's children on an international basis until the United Nations technical assistance programme had borne concrete results leading to improved living standards and economic conditions.

The representative of Australia suggested that the Council should look ahead two years in determining UNICEF policies, but that it might be appropriate to re-examine the need for assistance to children after that time in the light of the economic conditions then prevailing. He opposed the setting up of a permanent organization because every aspect of such a long-range programme was already part of either a United Nations or a specialized agency programme.

While favouring the permanent establishment of the Fund, the representative of Brazil stated that he would be willing to accept a continuation for a five-year period. Although a co-author of the joint draft resolution, he thought that there was little reason for shifting the emphasis from material supplies to technical assistance and that the provision for an advisory committee was superfluous. The United Kingdom representative was of the opinion that the draft resolution had three fundamental defects: (1) it concentrated too exclusively on UNICEF and not enough on general activities being carried out for the purpose of raising living standards; (2) the proposed terms of reference of the Endowment Fund, as the representative of Canada had pointed out, were as wide as those given to the Emergency Fund although the resources would be smaller; and (3) it envisaged too large future budgetary commitments.

The representatives of Pakistan and Iran stated that they would have preferred less complicated machinery so that more rapid and far-reaching action could be taken in cases of emergency. The former also expressed the opinion that it might be better to amend resolution 57(I) to shift the emphasis from immediate to long-term activities and leave the structure of UNICEF untouched.

The representative of Belgium thought that the proposed advisory committee should also have the advice of certain non-governmental organizations specializing in child welfare problems and that this should be indicated in the resolution. Provision should also be made for active participation of organizations concerned with the welfare of families.

These two points were incorporated in a series of joint amendments proposed by the representatives of Canada, Denmark and the United Kingdom (E/AC.7/L.67) and as such accepted by the sponsors of the joint draft resolution (E/AC.7/L.64) and incorporated in it. The sponsors of the joint draft resolution also accepted, in addition to other minor points, the proposals in the joint amendments to refer to programmes for the general improvement of economic conditions and to include some reference to the need for co-ordination with the work of the Technical Assistance Board (TAB) and the Technical Assistance Committee (TAC). In this respect they drafted a new paragraph to read: "During its review of the Technical Assistance Programme to under-developed countries, the Council should examine the activities of UNICEF with a view to ensuring proper co-ordination". This was later adopted by 14 votes to none, with 1 abstention, while the paragraph proposed in the joint amendments which specifically called for consultation between the Advisory Committee and the TAB was rejected by 8 votes to 5, with 2 abstentions.

The Social Committee at its 164th meeting on 4 August rejected the following amendments proposed in the joint amendment (E/AC.7/L.67) to the joint draft resolution (E/AC.7/L.64):

(1) By varying votes, several amendments proposed by the representative of Australia (E/AC.7/L.65) which were based on the conception of the present International Children's Emergency Fund and were designed to continue it for two years, reviewing the question later in the light of the economic conditions then prevailing.

(2) By 8 votes to 5, with 1 abstention, a proposal to reverse the order of the purposes of the Fund to stress first its emergency functions and second its long-term activities.

(3) By 9 votes to 4, with 2 abstentions, a proposal which would continue in being the present Emergency Fund, and by 9 votes to 5, with 1 abstention, the present terms for constituting its Board.

The Committee also adopted by 13 votes to none, with 7 abstentions, an amendment by Canada, Denmark and the United Kingdom (E/AC.7/L.67) to indicate that Governments in which operational activities were being carried out would be expected to contribute to the largest possible extent to the local expenses of such activities. By 8 votes to none, with 7 abstentions, on the proposal of India, it added to this the words "due regard being had to the need of under-developed countries".

Following a paragraph-by-paragraph vote, the joint draft resolution (E/AC.7/L.64) as a whole, as amended, was adopted by 9 votes to none, with 6 abstentions, by the Social Committee (E/1811) at its 164th meeting on 4 August 1950. (See below.)

During the discussion at the Council's 406th plenary meeting on 11 August several representatives, among them those of Belgium, Brazil, the United Kingdom and Canada, reserved the position of their Governments on the question of the financing of the proposed fund.

By 7 votes to 4, with 2 abstentions, the Council then agreed to delete from the section of the draft resolution which provided that the Assembly should consider the advisability of increasing the amount of money available from voluntary contributions, the words "if necessary, by a sum of money to be shared by Member States in the same proportion as laid down in the scale of contributions to the regular United Nations budget".

The Council also adopted an Indian proposal (E/L.92) to reword, for the purposes of clarification, the paragraph dealing with the question of contributions of recipient countries.

The draft resolution, as proposed by the Social Committee (E/1811), as amended, was then adopted by 8 votes to none, with 5 abstentions.

In resolution 310(XI) the Council recommended that the General Assembly should amend its resolution 57(I) so as to incorporate the proposals in the Council's resolution, and requested the Secretary-General to prepare a draft resolution embodying these proposals for presentation to the General Assembly.

The resolution provided that:

(1) the activities of the United Nations International Children's Emergency Fund would be continued and developed by the United Nations International Children's Endowment Fund for the purpose of (a) providing supplies, training services and advisory assistance in support of the recipient countries' permanent programmes for children, and (b) meeting relief needs in cases of serious emergencies;

(2) a United Nations Children's Board would be established, composed of the Governments represented on the Social Commission and of other Governments not necessarily Members of the United Nations, designated by the Economic and Social Council; this Board, with the advice of a Programme Committee of members of the Board, would, subject to such principles as may be laid down by the Council and the Social Commission, formulate the policies—including the determination of programmes, and allocations of funds—under which the Fund would be administered;

(3) close collaboration would be ensured between the Fund and the specialized agencies pursuant to the agreements between such agencies and the United Nations, and also between the Fund and the non-governmental organizations having a special interest in child and family welfare; the specialized agency or agencies concerned, and the United Nations, would each in its respective field, in collaboration with UNICEF, develop and give technical approval to all programmes of assistance to Governments to be presented to the Programme Committee, and would provide the technical personnel required in their implementation; the administration of the Fund would be assisted by an advisory committee, composed of representatives of the United Nations and the specialized agencies concerned, in order to co-ordinate the procedures of co-operation with their organizations and to exchange information;

(4) during its review of the technical assistance programme to under-developed countries, the Council would examine the activities of UNICEF, with a view to ensuring proper co-ordination;

(5) the Executive Director would be appointed by the Secretary-General after consultation with the Board, and the staff and facilities required for the administration of the Fund would be provided by the Secretary-General;

(6) the central administrative expenses of the Fund would be covered by appropriations in the United Nations budget;

(7) the operational activities, including the costs of field missions, would be financed from the voluntary contributions;

(8) the Governments of countries in which operational activities of the Fund are being carried out would be expected to contribute to the largest possible extent to the local expenses of such activities;

(9) the Fund would consist of the assets of UNICEF as of 1 January 1951, the date on which it was proposed that these amendments should come into effect, as well as of further voluntary contributions made available by Governments, voluntary agencies, individual or other sources;

(10) the General Assembly should review at its regular sessions the financial situation of the Fund.

c. CONSIDERATION BY THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY AT ITS FIFTH SESSION

The General Assembly considered the question at the 278th to 287th meeting of its Third Committee from 6 to 18 October and at its 314th plenary meeting on 1 December 1950. It had before it, inter alia, a draft resolution (A/1411) prepared by the Secretary-General for the purpose of consolidating the provisions of Council resolution 310(XI) with those of General Assembly resolution 57(I) which, in his opinion, would remain in effect as not inconsistent with the Council's resolution.

During the debate in the Third Committee the activities and work of the Children's Fund were highly praised. There was general agreement that the activities should be continued, but opinion was divided as to the most desirable and effective method of continuing them. The majority stressed that the Fund should continue to meet emergency relief needs with material assistance. However, several representatives, including those of Belgium, Canada, Chile, Greece, Ethiopia, Lebanon, Sweden and the United States, were of the opinion that, while not ignoring emergency needs, the Fund should develop long-range programmes of technical assistance and advice. The United States representative, in this connexion, explained that by technical assistance her Government did not mean that all furnishing of supplies should be completely abolished. Rather, it was intended that while these supplies were being furnished, the Fund should survey the position with the Governments concerned to see what steps could be taken to remove the need for future supplies and effect permanent improvement. The need for supplies would continue indefinitely, she felt, unless nations were helped to help themselves.

with particular attention being paid to the needs of under-developed areas.

There was some discussion as to the role the specialized agencies should play in determining programmes. The representatives of Brazil, Turkey and the Dominican Republic stressed that the agencies should act in an advisory capacity with regard to everything that concerned the technical aspects of assistance and pilot projects, but that they should not be consulted on the preparation of programmes. The representatives of the United States and the Union of South Africa, however, thought that the specialized agencies should be able to pass judgment on programmes that they would be called upon to aid in implementing. The representative of the World Health Organization, speaking for WHO and other agencies, felt that no specialized agency should be asked to take responsibility for the working out of a programme without being given a voice in its formulation.

Because of the number of amendments submitted to the Secretary-General's draft resolution (A/1411), the Third Committee, at its 281st meeting on 9 October, appointed a sub-committee to clarify the different points of view expressed and to reduce the amendments to the smallest number necessary to express the differences still outstanding. The sub-committee, composed of representatives of Burma, France, India, Indonesia, Iraq, Pakistan, Poland, the United Kingdom, the United States, Venezuela and Yugoslavia, held two meetings on 11 and 12 October, and reported that it had made a small reduction in the number of amendments, but that irreconcilable differences remained (A/C.3/L.58).

The different points of view which were irreconcilable were expressed in the following amendments:

(i) Several United States amendments (A/C.3/L.48) to ensure the integration of the Fund in the United Nations Secretariat, to make clear the distinction between the administrative integration and the financial separateness, and to include in the United Nations budget the administrative costs of field missions;

(ii) Joint amendments by Burma, India, Indonesia, Iraq and Pakistan (A/C.3/L.49), inter alia, (1) to specify that UNICEF had contributed aid of lasting value, rather than to state simply that it had effectively bettered the world's situation; (2) to indicate that the needs of children in under-developed areas are among the principal needs of the world's children and that they offer scope for action which can be best met by the provision of supplies; and (3) to specify that the purpose of the Endowment Fund would be to provide supplies, training services and "related" assistance rather than "advisory" assistance, and delete the provision that assistance should be given in support of "permanent" programmes in recipient countries;

(iii) Amendments by Venezuela (A/C.3/L.50), providing for a Children's Board composed of Governments of 25 States; by France (A/C.3/L.52), which suggested that it should be composed of Governments represented on the Social Commission and eight other States; and by the Dominican Republic (A/C.3/L.53), providing for a 27-Member Board, two thirds of which would be members of the Social Commission. (The original draft resolution called for a Board composed of Governments represented on the Social Commission and of other Governments not necessarily Members of the United Nations);

(iv) Yugoslav amendment (A/C.3/L.51) to delete the reference to the role of the specialized agencies with regard to formulating programmes, and to delete the paragraph providing for coverage in the United Nations budget of the central administrative expenses of the Fund. Polish amendment (A/C.3/L.55) would have retained this latter point but added to it that this should be done by effecting savings in other items and not by increasing the total budget;

(v) United Kingdom amendment (A/C.3/L.56) (a) to rearrange the order of several phrases so that emergency action would be listed before long-term action; (b) to delete the reference to the shifting of emphasis from immediate to long-term objectives; (c) to continue the present Fund without a change in structure, except that the Executive Board would be replaced by a Children's Board which would be responsible for the allocation of money and supervision of administration; (d) to indicate that in view of limited resources many urgent long-term needs would remain to be met and to instruct the Council to explore the possibility of giving greater emphasis to children's programmes under the expanded programme of technical assistance;

(vi) Amendment by Uruguay (A/C.3/L.57) later revised (see below) which would recommend that States in making budgetary provisions for social services for their own children, set aside a special amount for UNICEF.

The Third Committee, therefore, on receiving this report, at its 283rd meeting on 13 October decided by 13 votes to 8, with 22 abstentions, to consider first a draft resolution presented by the representative of Australia (A/C.3/L.54) before considering the Secretary-General's draft resolution and the amendments to it.

The representative of Australia pointed out that his draft resolution was based mainly on the original General Assembly resolution 57(I) establishing UNICEF, with the difference that the composition of the Executive Board had been altered in recognition of the principle that the activities of UNICEF should be extended to Asia and Latin America. The draft resolution would, inter alia, recognize the necessity for continued emergency action, particularly in under-developed countries and countries devastated by war and other calamities; reaffirm its approval of the policy of devoting a greater share of the Fund's resources to development programmes outside Europe; express its gratitude for contributions and appeal for further collaboration; and decide that the Board should be reconstituted as from 1 January 1951 to consist of eighteen members, having regard to geographical distribution and to the representation of the major contributing and recipient countries and to include States not Members of the United Nations. The Assembly, under the resolution, would consider the future of the Fund again in two years time.

The representatives of Mexico, Peru, Uruguay, India, Egypt, Yugoslavia, and the United Kingdom indicated that they would support the Australian proposal with some amendment. Those opposed to the resolution, among them the representatives of Canada, China, the Netherlands, Norway and the United States, stated that they could not support it since it would merely postpone for two years a decision on the fundamental issue of the permanent nature of the Fund.

The Committee adopted, inter alia, the following amendments to the Australian proposal (A/C.3/L.54):

(i) By 41 votes to 5, with 7 abstentions, an Indian proposal (A/C.3/L.61) to delete the word "emergency" with reference to the need for continued action;

(ii) By 40 votes to 2, with 9 abstentions, a Lebanese amendment (A/C.3/L.63) to renew the Assembly's appeal for the continuance of contributions;

(iii) By 29 votes to 12, with 9 abstentions, a proposal by the representative of Ecuador (A/C.3/L.60) to have the Council reconstitute the Executive Board to consist of Governments represented on the Social Commission and eight other Governments not necessarily Members of the United Nations;

(iv) By 36 votes to 3, with 8 abstentions, a United States amendment (A/C.3/L.65) to ensure close collaboration between the Administration of the Fund and the specialized agencies;

(v) By 30 votes to 7, with 11 abstentions, a United Kingdom amendment (A/C.3/L.66) which would have the Fund obtain, when appropriate, advice and technical assistance from inter-governmental and non-governmental organizations;

(vi) By 35 votes to 8, with 5 abstentions, an amendment by Yugoslavia which recommended that the Assembly consider in 1953 the future of the Fund with the object of continuing it on a permanent basis;

(vii) By 23 votes to 9, with 15 abstentions, a proposal by Peru (A/C.3/L.62) recommending that Member States develop their national child welfare services;

(viii) By 35 votes to 2, with 13 abstentions, a United Kingdom amendment (A/C.3/L.66) requesting the Council to give greater emphasis to the support of national children's programmes within the framework of existing United Nations activities for promoting the economic and social development of under-developed areas, and to explore the means of providing and financing supplies incidental to such programmes, especially those needed for demonstration purposes;

(ix) By 42 votes to none, with 8 abstentions, an Indian proposal (A/C.3/L.70) to entitle the resolution: "Continuing needs of children: United Nations International Children's Emergency Fund".

Among the amendments rejected by the Third Committee were the following:

- (i) By varying votes, several United States amendments (A/C.3/L.65) which were designed to make the Fund an integral part of the United Nations and establish it as a permanent organization;
- (ii) By 22 votes to 9, with 23 abstentions, a proposal by Uruguay (A/C.3/L.57/Rev.2), amended by Lebanon (A/C.3/L.63), which would recommend that States if possible make budgetary provision for UNICEF as means permit;
- (iii) By 27 votes to 4, with 16 abstentions, a proposal by the representative of Peru which would recommend that States look forward to providing funds for an organ such as the proposed Endowment Fund at the end of three years.

The Australian draft resolution, as amended (A/C.3/L.69), was adopted, as a whole, at the Committee's 287th meeting on 18 October by a roll-call vote of 43 to 8, with 1 abstention (see below). In recommending the adoption of the resolution (A/1455), the Committee proposed that the Council, which was still in session, should immediately be notified of the Assembly's decision so that it might at the current session designate the eight members of the Executive Board which are not members of the Social Commission²¹¹.

The General Assembly considered the report of the Third Committee (A/1455) at its 314th plenary meeting on 1 December 1950. Without further discussion it adopted by 33 votes to none, with 5 abstentions, an amendment (A/1581) by the representatives of Australia, Chile, Denmark, Ecuador and Yugoslavia to specify that the eight Governments elected to the Board would be designated for "appropriate terms", and by 51 votes to none, with 5 abstentions, an amendment (A/1580) concerning activities of the Executive Board. The latter amendment which was adopted as paragraph 6(b) (see below) of the resolution was proposed by the representatives of Bolivia, Canada, Ecuador and the Netherlands.

The resolution as a whole was adopted without objection. Resolution 417(V) read as follows:

The General Assembly,

Having considered resolution 310(XI) of the Economic and Social Council in the light of resolutions 57(I) and 318(IV) of the General Assembly,

Recognizing the necessity for continued action to relieve the sufferings of children, particularly in under-developed countries and countries that have been subjected to the devastation of war and to other calamities,

1. Reaffirms its approval of the policy of the Executive Board of the United Nations International Children's Emergency Fund to devote a greater share of the Fund's resources to the development of programmes outside Europe;

2. Expresses again its gratitude to governments and individuals for their generous contributions enabling the Fund to carry out its tasks;

3. Renews its appeal to governments and private persons to continue their contributions to the Fund, and to the various officials and private international organizations interested in child welfare to collaborate with the Fund in every possible way;

4. Recommends to Member States that they develop and improve their national child welfare services, providing, if possible, the necessary funds for that important purpose under their respective budgets;

5. Requests the Economic and Social Council, in consultation with the appropriate specialized agencies:

(a) To give greater emphasis to support of national programmes designed to aid children within the framework of existing United Nations activities for promoting the economic and social development of under-developed areas;

(b) To explore the means of procuring and financing supplies incidental to such programmes, especially those needed for demonstration purposes;

6. Decides:

(a) That the Executive Board of the Fund shall be reconstituted as from 1 January 1951 to consist of the governments of the States represented on the Social Commission and the governments of eight other States, not necessarily Members of the United Nations, to be designated by the Economic and Social Council for appropriate terms, with due regard to geographical distribution and to the representation of the major contributing and recipient countries;

(b) That during the period of the Fund's existence, as provided in paragraph 6(e), the Board, in accordance with such principles as may be laid down by the Economic and Social Council and its Social Commission, shall, with due regard to the urgency of the needs and available resources, formulate the policies, determine the programmes and allocate the resources of the Fund for the purpose of meeting, through the provision of supplies, training and advice, emergency and long-range needs of children and their continuing needs particularly in under-developed countries, with a view to strengthening, wherever this may be appropriate, the permanent child health and child welfare programmes of the countries receiving assistance;

(c) That the Executive Board shall take all necessary steps to ensure close collaboration between the Administration of the Fund and the specialized agencies, pursuant to the agreements between the United Nations and the specialized agencies;

(d) That the Administration of the Fund shall, as appropriate, obtain from inter-governmental and non-governmental organizations having a special interest in child and family welfare the advice and technical assistance which it may require for the implementation of its programmes;

(e) That the General Assembly will again consider the future of the Fund at the expiration of three years, with the object of continuing the Fund on a permanent basis.

P. POPULATION AND MIGRATION QUESTIONS

At its eleventh session, held from 3 July to 16 August 1950, the Economic and Social Council debated aspects of the problems of population and migration when it came to consider the reports of two of its Commissions—that of the fifth session of the Population Commission (E/1711), and that of the sixth session of the Social Commission (E/1678).

The report of the Population Commission was discussed by the Council's Social Committee at its 131st and 132nd meetings on 10 July and by the Council at its 388th and 389th plenary meetings on 14 and 17 July.

The report of the Social Commission, in so far as it referred to migration, was discussed by the Social Committee at its 125th and 126th meetings on 5 July, and at the 387th plenary meeting of the Council on 13 July 1950.

1. Population and Economic Development of Under-developed Countries

The Population Commission, at its fifth session, held from 22 May to 2 June 1950, was concerned primarily with problems of economic development of under-developed countries. In this connexion, the Commission paid special attention to (1) demographic aspects of technical assistance for economic development, and (2) studies of the relationships between population trends and economic and social changes.

a. DEMOGRAPHIC ASPECTS OF TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE

The Commission, in its report (E/1711), noted that demographic considerations are related to many aspects of economic development; that the size and composition of the population largely determine the needs for consumer goods and thus the objectives of economic development programmes; and that, on the other hand, population factors—notably the supply of labour—also affect the problems of developing and utilizing productive resources. The Commission considered that economic development programmes should be formulated with a view not only to the existing demographic situation, but also to expected future population changes and, in particular, to the population increases which might result from economic development itself. The Commission stated that in many countries economic development would probably be accompanied, at least for a time, by rapid population growth, because of reductions in death rates without immediate corresponding reductions in birth rates; successful economic planning would thus depend on increasing production faster than the rate of population growth.

The Commission's report included, in an annex, a statement of the kinds of technical assistance which, in its view, could most usefully be rendered to the governments of under-developed countries in dealing with the demographic aspects of their economic development problems. Assistance might be rendered, for example, in: (1) a survey of the demographic situation of the country, as a part of a more general survey of economic and social conditions affecting development plans; (2) specific analytical studies on such subjects as the effects of changing social and economic conditions on birth and death rates, the influence of migration on population trends and on economic development, the estimation of future changes in population size and composition, and the effects of prospective population changes on labour supply, utilization of resources, capital formation, consumption, production, and the standard of living; (3) improvement of demographic statistics; and (4) the formulation of legislative and administrative measures for social and economic reform with regard to their effects on population trends.

The Social Committee had before it a draft resolution by the United States (E/AC.7/L.29), based on recommendations of the Commission, which had not been presented to the Council as draft resolutions. In respect of the demographic aspects of technical assistance, the United States draft resolution would have the Council, noting the views of the Commission on this subject, request the Secretary-General to draw the attention of Member Governments to these views and recommendations as relevant to the plans and operations of the Technical Assistance Programme,²¹² and to bring them to the attention of the Technical Assistance Committee and the Technical Assistance Board for use in the implementation of their programmes.

In the discussion, the importance for the technical assistance programme of the Commission's work on demographic aspects of technical assistance was emphasized by the representatives of ²¹² See pp. 445 ff.

Australia, Belgium, Canada, Chile, the United Kingdom and the United States. The United Kingdom representative, however, urged that great care should be exercised in the selection of experts to advise Governments on this matter, as the success of the Commission's proposals would largely depend on this. The United States representative said that the implementation of the entire technical assistance programme might be seriously hindered if it were believed that attempts to develop the economies of under-developed countries would result only in population increases and the spreading of existing poverty to still larger numbers of people.

The draft resolution was adopted unanimously both by the Committee, at its 132nd meeting on 10 July, and by the Council, without discussion, at its 388th plenary meeting on 14 July (resolution 308 B (XI)). It read as follows:

The Economic and Social Council,

Taking note of the views and recommendations of the Population Commission relating to the demographic aspects of technical assistance for economic development of under-developed areas,

Requests the Secretary-General to draw the attention of Member Governments to these views and recommendations, in the measure in which they are relevant to the plans and operations of the Technical Assistance Programme; and Calls these views and recommendations to the attention of the Technical Assistance Committee and the Technical Assistance Board for use in the implementation of technical assistance programmes.

b. POPULATION TRENDS AND ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL FACTORS

The Commission, at its fifth session had before it a report (E/CN.9/55 & Add.1 & 2) it had requested of the Secretary-General summarizing the findings of existing scientific studies on the relationships between population trends and economic and social factors. This document showed that most of the existing knowledge concerning the inter-relationships of demographic, economic and social factors had been derived from studies relating to Western countries, and recognized the need to undertake new studies with specific reference to individual under-developed countries.

The Commission had already recommended, at its fourth session during 1949, that the Secretary-General should explore the possibilities of undertaking studies in individual under-developed countries, in collaboration with the Governments concerned. At the fifth session the Secretary-General submitted to the Commission a plan worked out in consultation with the Government of India for a co-operative study of relationships between population trends and social and economic development in that country (E/CN.9/58; E/CN.9/L.6 & Add.1). The Commission recommended that this project should be considered as an initial step in a continuing programme of studies on inter-relationships of demographic, economic and social factors in India, and further recommended that the scope of this initial study should be expanded. In addition, the Commission requested the Secretary-General to consider the possibility of conducting similar studies in such health demonstration areas as the World Health Organization might establish as part of its technical assistance activities.

The Commission's recommendations on this matter were embodied in a draft resolution submitted by the representative of the United States (E/AC.7/L.29), who emphasized the importance of the issues with which the Population Commission was concerned and stated that too little was known of the inter-relationship between economic and social factors and growth of population. The existence in India of a variety of populations at varying stages of development made that country an ideal field for a comparative study. He urged that the pilot survey in India be completed as soon as possible, in order to ascertain facts which could also be of value to other countries.

Members of the Committee generally expressed recognition of the importance to both Member Governments and specialized agencies of the recommendations of the Commission regarding studies of the relationship between population trends and economic and social factors. Some criticism, however, was made of the report by the Secretary-General (E/CN.9/55). The representative of Belgium thought that this report seemed to set out from the idea that in order to improve the standard of living it was necessary to limit the increase of the population, and his delegation opposed this theory. The representative of Pakistan also pointed out that it would be difficult to implement any plan for the limitation of families as most of the religions in the East were opposed to this.

The representative of France felt that there were two weaknesses in the report by the Secretariat (E/CN.9/55); it was based only on "Anglo-Saxon authors" and this basis could have been widened. Another aspect which the report failed to take into account, he said, was the effect of the ageing of populations.

As for the proposed studies in India, the representative of India said that it might be wise to postpone this for a while. The representative of Pakistan supported the suggestion of postponement.

An amendment (E/AC.7/L.34) was proposed by the representative of the United Kingdom, which sought to incorporate in the United States draft resolution a recognition that the expanded field of investigations recommended by the Commission would be of use not only to India in its programme of economic development and to other Governments facing similar problems, but "above all to the United Nations as an essential examination of the demographic aspects of the provision of technical assistance to India and similar new fields in Asia and the Far East". The United States representative accepted this amendment, and added to the draft resolution, with a view to meeting some objections raised in the Committee, a paragraph which would have the Economic and Social Council recommend that the timing of the studies in India and the selection of the areas to be studied be left to the Secretary-General, in consultation with the Government of India.

The amended draft resolution was adopted by 12 votes to none, with 2 abstentions, at the 132nd meeting of the Committee on 10 July, and by the Council (resolution 308 D (XI)) at its 389th plenary meeting on 17 July, unanimously and without discussion. The resolution read:

The Economic and Social Council,

Having in mind the relation of population growth to problems of economic development, especially in areas of dense population in relation to existing economic resources,

Noting

(1) The high priority assigned by the Population Commission to studies of the interrelationship of economic, social and population changes, and especially to the development of a field study of this question in India in co-operation with and jointly financed by the Government of India;

(2) The recommendations of the Population Commission that the field investigation should be expanded to provide adequate information on fertility and on the social and economic characteristics of households exposed to differing patterns of economic development;

(3) That such expanded field investigations will be of use to India in its programme of economic development, to other Governments facing similar problems and, above all, to the United Nations as an essential examination of the demographic aspects of the provision of technical assistance to India and similar new fields in Asia and the Far East;

Recommends

(1) That the studies of the interrelationship of demographic, economic and social factors be carried forward by the Secretary-General as recommended by the Population Commission, and that the essential additional costs be met by the Secretary-General by

(a) Releasing funds by postponing work on projects given lower priority by the Commission,

(b) Exploring with the Government of India the possibility of developing a technical assistance project financed from the Special Account to meet part of the additional costs of the proposed expansion of the field investigation noted above; and

(2) That the timing of the studies in India and the selection of the areas to be studied be left to the Secretary-General in consultation with the Government of India.

2. Development of Population Statistics

The Population Commission and the Statistical Commission both gave further consideration to problems of population statistics at their fifth sessions (E/1696, E/1711). The two Commissions had previously paid special attention to the development of international standards relevant to the data to be obtained in censuses of populations to be undertaken in many countries during 1950 and 1951. The additional action taken by the Commissions in this connexion at their fifth sessions included:

(1) the adoption of tentative international standards for the definition and enumeration of categories of status;

(2) the adoption of standard international terminology for various types of classifications relating to economic activities of the population;

(3) the recommendation that the Secretary-General, in collaboration with the International Labour Office, should prepare a preliminary manual on the application of international standard classifications by occupation, industry and status;

(4) the adoption of recommended classifications relating to urban and rural population.

They also considered a report on comments (E/CN.9/47 & Add.1) by Governments on a set of draft recommendations for the improvement of migration statistics, which were presented to the Statistical Commission for comment at its fourth session and subsequently circulated for comment to Governments and interested international agencies. The Commissions requested the Secretary-General to continue work on this problem, calling upon Governments which had not yet done so to submit their comments on the draft recommendations; analysing the difficulties in implementing these recommendations which had been mentioned in some of the comments, with a view to the possibility of adjustments in the recommendations; examining the possibility of improving certain of the recommended classifications and definitions; and studying the possibility of using sampling methods to obtain migration statistics.²¹³

3. Migration

a. MIGRATION STUDIES

The Economic and Social Council, in resolution 156 A (VII), had laid upon the Population Commission the responsibility for advising the Council on co-ordination of the research on international migration undertaken by the United Nations and the specialized agencies. Accordingly, the Commission, at its fifth session, examined a report on the relevant activities of various agencies (E/CN.9/59), and noted, in particular, the recommendations of the Preliminary Conference on Migration, held at Geneva in April-May 1950, concerning the possibilities of emigration from certain European countries and the relation of such emigration to the economic development of under-developed countries in other parts of the world. The Commission requested the Secretary-General, in collaboration with interested specialized agencies and other bodies, to prepare a summary statement of inter-war and recent migrations affecting various parts of Europe, as well as to analyse emigration potentials in these areas and the possible contribution of emigrants from Europe to the economic and social advancement of the countries of emigration and immigration (E/1711).

During its discussion of the report of the Population Commission, the Social Committee had before it a draft resolution by the United States (E/AC.7/L.29) referring to migration studies and embodying the recommendations of the Commission.

An amendment (E/AC.7/L.30) to the Report of the Commission was proposed by the representative of Brazil, who pointed out that the Preliminary Conference on European Migration, held under the auspices of the International Labour Organisation, had emphasized the urgency of the problem of surplus labour in Europe, and the outstanding contribution that European emigrants could make to the development of under-developed countries. The Preliminary Conference had concluded that the most serious obstacle to a solution of the problem of migration was of a financial character; countries with a labour surplus and those with a labour shortage usually lacked financial resources and technical knowledge adequate to solve the problem by bilateral agreements alone. His delegation therefore thought that the possibilities of international financing of European migration to under-developed areas should be studied by the Secretary-General. Such international financing could be included among the "economic and social overhead projects" mentioned in the report of the Sub-Commission on Economic Development.²¹⁴

Support for the principle of this amendment was given by the representatives of Australia, Chile, and Mexico. The representative of Mexico, however, suggested that the Brazilian amendment to the Commission's report should be incorporated in the draft resolution of the United States referring to migration.

At its 132nd meeting on 10 July 1950, the Social Committee first adopted, by 8 votes to none, with 6 abstentions, the Brazilian amendment (E/AC.7/L.30) to the report of the Population Commission. It was then pointed out by the Chairman that the decision taken by the Committee raised some difficulty as it was not the practice of the Council generally to amend reports submitted to it. The representative of Brazil thereupon agreed to submit a draft resolution to the Council, and the Committee adopted the Mexican oral amendment to the United States draft resolution by 7 votes to 2, with 5 abstentions. The draft resolution, as amended, was adopted by 12 votes to none with 2 abstentions.

At the 389th plenary meeting of the Council, a joint amendment by Brazil, Chile and Mexico (E/L.66) to replace the draft resolution submitted by the Social Committee, was adopted unanimously by the Council (resolution 308 C (XI)). By this resolution, the Council referred not only to the work of the Preliminary Conference on Migration, but also to studies prepared by the Economic Commission for Latin America. The latter, at its third session (E/1717), had recommended the establishment of a working group in the Commission's secretariat to study and advise the Governments of Latin-American States, at their request, on questions of immigration in relation to economic development.²¹⁵

In discussing this resolution, the representative of India raised the question why it referred only to emigration from Europe. He felt it desirable to study also the migration problems of the Middle East and the Far East.

By its resolution, the Council requested the Secretary-General, in consultation with the Director-General of the International Labour Office and the executive heads of other interested agencies, to press forward not only with the migration studies recommended by the Population Commission, but also with a study of methods of international financing of European emigration.

b. ASSISTANCE TO INDIGENT ALIENS

At its sixth session, held from 3 April to 5 May 1950, the Social Commission considered the report (E/CN.5/191 & Add.1-3) which the Secretary-General had been requested to prepare by Council resolution 43(IV) concerning the Model Convention and recommendations relative to the assistance of indigent aliens, and adopted a resolution recommending that the Secretary-General pursue his inquiries in this field, since sufficient time had not been available to Governments to furnish their observations on the international convention suggested by the Secretary-General for dealing with the problem.

The Social Commission further submitted to the Council, at its eleventh session, a draft resolution recommending to the Governments of Member States "that pending consideration of the possibility of an international Convention, they consider according to indigent aliens the same measures of social assistance as that accorded to their nationals, and refrain from removing them from their territories for the sole reason of indigency".

This aspect of the report of the Social Commission (E/1678) was considered by the Social Committee of the Council at its 125th and 126th meetings on 5 July 1950, and by the Council at its 387th plenary meeting on 13 July 1950.

Support for the draft resolution was expressed in the Social Committee by the representatives of Belgium, France, Mexico, the United Kingdom and the United States. The representative of Denmark, however, said that because of difficulties resulting from large numbers of refugees pouring into his country in recent years, his Government could not undertake unconditionally to refrain from removing indigent aliens from that territory, although its attitude was a humane one. The representative of Canada said that his Government, in common with that of Denmark, felt that the moment was premature for elaborating a draft convention to protect the rights of aliens. The Government of Canada was sympathetic to consideration of the needs of indigent aliens, but Canadian immigration laws specified certain grounds for removing indigent citizens, and the Government was not prepared to amend existing legislation in that respect. The representatives of France and Belgium, who said that they would support the draft resolution, added that they felt that the conclusion of reciprocal multilateral or bilateral agreements would be preferable to the adoption of the recommendation contained in the draft resolution. The representative of Belgium orally proposed an amendment to the draft resolution which would have the Council recommend to Member Governments that they consider these measures of social assistance to indigent aliens pending consideration of the possibility of an international convention "or model agreement". The draft resolution, as amended, Was adopted by the Committee by 10 votes to none, with 4 abstentions, at its 126th meeting, and by the Council, without discussion, at its 387th meeting on 13 July (resolution 309 B (XI)). It read:

The Economic and Social Council,

Having considered the recommendation of the Social Commission and the Secretary-General's Report on Assistance to Indigent Aliens, Recommends to Member Governments that, pending consideration of the possibility of an, international convention or model agreement, they consider according to indigent aliens the same measures of social assistance as those accorded to their nationals, and refrain from removing them from their territories for the sole reason of indigency.

Q. INTERNATIONAL CONTROL OF NARCOTIC DRUGS

1. Implementation of International Treaties on Narcotics

a. ANNUAL REPORTS OF GOVERNMENTS

The Commission on Narcotic Drugs at its fifth session from 1 to 15 December 1950 (E/1889) examined the Summary of Annual Reports of Governments for 1948 (E/NR.1948/Summary), and the annual reports for 1949 (E/NR.1949/- Summary). After a brief discussion, it requested the Secretary-General:

(1) to obtain from the competent authorities of Kuwait, from whom annual reports had never been received, more detailed information on the alleged offer for sale in that territory of seven and one half tons of morphine;

(2) to obtain from the Union of South Africa an account of the work of a commission set up in that country to inquire into the misuse of dagga [Indian hemp];

(3) to obtain particulars from Argentina on the cultivation of the opium poppy as announced in that country's annual report for 1948;

(4) to draw the attention of the Government of Haiti to the need for amending its legislation on narcotic drugs, which dates from 1922, to apply the provisions of international treaties concluded after that year; and

(5) to draw Australia's attention to its export of diacetylmorphine in apparent breach of the provisions of the 1931 Convention.

He was also to draw the provisions of this convention to the attention of Finland, the representative of which had now explained to the Commission that that country's apparent breach of the Convention, as far as a minor export of tablets containing diacetylmorphine was concerned, had been due to an oversight.

b. ILLICIT TRAFFIC

The Commission also discussed the question of the presence of opium, diacetylmorphine and heroin in the illicit traffic and commented on the relationship between the medical use of diacetylmorphine and the presence of this drug on the illicit market in countries which authorized its use. The Commission took particular note of the increasing quantities of hashish and opium seized in Egypt. The Egyptian representative stated that a considerable quantity was being smuggled in from Syria and Lebanon, where 60,000,000 square metres were reported to be under Indian hemp cultivation with an annual production of some 300 tons in each country. The representative of Turkey also mentioned certain data which, he thought, indicated that opium was being produced in large quantities in Syria. The Commission, therefore, asked the Secretary-General to obtain information immediately from Syria concerning the export of opium and from Syria and Lebanon with regard to the cultivation of Indian hemp and the production of hashish in their countries.

There was some discussion about the increase in illicit traffic in narcotics on ships, due to smuggling by merchant vessel personnel. The representative of the United States presented a resolution in which the Council would request the Secretary-General to compile a list of merchant vessel personnel who had been convicted, during the period 1946-50, of crimes involving the smuggling of narcotics. This list would then be sent to all States with recommendations, inter alia, that they revoke licences of those persons on the list, or refuse to issue new ones, that they ask the maritime unions in their territories to take steps to bar such officers and seamen permanently, and that they urge all steamship companies in their territories, engaged in international commerce, not to employ such seamen.

However, the representatives of Canada, China, France, Mexico, the Netherlands and the United Kingdom, while expressing agreement with the general intention of the resolution, pointed out that the penalties applicable to seamen were prescribed in national legislation, which, in many instances, left it to the discretion of the appropriate authorities to decide whether or not loss of licence should follow conviction. The Commission decided to include the United States draft resolution in its report and to request the Secretary-General to ask Governments for their comments on the possibilities of giving effect to it.

The Commission further expressed its appreciation of the offer of co-operation extended by the International Criminal Police Commission (ICPC).

c. INVITATION TO THE UNITED STATES OF INDONESIA TO BECOME A PARTY TO THE PROTOCOL OF 19 NOVEMBER 1948 RELATING TO NARCOTIC DRUGS

At its eleventh session, the Economic and Social Council at its 377th plenary meeting on 4 July 1950 considered the question of inviting Indonesia to become a party to the Protocol of 19 November 1948, bringing under international control drugs outside the scope of the Convention of 13 July 1931, as amended by the Protocol of 11 December 1946.

Article 5 of the Protocol provides that it "shall be open for signature or acceptance on behalf . . . of any non-member States [of the United Nations] to which an invitation has been addressed by the Economic and Social Council".

The Secretary-General pointed out (E/1689) that Indonesia had become a sovereign State after 8 October 1948, the date on which the General Assembly had invited all non-member States to sign or accept the Protocol. Indonesia had therefore not been included in the invitation. To enable it to become a Party to the Protocol, it would be necessary for the Council to issue an invitation in that sense.

The Council on 4 July unanimously adopted resolution 317(XI), inviting Indonesia to become a Party to the Protocol at an early date.²¹⁶

²¹⁶ Indonesia, which had been admitted to the United Nations as a Member State on 28 Sept. 1950, accepted the Protocol as a Member State in Feb. 1951.

2. Draft Single Convention on Narcotic Drugs

a. CONSIDERATION BY THE ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL AT ITS ELEVENTH SESSION

During its eleventh session the Council at its 377th plenary meeting on 4 July 1950 had before it a draft resolution submitted by the Secretary-General (E/1673) on the procedure to be followed with regard to the transmission to Governments, for comment, of the draft single convention on narcotic drugs. In view of the postponement of the fifth session of the Commission on Narcotic Drugs,²¹⁷ such transmission would be delayed if the usual procedure of submitting the draft text to the Council after it had been examined by the Commission and before it was sent to Governments were to be followed. The Secretary-General, therefore, proposed that the Council should authorize the Commission on Narcotic Drugs, if it should so desire, to request him to transmit the draft instrument to Governments for their comments after the Commission, at its fifth session, had examined the draft and had made such amendments as it saw fit.

The Council unanimously adopted the proposal (315(XI)) with the understanding that the draft single convention would eventually be submitted to the Council before being submitted to the General Assembly.

b. CONSIDERATION IN THE COMMISSION ON NARCOTIC DRUGS (FIFTH SESSION)

The Commission had before it a draft (E/CN.7/AC.3/3 & Corr.1) of a single convention to replace the eight existing instruments on narcotic drugs and to contain provisions for limiting the production of raw materials. The draft had been prepared by the Secretary-General, in accordance with the Commission's request, at its fourth session,²¹⁸ and was accompanied by a detailed commentary (E/CN.7/AC.3/4/Rev.1) on the provisions of the draft. The discussion was primarily an exchange of views, since it had been decided that there would not be time to reach conclusions on the many complex issues which the new proposals involved. The Commission felt, therefore, that it would be premature at the present stage to send the draft to Governments for their observations. It considered, however, that it would be advantageous to formulate the views of the Governments represented on the Commission and to make them available to its sixth session in order that these observations and any discussion undertaken by the Commission in the light of them might be available to the Secretary-General in preparing revised drafts. The Commission at its seventh session, early in 1952, would then make a detailed study of the draft single convention.

The following were among the observations made by the Commission regarding the general principles of the draft instrument.

There was general agreement that the control of narcotics should, in principle, be carried out by national organs, although under supervision of international organs, and that, in general, indirect international administration was preferable to direct international administration. It was also agreed that direct international administration should not be excluded whenever its disadvantages were outweighed by greater effectiveness of international control of narcotic drugs. Some members, however, expressed the fear that the draft deviated in some respects unnecessarily from the principle of indirect international administration and that this might result in a considerable weakening of existing domestic control.

One member expressed the opinion that a rigid limitation of the use of drugs under control to medical and scientific needs exclusively did not sufficiently take into consideration long-established customs and traditions which persisted, in particular, in territories of the Middle and Far East and which it was impossible to abolish by a simple decree of prohibition. More elastic provisions should be adopted under which special measures, in keeping with the varying circumstances of the territories in question, could be taken for the abolition of the non-medical use of drugs in this part of the world.

Some members of the Commission held that the Single Convention placed too much emphasis on the control of the legitimate trade in narcotic drugs while not dealing very satisfactorily with the illicit traffic. For example, there was no provision for establishing international inspection. Close liaison, it was suggested, should be arrived at between national bodies concerned with the repression of the illicit traffic, as well as effective co-ordination on the international level.

Some members expressed the fear that the draft showed a tendency to grant excessive discretionary powers to international organs and that a heavy and complicated control machinery would be established which would prove too expensive. They thought it might be preferable to define more precisely in the convention itself the powers of the international control organs.

²¹⁷ The date of the Commission's 5th session as indicated in the revised calendar of conferences for 1950 (E/1569/Rev.1), was moved forward to Aug. 1950. At the 11th session, the Council in resol. 316(XI) agreed to a further postponement to Dec. 1950.

Several members held that some provisions of the draft were too complicated and were adopted for theoretical considerations rather than for practical reasons and that they would even impede medical research.

Attention was called to the fact that the control of synthetic drugs showed several aspects which were different from those involved in the control of other narcotics and that it might be desirable to provide for a specific régime applying to synthetic drugs. Some apprehension was also expressed that the draft paid too little attention to the problems of composite States of varying constitutional structures.

Observations were also made on specific provisions of the draft Single Convention, i.e. on the international control organs provided for; the organization of national control organs; production of raw materials, manufacture and trade in drugs; penal provisions and cure of the drug habit; and general provisions, including the so-called "Colonial Clause", and reservations. Comments were also expressed regarding terminology and drafting.

In conclusion, the Commission recommended (E/1889) that the Council approve its plans for the further study and elaboration of the single convention and reaffirm its authorization that the draft instrument might be sent to Governments for comment, after the Commission had made such amendments as it had seen fit.

3. Interim Agreement to Limit the Production of Opium to Medical and Scientific Needs

The Commission on Narcotic Drugs at its fifth session had before it the report of its Ad Hoc Committee of the Principal Opium-Producing Countries (E/CN.7/188), which had met in Ankara in 1949, the report (E/CN.7/200) of the Meeting of Representatives of the Principal Drug-Manufacturing Countries held in Geneva from 7 to 15 August 1950, and the reports (E/CN.7/201 & 204) of the Joint Committee of the Principal Opium-Producing Countries and of the Principal Drug-Manufacturing Countries.

The Ad Hoc Committee,²¹⁹ among other things, had agreed to the limitation of the production of opium to medical and scientific needs, to the shares of the world opium output which the opium-producing countries would severally produce each year under the proposed Interim Agreement and to the re-organization of the existing opium trade as an international monopoly. The Committee had further proposed a number of draft provisions for the Interim Agreement which the Secretary-General used as a basis for the first draft of this instrument (E/CN.7/199), which was presented to the Meeting of Representatives of the Drug-Manufacturing Countries. This Meeting (E/CN.7/200) accepted in principle the decisions taken at Ankara and emphasized matters of paramount interest to the drug-manufacturing countries, for which provisions should be made in the Interim Agreement.

The Joint Committee of the Principal Opium-Producing Countries and of the Principal Drug-Manufacturing Countries held its first session at Geneva in August and its second session at New York in November 1950.

At the first part of its first session (E/CN.7/201) it reviewed the work done up to August 1950 and made a number of provisional decisions on several aspects of the Interim Agreement. It particularly stressed that some form of international inspection would be essential to ensure the proper functioning and successful operation of the International Opium Monopoly under the Interim Agreement. Due to lack of time, the Joint Committee, at its first session, was unable to give full consideration to all aspects of the draft Interim Agreement. It also was unable to reach agreement on certain questions, including that of the basic price at which the International Opium Monopoly should conduct its opium transactions. It therefore continued its session in November 1950.

At the second part (E/CN.7/204) of its first session, the Committee, however, was again unable to agree on: opium prices; the precise form that international inspection of the opium trade should take under the International Monopoly; the problem of the competition which would be met by drug-manufacturing countries from exports of opium alkaloids by countries producing opium under the Interim Agreement; and the measures required to meet competition from exports of alkaloids made from poppy straw.

The Commission at its fifth session noted (E/1889) that up to the present stage of its development only the principal opium-producing countries and the principal drug-manufacturing countries had had an opportunity to discuss the draft of the Interim Agreement, and to bring such changes to the text as they had considered necessary. It therefore decided, in addition to examining the text of the Agreement in some detail, to obtain some expression of the views of countries not in either of these categories on the proposed treaty instrument.

Among the observations made on behalf of those countries, the view was expressed that their interests did not seem to have been adequately safeguarded; the costs of running the opium trade as an international monopoly would, it appeared, have ultimately to be borne by the actual consumers of drugs made from opium, and fears were expressed that in time of international emergency the rigidity of such a system might militate against consumers obtaining their drug requirement. It was also stated that the obligation to buy opium alkaloids from parties to the Interim Agreement might discourage certain countries from acceding to the Agreement, because they would wish to reserve the right to buy alkaloids from other countries at lower prices, and for similar reasons, they might not be prepared to accept any proposal to prohibit or limit the export of alkaloids by opium-producing countries.

In reply it was, however, stated that the principal drug-manufacturing countries were themselves the principal consumers of opiates, having consumed in 1948, for example about two thirds of the total quantity of morphine manufactured and three quarters of all the codeine. Thus, it was reasonable to assume that the interests of consumers generally would be assured. It was also pointed out that the dangers of an opium shortage in any particular area of the world in an international emergency were much less likely under the International Monopoly than if the opium trade remained unchanged, since the International Monopoly as an organ set up under the auspices of the United Nations would have the duty of ensuring to all States adequate supplies of opium for their medical and scientific requirements. The cost of operating the International Monopoly would clearly have ultimately to be distributed on a fair basis among all users of drugs made from opium. As the representative of the Secretary-General pointed out, it would be a small premium to pay for a reduction in the illicit traffic with which the Commission had been so deeply pre-occupied during its fifth session. It was mentioned, however, that the Interim Agreement would not affect illicit traffic from those opium-producing countries which remained outside it.

The Commission (E/1889) informed the Economic and Social Council that it wished, during its sixth session, to solve the problems still requiring solution before the elaboration of the proposed Interim Agreement could be completed. It therefore expressed its desire to meet for two months in the spring of 1951 at Geneva to facilitate the attendance of experts from European and Near Eastern countries.

Since Belgium, Italy and Switzerland were among the principal drug-manufacturing countries, the Commission also decided to invite them to send observers to the sixth session, which would be devoted to consideration of the proposed Interim Agreement to limit the production of opium to medical and scientific needs.

The Commission considered briefly the proposal of its Joint Committee for the establishment of an International Monopoly of Alkaloids and asked the Secretary-General to obtain from Governments represented on the Commission their views on this subject.

In connexion with the establishment of the International Monopoly, the Commission agreed with the Joint Committee that it would be desirable to establish an internationally accepted method for assaying opium, and for standardizing the packing, sampling and weighing of that substance. The Commission endorsed the Joint Committee's recommendation that one or more expert committees should subsequently be set up to study the question.

4. Abolition of Opium Smoking in the Far East

During the debate at its fifth session the Commission on Narcotic Drugs was informed of the measures taken by the French authorities in Indochina to close the clinics for the cure of drug addicts, to discontinue the registration of addicts and to reduce the quantity of opium allowed to each new addict. The proportion of smokers to the whole population was about 1 : 1,000, and care was being taken to prevent young people from becoming addicts.

The Commission was further informed of the efforts being made in British territories in the Far East to abolish opium smoking, which was already prohibited.

At the request of the representative of the United States, the Commission decided to ask the Secretary-General to communicate with the Republic of Indonesia to ascertain how the opium dens in that country obtained their supplies of opium since there was no longer any official source of supply.

5. Methods of Determining the Origin of Opium by Chemical and Physical Means

The Commission at its fifth session heard a report by the Secretariat on the generally satisfactory progress of the programme of research into the methods of determining the origin of opium by chemical and physical means undertaken pursuant to Economic and Social Council resolution 246 F (IX). International collaboration in the laboratory research had started early in 1950 but had developed slowly because the number of opium samples which had thus far been furnished to the Opium Distribution Centre by Governments was insufficient to enable a wide distribution to be made; and it was accordingly expected that about two years would be required before the results of the research could be finally evaluated. The Secretariat, it was stated, hoped soon to be in a position to publish a new method for determining the morphine content of opium.

The Commission debated the desirability and possibility of extending the scope of the research to include studies on methods of determining the origin of opium by physiological means and by such other scientific means as might seem desirable.

However, since this would entail additional expenditure, it was decided not to attempt any broadening of the scope of the research for the time being, especially in view of the fact that the current programme had not been completed. It was generally agreed that the Secretariat should, within the terms of reference provided by the Council's resolution, be able to continue its research into methods for determining the morphine and codeine content of opium, irrespective of the use of such methods for establishing the geographical origin of opium seized in the illicit traffic. The necessary authority for this, the Commission considered, would be given if the Council approved its decision to study the commercial assay of opium (see above).

The Commission decided (E/1889) to request the Secretary-General to continue research on methods for determining the morphine and codeine content of opium within the scope of Economic and Social Council resolution 246 F (IX), and to explore the possibilities of research into the methods of determining the origin of opium by scientific means other than those referred to in that resolution.

6. Drug Addiction

Among other aspects of drug addiction, the Commission at its fifth session discussed addiction to heroin and the consequent desirability of prohibiting its use even for medical purposes, and noted that the division of opinion on this question, which had been brought to its attention in previous years, still remained. The representatives of France and the Netherlands restated the view that the prohibition of the medical use of heroin would deprive sufferers from certain diseases of an irreplaceable medicament without suppressing the sources from which addicts to the drug drew their supplies. The representatives of Mexico, Peru, Turkey, the USSR and the United States re-emphasized the opposite point of view, that heroin could well be replaced for all medical uses by other less dangerous drugs, the USSR representative suggesting the use of dicodide, dilaudide, eucodal, methadon and pethidine as possible substitutes.

The Commission noted with appreciation the work done on drug addiction at its request by the Expert Committee of the World Health Organization on Drugs Liable to Produce Addiction. It debated, in particular, the definitions of addiction-producing drugs and of habit-forming drugs which the Expert Committee of WHO had elaborated. The representatives of France and the USSR considered that it would be more satisfactory to have one definition only, in view of the fact that the characteristics of habit-forming drugs were covered by the definition of addiction-producing drugs. The representatives of Canada and the United States, however, considered that there would be an advantage in keeping the two definitions, in view of the fact that the two classes of drugs produced different types of withdrawal symptoms. The United Kingdom representative drew attention to the fact that the definitions really left the question whether a substance fell into either category to be determined by the view of society at a given time as to the detrimental effect upon the individual and upon society of its habitual use.

The Commission decided that the problem should be studied further.

7. Question of the Exemption of "Ipécopan" from the Provisions of the International Convention on Narcotic Drugs

Article 8 of the Convention on Narcotic Drugs, of 19 February 1925, as amended by the Protocol of 11 December 1946, provides that the Convention will not apply to any preparation which the World Health Organization (WHO) finds cannot give rise to the drug habit because of the medicaments with which it is compounded and which, in practice, preclude the recovery of the drug.

In June 1949 the Swiss Government requested that the product known as "ipécopan" be exempted from international control under this provision. This request was referred to WHO for its advice and report. The Executive Board of WHO, at its fifth session from 16 January to 2 February 1950, approved the recommendation of its Expert Committee on Drugs Liable to Produce Addiction to the effect that exemption should not be granted in respect of "ipécopan" (E/1632/Rev.2). The Council at its 372nd plenary meeting on 3 March 1950 authorized the Secretary-General to transmit WHO's decision to the Swiss Government.

8. Question of the Use of Morpholyethylmorphine

During the Commission's examination of a report of the WHO Expert Committee, the representative of France questioned the findings of the Committee on morpholyethylmorphine. The French Government had proposed that the substance should be subject to the control applicable to the drugs mentioned in article 1, Group II, of the 1931 Convention, as amended by the 1946 Protocol. The Expert Committee, on the other hand, had decided that there was insufficient evidence on the addiction-producing properties of this substance, though it was probable that it was convertible to morphine. In any case, they concluded, as an ether of morphine it belonged by definition in Sub-group (b) of Group I, for which the Convention requires a more strict control.

The French representative therefore asked that a committee of three experts be appointed to reconsider the matter.

After a brief discussion the representative of the United Kingdom proposed that the question should be referred back to WHO for consideration in the light of fresh information which the French authorities would now be in a position to make available. Since this was acceptable to the representative of France, the Commission (E/-1889) adopted this proposal.

9. Offer for Sale in China of Five Hundred Tons of Opium

The Commission at its fifth session considered the offer for sale of five hundred tons of opium which had been made in December 1950 to a British firm in Hong Kong and which had been reported to the Secretary-General by the United Kingdom (E/CN.7/211).

That this large amount of opium, equal to the world requirements of the substance for medical and scientific needs for more than a year, should suddenly be offered on the market from a country in which the production of opium had been prohibited since 1934 and at a time when the Commission was actively engaged on work to limit the production of opium, was an occurrence that the Commission viewed with concern. It accordingly discussed at some length what action could appropriately be taken in the matter, but was hampered in reaching conclusions by a lack of precise and complete information on the origin of the opium in question and on its present whereabouts. The representative of the United Kingdom had no further information. The representative of the United States informed the Commission that some three hundred tons had been offered in his country as barter in exchange for cotton. He had also had reports that one hundred and thirty tons had recently been reported at Tientsin and that a further quantity was at Peking.

The Commission proposed that the Council request the organs entrusted with the control of narcotic substances to ascertain the origin of this opium, what stocks of opium existed in China, and whether the production and export of opium were still prohibited there.

10. Report of the United Nations Commission of Enquiry on the Coca Leaf

The Commission at its fifth session had before it the Report to the Council of the Commission of Enquiry (E/1666) which had visited Bolivia and Peru towards the end of 1949²³⁰ to investigate the effects of the chewing of the coca leaf on the inhabitants of the High Andes. The report consisted of two main parts, one dealing with medical considerations and the other with economic and social considerations. The Commission concluded that coca-leaf chewing was a dangerous habit and that since the habit is the consequence of a number of unfavourable social and economic factors, the solution of the problem involved two fundamental and parallel aspects: the need for improving the living conditions of the population among which chewing is a general habit, and the need for initiating simultaneously a governmental policy to limit the production of the coca leaf, to control its distribution, and eradicate the practice of chewing it. The Commission of Enquiry made detailed recommendations in regard to these two aspects in its report. The Commission on Narcotic Drugs (E/1889) recorded its appreciation of this report and of the co-operation given to the Commission of Enquiry by the Governments of Bolivia and Peru.

At the Commission's invitation a representative of the Government of Bolivia attended the discussion of the report. The representatives of Bolivia and Peru expressed dissatisfaction with the medical part of the report of the Commission of Enquiry on the ground that this Commission had not itself undertaken an expert scientific investigation of the medical and physiological factors involved, and that the findings upon which its conclusions and recommendations were based were not accepted by certain medical and scientific authorities in these countries who have given the question special study. The Commission on Narcotic Drugs decided (E/1889) to request the Commission of Enquiry to forward its observations on the opinions expressed by the representatives of Bolivia and Peru to the Secretary-General by 1 March 1951 for transmission to the Council. It recommended to the Council that the report and the observations of the Commission of Enquiry should be forwarded to the Governments of Bolivia and Peru with a request that they send their observations to the Secretary-General before 15 September 1951; it proposed that the Commission on Narcotic Drugs should examine the question further at its seventh session, taking all available information into consideration, with a view to submitting recommendations to the Council as soon as possible thereafter.

11. Report of the Permanent Central Opium Board

a. CONSIDERATION IN THE ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL AT ITS TENTH SESSION

At its tenth session in February-March 1950, the Council examined the report of the Permanent Central Opium Board (E/OB/5 & Add.) at the 124th meeting of its Social Committee on 28 February and at its 368th plenary meeting on 1 March 1950. The report covered the Board's work in 1949 and included statistical tables covering 1936 and 1946-1948. Apart from routine questions relating to administration and the present state of the control the report contained a section on the responsibilities of exporting countries in preventing exports in excess of estimates of importing countries, a section on synthetic narcotic drugs, and sections on diacetylmorphine and the trend in the movement of narcotic drugs during 1948.

The Board concluded that a perfect control of narcotics ought to begin even before their production, so that production might be adjusted to effective lawful requirements, which are well known. The current volume of production of certain manufactured drugs, synthetic or non-synthetic, and the prevailing uncertainty as to the volume of the production and utilization of opium, coca leaf and Indian hemp made it more necessary than ever, the Board stated, that an extremely strict control over the distribution and use of these drugs should be exercised in all countries and territories in order to avoid improper consumption and increased addiction. The Board expressed particular concern that a synthetic narcotic such as demerol was being manufactured in amounts almost equal to those of morphine produced for use as such (i.e. not used for conversion), and did not yet fall under the Convention of 1931. The Board was of the opinion that the only way to fill one of the most serious gaps which still existed in the international control of narcotics was to bring the Protocol of 19 November

1948 into force, and it therefore urged Governments which had not done so to ratify it.²²¹

In its report the Board had drawn the attention of the Council to the fact that the Government of Iran, although a party to the 1931 Convention, had not replied to the Board's communications.

The representative of Iran stated that his Government, although not a signatory to the Convention of 19 February 1925 relating to narcotic drugs, had taken appropriate measures to prevent the illicit traffic in opium and wished to co-operate fully with the Board. Among other things, the Board had referred to the "presence of Iranian opium in the illicit traffic in many parts of the world" and to "exports to countries which had prohibited import" of the drug. The Iranian representative stated that specific instances had not been quoted and the references were somewhat vague. He pointed out that it had been impossible for Iran, during its four-year occupation by foreign Powers, to take effective measures against smuggling in both directions. To strengthen control the Iranian Government had since decided to issue export permits only when the importer had secured appropriate import certificates. Furthermore, the Government was prepared to make inquiries whenever cases of smuggling were discovered, but it had requested that such charges should be accompanied by supporting evidence. Some of the delay in submitting statistics had also been due to the difficulties which had arisen following the four-year occupation, but the administrative machinery was again functioning effectively. Another reason for delay had been the Government's confusion in assuming that the annual reports containing statistics prepared for the Secretary-General might also serve the needs of the Board. However, both quarterly and annual reports for the period 1947/48 had now been sent to the Board and his Government would gladly supply additional data should this be necessary.

The representative of India congratulated the Board. While agreeing with its recommendations for a "perfect control of narcotics", he pointed out that it should be remembered that, despite good will and determination, such control was sometimes difficult to put into effect.

In addition he stressed the importance of the question of assessing those parties to the 1925 Convention which were not Members of the United Nations for a share of the Board's expenses.

The Social Committee (E/1638) and, on its recommendation, the Council at its 368th plenary meeting on 1 March 1950 in resolution 282(X) took note of the Board's report.

b. CONSIDERATION IN THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY AT ITS FIFTH SESSION

The General Assembly, at the 258th meeting of its Fifth Committee on 31 October and at its 305th plenary meeting on 16 November 1950, considered the question of assessment of non-members of the United Nations which had signed the Convention of 19 February 1925 relating to Narcotic Drugs. Pursuant to General Assembly resolution 353(IV),²²² the Secretary-General had submitted a report (A/1418) embodying the results of a comprehensive study of this question. Attention had been given to the total expenses incurred in connexion with the international administration of the control of narcotic drugs and of such other functions or powers, the responsibility for which is shared by non-members of the United Nations under existing treaties. In addition to the Secretary-General's report, the Fifth Committee had before it the observations of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions (A/1461) on the report.

In the case of international administration in the field of narcotic drugs the Secretary-General had expressed the view that, in addition to direct meeting and secretariat costs of the Permanent Central Opium Board, certain other costs enumerated in his report (such as meetings of the Commission, the Board and Supervisory Body, and certain salary, service and printing costs) might reasonably be deemed to comprise assessable expenditure towards which non-member States might be asked to contribute. The Advisory Committee had concurred in this recommendation, as well as in the Secretary-General's provisional recommendation that the United Nations should include in its calculations similar expenses incurred by the World Health Organization, on the understanding that, should these proposals be approved, the United Nations would turn over to WHO its share of such collections.

With regard to the scale of assessment to be applied to non-members of the United Nations, the Advisory Committee expressed the opinion that the first of the alternative methods proposed by the Secretary-General would be an equitable one, namely, that the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Committee on Contributions, should establish the percentage contribution to be paid—this assessment being based on the same principles as those which are being used for the assessment of Member States in apportioning the expenses of the United Nations (i.e. the method presently used in assessing contributions of non-Member States to the expenses of the International Court of Justice). The Secretary-General had given the assurance that, when seeking payment of contributions from non-member States, he would be guided by the resolutions of the General Assembly regulating the relationships with those States.

The Fifth Committee approved (A/1497), without discussion, the Advisory Committee's recommendation that the draft resolution submitted by the Secretary-General should be adopted.

The General Assembly at its 305th plenary meeting on 16 November 1950, without discussion, unanimously adopted resolution 455(V) as recommended by the Fifth Committee, as follows:

The General Assembly,

Taking note of the report of the Secretary-General to the fifth session of the General Assembly on the question of the assessment of signatories of international instruments relating to the control of narcotic drugs, which are non-members of the United Nations, for their fair share of expenses resulting from obligations placed on the United Nations by those instruments,

1. Approves the principle proposed by the Secretary-General for determining the expenses to be considered as assessable on such non-members;

2. Requests the Committee on Contributions to determine the rates at which such non-members should be assessed by the same method as that followed in determining the assessment of non-members which are parties to the Statute of the International Court of Justice for their share of the expenses of the Court;

3. Directs the Secretary-General to seek payment of such amounts as are determined by the method established above in respect of the 1950 expenses and those of future years.

R. CULTURAL ACTIVITIES

1. Teaching about the United Nations in the Schools of Member States

The Economic and Social Council, at its seventh and eighth sessions, had examined reports on the teaching about the United Nations prepared in response to General Assembly resolution 137(II). At its eleventh session, in July-August 1950, it had before it a report (E/1667), submitted jointly by the Secretary-General of the United Nations and the Director-General of UNESCO, as requested by Council resolution 203(VIII), on the progress achieved in teaching about the United Nations in the educational institutions of Member States.

The joint report stated that in response to this request the United Nations and UNESCO had attempted to find out what was being taught about the United Nations, what had been the main obstacles and difficulties and how they were being overcome. Although the report was based largely on information received from 19 Member States in 1949, the information included in the earlier reports to the Council had also been used. Altogether, reports from 37 Member States had been analysed. The report noted that about half of these Member States had merely stated that they did include teaching about the United Nations in the curricula of their educational institutions. In many cases it had been very difficult for States to compile the data because of a decentralized system of education. Twenty-two Member States had never submitted any information on the subject.

The report dealt chiefly with teaching about the purposes and principles, structure and activities of the United Nations in schools, universities and adult education groups. Special attention was also given to information on teaching about the United Nations in Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories. One section, based on reports of non-governmental organizations, gave an account of the important part the organizations had played in such teaching, and another outlined the work that the United Nations and UNESCO had been doing to encourage this teaching.

Among other things, the report stated, teaching could not be isolated from the whole question of education for international understanding. UNESCO and the United Nations regarded teaching about the United Nations as a means both of developing a world outlook and as a means of creating the public support for the work of the United Nations and the specialized agencies which was essential to their success. The report concluded that the over-all picture was not too discouraging in view of the recent establishment of the United Nations, the slowness with which educational changes take place and the preoccupation of many educators with other problems, such as providing minimum education for all in the under-developed countries. However, the position was not entirely satisfactory in any country. One of the greatest obstacles to teaching about the United Nations at all levels was the shortage of materials, particularly in countries where the language was not one of the official languages of the Organization.

Finally, the following recommendations were suggested for improving teaching about the United Nations.

(1) In primary and elementary schools increased attention should be given to the development of skills favourable to international understanding and some direct teaching on the United Nations and the specialized agencies should be included.

(2) In secondary schools full use should be made of all subjects in the curriculum and of special activities and current events lessons to give pupils an understanding of the work of the United Nations. Some systematic teaching about the United Nations system as a whole should be given in either special courses or in appropriate school subjects.

(3) United Nations Day and Human Rights Day should be observed in schools of all types.

(4) University authorities and student organizations in each country should be consulted on how to expand teaching about the United Nations at the university level.

(5) Greater attention should be given to training prospective teachers and full use made of national, regional and international seminars to assist teachers.

(6) Non-governmental organizations should be encouraged to continue to spread information about the work of the United Nations and particular consideration given to holding courses for leaders in adult and youth organizations on education for international understanding.

(7) Serious efforts should be made by national authorities to provide more teaching materials for educational institutions, and to make wider use of the United Nations Bulletin and the UNESCO Courier.

(8) Ministries of Education should establish the necessary machinery to give official encouragement and to assist in the distribution—and where necessary the translation—of material on the United Nations.

(9) Fullest use should be made of the services of the United Nations and UNESCO.

(10) Reports on progress achieved should be submitted at two-year intervals and fuller reports prepared every four years.

The Council discussed the question at its 397th plenary meeting on 24 July 1950. The majority of members commended the report and supported its conclusions and suggestions.

The representatives of Australia, France and the United States pointed out that the crux of the problem at the present time did not lie with the young but with the adult. The effectiveness of the United Nations depended on the extent to which Governments were prepared to accept their responsibilities which in turn depended on the support of their people. One big obstacle, several representatives stated, was the pessimism which had resulted from the failure of the League of Nations and the current disagreements among United Nations Members.

The representatives of Chile, France and the United States urged greater propaganda efforts to explain the aims and principles of the United Nations. The United Nations machinery which had been set up to implement these aims should, the United States representative stressed, also be publicized so that the principles of the Charter might seem more real. These representatives held that greater emphasis should be placed on the use of the Press, radio, cinema and television in spreading information. The need for up-to-date information to enable current United Nations activities to be defended when criticized was pointed out by the representative of France.

The representatives of Canada, Pakistan and the United Kingdom agreed with these points, but stressed that the United Nations should not be advertised along commercial lines which would lead to false emotional associations and hopes. The Organization's possibilities and achievements should not be exaggerated and information should be restrained and realistic.

The Council unanimously adopted a joint United States-France resolution (E/L.75), as amended by Mexico (E/L.78) and India. Resolution 314 (XI) read:

The Economic and Social Council,

Noting with satisfaction the report on "Teaching about the United Nations and the Specialized Agencies" submitted, in accordance with resolution 203(VIII) of the Economic and Social Council, jointly by the Secretary-General of the United Nations and the Director-General of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization, and particularly the conclusions set forth in chapter IV,

Considering that teaching about the United Nations, including the specialized agencies, in order to promote understanding among all the peoples of the world concerning the purposes, and principles and activities of the United Nations, should be undertaken in schools as well as in adult education programmes in all countries and territories,

Recognizing that the attainment of these ends requires continuous effort on the part of the United Nations, the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization, the other specialized agencies, the Member States, and interested non-governmental organizations, Requests the Secretary-General, in collaboration with the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization:

(a) To continue the preparation of basic materials on the United Nations and to encourage educational and public information authorities of Member States, particularly those whose native tongues are not the official languages of the United Nations, to adapt and publish these materials in the light of their particular needs;

(b) To continue to make available through Information Centres to all interested persons and to Press, radio and film services, information about the United Nations; and

(c) To study ways for increasing public awareness and understanding of United Nations policies, problems and activities;

Invites the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization, in consultation with the United Nations:

(a) To continue the production for use by teachers, and by adult education groups, of teaching aids on the United Nations;

(b) To evaluate, in collaboration with the educational authorities of the Member States, various methods for teaching about and stimulating interest in the United Nations;

(c) To encourage and facilitate teaching about the Universal Declaration of Human Rights in schools and adult education programmes and through the Press, radio and film services; and

(d) To continue to grant a limited number of fellowships to enable educators to study, both at the headquarters of the United Nations and of the specialized agencies, and in educational institutions, the practical problems of teaching about the United Nations;

Requests the other specialized agencies to co-operate with the United Nations and the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization in this programme;

Invites interested non-governmental organizations to continue their valuable co-operation in these activities;

Requests the Member States actively to encourage the dissemination of information about the purposes and principles and the structure and activities of the United Nations through all appropriate media, and to report to the Secretary-General every two years on the progress made toward achieving the ends set forth in this resolution; and Invites the Trusteeship Council to consider this resolution in order to ensure its implementation in the Trust Territories.

2. United Nations Research Laboratories

The question of establishing international research laboratories under the auspices of the United Nations or the specialized agencies had been considered by the Economic and Social Council at its third and seventh sessions. At the third session, the Council had expressed the view that a certain number of research activities could only be carried out in a rational manner on an international scale, and had invited the Secretary-General to undertake extensive consultations on the problem (22(III)). At its seventh session, the Council had noted his report and affirmed its interest in furthering the development of research and discovery in all sciences. In view of the large number, variety and importance of suggestions made in the report, the Council had decided that study of the question ought to be actively pursued. It, therefore, had recommended that a committee of experts in the basic sciences should consider the question of priorities. The Committee was also asked to examine the advisability of convening an international conference of scientists (160(VII)).

The Committee of Scientific Experts on International Research Laboratories met in Paris from 16 to 24 August 1949 (E/1694 & Add.1). In considering the question of priorities the Committee used as a basis for its decisions the following criteria: (1) the importance of the work to humanity; (2) its appropriateness for research on an international level; (3) existing resources available for proceeding with the project; and (4) cost. The Committee recommended that the highest priority should be given to the establishment of an international computation centre, an international institute of research on the brain and an international institute of social sciences. While the Committee was of the opinion that there were compelling reasons for beginning with these projects, it urged that funds should be made available as soon as possible to start on four other projects: an international laboratory for arid-zone research; an international astronomical laboratory; an international institute for the chemistry of living matter and an international meteorological institute.

Finally, the Committee proposed that a widely representative conference of scientists should be held in 1951 or 1952 for the purpose of examining other proposed projects and of providing the Council with an exhaustive study on the important question of international action in the field of scientific research.²²³

The Committee's report and the second report of the Secretary-General (E/1669/Rev.1) were examined by the Council at its eleventh session at its 410th and 411th plenary meetings on 14 August 1950.

The Secretary-General's report contained substantive excerpts from communications from Governments and national institutions, specialized agencies and international scientific organizations on the question of establishing such laboratories. The Secretary-General noted that by 30 April 1950, 25 Member Governments, three non-member Governments, eleven specialized agencies and three international scientific unions had entered into correspondence with him on the subject. All communications, with the exception of one from Canada and one from Pakistan, which had been received too late, had been submitted to the Committee of Experts.

During the Council's discussions, a number of representatives, among them those of Australia, Canada, the United Kingdom and the United States, were of the opinion that the need for the establishment of international research laboratories at this time had not been proved; therefore, they doubted the feasibility and desirability of setting up these laboratories. For one thing, there were not sufficient funds available to carry out a far-reaching programme. The representatives of Canada and the United Kingdom held, in addition, that it would be wiser to strengthen research on a national level, placing the emphasis on greater collaboration.

The representative of Canada thought that one of the best ways of carrying out research would be through the technical assistance programmes of the United Nations. However, the representatives of the United States and India pointed out that it had already been established at the Council's tenth session that as a general rule technical assistance funds should not be used for the promotion of scientific research per se.

Those supporting the Committee of Experts' proposals, among them the representatives of Denmark, France, Chile and Mexico, considered that the creation of international research laboratories would provide scientists with increased resources and ensure better results. Such laboratories would remove obstacles to certain projects which were too costly to be undertaken by one single country. They also would obviously be of great benefit to the under-developed countries. Moreover, they would encourage the development of science itself by removing the danger that Governments would limit research in fields such as the basic sciences because of an over-concern with the added power they might gain from the development of certain branches of scientific knowledge.

The majority felt that UNESCO should study the general problem connected with the establishment of international research laboratories, and, in particular, should proceed as early as possible with details for the setting up of an international computation centre.

In view of this the majority of the Council held that it was unnecessary and undesirable to hold the proposed conference of scientists in 1952.

The Council considered a joint draft resolution (E/L.102) combining resolutions proposed by Denmark and France (E/L.100) and by the United States (E/L.101). Regarding the holding of a conference of scientists (Part C of draft resolution) two alternatives were presented: one, proposed by the representatives of Denmark and France, that a conference be convened as early as possible and not later than 1952; the other, proposed by the United States representative, that a decision on holding a conference should be postponed pending the receipt of the report requested from UNESCO. The United States proposal in part C was adopted by 6 votes to 5, with 4 abstentions. The joint draft resolution (E/L.102), with additional minor amendments, was adopted as a whole, at the Council's 411th meeting by 13 votes to 2.

In this resolution (318(XI)), the Council reaffirmed its "desire to promote the development of scientific research and discovery as an indispensable basis for the economic and social progress of mankind" and gave special consideration to the Committee's proposal for the establishment of an international computation centre. The United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization was accordingly invited, in part B of the resolution, to propose a detailed plan for the setting up of such a centre, "including recommendations as to location, staffing, equipping and financing". As regards the other proposals made by the Committee, the Council in part A of the resolution considered that they should receive thorough technical examination before any final decisions were taken, and entrusted UNESCO, in co-operation with the United Nations and the appropriate specialized agencies, with the execution of the requested study. The study should include

- (a) "an appraisal ... of the outstanding problems of scientific research referred to in the report of the Committee";
- (b) "an evaluation of the ability of existing research centres to deal adequately with such problems and recommendations for measures which might be taken to expand such centres or to promote a greater degree of co-ordinated research" among them;
- (c) "a thorough analysis of the need for the establishment of specific regional or United Nations laboratories, and of the functions they might perform," including detailed plans for their staffing, location, equipment and operation; and
- (d) "an examination of the role of the other specialized agencies and other international organizations in assisting scientific research in their respective fields".

Finally, in part C of the resolution the Council decided to postpone a decision for convening the proposed conference of scientists until a later session pending receipt of the report by UNESCO on the above questions.

3. Co-ordination of Cartographic Services

In pursuance of resolution 261(IX)²²⁴ of the Economic and Social Council, the Secretary-General was engaged during 1950 in consulting Governments on the following questions:

(a) The calling of regional meetings on cartography, to be attended by representatives of Governments having a common interest in a specific region;

(b) The constitution of a panel of consultants in the various fields of cartography, whom the Secretariat may call on individually for counsel on specific problems;

(c) The publication of a United Nations cartographic bulletin.

Regarding the last item, the views of the specialized agencies and international scientific organizations in the field were also obtained. The bulletin was scheduled to appear in 1951.

In accordance with the decision of the General Assembly in 1949, the establishment of the United Nations cartographic office was to be carried out in 1951.

S. RELATIONS WITH AND CO-ORDINATION OF THE SPECIALIZED AGENCIES

1. Consideration by the Economic and Social Council at Its Tenth and Eleventh Sessions

a. GENERAL CO-ORDINATION QUESTIONS

At its tenth session, the Economic and Social Council, at its 347th, 348th, 350th and 354th plenary meetings from 8 to 17 February 1950, considered general co-ordination questions and briefly reviewed the progress made since its previous session.

The first of the two documents before it, the sixth report of the Administrative Committee on Co-ordination (ACC) (E/1572) dealt mainly with the initial action taken to give effect to the decisions made at the ninth session of the Council (259(IX))²²⁵ and the fourth session of the General Assembly (310(IV), 311(IV)),²²⁶ and called attention, inter alia, to the problem of concentration of effort and resources, the setting up of the Technical Assistance Board and certain aspects of programme, administrative and budgetary, and regional co-ordination.

The second, a report by the Secretary-General on particular co-ordination matters (E/1573) reviewed the action taken on the following questions: the agreements between the United Nations and the specialized agencies; the headquarters arrangements with the World Health Organization; the decision of the Food and Agriculture Organization regarding its permanent headquarters; the calendar of conferences of specialized agencies; and inter-agency agreements.

The Council, at its 350th plenary meeting on 14 February, unanimously adopted, as resolution

284(X), a United States proposal (E/L.11), which read as follows:

The Economic and Social Council

Notes the sixth report of the Administrative Committee on Co-ordination,

Requests the Secretary-General to call to the attention of other organs of the United Nations the desirability of using, wherever possible, the annual reports of the specialized agencies to the Economic and Social Council rather than requesting special reports;

Requests the Secretary-General to call General Assembly resolution 309(IV) to the attention of the Administrative Committee on Co-ordination and to submit to the eleventh session of the Council any suggestions he or the Committee may wish to make on the matter; and Recommends to Member Governments which are also members of the International Telecommunication Union that further consideration be given to the time at which meetings of the Administrative Council of the International Telecommunication Union are held.

At its eleventh session, the Council considered general co-ordination matters at the 59th-71st meetings of the Co-ordination Committee, 17-25 July and 4 August, and at its 405th plenary meeting, 9 August 1950. It gave close attention to General Assembly resolution 310(IV) in the light, more particularly, of the report on concentration of effort and resources of the United Nations and the specialized agencies (E/1683) which had been prepared by the Secretary-General in consultation with the heads of the specialized agencies in accordance with the resolution.

The report dealt primarily with programmes, organs and meetings, documentation and co-ordination of national action (see below, under subject headings). It noted that aspects of the same problem had been dealt with in the seventh report (E/1682) of the Administrative Committee on Co-ordination (ACC). This report, in general, had considered the problem of concentration of effort and resources; technical assistance for economic development; programme co-ordination; regional co-ordination; administrative and budgetary co-ordination; inter-agency agreements and agreements between agencies and other inter-governmental organizations; and Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories. The Council found itself in close agreement with the analysis of the problem and the concrete suggestions contained in the Secretary-General's report. By resolution 324 A (XI), unanimously adopted at the 405th plenary meeting on 9 August, it referred the report to the General Assembly. In the same resolution, the Council noted the progress made in the co-ordination of activities of the United Nations and the specialized agencies and approved the report, including the specific recommendations (E/1810) of its Co-ordination Committee (see below).

The Council considered that the ACC was proving increasingly effective as a device for facilitating co-ordination among the United Nations and the specialized agencies and that its seventh report (E/1682) showed noteworthy progress along the lines recommended by previous resolutions both of the Council and of the General Assembly.

The Council considered a number of aspects of the question of co-ordination in which improvements could be made on existing practice. It endorsed the view, put forward in the Secretary-General's report (E/1683), that the co-ordination of national action was of paramount importance to the concentration of international effort, and that consistency in briefings of national delegations for international conferences and the co-ordination of requests made by Governments to international agencies for technical advice and services were an indispensable prerequisite to the success of other measures designed to achieve co-ordinated action.

(1) Programme Co-ordination

On questions of programme co-ordination the Council, at its eleventh session, underlined the importance of co-ordinating programmes while they were still in the planning stage, and to this end, at its 405th plenary meeting on 9 August, it unanimously adopted resolution 324 B (XI) requesting the Secretary-General, through the ACC, to make arrangements to ensure that all proposals which concern more than one organization should be the subject of inter-agency consultation prior to their adoption by the organ concerned, and that the results of this consultation should be put before the competent organs of the United Nations and specialized agencies when they were considering new projects. It further recommended that the United Nations, specialized agencies and States members thereof should insist on a deadline for the submission of new projects of at least six weeks prior to the opening of the conferences at which the substance of these projects was to be discussed.

The Co-ordination Committee of the Council made particular recommendations on two items of programme co-ordination, namely:

(a) on the co-ordination of United Nations activities for the development of arid zones,²²⁷ concerning which the Council unanimously adopted resolution 324 D (XI) urging closely co-ordinated action in defining and meeting the inter-related problems of the development of the arid zones;

(b) on activities in the field of freedom of information, concerning which the Council on 9 August unanimously adopted resolution 331 B (XI) calling for an examination of the fields of responsibility of UNESCO and of the United Nations.

(2) Priorities

At its eleventh session, the Council gave careful consideration to the problem of establishing priorities, with particular reference to the request of the General Assembly in resolution 310(IV) that it review the Catalogue of Economic and Social Projects in terms of categories of priorities and report thereon to the fifth regular session of the Assembly. The Council agreed with the conclusion of the Co-ordination Committee that it was not possible at that time to meet this request fully in view of the difficulties both of defining priorities and of introducing any standard procedure for establishing them. The Council, however, endorsed the Committee's suggestion that the establishment of criteria, which might provide for the organs of the United Nations and the specialized agencies a common approach to the evaluation of priorities between programmes within a particular field of work and between projects within those programmes, might represent at this stage a more constructive and practical, if less direct, approach to the problem than an effort to review, in terms of categories of priorities, the manifold and diverse activities of the United Nations and the specialized agencies.

²²⁷ See also p. 646.

The Co-ordination Committee had recommended that the criteria should be taken as a whole and subject to two overriding principles: (a) that international action would be justified only in cases where the desired results could not be achieved by unassisted national action with some degree of certainty and within a reasonable time; and (b) that the proposed action must be technically sound and adapted to its purpose. It suggested that the criteria for priorities should be: urgency, feasibility, scope, preparation and co-ordination, and results. In recommending that these criteria should be employed both by itself and by the specialized agencies, the Council agreed that their effectiveness would largely depend upon the extent to which Governments, through their representatives, were prepared to apply them to proposals submitted at the various international conferences. The Council also recognized that these criteria were of an experimental nature and that they would probably require further elaboration and development.

(3) Meetings of International Bodies

At its tenth session, in connexion with its plan for a balanced calendar of international meetings under which the annual conferences of the specialized agencies would, wherever possible, take place within the first six months of the year, the Council, on 14 February, in resolution 284(X), recommended that further consideration be given by the Governments of those members which are also members of the International Telecommunication Union to the time of meeting of the Administrative Council of ITU. At its eleventh session, the Council agreed with the opinion expressed by the Co-ordination Committee that the arrangements under which the annual conferences of most of the specialized agencies met during the first half of 1950 represented a substantial improvement over previous practice, but, unanimously adopted resolution 324 E (XI), urging that so far as possible these annual conferences should be arranged so as not to overlap.

The Council endorsed the conclusions contained in the Secretary-General's report on concentration of effort and resources (E/1683) and emphasized the importance of avoiding the establishment of new inter-governmental organizations and the convening of ad hoc conferences without due consideration of the adequacy of existing organizations and facilities. It recommended the wider use, where appropriate, of existing inter-governmental and non-governmental organizations for tasks within their recognized competence, and urged further examination of the possibility of greater use of joint inter-agency committees.

The Council also discussed possible methods of avoiding duplication of debate between itself and its subsidiary organs, and agreed on the desirability of any re-organization of work which might lead to the Secretariat spending less of its time in servicing meetings and more of its time in carrying out substantive tasks.

(4) Documentation

At its tenth session the Council on 14 February (284(X)) requested the Secretary-General to call to the attention of other organs of the United Nations the desirability of using, wherever possible, the annual reports of the specialized agencies to the Council rather than requesting special reports.

At its eleventh session, the Council approved (324 A (XI)), in general, the recommendations contained in the Secretary-General's report (E/1683) on this subject, and in particular recommended that the Council, its subsidiary organs and the organs of the specialized agencies, before requesting further reports and studies from the Secretariat, should weigh very carefully the urgency and usefulness of such further reports. Among the other recommendations stressed were the need for limiting background material and categories of documents produced in several languages and the desirability of Governments assisting in the reduction of distribution lists and copies required by ensuring proper and rapid distribution of documents received among the Government departments and offices concerned. It further recommended that ACC should continue to examine the possibility of further co-ordinating sales of the publications of the specialized agencies with those of the United Nations so that these publications might be disseminated in the most efficient and economical manner.

The Council considered that the documents on co-ordination which were before it showed that a basis had now been laid for the economical use of the efforts and resources of the United Nations and the specialized agencies, and made various recommendations as to the nature of the documentation on co-ordination matters which should be prepared for its thirteenth session.

(5) Catalogue of Economic and Social Projects

The Council expressed its appreciation of the Catalogue as a comprehensive work of reference. It considered that Governments should be asked by the Secretary-General to submit, by 1 March 1951, their comments on its form, presentation and usefulness, and that, pending the receipt of these comments, a supplement to the current issue would adequately meet the needs of the Council at its thirteenth session. It adopted resolution 324 C (XI) to this effect, by 13 votes to none, with 2 abstentions.

(6) Regional Co-ordination

In connexion with problems of regional co-ordination, the Council had before it at its eleventh session a report by the Secretary-General on regional co-ordination of programmes of the United Nations and specialized agencies (E/1684). The Council noted that particular attention had been paid to co-ordination and co-operative arrangements between the regional economic commissions and several specialized agencies, which were considerably developed during the period under review. The Co-ordination Committee of the Council expressed the hope (E/1810) that the ACC would continue to report to the Council on the development of techniques for co-ordination and avoidance of duplication at the regional level.

(7) Administrative Co-ordination

At its eleventh session, the Council noted the section of the report of the ACC (E/1682), which dealt with administrative and budgetary co-ordination, and expressed general satisfaction with the progress made. It particularly urged further consideration of the possibilities of the use of common staffs and of the pooling of administrative services, and specifically recommended that the specialized agencies should make as full use as possible of the services of the United Nations Department of Public Information and its Information Centres throughout the world. The Council, while expressing the hope that the studies already undertaken under General Assembly resolution 311(IV) in regard to the methods of increasing the utilization of soft currencies by the United Nations and specialized agencies would lead to positive results, also considered that further studies should be made of the possibilities of granting to all member States the opportunity of paying an equitable proportion of their contribution to the budgets of the organizations concerned in soft currencies usable by those organizations.

(8) Agreements between the United Nations and the Specialized Agencies²²⁸

At its eleventh session the Council considered the reports of the Secretary-General (E/1741) and of the ACC on the question of agreements between the United Nations and specialized agencies requested by the Council in resolution 284(X)²²⁹ in connexion with General Assembly resolution 309(IV). The latter resolution asked the Council to report to the next session of the General Assembly on the possible revision of the agreements. The Council decided that it was unnecessary at this stage to recommend to the General Assembly any measures for the revision of the agreements, and recommended that, unless the matter was raised by the General Assembly, by the Council itself, by the Secretary-General or by one of the specialized agencies, it would be unnecessary for the Council to consider further the question of a possible revision of the agreements until more experience in their working had been obtained.

The Council considered the question of the negotiation of an agreement between the United Nations and the World Meteorological Organization (WMO). It noted that the Convention of WMO had come into force on 23 March 1950 and that the first quadrennial congress of WMO would take place at Paris on 15 March 1951. It agreed with the Secretary-General's suggestion that the negotiations between its Committee on Negotiations with Inter-Governmental Agencies and the negotiating representatives of WMO should take place in the latter part of March 1951 so that the draft agreement reached could be considered for approval by the WMO Congress before the end of its session and by the Council at its thirteenth session.

(9) Applications for Membership in UNESCO

The Council at its 347th, 348th and 354th plenary meetings on 8, 13 and 17 February considered the applications for membership in UNESCO of the Republic of Korea, the Republic of the United States of Indonesia and the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan, transmitted by UNESCO to the Council in accordance with article II of the Agreement between the United Nations and that organization. It had before it three draft resolutions submitted by Australia (E/L.2), India (E/L.3) and Iran (E/L.10) concerning, respectively, the admission of the Republic of Korea, the Republic of the United States of Indonesia and the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan. The Council unanimously adopted them at its 347th and 354th plenary meetings on 8 and 17 February 1950 as resolution 285(X), by which it informed UNESCO that it had no objection to the admission of these States to the organization.

b. REPORTS OF THE SPECIALIZED AGENCIES

At its 352nd and 353rd plenary meetings on 16 February and 53rd-58th and 66th-68th meetings of its Co-ordination Committee, 11 to 24 July and at its 396th, 403rd and 405th plenary meetings from 20 July to 9 August 1950, the Council considered the following reports:

International Labour Organisation: Fourth report to the United Nations (E/1719) covering the period from March 1949 to March 1950.

Food and Agriculture Organization: Annual report to the United Nations (E/1676 & Add.1-4), including the report of the Director-General on the work of FAO, 1948/1949, the draft programme of work for 1950, the report of the fifth session of the Annual Conference of FAO, and the report of the Joint Food and Agriculture Organization—International Office of Epizootics Veterinary Committee.

International Bank for Reconstruction and Development: Fourth annual report of the Bank to the Board of Governors for the period 1 September 1948 to 20 August 1949, incorporating financial statements covering the fiscal year ended 30 June 1949 (E/1557). Financial statements as of 30 September 1949 (E/1557/Add.1), quarterly financial statements as of 31 December 1949 (E/1557/Add.2) and a statement of the principal activities since 1 September 1949 (E/1557/Add.3).

International Monetary Fund: Annual report of the Executive Directors of the Fund for the fiscal year ended 30 April 1949 (E/1556). Quarterly financial statement dated 31 July 1949 (E/1556/Add.1/Rev.1), quarterly financial statement as of 31 October 1949, and summary of activities of the Fund for the period 1 May 1949 to 1 February 1950. (E/1556/Add.2/Rev.1 & Add.3.)

International Civil Aviation Organization: Report of the Council to the fourth session of the Assembly of the organization on activities in 1949 and budget estimates, 1951 (E/1713 & Add.1).

Universal Postal Union: Annual report on the work of the Union in 1949 (E/1664).

International Telecommunication Union: Summary of the work of the general secretariat of the International Telecommunication Union during 1949 (E/1679).

United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization: Second annual report of UNESCO to the United Nations on activities in 1949 and covering a programme of work for 1950 as approved by the fourth session of UNESCO's General Conference (E/1688). A supplementary report containing an outline of the decisions of the fifth session of the General Conference held in Florence between 22 May and 17 June 1950 (E/1688/Add.1).

World Health Organization: Annual report of the Director-General of the organization to the World Health Assembly and to the United Nations, 1949 (E/1677), the proposed programme and budget estimates for the financial year 1 January—31 December 1951 (E/1677/Add.1), and a copy of a resolution adopted by the Executive Board of WHO at its sixth session in June 1950 on the expenditure level for 1951 (E/1677/Add.2).

International Refugee Organization: Second annual report of the organization to the United Nations covering activities for 1949, and the programme for 1 January 1950-31 March 1951 (E/1675 & Corr.1/Rev.1).

(1) International Labour Organisation

The Council considered the fourth report of ILO to the United Nations (E/1719) at the 53rd and 54th meetings of its Co-ordination Committee on 11 and 12 July and at its 396th plenary meeting on 20 July 1950. A representative of ILO supplemented the information contained in the report.

In the course of the discussion, warm appreciation was generally expressed of the success of ILO in concentrating its efforts on urgent problems and in effective fields, in intensifying its operational programmes of practical assistance to Governments, and in co-ordinating its activities with the United Nations and other specialized agencies on various common problems. Certain members, among them Belgium and the United Kingdom, noted with special satisfaction the achievements of ILO in the fields of vocational guidance, unemployment, migration and the protection of trade union rights.

The representative of Pakistan expressed the hope that ILO would direct greater attention in the future to improving the conditions of agricultural workers. The United States representative felt that further effort should be made towards rendering ILO's budget more comparable with those of other international organizations. He and the representative of India also suggested that future reports might contain a chapter summarizing the situation with regard to the adoption and the ratification by Governments of various international labour conventions and recommendations.

The Co-ordination Committee on 12 July (E/1766) and the Council on 20 July (resolution 325(XI)) expressed appreciation of the report of ILO and requested the Secretary-General to transmit to that organization the records of its discussion on the report.

(2) Food and Agriculture Organization

The Council, at the 58th meeting of its Co-ordination Committee on 14 July and at its 396th plenary meeting on 20 July 1950, considered the annual report of FAO to the United Nations (E/1676 & Add.1-4) and heard a supplementary statement by the representative of that organization.

During the discussion, members expressed general satisfaction with the report of FAO, which gave a comprehensive picture of the organization's activities during the past year as well as its programme for 1950. The importance of its role under the expanded programme of technical assistance was generally recognized, and confidence was expressed that under this programme FAO's high technical competence would be translated into effective action for the benefit of economically under-developed countries. Certain members, among them India and Pakistan, saw the danger of increased mechanization of agriculture in an over-populated area, which might give rise to agricultural unemployment. Several members, including Canada and the United States, pointed out that the success of FAO's work was dependent on the fullest co-operation of the Governments of its members. The United States representative suggested that doubling the budget of FAO would produce less result than doubling the efforts of members to implement, in their own countries, the recommendations of the organization.

Among others, the representatives of Australia and the United States expressed satisfaction with FAO's activities in the commodity field and hoped that the Committee on Commodity Problems of the FAO Council could be allowed to play a more active part, working in close relation with the United Nations and specialized commodity bodies. Members were also generally satisfied with the co-operation in the field of agriculture between FAO and the Economic Commission for Europe, through their joint secretariat in Geneva.

Certain members, including India and the United Kingdom, commended FAO for having been able to restrict its expenditure to the limits of a foreseen income. The representative of the United States expressed the hope that it would endeavour to frame a concentrated and integrated programme and eliminate unrelated projects.

The Co-ordination Committee on 14 July (E/1779) and the Council, on 20 July 1950, unanimously adopted resolution 326(XI) expressing appreciation of the report and requesting the Secretary-General to transmit to the organization the records of the discussion thereon.

(3) International Bank for Reconstruction and Development

The Council at its 353rd plenary meeting on 16 February 1950 considered the report of the Bank (E/1557 & Add.1-3) and heard a supplementary statement by its President on behalf of the Bank.

In the course of the debate, certain members, among them India and Peru, urged the Bank to adopt a more liberal attitude in regard to extending loans to under-developed countries. The representative of the United Kingdom, however, defended it for having followed a cautious loan policy. The President of the Bank pointed out that the volume of loans had been limited by the lack of properly prepared projects rather than by the lack of funds, that these loans tended more and more to be granted for the purposes of economic development rather than for reconstruction, and that the technical assistance activities of the Bank in connexion with the planning and preparation of projects had become an important part of its programme.²³⁰

The Council at the same meeting adopted resolution 273(X) which took note of the report of the Bank.

(4) International Monetary Fund

The Council considered the report of the Fund (E/1556, Add.1/Rev.1, Add.2/Rev.1 & Add.3) at its 352nd plenary meeting on 16 February 1950. The Managing Director, on behalf of the Fund, made a statement emphasizing the important points covered in the report and, at the request of Canada, made a supplementary statement on the effects of the currency devaluation by certain countries on the world economy.

The United Kingdom representative commended the Fund for its ability to undertake speedily and smoothly a complex operation of financial adjustment following the devaluation. Certain other representatives, among them the representative of Brazil, hoped that the Fund would devote more attention to the adverse effects of the devaluations on trade in countries which, for reasons of their economic structure, had not been able to take that measure.

Members generally acknowledged that the nature and scope of the Fund's activities had changed as a result of the profound changes in the world economic situation, and looked to the Fund to continue exerting its influence for establishment of sound monetary practices which would contribute to the restoration of stability in world trade and finance, and to international economic equilibrium.

The Council at the same meeting adopted resolution 274(X) which took note of the report of the Fund.

²³⁰ See also pp. 438 S.

(5) International Civil Aviation Organization

The Council at the 54th and 55th meetings of its Co-ordination Committee on 12 July and at its 396th plenary meeting on 20 July 1950 considered the report (E/1713 & Add.1) of ICAO on its activities in 1949 and heard a supplementary statement by the representative of that organization.

General appreciation of ICAO's report was expressed both in regard to its form and its content. Chapter I, which contained a summary of outstanding events in the field of civil aviation during 1949, was found to be of particular interest. Members were particularly satisfied with the concrete achievements of ICAO on a relatively modest budget, and with its success in co-ordinating its work with that of other specialized agencies, especially in the transport and communications field.

With regard to administrative matters, members expressed satisfaction with the efforts of ICAO in promoting administrative and budgetary practices in common with the United Nations and the other specialized agencies. The representatives of Canada and India, however, expressed the hope that ICAO would take early steps to participate in the system of joint external audit of the United Nations.

The Co-ordination Committee on 12 July (E/1768) and the Council on 20 July (327(XI)) unanimously adopted a resolution expressing appreciation of the report and requesting the Secretary-General to transmit to the organization the record of the discussions thereon.

(6) Universal Postal Union

After having considered the annual report (E/1664) of UPU on its work in 1949, and having heard a supplementary statement by a representative of the organization, the Council, at the 55th meeting of the Co-ordination Committee on 12 July (E/1769) and at its 396th plenary meeting on 20 July 1950, unanimously adopted a resolution (329(XI)) expressing appreciation of the report of UPU and requesting the Secretary-General to transmit to the organization the records of its discussion.

(7) International Telecommunication Union

The Council, at the 68th meeting of its Co-ordination Committee on 24 July and at its 403rd plenary meeting on 9 August 1950 considered the report (E/1679) of ITU on the work of that organization in 1949. The Secretary-General of ITU made a supplementary statement on behalf of that organization.

During the discussion, certain criticisms were made on the form and content of the report as well as on the work of the organization. The representatives of the United States and the United Kingdom pointed out that the report did not indicate the purposes of ITU as an integral part of international co-operative efforts in the interests of peace, or its accomplishments during the past year in relation to the difficulties it had encountered; nor did it contain sufficient information on the relations developed between ITU and other international organizations. They also expressed the hope that the next report of ITU would contain some information on developments in the field of telecommunications. The representatives of Australia, France and the United States further expressed the desire that the next report would contain information on the financial situation of the organization.

Reference was made to the difficulties encountered by ITU in the allocation of radio frequencies, which was dealt with separately under Council resolution 298 J (XI)²³¹ and to the date of the future sessions of the Administrative Council, on which recommendations had been made to members by the Council at its tenth session in resolution 284(X) (see above). The Secretary-General of ITU indicated that if, as was proposed, the annual sessions of the Administrative Council were henceforth held in the first half of the year, it should be possible to meet the recommendations made in this resolution and also give the information required by the Council.

The Co-ordination Committee (E/1804) unanimously adopted a draft resolution which was subsequently unanimously adopted by the Council on 9 August as resolution 328(XI). By this resolution the Council took note of the report; invited ITU, in its next report, to include a general statement containing an appraisal of its work during the year, and an account of its relations with other international organizations and of steps taken under its Agreement of Relationships with the United Nations; and requested the Secretary-General to transmit to the organization the record of the discussions of the report.

(8) United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization

The Council at the 66th and 67th meetings of its Co-ordination Committee on 21 July and at its ²³¹ See p. 487.

405th plenary meeting on 9 August 1950 considered the annual report (E/1688 & Add.1) of UNESCO to the United Nations and heard a statement by its Director-General.

During the debate, members expressed general satisfaction on the work of UNESCO during the past year. Two recent activities of the organization were especially praised, namely, the Brussels meeting of experts to improve history textbooks and the publication of the scientific report on the question of race. Considerable emphasis was laid by some members, among them Australia, India and Mexico, on the work of UNESCO's national commissions, which played an important part in the promotion of the organization's programmes at the national level.

Members expressed general appreciation of the progress made by UNESCO in systematizing its programmes and establishing priorities. In the meantime, they expressed the hope that the organization would achieve a greater concentration of effort to promote peace and security in the world, as well as to give special attention to assisting under-developed countries. The representative of Belgium stressed the need for UNESCO to stabilize its budget and to lower its administrative costs.

Members also commended the organization on the manner in which it had carried out the various requests of the Council and other main bodies of the United Nations, particularly in such activities as the teaching of the purposes and principles of the United Nations and the dissemination of information on the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. Attention was drawn, however, to the need for better co-ordination between the work of UNESCO and of other organizations in the field of freedom of information and in the problems of arid zones.²³²

The Co-ordination Committee (E/1800) on 21 July and the Council (331(XI)) on 9 August, by varying votes, adopted a resolution which consisted of three parts. Part A of the resolution expressed its appreciation of the report; commended the efforts of UNESCO to establish priorities in its work programmes; invited members of UNESCO to seek greater concentration of future programmes in terms of priorities of major projects designed to advance UNESCO's contribution to peace and security; expressed the hope that this concentration of effort would result in a reduction of the number of expert meetings and conferences held under the auspices of UNESCO in order to allow adequate preparations for such meetings and proper implementation of their findings and recommendations, both nationally and internationally; requested UNESCO to continue to give special attention to assistance to under-developed countries in the improvement of their educational systems and to the promotion of effective methods of teaching international understanding; and requested the Secretary-General to transmit to the organization the records of the discussions on the report.

Part B of the resolution requested the Secretary-General to prepare for the Council, in collaboration with the Director-General of UNESCO, a report delimiting the respective activities of the United Nations and of UNESCO with a view to their co-ordination, in particular comparing the terms of reference and programme of the Sub-Commission on Freedom of Information and of the Press with the constitution and programme of UNESCO.

Part C of resolution 331(XI), which was submitted by the representatives of Chile, Iran, Mexico and Peru (E/L.86) at the 405th plenary meeting on 9 August and unanimously adopted with minor amendments, noted that the Agreement on the importation of educational, scientific and cultural materials adopted at the fifth session of the General Conference of UNESCO had been deposited with the Secretary-General of the United Nations, and drew the attention of member States to the practical importance of this agreement.

(9) World Health Organization

The Council considered the annual report (E/1677 & Add.1 & 2) submitted by WHO to the United Nations at the 57th meeting of its Co-ordination Committee on 13 July and at its 396th plenary meeting on 20 July 1950. The Director-General presented the report with a supplementary statement.

During the discussion members generally paid tribute to WHO for its contribution towards meeting some of the most critical health needs of the world and for its realistic and regional approach to the world health problems. Approval was particularly given to the achievement of the organization in its campaign against epidemic diseases, its advisory social services and its training and fellowship programme. The organization's capacity for co-operation with other international organizations—in particular, its co-operation with UNICEF in improving the health of children, with FAO on nutrition problems and combating malaria, and with UNESCO on the development of primary education—was also commented on favourably.

Several members expressed satisfaction with the performance of WHO in concentrating its resources and personnel on a limited number of priority fields. The representative of France, however, felt that further concentration of activities in greater depth on a narrower front would be desirable, and that the organization should plan its programme according to financial resources which were likely to be at its disposal.

The Co-ordination Committee (E/1780) and the Council (330(XI)) unanimously adopted a resolution expressing appreciation of the report and requesting the Secretary-General to transmit to the organization the records of its discussions.

(10) International Refugee Organization

The Council at the 55th and 56th meetings of its Co-ordination Committee on 12 and 13 July and its 396th plenary meeting on 20 July considered the second annual report (E/1675) of IRO. The Deputy Director-General made a supplementary statement bringing up to date the information contained in the report.

Members praised the achievements of IRO, which, within a limited time, had done so much to produce a constructive solution of the refugee problem, as well as its preparations for bringing its activities to an orderly close. Certain members, among them Australia, India, Canada, the United Kingdom and the United States, expressed particular satisfaction with the accelerated effort of the organization in the resettlement of refugees during the past year.

The Co-ordination Committee on 13 July (E/1770) and the Council on 20 July (332(XI)) unanimously adopted a resolution taking note of the report of IRO and expressing highest praise for the efficient manner in which the organization had performed the great humanitarian task entrusted to it. The resolution also appealed to the goodwill of Governments and asked them to assist IRO in achieving its task by the adoption of the broadest possible criteria for the admission of refugees. The Secretary-General was requested to transmit to the organization the record of the Council's discussions thereon.

c. INTER-GOVERNMENTAL ORGANIZATIONS

The Council, during its tenth and eleventh sessions, considered reports of the Secretary-General on the termination, absorption and integration of certain inter-governmental organizations and the establishment of relationships between certain others with the United Nations or the specialized agencies (E/1574 & Add.1, E/1686, E/1735, E/1687). They were discussed at the tenth session at its 347th plenary meeting on 8 February and at the eleventh session at the 48th-52nd meetings of its Co-ordination Committee from 6-11 July and at its 396th plenary meeting on 20 July 1950. At its eleventh session the Council also considered sections of reports of FAO and UNESCO which dealt with this subject (E/1676/-Add.4; E/1688). At these sessions, the Council unanimously adopted resolutions 286(X) and 333 A-H (XI). Following is a summary of the action taken under these resolutions:

(1) POSSIBLE TERMINATION, ABSORPTION OR INTEGRATION

International Relief Union: The Council recommended (286(X)) to Members of the United Nations which are also members of the Union to take steps to terminate that organization.

International Commission for the Scientific Exploration of the Mediterranean Sea: The Council at its tenth session recommended to Members of the United Nations which are also members of the Commission to take steps to terminate that organization (286(X)). At its eleventh session, the Council (333 F (XI)) requested FAO to report on the progress of the negotiations being held on the termination.

International Penal and Penitentiary Commission: The Council, in resolution 333 H (XI), approved a draft plan prepared by the Secretary-General in consultation with IPPC as an acceptable basis for the integration of IPPC within the United Nations and decided to transmit this draft plan to the fifth session of the General Assembly (see below).

(2) CLOSER CO-ORDINATION WITH SPECIALIZED AGENCIES CONCERNED

International Office of Epizootics: The Council, after having noted a progress report submitted by FAO on its negotiations with the International Office of Epizootics (E/1676/Add.4), recommended (333 D (XI)) that Members of the United Nations which are members of both organizations should give further consideration to the possibility of establishing an international system satisfactory to the Governments concerned for the collection and dissemination of information and for the co-ordination of activities in the control of animal diseases, and expressed the hope that the next report of FAO to the Council would register definite results in this respect.

International Seed Testing Association: The Council noted with satisfaction (333 E (XI)) the action taken by the General Assembly of the Association suggesting to the countries participating in the work of that organization that they examine the possibilities of close co-operation between the Association and FAO, including the possibility of the Association eventually becoming a technical commission of FAO, and requested FAO to report to the thirteenth session of the Council on the progress in its negotiations with the Association.

International Union for the Protection of Rights of Authors and their Literary and Artistic Works: The Council noted with satisfaction (333 A (XI)) the action taken by the Executive Board of UNESCO at its ninth session in instructing its Director-General to strengthen the existing working relations with the Union and to define the procedure to be followed in these relations by an exchange of letters with the Director of the Office of the Union. It requested UNESCO to include in its next report to the Council a further account of the developments in this regard.

(3) CONSIDERATION POSTPONED PENDING FURTHER STUDY

Permanent Committee of International Congresses on Military Medicine and Pharmacy: The Council, after having noted the decision of the Executive Board of WHO to postpone consideration of the establishment of official relations with the Committee pending further clarification of the structural basis of the organization, decided (333 B (XI)) to postpone consideration of this matter until the thirteenth session of the Council. The Council requested WHO to report to the Council at its thirteenth session on the progress made, and further requested the Secretary-General to report to the same session on the feasibility of closer relations between the Committee and the Council for Co-ordination of International Congresses of Medical Sciences.

International Central Office for the Control of Liquor Traffic in Africa: The Council invited (333 G (XI)) the Belgian Government to consult with the parties to the Convention relating to liquor traffic in Africa signed at St. Germain-en-Laye on 10 September 1919 concerning the present value of this Office and their interest in maintaining it.

(4) DISSOLUTION

International Co-ordination Committee for European Migratory Movements: The Council noted with satisfaction (333 C (XI)) the action taken by the members of the International Co-ordination Committee for European Migratory Movements leading to the dissolution of that organization, and the steps taken by the International Labour Organisation in taking over the functions formerly discharged by that Com-

(5) INTEGRATION OF INTER-AMERICAN SPECIALIZED ORGANIZATIONS

The Council noted with satisfaction (286(X)) the progress made by the Organization of American States in integrating and simplifying the structure of Inter-American organizations with the United Nations and the specialized agencies. It requested the Secretary-General, in consultation with the Secretary-General of the Organization of American States, to provide the Council, as appropriate, with further information on this subject.

Of the above organizations, the case of IPPC was a subject of detailed discussion. The Council considered a report prepared by the Secretary-General in consultation with IPPC (E/1735 & Add.1) concerning the transfer of functions of IPPC to the United Nations pursuant to resolution 262 B (IX).²³³ After considerable discussion, the Council resolved (333 H (XI)) to approve the draft plan contained in the above-mentioned report as an acceptable basis for the integration of IPPC within the United Nations; to transmit the draft plan to the fifth session of the General Assembly; to express the hope that IPPC would give favourable consideration to the draft plan as early as possible and to recommend that, as soon as approval is given, the Secretary-General of the United Nations, in consultation with the Secretary-General of IPPC, make appropriate arrangements for the transfer of functions and assets on a mutually satisfactory date, prior to 31 December 1951. In the course of discussion the majority of members expressed general support of the objectives of integrating IPPC into the United Nations. While most members approved in general the draft plan²³⁴ contained in the Secretary-General's report, certain reservations were made on the detailed points in that plan, including the financial implications of proposed bodies and meetings and the transfer of IPPC staff to the United Nations Secretariat.

2. Consideration by the General Assembly at Its fifth Session

The General Assembly considered the question of co-ordination between the United Nations and the specialized agencies at the 48th-51st meetings of the Joint Second and Third Committee and 253rd-255th and 260th meetings of its Fifth Committee, from 23 October to 4 November, and at its 314th plenary meeting on 1 December 1950.

It had before it the following reports: (1) Report of the Economic and Social Council (A/1345); (2) Report of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions (A/1441) on Administrative Budgets for the Specialized Agencies; and (3) Report of the Secretary-General (A/1352) on Administrative and Budgetary Co-ordination between the United Nations and the Specialized Agencies.

a. GENERAL DEBATE

In the course of the general debate on co-ordination in the Joint Second and Third Committee and Fifth Committee, meeting jointly, satisfaction was expressed with the progress that had been made in co-ordinating the work of the international organizations and in promoting the concentration of effort and resources in accordance with resolution 310(IV) adopted by the General

Assembly at its fourth session. In regard to priorities, a subject which had received especial emphasis in that resolution, appreciation was expressed of the work accomplished by the Economic and Social Council. The Council, as a first practical step towards achieving the ends which the General Assembly had in mind, had suggested various criteria by which priorities might be established within a given field and had recommended that these criteria should be applied by all bodies concerned.²³⁵ However, some members, among them Australia and Brazil, still felt it desirable that early consideration should be given to the question of priorities between particular fields of activity and the proportion of international resources allotted to the work of each of the international organizations.

It was generally considered that caution should be shown in embarking on new projects, and several representatives, among them those of Australia and the United Kingdom, expressed concern at the continued expansion of agency budgets. They felt that an increasing number of members of agencies might be unable to meet their obligations and that, if the budgets became too large, some States might even have to withdraw from membership.

In the matter of administrative and budgetary co-ordination, it was agreed that considerable improvement had occurred since the fourth session of the General Assembly, though further development of uniform practices was urged. The use of common administrative services by agencies situated in the same area was advocated as a means of economizing both personnel and resources. The Committees were informed that the Administrative Committee on Co-ordination had already considered this and had arranged for a survey to be made.

The representatives of Australia, Canada, France and the United Kingdom, among others, drew the attention of the Committee to the increased resources available to the United Nations and to specialized agencies under the technical assistance plan. Since these funds were not incorporated in the regular budgets they commented favourably on the recommendation of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions that the agencies should be requested to include, as annexes to their annual reports, information on the manner in which these funds were being used.

With regard to the general problem of co-ordination, the representative of France warned against attempts to seek solutions of a purely administrative or financial character. He felt that the aim should be to encourage all efforts that would promote the development of international action by ensuring not only the necessary co-ordination but also the maintenance of the impetus essential to the success of that action. The representative of the USSR felt that a greater degree of independence should be given to the agencies in order to reduce to a minimum the exercise of authority over them by the United Nations for which there was no provision in the Charter.

Some doubt was expressed during the discussion as to whether sufficient study had been given by the Economic and Social Council to the reports of the specialized agencies. Several members, among them those of Brazil, France, Mexico and the United Kingdom, emphasized that really effective co-ordination could only be achieved if there were a greater degree of national co-ordination to ensure that policies advocated by the delegation of a member State in one organization would be followed by that member's delegation attending the meetings of other organizations.

At the conclusion of the general debate, the Committees proceeded to a detailed discussion of the draft resolutions before them and amendments thereto. These are described under the headings following.

b. ADMINISTRATIVE BUDGETS OF THE SPECIALIZED AGENCIES

In reviewing administrative and budgetary co-ordination with the specialized agencies, the Committees considered the report of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions (A/1441) and the draft resolution contained therein. The Committees also had before them the report of the Secretary-General (A/1352) on the progress that had been made in co-ordination on administrative and financial questions.

(1) Sixth Report of the Advisory Committee for 1950

The Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions reported that it had examined on behalf of the General Assembly the administrative budgets of those specialized agencies which have formal agreements with the United Nations providing for the transmittal of their budgets for examination by the Assembly.

The following agencies had submitted their budgets or budgetary estimates for 1951 to the United Nations: International Labour Organisation, United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization, World Health Organization, Food and Agriculture Organization, International Civil Aviation Organization, International Refugee Organization (for the supplementary period 1 July 1950-31 March 1951) and Universal Postal Union.

The budget estimates for 1951 of the International Telecommunication Union had not been available to the United Nations in time for consideration by the Advisory Committee. The Committee had therefore limited its review to the relevant parts of the annual report presented by ITU to the United Nations (E/1675), together with the amended budget for 1950.

The agreements concluded with the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development and the International Monetary Fund provide that "in the interpretation of paragraph 3 of Article 17 of the Charter, the United Nations will take into consideration that the Bank (Fund) does not rely for its annual budget upon contributions from its members, and that the appropriate authorities of the Bank (Fund) enjoy full autonomy in deciding the form and content of the budget". The budgets of these organizations were therefore not submitted to the United Nations for examination.

Following are the gross totals of the 1951 budgets or budget estimates,²³⁶ together with the corresponding figures for the preceding fiscal year:

* Estimate. † For 1 June 1950-31 Mar. 1951.

Contributions from States members of ITU to its 1951 budget were expected to add a figure of about $1,500,000 to the above total, while the operational budget of IRO had been approved at a figure of $52,658,533 for the period 1 June 1950-31 March 1951.

Of the problems common to most or all of the agencies, the Advisory Committee stated that perhaps the most important concerned the control of technical assistance funds and other extra-budgetary funds, as well as the form of presentation of the relevant estimates. At present, such funds are not incorporated in the annual budgets of the agencies and, except in the case of WHO, even the presentation of the estimates for technical assistance is entirely separate from the annual budgets.

As a result, the annual budgets do not reflect the whole of the activities of the organization for the year to which they refer, and a comprehensive appraisal can be made only by reference to a number of separate documents.

The Advisory Committee had therefore suggested that the specialized agencies should be requested to include, as information annexes to their annual budget documents, the estimates and plans for expenditure of any other funds which might be available for use during the year covered by the regular budget estimates.

As regards the control of technical assistance expenditures, the Advisory Committee noted that under Economic and Social Council resolution 222 A (IX) the Secretary-General of the United Nations and the executive heads of the organizations participating in the technical assistance programme "shall, after consultation, make appropriate arrangements for the audit of contributions and expenditures under this programme". The Committee recommended that, in addition, a consolidated audit report on the expenditures connected with the programme should be submitted for examination and approval to the General Assembly of the United Nations, and the appropriate audit reports to the general conferences of the specialized agencies.

A second problem to which the Advisory Committee directed attention concerned the collection of contributions, which appeared to be causing serious financial difficulties in most of the specialized agencies. Default or delay in the payment of contributions assessed against States members of the specialized agencies, it held, might result in a severe drain on the Working Capital Funds of those agencies, and hamper the execution of programmes approved in the budgets. The General Assembly might wish to invite the specialized agencies to give special consideration to this problem.

It was this problem which had led the General Assembly to recommend to each specialized agency that it keep its expenditure each year from its regular budget within the amount of funds reasonably expected to be received in respect of that year (resolution 311 C (IV)). Furthermore, several agencies could never expect to receive the full amount of the assessments on their members, inasmuch as their scale of contributions includes States which have not joined, or have given notice of withdrawal from, the organization, as well as States which for other reasons are in arrears or have defaulted in their contributions. In so far as the latter group is concerned, the Committee had noted in the past that any plan of expenditure which was based on the assumption of non-payment of contributions might have undesirable effects. An examination of the 1951 estimates of those agencies which had found it necessary to adopt a plan of expenditure substantially below the approved budget raises some doubt concerning this technique of financial control. In such circumstances, the budget estimates become a theoretical target, and the Advisory Committee therefore suggested that the Secretary-General, in consultation with the administrative heads of the agencies and the Advisory Committee, might also study and report on alternative procedures for attaining the objectives of the General Assembly.

In addition, the Advisory Committee drew attention to the unsatisfactory position in regard to common administrative services for organizations situated in the same area. While efforts had been made to secure a measure of co-ordination in this field among the specialized agencies with headquarters in Geneva and the European Office of the United Nations, the results so far achieved were, in the opinion of the Committee, inadequate. It suggested that the Secretary-General of the United Nations and the administrative heads of the agencies concerned might consider the desirability of setting up in Geneva a joint management board to undertake a survey of existing administrative services and to determine the possibility of creating joint service units. Similar efforts in Paris, Bangkok, Cairo, New Delhi and Santiago de Chile should also prove fruitful.

The Advisory Committee suggested that consideration should also be given to the question of uniformity in the presentation of resolutions adopted by the main legislative bodies of the specialized agencies and the General Assembly of the United Nations, as a means of facilitating the review of budgets in relation to programmes both by the specialized agencies and by the General Assembly. This question might, in the opinion of the Committee, appropriately be studied by the Consultative Committee on Administrative Questions. Further progress might also be made in developing a standard terminology and a common form of presentation of the budgets of the several agencies.

It was recognized that basic comparability of the estimates depended upon common financial regulations concerning the estimates, treatment of budgetary surpluses, treatment of revenue, and other matters. The Advisory Committee therefore hoped that the permanent financial regulations eventually adopted by the General Assembly would be favourably considered by each of the agencies.

The General Assembly had, at its third session, invited the specialized agencies to review their programmes of meetings with a view to reducing the number of formal meetings of governmental representatives and, in particular, to consider whether a full-scale conference is necessary. It would, in the opinion of the Advisory Committee, be desirable to call further attention to this matter.

The Joint Second and Third and Fifth Committees noted that progress had been made in the implementation of resolution 311 A (IV) adopted by the General Assembly at its fourth session. The Joint Panel of Auditors had been established, the United Nations Joint Staff Pension Board was holding its first meeting, and the organizations had taken some steps to increase the proportion of their expenditures made in soft currencies. A model set of financial regulations had been developed by the Administrative Committee on Co-ordination, and there had been a co-ordinated approach by the organizations in respect of the proposed salary and allowances scheme and in the development of a common pattern of staff regulations.

On the other hand, several members, among them Australia and Brazil, noted that much remained to be done. The Committees' attention was drawn to the fact that a least one large agency had not yet adhered to the Joint System of Audit, and that several agencies had not found it possible to join the Joint Staff Pension Scheme. The action which had so far been taken to give member States a degree of relief from contributions in hard currencies was still not as substantial as might be hoped, and it was suggested by the representatives of Canada, France and the United Kingdom that further attention should be given to effecting contractual procurement and printing in soft currency areas.

Attention was drawn by the representatives of Australia and Canada to the provisions of General Assembly resolution 311 B (IV) making the services of the United Nations Committee on Contributions available to the specialized agencies. This resolution had been adopted in the hope that such action would result in more uniformity in scales of assessments among the various organizations. It was noted that this service would be available to the World Meteorological Organization, which would be adopting a scale of assessments at its first congress, to be held in 1951.

A further step towards achieving a greater degree of common services was suggested by a joint Australian and Canadian draft resolution (A/C.2&3/L.20—A/C.5/L.53) making available to the agencies the services of the United Nations Investments Committee (see below, section c).

The representative of Australia commended those agencies which, in accordance with General Assembly resolution 311 C (IV), had planned their expenditure on the basis of their probable receipts. He noted that, in their reports, the Advisory Committee and the Secretary-General had pointed out that this meant the setting up of second budgets and would encourage defaults in payments. He did not agree with this although he recognized that the preparation of two budgets involved administrative difficulties. He felt that a more realistic method of assessing member States and collecting their contributions was the remedy for the budgetary difficulties of the agencies. It was somewhat unrealistic to assess countries which had formally declared that they were not members of an agency. Secondly, there was need for strict measures against defaulters. He drew the attention of the Committees to the fact that one agency had suspended the voting power of six of its members which had failed to discharge completely their financial obligations to the agency. Lastly, he stressed the need for economy in the budgets of the various international organizations.

The representative of France also stressed the importance of the agencies drawing up their programmes in accordance with receipts actually anticipated. Attention was drawn to the difficulties resulting from the fact that member States did not receive the annual accounts and the related audit reports of the specialized agencies in sufficient time to allow careful consideration prior to the meeting of the Assembly or Conference.

Several members suggested that it would be useful to have more information from the various organizations on the actual number of their staff and the distribution of their staff by grades.

The Committees expressed general support of the Advisory Committee's report and the draft resolution contained therein.

The representative of Canada, with a view to strengthening paragraph 1 of the draft resolution dealing with the stabilization of the budgets of the specialized agencies and emphasizing the desire of the Committees to avoid duplication of administrative expenses of the international organizations, proposed an amendment (A/C.2&3/L.24—A/C.5/L.51) to that effect to the draft resolution.

It was recognized that events in Korea had created additional demands on the United Nations and the specialized agencies which they would probably be unable to meet from their present resources. The representative of the United Kingdom therefore introduced an amendment (A/C.2&3/L.22—A/C.5/L.55) urging that every effort should be made in 1951 to meet the new demands by the deferment of less urgent projects. The Chairman of the Advisory Committee accepted these amendments and the Committees adopted the former in paragraph-by-paragraph vote and the latter unanimously. The draft resolution as proposed by the Advisory Committee was adopted unanimously, as amended, at the 49th meeting of the Committees on 23 October (A/1547) and at the 314th plenary meeting of the General Assembly as resolution 411(V). It read as follows:

The General Assembly,

Having received the sixth report of 1950 of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions on the budgets of the specialized agencies for 1951,

1. Urges the specialized agencies to intensify their efforts to stabilize their regular budgets by the elimination or deferment of less urgent projects;

2. Draws the attention of all States Members of the United Nations and of the specialized agencies to the necessity for prompt payment of contributions to assure the adequate financing of budgets approved by them;

3. Requests specialized agencies participating in the technical assistance programme to provide information concerning the estimates for expenditure of technical assistance funds, as well as other extra-budgetary funds, in their regular budget documents, and to agree to the transmittal to the General Assembly of the United Nations, for examination and approval, of the audit reports relating to expenditure of technical assistance funds allocated from the Special Account after approval of the appropriate audit reports by the general conferences of the specialized agencies;

4. Requests the specialized agencies to consider at an early date the adoption of common financial regulations and staff regulations modelled on those adopted by the General Assembly, so far as their constitutional arrangements will permit;

5. Requests the Secretary-General, in consultation with the heads of the specialized agencies, to pay particular attention, in 1951, to the further development of satisfactory arrangements for the provision of common services, particularly in respect of regional and branch offices of the United Nations and specialized agencies, with a view to achieving greater efficiency and economy;

6. Requests the Secretary-General, after consultation with the heads of the specialized agencies and with the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions, to report to the next regular session of the General Assembly in respect of progress made in achieving a common salary system, in developing common budgetary policies and a common form of budget, in increasing the utilization of soft currencies, in efficiencies and economies to be achieved through further development of common services, and in dealing with arrears in contributions;

7. Requests the specialized agencies and the United Nations to make every effort, during 1951, to meet as fully as possible demands for expert assistance in Korea and other operational programmes where the need is urgent, by deferment of less urgent projects.

c. INVESTMENTS COMMITTEE

In the course of the general discussion, an Australian and Canadian joint draft resolution (A/C.2&3/L.20—A/C.5/L.53) was introduced. This resolution proposed that the United Nations Investments Committee should be authorized to provide advice to a specialized agency at the request of that agency, and requested the Secretary-General to inform the specialized agencies that the Committee was available for that purpose.

The draft resolution was adopted by 46 votes to none, with 2 abstentions, at the 419th meeting of the Committees on 23 October (A/1547). The General Assembly, at its 314th plenary meeting on 1 December, unanimously adopted the proposed resolution as resolution 412(V), which read as follows:

The General Assembly,

Noting that certain specialized agencies may require advice on the nature and extent of investment of their funds,

1. Authorizes the United Nations Investments Committee to provide advice to a specialized agency at the request of that agency;

2. Requests the Secretary-General to inform the specialized agencies that the United Nations Investments Committee is available for this purpose.

d. CONCENTRATION OF EFFORT AND RESOURCES

A draft resolution (A/C.2&3/L.21—A/C.5/L.54) submitted by Australia formed the basis of discussion on this matter. The resolution was proposed with a view to the consideration of the present division of the available resources among the major fields of action of the United Nations. It called for the establishment of a fifteen-member committee to consider the programmes and budgets of the specialized agencies and of the United Nations in the economic and social fields. It recommended that, pending the review of the report of this committee at the sixth session of the General Assembly, each specialized agency should keep its estimated expenditure from its regular budget for 1952 within the regular budget for 1951 approved by its conference.

In the general debate, several members, among them Brazil, China, Mexico, the USSR and the United Kingdom, expressed disagreement with the suggestion that another body should be created to undertake the functions which should properly be performed by the existing co-ordinating machinery. The representatives of Mexico, Netherlands and the United States jointly presented a draft amendment (A/C.2&3/L.29—A/C.5/L.67) proposing substantial changes to the Australian draft resolution. The joint amendment requested the Economic and Social Council to review, during 1951, the 1952 programmes of the United Nations and the specialized agencies, and requested the agencies themselves to review their own programmes, with the aid of the criteria for priorities established by the Council at its eleventh session. Before adopting new projects, the Council and the agencies would indicate which current projects might be deferred, modified or eliminated, to ensure that the economic and social work of the United Nations and the specialized agencies would be carried on most effectively.

In the course of the discussion, the representative of Brazil requested that the President of the Council should be asked to examine the possibility of convening the Co-ordination Committee some time before the opening of the Council sessions to enable the Committee to submit co-ordinated programmes of work to the Council. Various technical oral amendments were accepted by the representative of Australia and the sponsors of the joint amendment. The Australian representative accepted the joint amendment, but reserved the right to re-open the question at the next session of the General Assembly.

The Australian draft resolution, as amended, was adopted unanimously at the 51st meeting of the Committees on 4 November (A/1547) and at the Assembly's 314th plenary meeting on 1 December 1950, as resolution 413(V). It read as follows:

The General Assembly,

Recalling its responsibilities under Article 17, paragraph 3, and Article 58 of the Charter, Recalling its resolution 310(IV) declaring that the resources devoted to the economic and social work of the United Nations and the specialized agencies should be concentrated on tasks of primary importance.

Taking note of the work of the Economic and Social Council at its eleventh session in determining criteria for establishing priorities within the fields allotted to the various bodies composing and associated with the United Nations,

Recognizing that the successful carrying out of the economic and social work of the United Nations and the specialized agencies may be jeopardized by undertaking so many projects as to exceed the available technical, administrative and financial resources,

Recognizing that the extent of activity is determined by the programme decisions and by the budgetary appropriations of the United Nations and the specialized agencies,

Declaring that the resources placed at the disposal of the United Nations and the specialized agencies should be applied where they are most needed,

1. Requests each specialized agency to review its 1952 programme during 1951, using the criteria set forth in the report of the Co-ordination Committee as approved by the Economic and Social Council;

2. Requests the Economic and Social Council and the specialized agencies to indicate, when new projects are adopted, which current projects may be deferred, modified or eliminated to ensure that the economic and social work of the United Nations and the specialized agencies will be carried on most effectively;

3. Requests the Economic and Social Council:

(a) To review, during 1951, the 1952 programmes of the United Nations and the specialized agencies, using the criteria set forth in the report of the Co-ordination Committee as approved by the Economic and Social Council;

(b) To seek, in reviewing the programmes, the assistance of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions on the administrative and financial aspects of this matter;

(c) To report to the sixth session of the General Assembly on the results of these reviews;

4. Requests the Secretary-General, in co-operation with the administrative heads of the specialized agencies, to include in annex IV to the Secretary-General's budget estimates a summary schedule of the estimated costs of the projects provided for in the budgets of the United Nations and of the specialized agencies; and, further,

Having noted the steps taken and progress made by the Economic and Social Council, the Secretary-General, the Administrative Committee on Co-ordination and the specialized agencies,

5. Urges that the efforts which are being made to ensure the fullest co-ordination of the programmes and activities of the United Nations and the specialized agencies be vigorously pursued.

e. MEMBERSHIP IN SPECIALIZED AGENCIES

The representative of Israel introduced a draft resolution (A/C.2 & 3/L.25/Rev.1—A/C.5/-L.58/Rev.1), expressing the hope that those members not participating at the present time in the work of the specialized agencies might resume full participation as soon as possible. In introducing the resolution, the Israeli representative referred to the seventh report of the Administrative Committee on Co-ordination to the Council (E/1682)²³⁷ which contained a statement reaffirming the validity of the principle of universality of membership. Two oral amendments were introduced, one by the representative of Mexico and one by the representative of Lebanon. The former would have the resolution refer to "international co-operation" as an important condition for successful action, rather than "universal participation". The latter would have the resolution call on all members to participate, not merely those who had ceased to take part. The representative of Israel accepted the amendments, and the draft resolution was adopted by 36 votes to none, with 9 abstentions, at the 50th meeting of the Committees on 25 October (A/1547). The General Assembly, at its 314th plenary meeting on 1 December 1950, adopted the proposal by 49 votes to none, with 5 abstentions, as resolution 414(V). It read as follows:

The General Assembly,

Considering the principle of international co-operation as an important condition for the full success of the activities of the specialized agencies,

Noting that some of the specialized agencies do not enjoy participation of all Member States in their work, Expresses the hope that those Members not participating at the present time may find their way to assume or resume, as soon as possible, full participation in the specialized agencies.

f. TRANSFER OF FUNCTIONS OF THE INTERNATIONAL PENAL AND PENITENTIARY COMMISSION

The Committees had before them a report of the Secretary-General on the proposed integration of the functions of the International Penal and Penitentiary Commission (IPPC) within the United Nations (A/C.2 & 3/93—A/C.5/375), prepared under resolution 333 H (XI) of the Economic and Social Council.

In supporting the plan, which was subsequently adopted (see below), several representatives, including those of Denmark, the United States and the Union of South Africa, pointed out that interest in the question of the prevention of crime and the treatment of offenders was common both to the IPPC and to the Economic and Social Council and that the proposed integration would avoid duplication and concentrate the action which could be taken in that field.

The representative of Yugoslavia raised the question whether the proposed plan was in conformity with the practices of the United Nations, and suggested that it might be advisable to defer a final decision until further studies had been made. The question was also raised as to whether by the terms of the proposed transfer the IPPC was being treated in a privileged manner compared with other inter-governmental organizations. It was, however, the understanding of the Committees that arrangements proposed would be subject to review, in the light of experience, at any time by the appropriate organs of the United Nations.

Several members, among them Canada, Lebanon and Yugoslavia, asked for additional information, particularly concerning the financial implications of the plan, and the representative of Canada submitted a list of questions (A/C.2 & 3/L.26—A/C.5/L.59). In reply, the representative of the Secretary-General circulated a statement (A/C.2 & 3/L.28—A/C.5/L.65).

The draft resolution contained in the Secretary-General's report was adopted by the Committees at the 51st meeting on 4 November by 37 votes to 4, with 1 abstention (A/1547). The General Assembly, at its 314th plenary meeting, adopted the resolution as resolution 415(V) by 48 votes to 5, with 2 abstentions. It read as follows:

The General Assembly,

Noting resolutions 262 B (IX) and 333 H (XI) of the Economic and Social Council and the resolution adopted by the International Penal and Penitentiary Commission on 12 August 1950,

1. Approves the plan contained in the report prepared by the Secretary-General, in consultation with the International Penal and Penitentiary Commission, concerning the transfer of the functions of the Commission to the United Nations and which is annexed to the present resolution;

2. Notes the decision of the Commission with respect to its residual assets;

3. Expresses its appreciation to the Commission for donating its library and its archives to the United Nations on the conditions specified in the above-mentioned plan;

4. Notes that these arrangements do not involve the assumption by the United Nations of responsibility for any liabilities of the Commission;

5. Authorizes the Secretary-General of the United Nations, in consultation with the Secretary-General of the International Penal and Penitentiary Commission, to make arrangements for the transfer of the functions of the Commission and of its library and archives to the United Nations on a mutually satisfactory date prior to 31 December 1951;

6. Pays tribute to the accomplishments of the Commission, during the long period of its existence, in the field of the prevention of crime and the treatment of offenders.

ANNEX

PLAN PREPARED BY THE SECRETARY-GENERAL OF THE UNITED NATIONS IN CONSULTATION WITH THE INTERNATIONAL PENAL AND PENITENTIARY COMMISSION:

(a) All Members of the United Nations, and all existing members of the International Penal and Penitentiary Commission (IPPC) which are not Members of the United Nations, and any other States designated by the Economic and Social Council, shall be invited by the Council to appoint one or more representatives of expert qualifications or experience, professional or scientific, in the field of the prevention of crime and the treatment of offenders. The experts so appointed shall act in the first instance as individual correspondents with the United Nations Department of Social Affairs.

(b) They shall also be called upon to meet together in appropriate groups (in the composition of which ethnical, legislative and customary affinities shall be taken into account) to consider questions of particular interest to such groups, as well as those which may be submitted by the participating governments, by the Economic and Social Council, the Social Commission or by the Secretary-General of the United Nations. The experts so appointed shall constitute "United Nations consultative groups" in the field of the prevention of crime and the treatment of offenders. The groups shall meet biennially, or more often if required. The first group set up shall be composed of the present members of the IPPC. Pending the establishment of other groups, new members may be added to the first group. As other groups are set up, any members of the first group may join such groups as is most appropriate. With respect to the composition of groups to study questions of special importance to the less-developed areas it might be practicable to utilize the procedure employed for United Nations seminars under General Assembly resolution 58(I). Findings of fact and recommendations as to policy approved by the experts appointed under (a) or by the expert group meeting under (b) shall be transmitted to the Secretary-General of the United Nations for publication, for communication in appropriate cases to the policy-making bodies, or such other action as he considers necessary.

(c) The Secretary-General shall invite each group to submit names from among its members to assist the Secretary-General in selecting a small international Ad Hoc Advisory Committee of Experts. The purpose of such a committee would be to advise the Secretary-General and the Social Commission in devising and formulating programmes for study on an international basis and policies for international action in the field of the prevention of crime and the treatment of offenders and also to advise on the co-ordination of the work of the United Nations consultative groups. It is hoped that such a committee will be able to meet annually at the Headquarters of the United Nations.

(d) The United Nations shall convene every five years an international congress similar to those previously organized by the IPPC. Resolutions adopted at such international congresses shall be communicated to the Secretary-General and, if necessary, to the policy-making bodies.

(e) The expenses of attendance of the international Ad Hoc Advisory Committee of Experts at meetings convened at the Headquarters of the United Nations will be borne by the United Nations. The expenses of experts who participate in the biennial group meetings and in the quinquennial congresses will be borne by the respective governments. The United Nations will be financially responsible for furnishing the services required for the efficient organization of such meetings when held at the Headquarters or at the regional offices of the United Nations. When such meetings, on the invitation of a government, are held away from the Headquarters and the regional offices, the financial responsibility for the furnishing of similar services shall be otherwise met.

(f) The United Nations shall publish an international review which shall include the recommendations and the findings of the groups mentioned under (b) and the Committee mentioned under (c), as well as a legislative and administrative series on the prevention of crime and the treatment of offenders.

(g) The United Nations welcomes the transfer of the library of the IPPC to the Library of the United Nations in Geneva. Suitable measures will be taken to indicate that the volumes donated originated from the IPPC, by arranging for appropriate markers to be used, and the preservation of the library as an entity so far as practicable. The archives of the IPPC shall also be transferred to the archives of the United Nations and shall be available to delegations and to other interested parties.

(h) In view of the enlargement of the functions of the United Nations, and in order to maintain continuity in the work, the United Nations shall invite the services of two professional officers at present employed by the IPPC. One officer specialized in the field of the prevention of crime and the treatment of offenders shall be detached for duty at the United Nations Office at Geneva.

(i) While it is for the IPPC to decide as to the disposition of its residual assets, the United Nations would welcome a decision to transfer those assets to the United Nations. Such a decision would not, however, involve the assumption by the United Nations of responsibility for any liabilities of the IPPC. In the event of the transfer of the assets or proceeds realized, all such funds would become part of the general revenue of the United Nations unless the IPPC would prefer that they be added to the capital of the Library Endowment Fund. The resulting increase in the income of the Library Endowment Fund would make it possible for the United Nations Library to become one of the most complete and up-to-date libraries in the field of social defence. The setting aside of the residual assets of the IPPC in a special fund in the United Nations is not desirable from the point of view of United Nations policy and practice, nor is such a fund necessary to ensure the continuation within the United Nations of the objectives and purposes described in article I of the constitutional regulations of the IPPC.

(j) The transfer shall take place at such time as may be agreed upon between the Secretary-General of the IPPC and the Secretary-General of the United Nations and, in any case, before the end of 1951.

g. AGREEMENTS BETWEEN THE UNITED NATIONS AND THE SPECIALIZED AGENCIES

The Committees took note of a paragraph in the report of the Economic and Social Council (A/1345) which contained the Council's recommendation that unless the matter was raised by the General Assembly, by the Council itself, by the Secretary-General or by one of the specialized agencies, it would be unnecessary for the Council to consider further the question of a possible revision of the agreements until more experience in their working had been obtained.

h. REPORT OF THE ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL: CHAPTER IX

Following the practice of previous sessions, the Committees decided to recommend to the General Assembly that it should "take note" of Chapter IX ("Questions of Co-ordination and Relations with Specialized Agencies") of the report of the Council (A/1345), on the understanding that this action would, in due course, be incorporated with similar action by other Committees to which parts of the report had been referred, in order to form a single resolution "taking note" of the report as a whole.

The report of the Economic and Social Council, as a whole, was noted by the General Assembly on 14 December 1950, as resolution 416(V).

T. RELATIONS WITH NON-GOVERNMENTAL ORGANIZATIONS²³⁸

1. Review of Consultative Arrangements with Non-Governmental Organizations

On 16 February 1949 the Economic and Social Council requested (214 E (VIII)) the Secretary-General to prepare a report on the activities undertaken by the non-governmental organizations up to 1 June 1949 in implementation of the consultative arrangements made with them and on their work in support of the activities of the Council with special regard to those organizations which were brought into consultative relationship not later than the sixth session of the Council. The Council by the same resolution directed the Council Committee on Non-Governmental Organizations, on the basis of the report of the Secretary-General, to make recommendations to the Council taking into account "(a) the use made by organizations of the facilities provided for non-governmental organizations brought into consultative relationship; and (b) any improvements in the existing arrangements for consultation which the Committee may deem desirable".

The report of the Secretary-General (E/C.2/231, & Corr.1 & Add.1-4) included specific comments and suggestions of the non-governmental organizations on the consultative arrangements. The Committee also examined a document containing accounts of the structure, objects and activities of the non-governmental organizations in consultative status (E/C.2/224) and studied a number of papers submitted by the organizations. Representatives of fourteen organizations were heard by the Committee, which held hearings on this subject on 23 January and 8, 9 and 10 February 1950.

The Council considered the Committee's report (E/1619 & Corr.1 & 2 & Add.1 & 2) and heard the representatives of five category A organizations at the 362nd-365th plenary meetings, on 24 and 27 February 1950.

Much of the discussion in the Council centred upon the submission of items for the Council's provisional agenda and upon the limitations of length of documents to be circulated.

The NGO Committee had recommended unanimously that the right to submit items for the Council agenda be withdrawn entirely. But in submitting the Committee's report (E/1619 & Corr.1 & 2 & Add.1 & 2), the representative of the United States, who was the acting chairman, simultaneously offered a United States amendment (E/L.23) to this, retaining the right, but shifting to the NGO Committee responsibility for first screening the NGO proposals. At the same time he stated that the members of the NGO Committee believed that the agenda right had been abused for propaganda purposes, that items had been proposed to sow dissension among members rather than to promote the Council's work and that items had been offered without adequate documentation. However, the NGO's were so attached to the right that the United States now proposed its retention with regulations to prevent abuse.

The shift of NGO focus would require additional Secretariat staff facilities, which must be budgeted for, and the size of the NGO Committee, he considered, should be increased, though, he said, Committee members were equally divided on the latter point.

Further, after considering the problem resulting from the circulation of documents presenting an incorrect picture of conditions in Member States, the Committee had concluded that any remedy proposed would constitute a censorship more objectionable than the ill it sought to cure. This was one reason why the Committee proposed a statutory provision that the Secretary-General consult with NGO's before circulating their communications.

Withdrawal of the right to submit agenda items was opposed by representatives of the five non-governmental organizations heard by the Council: the American Federation of Labor (AFL), the International Co-operative Alliance (ICA), the International Federation of Christian Trade Unions (IFCTU), the World Federation of Trade Unions (WFTU) and the World Federation of United Nations Associations (WFUNA). All except the WFTU said that the United States amendment was an acceptable compromise.

Among the views expressed by the organizations were: that withdrawal of the right to submit agenda items would be a weakening of the democratic process; that this right was now known throughout the world as one of the major privileges of responsible organizations and was of great significance; that to charge all NGO's with an abuse of the privilege was unfair. It was also stated that the NGO's were not responsible for dissensions between members of the Council, and that their work with the subsidiary organs of the Council had been underestimated. The limitation proposed by the Council NGO Committee of 2,000 words on written statements by NGO's was criticized as likely to lead to inadequate documentation and discourage the submission of views. The representative of the International Federation of Christian Trade Unions criticized the proposal that both majority and minority views of the components of a group of organizations should be presented. The representative of the World Federation of Trade Unions stated that the proposed change in the right of NGO's to submit agenda items was aimed at his organization, which had initiated this right and gained it against the opposition of the United States and United Kingdom. His organization, he said, had given indispensable support to the work of the Council and had popularized it throughout the world. Its growing membership (which was now 75,000,000 plus eleven associated trade union internationals), he stated, displeased reactionary Governments, which, also, disliked having their policies unmasked at the very heart of the United Nations.

All members of the Council who took part in the discussion agreed that the consultation between NGO's and the Council was beneficial on the whole. Most felt, however, that the existing arrangements had not worked out as satisfactorily as had been hoped. The representative of Belgium believed that the fault was in the Charter which had not made the NGO's an organic part of the Council, as they were of the International Labour Organisation; the arrangement under which the rights granted to NGO's were not matched by corresponding obligations was, he stated, bound to lead to irresponsibility. Various representatives, including those of Mexico, India and Chile, considered that some abuse of the privilege of introducing agenda items did not justify its withdrawal.

Several representatives, including those of the United States, the United Kingdom, France, Canada, India and Australia, put forward the view that most of the NGO work should be on the preparatory working level, rather than directed to the Council. The representative of the United States considered that Council members could reasonably be expected to submit all the items which the Council could usefully discuss. The United Kingdom representative stated that the NGO's had neglected other channels of consultation, citing in this connexion a WFTU request to discuss before the Council the report of the Economic and Employment Commission although the organization had not been represented at the Commission's recent meetings. He proposed an amendment (E/L.24) to enable NGO's having the required special knowledge to participate fully in the NGO Committee's preparatory discussion of items for its report. The representative of Canada favoured the Agenda Committee, rather than the NGO Committee, for reviewing all questions relating to the Council's preliminary agenda. He also considered that the Secretary-General should be empowered to refer NGO items directly to the Council's functional commissions. The representative of India agreed that NGO's should deal first with the specialized agencies and the commissions; if successful with the specialized agencies, the NGO's would have no reason to appeal to the Council. He proposed an amendment (E/L.27) under which NGO's would be required to serve advance notice to commissions of their intention to propose agenda items to them, to give due attention to Secretariat comments, and to submit the items a certain time before the commission sessions. The representatives of France and Australia emphasized the value of NGO consultation at the working level.

The representative of Australia introduced an amendment (E/L.26), differentiating between national and international organizations, by which national organizations could be placed on the register only by vote of the Council or by its NGO Committee. The representative of Canada stated that it was important for the Council to know whether an agenda item was being proposed on an NGO representative's own initiative, at the behest of its executive board, or, which would be preferable, by the membership of the NGO in question.

At its 365th plenary meeting on 27 February the Council unanimously adopted draft resolution I recommended by the NGO Committee, taking note of the report of the Secretary-General (E/C231 & Corr.1 & Add.1-4) and of the NGO Committee (E/1619).

After adopting, for the most part unanimously, the amendments proposed by the United States, United Kingdom, India and Australia, the Council unanimously adopted the amended draft resolution II proposed by the Committee (E/1619) containing the draft statute on Arrangements for Consultations with Non-Governmental Organizations. It also unanimously adopted draft resolution III (E/1619/Add.1) repealing the previous arrangements, with the exception of resolution 214 C (VIII)²³⁹ on international non-governmental organizations having members in Spain.

The NGO Committee reported that it had been evenly divided as to whether to recommend that the membership of the Committee should be retained at five or whether, as had been proposed by the United States, its numbers should be increased to seven. In the Council, certain representatives, including those of France and China, considered that the Committee would be better able to fulfil its technical task with the smaller membership; others, including the representatives of Australia, Mexico and Denmark, were in favour of increasing the membership to seven in view of the more important role assigned to the Committee. An Australian oral proposal to increase the members to seven was adopted by 13 votes to 2.

The main changes made by the Council in the arrangements for consultative status under resolution 288 B (X) may be summarized as follows:

(1) Increased emphasis was placed on consultation with the commissions in order that business coming from non-governmental organizations should reach the Council only after careful preliminary consideration in a commission (or by a specialized agency) and after having been brought into proper relationship with other matters under consideration in the same field.

(2) An increased role in consultations, it was provided, should be played by the United Nations Secretariat:

(a) The Secretariat is encouraged to take the initiative in seeking advice from competent organizations;

(b) It is actively to assist the organizations to make the most effective use of the consultative arrangements. For example, consultation is to take place with the organizations before their written statements are circulated; an organization may accordingly be advised on the content of its statement and as to the body to which it could most appropriately be presented;

(c) The Secretary-General may request non-governmental organizations to prepare specific studies or papers, subject to the relevant financial regulations.

(3) The membership of the NGO Committee was increased from five to seven.²⁴⁰

(4) Changes were made regarding the submission of agenda items by NGO's:

(a) Category A organizations may, as before, propose items for the provisional agenda of the Council. These proposals are first submitted to the NGO Committee which considers the adequacy of the documentation, whether the item lends itself to early and constructive action, and the possibility that it might be more appropriately dealt with elsewhere (for example, by a commission or a specialized agency). A refusal of the Committee to request that the item be put on the provisional agenda is final.

(b) Category A organizations may also, as before, submit items for the provisional agenda of commissions. Under the new arrangements, however, the organizations before formally proposing an item are to give due consideration to any comments the Secretary-General may make, and inclusion of the item will require a two-thirds vote of the commission.

(5) Changes were also made regarding the written statements submitted by the organizations for circulation.

(a) Under the new arrangements, statements, when submitted to the Council, are limited to 2,000 words for category A organizations and 500 words for category B; both categories are, however, on an equal basis in regard to statements submitted to commissions, where the limit is 2,000 words. An organization may submit a summary of longer statements, and, under certain conditions, statements of greater length may be circulated in full. In all cases, it is provided, such statements must be relevant to the work of the body concerned and not obsolete. (Before the adoption of the revised arrangements, the statements of category A organizations were automatically circulated in full while those of category B were summarized by the Secretariat and were distributed in full only by request of a member of the Council.)

(6) Category C consultative status was abolished.

(7) A "register" was established, to be kept by the Secretary-General, of organizations not in full continuous consultative relationship (that is, in category A or B) but which might be consulted from time to time as appropriate by the Council, the commissions or the Secretariat. The register, it was provided, was to include organizations recommended by the Council or its NGO Committee: international organizations in consultative or similar status with a specialized agency, when the organization is not in category A or B; and other international organizations which apply to the Secretary-General and which, in his opinion, have a significant contribution to make to the Council or one of its subsidiary organs. The register, it was envisaged, would be primarily concerned with organizations of a more specialized character for which forms of ad hoc consultation would be more appropriate than a continuing consultative status.

The provisions previously in force for attendance of observers at sessions of the Council, its commissions and committees, and for hearings by the Council, its commissions and committees, and by the NGO Committee, were incorporated in the statute, with only minor changes. It was provided in the rules of the functional commissions that, on the recommendation of the Secretary-General, and at the request of a commission or sub-commission, organizations on the register may also be heard by that body.

The revised arrangements incorporated many other past provisions with relatively minor or no changes including:

(a) criteria for eligibility to consultative relationship;

(b) the principles governing the nature of the consultative arrangements;

(c) the definitions of categories A and B;

(d) hearings of non-governmental organizations by the NGO Committee, even on matters not on the agenda of the Council;

(e) hearings of organizations in category A by the Council on the recommendations of the NGO Committee or in connexion with an agenda item proposed by an organization and accepted by the Council;

(f) hearings of non-governmental organizations by the commissions;

(g) facilities to be offered by the Secretary-General to the organizations such as supplying them with appropriate documents.

The revised arrangements did not, however, apply to the regional economic commissions as their arrangements for consultation were to be reviewed in 1951 as part of the general review of regional economic commissions.²⁴¹ It was also decided that Council resolution 214 C (VIII) on international non-governmental organizations having members in Spain would remain in force.²⁴²

At its 365th plenary meeting on 27 February, the Council also considered a note from the Secretary-General (E/1619/Add.2) on the financial implications of putting the arrangements into effect. It was pointed out by a representative of the Secretary-General that it would be impossible at that stage to foresee whether or not the additional expenditures involved could be covered by the existing budget. The Chairman of the NGO Committee and the representative of France considered that the new arrangements should be brought into operation immediately. The Council, however, by 11 votes to 2, with 1 abstention, adopted an Australian draft resolution (E/L.28) providing that in so far as the cost could not be absorbed within the existing budget, the implementation of the revised statute on arrangements should begin on 1 January 1951.

2. Admission into the United States of Representatives of Non-Governmental Organizations with Consultative Status

At the fifth session of the General Assembly, at the 118th meeting of the Second Committee on 2 October and the 273rd meeting of the Third Committee on 28 September, the question of the attendance of the representative of the World Federation of Trade Unions (WFTU) at the Assembly's fifth session was raised.

The representatives of Poland in the Third Committee and of Czechoslovakia in the Second Committee protested against the action of the United States authorities in detaining Georges Fischer, the WFTU representative, at the Immigration and Naturalization Service Detention Station, Ellis Island, New York, and then deporting him to France, despite the fact that he had obtained an entry visa from the United States Embassy in Paris to attend the sessions of the General Assembly. These representatives and the representative of the USSR stated that this was a violation of the Headquarters Agreement, which, they stated, specified that the United States authorities would not impose any impediments to transmit to or from the Headquarters district upon any persons authorized to participate in the work of the United Nations, including representatives of non-governmental organizations with consultative status.²⁴³ In the opinion of the USSR representative, the result of United States intervention in such a question was to give a privileged position to organizations with headquarters in the United States. It was also stated that such action interfered with the work of the United Nations, since questions on the agenda of the two Committees had first been considered by the Economic and Social Council at the request of the WFTU.

The three representatives asked that the Secretary-General should be requested to approach the United States authorities with a view to the revocation of the expulsion order against the WFTU representative, and that a report should be submitted on the question.

At the 121st meeting of the Second Committee on 11 October, the Chairman reported that he had forwarded the protests of Czechoslovakia, Poland and the USSR to the Secretary-General. He read a letter from the Secretary-General, in reply, stating that the Secretariat was giving every attention to the principle involved "namely the interest which non-governmental organizations with consultative status have in meetings of the General Assembly dealing with economic and social questions". Discussions on the legal questions involved, under the relevant clauses of the Headquarters Agreement, were taking place between the Secretariat and the United States Government.

The question was further considered by the Economic and Social Council at its resumed eleventh session, at the 421st, 428th, 429th, 432nd and 435th plenary meetings on 20, 28 and 30 October and 6 and 14 November, respectively. The Council discussed the question as "to whether Article IV, Section 11 (4), of the Headquarters Agreement should be interpreted as applying to the representatives of non-governmental organizations in consultative relationship who wished to attend public meetings of the General Assembly.

It was pointed out by the Assistant Secretary-General for Economic Affairs that in the view of the United States authorities the special clause in the Headquarters Agreement relating to non-governmental organizations referred exclusively to consultations between the Council and the non-governmental organizations under Article 71 of the Charter. Concerning Mr. Fischer's attendance at the current session of the Council, he reported that, following communications between the Secretariat and the WFTU, the Secretariat had been informed on 18 October that a visa had been requested in Paris for Mr. Fischer to attend the meetings of the Council, and this information had been communicated to the United States Mission.

During the discussions in the Council, several representatives, including those of France, Poland, Mexico and Australia, expressed a desire for fuller information on the question and on the working of the Headquarters Agreement, as well as a legal opinion on the legal position. A joint draft resolution, submitted by France, Mexico and Poland (E/L.118), with slight modifications suggested orally by Denmark and accepted by the sponsors, was adopted by the Council at its 428th plenary meeting on 28 October by 15 votes to none, with 3 abstentions. The representative of China opposed the clause in the resolution asking the Secretariat to give a legal opinion on the matter.

In the resolution (340(XI)), the Council asked the Secretary-General:

- (a) To publish immediately all documents relating to this matter for the use of the Council members;
- (b) To have prepared as soon as possible and before the end of this session of the Council, a report on the implications of the legislation and administrative measures recently adopted in the United States governing the admission of aliens with respect to the application of the Headquarters Agreement concerning the admission of experts or representatives of non-governmental organizations enjoying consultative status;
- (c) To have prepared as soon as possible and before the end of this session of the Council, a legal opinion on the difficulties encountered by the representative of the WFTU in attending this session of the Council.

At the 429th meeting of the Council on 31 October 1950, the President stated that he had been informed by the United States delegation that the United States Government had decided to grant a visa to the representative of WFTU for attendance at the Council session, and had sent the necessary instructions to the United States Embassy in Paris.

In accordance with Council resolution 340 A (XI), the Secretary-General issued a communication from the WFTU (E/1862), the text of cables which had been received from that organization together with the replies (E/1863) and a memorandum (E/L.123) prepared in response to paragraphs (b) and (c) of the Council's resolution. This document concluded by stating that "The Secretary-General has accordingly continued to take the view, in negotiating with the United States the question of the interpretation of Section 11 (4) of the Headquarters Agreement, that the Council has itself determined, under the authority of the Charter, that representatives of non-governmental organizations recognized by the United Nations for the purpose of consultation are entitled to access to the United Nations Headquarters, on the initiative of the organization concerned, for consultation with the Secretariat—including attendance at General Assembly meetings dealing with matters in the economic and social fields".

During the Council's consideration of the memorandum, the United States representative said that his Government agreed on the right of representatives of non-governmental organizations to enter the United States to attend Council meetings, to consult with the Secretary-General by common agreement and to attend sessions of the General Assembly when invited by that body. He and the representative of France pointed out that the only question remaining was whether visas should be granted to representatives of non-governmental organizations so that they might attend sessions of the General Assembly without a specific invitation. Further, the United States representative said, the question of what authority was competent to issue such an invitation was under consideration. Both representatives were in favour of postponing further consideration of the question pending the current negotiations.

The USSR representative stated that the Headquarters Agreement did not specifically mention the Council or the General Assembly meetings and implied that representatives of non-governmental organizations had the right to attend any meeting at Headquarters. He urged that any further study of the question should be based on existing documents and resolutions, in particular Article 71 of the Charter and General Assembly resolution 49(I).²⁴⁴

On the proposal of the representative of India, the Council unanimously adopted resolution 340 B (XI) taking note of the Secretary-General memorandum and requesting him to submit a further report to the Council at its twelfth session on the conclusion of his negotiations with the United States Government regarding the application of the Headquarters Agreement.

3. Granting of Consultative Status

a. ORGANIZATIONS ADMITTED AT THE TENTH SESSION OF THE COUNCIL

On the basis of a report from the Council Committee on Non-Governmental Organizations (E/1643 & Corr.1) on applications for consultative relationship submitted by non-governmental organizations, the Council at its 372nd plenary meeting on 3 March 1950 unanimously decided to place in category A the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions.²⁴⁵

The Council at the same time (287(X)) decided by varying votes that the following organizations be placed in category B:

International Association of Independent Enterprises,
Trades and Crafts
International Federation of Newspaper Publishers (Proprietors) and Editors
International Society for the Welfare for Cripples
International Union for the Scientific Study of Population
Nouvelles équipes internationales
World Assembly of Youth
Anti-Slavery Society (United Kingdom)
Society of Comparative Legislation (France)

It requested the Secretary-General to place the following organizations on the register of non-governmental organizations to be established in accordance with Council resolution 288 B (X):²⁴⁶

Engineers Joint Council
International Council of Commerce Employers
International Federation of the Building Trade Employers
International Music Council
South American Petroleum Institute (pending consideration at the twelfth session of the Council of the views of the Economic Commission for Latin America)
The following four organizations, formerly in category C, were placed on the register, pending the review of the organizations in consultative status at the eleventh session of the Council:
International Federation of Secondary Teachers
Lions International—International Association of Lions Clubs
Rotary International
World Organization of the Teaching Profession

The Council noted that the following organizations would automatically be on the register, since they were in consultative status or similar relationship with one or more of the specialized agencies:

International Youth Hostel Federation
World Federation for Mental Health
World Federation of Scientific Workers
Young Christian Workers

Prior to the voting, representatives of India, United Kingdom, Chile, Belgium, France, Denmark and the United States expressed full support for the proposal to grant category A consultative status to the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions. Most of these representatives and the President also paid tribute to the valuable co-operation given by the American Federation of Labor in the past.

The Acting Chairman of the Council Committee on Non-Governmental Organizations explained, in answer to various questions, that the Committee recommended postponement of a decision on the International Federation of Free Journalists, since a larger and more comprehensive international federation of journalists was in the process of formation. It also recommended that the applications of Caritas Internationalis and the Auxilium Catholicum Internationale should be postponed in order to ascertain the exact relationship existing between the two organizations and which of the two was the more representative.

He also explained that the Committee had recommended that action be postponed on the application of the International Union of Socialist Youth since that organization seemed to be affiliated with another organization already enjoying consultative status.

The Committee had recommended that the International Music Council be placed on the register, since it would in any case be placed on the register once it had been granted consultative status by UNESCO, which might be soon.

It was further explained that certain organizations formerly in category C, which had been abolished by resolution 288 B (X), should be placed on the register pending the general review of organizations in consultative relationship to take place at the eleventh session.

The representative of Denmark considered that the World Federation for Mental Health and the World Federation of Scientific Workers should be placed in category B rather than on the register, as was recommended by the NGO Committee, and he suggested that a decision be deferred to the eleventh session. He accepted an Indian proposal that these applications be reconsidered at the twelfth session. This proposal, when put to the vote, was rejected by 4 votes in favour to 6 against, with 4 abstentions.

b. APPLICATIONS POSTPONED FOR LATER CONSIDERATION

On recommendation of the NGO Committee, the Economic and Social Council, at its 372nd plenary meeting on 3 March 1950, decided unanimously that the applications of the following organizations would be reconsidered at the twelfth session of the Council:

Arab Union
Auxilium Catholicum Internationale
Caritas Internationalis
Engineers Joint Council
Hansard Society
International Conference on Large Electric Systems

²⁴⁵ The American Federation of Labor, formerly in category A consultative status, withdrew from status as it is a member of the ICFTU.

²⁴⁶ See pp. 658-59.

International Federation of Free Journalists
 International Union of Socialist Youth
 Young Christian Workers

The Council decided that the application of the South American Petroleum Institute would also be reconsidered at its twelfth session, when the Council would have the comments of the Economic Commission for Latin America.

In accordance with resolution 288 B (X), which provided that applications for consultative status received from non-governmental organizations would be considered only at the first session of the Council each year, no further grants of consultative status were made during 1950.

4. Review of Consultative Status of Non-Governmental Organizations

a. ACTION TAKEN AT THE TENTH SESSION OF THE COUNCIL

The Women's International Democratic Federation, an organization in category B consultative status, had requested that it be placed in category A. On recommendation of the NGO Committee, the Council at its tenth session unanimously decided (287 B (X)) that it would remain in category B.

b. ACTION TAKEN AT THE ELEVENTH SESSION OF THE COUNCIL

The question of the review of non-governmental organizations in consultative status, which had been postponed from the tenth session, was considered by the Council during its eleventh session at its 395th plenary meeting on 20 July 1950. The Council considered the report of the NGO Committee (E/1697 & Add.1 & E/1775) and unanimously adopted resolution 334 A (XI). In this resolution, it decided:

(1) That the following organizations, formerly in category B, should be placed on the register of the Secretary-General:

Associated Countrywomen of the World Boy Scouts International Bureau
 Econometric Society
 International Student Service
 International Union of Producers and Distributors of Electric Power World Power Conference
 Service Civil International
 World Association of Girl Guides and Girl Scouts
 World Federation of Democratic Youth

(2) That the following organizations, formerly in category C, which had been placed on the register when category C was abolished, pending the review of the organizations in consultative status, should be placed in category B:

Lions International—International Association of Lions Clubs

Rotary International

World Organization of the Teaching Profession

(3) That the International Federation of Secondary Teachers, formerly in category C and placed on the register pending the review of organizations in consultative status, should remain on the register.

(4) That the International Association of Penal Law and the International Bureau for the Unification of Penal Law should remain in category B, but be jointly represented.

(5) That consultative status should be withdrawn from the following organizations:

International Association of Democratic Lawyers

International Organization of Journalists

5. Handbook of Non-Governmental Organizations

On 3 March 1950 the Council considered the report of the Secretary-General (E/1635) and the report of the NGO Committee (E/1644, Part I) on the question of the publication of a non-governmental organizations handbook and decided to postpone this question until the eleventh session.

The Council on 20 July 1950 at its 395th plenary meeting considered the report of the NGO Committee (E/1776) and by resolution 334 B (XI), unanimously adopted, noted that the Union of International Associations had published a Yearbook of International Organizations, which included information regarding a comprehensive number of international non-governmental organizations, and that the Union was willing to take into account in future editions the suggestions offered and information made available by the United Nations. The Council expressed the hope that the Secretary-General would offer the Union as much information and co-operation as possible. In these circumstances it decided not to consider further, at that time, the publication of a handbook by the United Nations.

6. Items Submitted by Non-Governmental Organizations in Category A

During 1950 the following items submitted by non-governmental organizations in category A were accepted by the Economic and Social Council:

Tenth Session

1. Study of the economic situation of Africa; reformulated to read: "Studies and data relating to the economic situation of Africa"—proposed by the World Federation of United Nations Associations (E/1555 & Add.1-3)

2. International reduction of working hours as a consequence of rising labour productivity (referred to the International Labour Organisation)—proposed by the American Federation of Labor (E/1564 & Corr.1)

3. Procedure for a study of world oil resources (deferred to the twelfth session)—proposed by the International Co-operative Alliance (E/1565, see also E/1366/Add.1)

4. Abolition of discriminatory measures of an economic and social character from which workers suffer on grounds of race or colour (referred to the International Labour Organisation)—proposed by the World Federation of Trade Unions (E/1563 & Corr.1 & 2 & Add.1 & 2)

Eleventh Session

None

7. Written Statements from Consultative Non-Governmental Organizations

In the period under review, 76 written statements from 28 non-governmental organizations were circulated as documents (E/C.2/263 & Add.1). The greater part of these communications were directed primarily to Commissions (in particular the Human Rights, Social, Status of Women and Transport and Communications Commissions), many were related to items on the Council's agenda, and some brought particular matters to the attention of the members of the Council.

In accordance with the recommendation of the Council Committee, the Secretary-General circulated lists (E/C.2/263 & Add.1) of the communications.

U. IMPLEMENTATION OF RECOMMENDATIONS ON ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL MATTERS

The General Assembly, by resolution 119(II) of 31 October 1947, recommended that in fulfilment of Article 64 of the Charter, the Secretary-General report annually to the Economic and Social Council (and that the latter report to the General Assembly) on steps taken by Members to give effect to the recommendations of the Council as well as to those of the Assembly on matters falling within the Council's competence.

The Economic and Social Council, at its ninth session,²⁵⁶ established an ad hoc Committee (resolution 255(IX)), whose task, as outlined by this resolution, was to meet and report to the Council at its tenth session on the replies received from Governments in this connexion and to make certain procedural recommendations. The Committee held twelve meetings from 7 to 22 December 1949, and its report (E/1585 & Add.1) was examined by the Council at its tenth session.

The Council, in resolution 283(X), decided that it would follow the procedures recommended with a slight modification (see below), and amended resolution 210(VIII) which dealt with requests for information from Members in 1950. The Council requested the Secretary-General to discharge his functions in accordance with the recommendations of the Committee, and transmitted the Committee's report, together with the records of the discussion on this subject, to the General Assembly.

The principal recommendations and considerations of the Committee are given below.

The Committee considered that the primary concern of the United Nations, in studying the implementation of recommendations on economic matters, was to improve its methods of work and the effectiveness of its decisions. A regular study of this subject should help to show the extent to which recommendations were being carried out, and might also draw attention to resolutions requiring consideration because they had proved ineffective, or had become out of date.

The fact that Governments in different stages of economic and social development encountered different problems in trying to carry out recommendations was appreciated by the Committee, which stated that the objective in making the study was not to pillory Governments which had thus far been unable fully to carry out recommendations, or to report adequately upon them, but rather to assist them in reporting and carrying out the recommendations of the United Nations.

The Committee noted that many of the replies which had been given by Governments seemed inadequate or unsatisfactory, often because the requests and recommendations were too many and not sufficiently precise. Further, some Governments found that they had not been given sufficient time, and could not spare skilled staff for preparing the replies. Furthermore, some of the resolutions of the Assembly and the Council were too vague in language to constitute guides for precise action, and others covered wide fields, making it difficult for Governments to report on their implementation. Declaratory statements, or exhortations, might have a place in the Council's work but their implementation needed different methods of study, such as detailed studies from time to time in particular fields of activity.

It was believed by the Committee that the Assembly and the Council should endeavour, so far as is consistent with the real needs of the United Nations, to reduce the number of resolutions adopted by them containing recommendations and requiring replies by Governments upon their implementation. It also felt that recommendations should be as clear and precise as possible, leaving no doubt as to exactly what action Members were expected to take. Furthermore, the Committee felt that the Secretary-General should not ask Governments for information which he received officially in other ways, or had received in response to earlier questions.

The Committee recommended that further reporting by Governments on recommendations on economic and social matters made by the Assembly or by the Council should follow a regular two-year cycle, beginning with the recommendations adopted in 1948 and 1949. Accordingly, the following time-table was recommended by the Committee:

The Secretary-General should, as at present, circulate to Governments all resolutions of the Assembly and of the Council as soon as possible after they have been adopted.

April 1950. The Secretary-General would circulate a list of recommendations involving reports on their implementation, adopted by the General Assembly and by the Economic and Social Council in 1948 and 1949, and invite Governments to state, by October 1951, what they have done to carry them out. This list would be in a form similar to E/AC.31/1, with an index.

April 1951. The Secretary-General would circulate to Governments a note reminding them that answers are expected on the foregoing by October 1951.

October 1951. Replies would be received from Governments. The Secretary-General would thereafter circulate a report to the Council.

February 1952. The Council would consider the implementation of the foregoing resolutions and conventions. The Council would also consider which resolutions adopted in 1950 and 1951 would be sent to Governments for report.

Action in subsequent years would follow a similar pattern.

The Committee recognized that some resolutions might have to be treated differently, or more quickly, but these cases should be made clear in the resolution itself. The Committee also considered that, when the Secretary-General circulated to Governments, every two years, a list of recommendations with requests for information on their implementation, he should not include the following:

- (a) Resolutions which are general statements of principle or make recommendations in such wide or general terms that they are not suitable for specific report.
- (b) Resolutions asking for information which the Secretary-General or a specialized agency has since obtained or taken steps to obtain. These would include requests for specific information, such as statistics and regular reports, and for replies to specific questions.
- (c) Resolutions which fall within the procedure of reporting to the General Assembly by some organ of the United Nations other than the Economic and Social Council (including, for this purpose, the International Children's Emergency Fund).

The report of the Committee also included, in appendix I, a list of recommendations which the Committee felt should not be included in further lists sent to Governments by the Secretary-General, because they represented general statements of principle, or were no longer relevant or in force, or because adequate information had already been obtained.

It was considered by the Committee that the Secretary-General should ask Governments to state in their replies:

- (a) whether the recommendations were put into effect by provisions contained in the Constitution, or by legislative or administrative enactment;
- (b) whether the action taken was governmental (and if so, whether central or local), or voluntary and non-governmental;
- (c) in a case in which no action has been taken, for what reasons implementation has been found unnecessary or impossible.

In regard to treaties, conventions and protocols on economic and social matters, the Committee recommended that the Secretary-General should ask Members which had not ratified or adhered to them what steps they had taken to do so.

With respect to the form of the Secretary-General's report to the Council, the Committee considered that the Secretary-General should:

- (1) circulate the full texts of replies received from Governments immediately upon receipt;
- (2) transmit to the Council a report containing: (a) a fully annotated list to serve as an index to all reports received that year, and indicating in what other context information had been supplied in addition to that appearing in the reports; (b) a factual statement regarding the extent to which Governments had not reported on the implementation of recommendations transmitted to them. The Committee further believed that the Secretary-General might, where possible and appropriate, give a fuller indication of Members' replies than that contained in document E/1325, but it stated that the Secretary-General should not have to evaluate the substance of the replies submitted to him.

The Committee also considered that a separate section of the report should be devoted to treaties, conventions and protocols, and that a separate section should contain a list of requests for specific information made during the two years under review, and should indicate those countries which had, or had not, supplied the desired material.

It was pointed out by the Committee that, if the Council decided that it was necessary to take action on any particular recommendation, it would have the following courses open to it:

- (1) to call for fuller or additional reports;
- (2) to revise or interpret a resolution adopted earlier;
- (3) to recommend the revision of a convention or protocol adopted earlier;
- (4) to place the question involved on the agenda of a subsequent session of the Council or of the General Assembly;
- (5) to refer it to a specialized agency or to a functional or regional commission;
- (6) to adopt some other means of studying the question involved, for example by referring it to an ad hoc committee or asking the Secretary-General to prepare a report.

The Committee considered that the Council should periodically select a particular field for more detailed study as to how far resolutions adopted have been carried out, and have proved adequate. The Council could, for instance, refer a recommendation to a specialized agency, a functional or regional commission, or a group of experts for study. The Council should also consider, every two years, the list of recommendations adopted, and should indicate which resolutions should not be circulated to Member Governments.

In accordance with the Committee's recommendation, the Council's report on implementation to the General Assembly will normally be part of the annual report of the Council, and not a separate report under a special General Assembly agenda item, unless particular circumstances justify it.

The Committee discussed a proposal that the Council should establish an ad hoc committee to carry out the Council's functions as outlined in the paragraph above, empowered to meet between sessions of the Council, and with terms of reference similar to those of the Ad Hoc Committee on the Implementation of Recommendations on Economic and Social Matters established by resolution 255(IX).

This item was discussed at the 346th plenary meeting of the Council on 8 February 1950. At this meeting, the representatives of Australia, Belgium and France voiced the opinion that there was no need to establish an ad hoc committee of such a nature, for its functions could be fulfilled by the Co-ordination Committee of the Council or by one of the other committees during the Council's sessions.

It was pointed out by the representative of Australia that those in favour of the creation of the proposed committee had remarked that the success of the Ad Hoc Committee's work spoke for the establishment of a committee of the same kind. They had stressed that the question of implementation of resolutions was a purely technical one; an ad hoc committee meeting between sessions of the Council would be in a better position to deal with it than the Council itself. They had also pointed out that the creation of such a committee would greatly ease the Secretariat's task.

The main argument advanced against the creation of the proposed committee, the representative of Australia further stated, was that it would add to the already considerable number of subsidiary organs of the Council, thus leading to an undue dispersal of the Council's duties. Although opposed to the formation of such a committee, the Australian delegate did not believe that it was essential to take a decision on the matter at the current session, but that it would be more advisable to await the results of the application of the procedure advocated by the Ad Hoc Committee.

The representative of China suggested that decision on the creation of the proposed ad hoc committee should be deferred to a later session of the Council. This was so decided by the Council.

The Committee drew the attention of the Council to resolution 125(II) of the General Assembly on relations with and co-ordination of specialized agencies and work programmes of the United Nations and specialized agencies, and considered that the Secretary-General should circulate this resolution again to all Governments and seek the most recent and detailed information. In an addendum to the report of the committee (E/1585/Add.2), the Secretary-General drew the attention of the Council to the fact that UNESCO had undertaken a study involving a detailed inquiry into the measures and machinery of Governments for co-ordinating national policies and international bodies. The Secretary-General wished to know whether, in view of such action by UNESCO, the Council still deemed it necessary again to circulate the text of resolution 125(II) of the General Assembly to all Member States or only to those not participating in the UNESCO study, or whether it would prefer to postpone any decision until the results of that study were available.

The Council discussed this item at its 346th and 347th plenary meetings on 8 February 1950. The representatives of Australia, Belgium, Denmark, France and India expressed the view during the discussion that resolution 125(II) should not be circulated again to Governments until the results of the UNESCO study were available. These representatives felt that UNESCO had gone somewhat beyond its field of competence in initiating the study in question, but they nevertheless appreciated the important work done by that organization.

The representative of the United States said he believed that the study in question was being carried out by experts and that the requests for information had not been formally addressed to Governments. He held the view that a study of such a nature should not deter the Council, which had the main responsibility for the implementation of the General Assembly's recommendation contained in resolution 125(II), from drawing the attention of Governments once again to that resolution and asking them for detailed and recent information.

The representative of Australia stated in concurrence that he did not think UNESCO was the competent organ to deal with the question of co-ordination as a whole, but rather that co-ordination was one of the Council's specific functions under the Charter. He therefore proposed that the Ad Hoc Committee's recommendation be adopted but that resolution 125(II) should not be circulated until April 1951, by which time the Secretary-General would have received the report from UNESCO and would be able to take it into account when framing his request for information. In addition, Governments would be able to take account of the UNESCO report in making their replies.

He further suggested that the lack of clear agreement between UNESCO and the United Nations as to fields of work revealed by the initiation of that study should not be overlooked by the Council during its debate on co-ordination between the United Nations and the specialized agencies, and that the Administrative Committee on Co-ordination should, at that time, be asked to study action to prevent overlapping and conflict in requests to Governments for information on the part of the United Nations and specialized agencies, and report to the following session of the Council.

The proposal made by the representative of Australia was adopted by the Council at its 347th plenary meeting on 8 February.

The Committee further called the attention of the Council to its resolution 203(VIII) on teaching of the purposes and principles, the structure and activities of the United Nations in the schools of Member States, and suggested that this resolution, which calls for annual reports, should be amended to require two-yearly reports, to fit in with the Council's cycle of action on implementation. Accordingly section B of resolution 283(X) amended resolution 203(VIII) to read as follows:

Recommends that Member States report every two years to the Secretary-General on the progress achieved in carrying out the above resolution.

The recommendation that the Council should consider whether it should recommend to the General Assembly an amendment of resolution 119(II) requiring the Secretary-General to report annually to the Council was made by the Committee. This matter is, therefore, brought to the attention of the General Assembly through resolution 283(X), which transmits the resolution, together with the report of the Ad Hoc Committee and the records of the discussions at the tenth session of the Council.

During the discussion at the 346th meeting of the Council on 8 February 1950, the attention of that body was also called to the fact that the Economic Commission for Asia and the Far East (ECAFE), in October 1949, had adopted a resolution requesting its secretariat to make an inquiry among the Governments of the members of the Commission to determine to what extent they had implemented the resolutions adopted by the Commission. The Council was informed by the Assistant Secretary-General for Economic Affairs that the Secretary-General had asked the Secretary of ECAFE to postpone the implementation of the Commission's resolution until it had been informed of the Council's views on the matter.

The representatives of Australia, China, India and the United States were of the opinion that all inquiries of a general nature, such as that undertaken by ECAFE, should be undertaken by the Council itself, since a regional commission could ask governments for information on specific measures only. It was pointed out by the representative of the United States that ECAFE's resolution was not clear, since it did not state whether ECAFE's secretariat should send special questionnaires to the members of the Commission or whether it should make use of the replies sent to the Secretariat at Headquarters. The representative of India held the view that it was for the Secretariat of the United Nations to ask for information relating to the implementation of recommendations, it being only logical for that body to centralize the activities of subsidiary United Nations organs in that field.

The representative of Australia felt that it was clear from Article 64 of the Charter that the Council itself should come to an understanding with Member States and specialized agencies in regard to obtaining reports on steps taken to implement recommendations of the Economic and Social Council and the General Assembly on economic and social questions.

This question of possible overlapping in the study of implementation by the Council and by the regional economic commissions was, upon the suggestion of the representative of the United States, taken up in connexion with the discussion of the report of ECAFE at the 349th plenary meeting on 13 February 1950. At this meeting the Council unanimously adopted resolution 270(X) which requested the Secretary-General to transmit to ECAFE the records of its discussion at its tenth session on implementation, and to take all possible steps to obviate unnecessary duplication in requesting information from Governments. This resolution also invited the attention of ECAFE to the arrangements which had been approved by the Council for a continuing review of the implementation of recommendations on economic and social matters.

ECAFE, in its report (E/1710) to the Council at its eleventh session, pointed out that there was general agreement that the Commission's study of implementation should be limited to those resolutions on which inquiries addressed to Governments might be expected to yield specific and useful information, and that the secretariat should act in close consultation with Headquarters.

A note by the Executive Secretary of the Commission (E/CN.11/244) called attention to the fact that the ECAFE resolution (E/CN.11/234) provided for a single report, in contrast to the continuing review contemplated by the Council in resolution 283(X). The Commission appointed an ad hoc Committee to consider the matter. That Committee scrutinized the resolutions that had been adopted by the Commission and listed them in three categories: (1) resolutions requiring an inquiry from the Governments of members and associate members; (2) resolutions on which information was required from the secretariat as to action taken; and (3) resolutions which, though containing ostensible recommendations to Members, did not warrant further inquiry.

The Committee recommended that the Executive Secretary should, as a matter of routine, report to each session of the Commission as to how far previous resolutions had been implemented. While appreciating the need for giving Governments adequate time to give information as to their implementation of resolutions, it considered, nevertheless, in view of the review to be undertaken in mid-1951 by the Council of the functions of the regional commissions, that a report on implementation should be made to the seventh session of the Commission so that a statement on the subject might be included in the next annual report to be submitted to the Council. The Commission adopted the report of the Committee, and it was, therefore, understood that the secretariat of ECAFE would make its own independent requests for information from Governments on the resolutions listed by the ad hoc Committee in category (1) for the specific purpose of the next annual report in view.

V. Questions Concerning Non-Self-Governing Territories

In accordance with General Assembly resolution 218(III) of 3 November 1948, Members responsible for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories transmitted during 1950 information under Article 73 e of the Charter¹ with respect to the following Non-Self-Governing Territories:

Australia:
Papua Belgium:
Belgian Congo
Denmark:
Greenland
France:
Comoro Archipelago	Morocco
French Equatorial Africa	New Hebrides
French Somaliland	(under Anglo-French
French West Africa	Condominium)
Madagascar	Tunisia
Netherlands:
Netherlands West Indies	Netherlands New Guinea
Surinam
New Zealand:
Cook Islands	Tokelau Islands
Niue Island
United Kingdom:
Aden Colony and	Hong Kong
Protectorate	Jamaica
Bahamas	Kenya Colony and
Barbados	Protectorate
Basutoland	Leeward Islands Colony
Bechuanaland Protectorate	Malaya, Federation of
Bermuda	Mauritius
British Guiana	New Hebrides
British Honduras	(under Anglo-French
British Solomon Islands	Condominium)
Protectorate	Nigeria
British Somaliland	North Borneo
Protectorate	Northern Rhodesia
Brunei	Nyasaland Protectorate
Cyprus	Pitcairn Island
Dominica	St. Helena
Falkland Islands and	St. Lucia
Dependencies	St. Vincent
Fiji	Sarawak
Gambia	Seychelles
Gibraltar	Sierra Leone Colony
Gilbert and Ellice	and Protectorate
Islands Colony	Singapore
Gold Coast Colony	Swaziland
and Protectorate	Trinidad and Tobago
Grenada	Uganda Protectorate
	Zanzibar Protectorate
United States:
Alaska	Hawaii
American Samoa	Puerto Rico
Guam	Virgin Islands

The Secretary-General had been asked by the Assembly to prepare full summaries and analyses of the information transmitted during 1949 and thereafter at three-year intervals, and to prepare annual supplements in the intervening years. In 1950, he accordingly prepared, on the basis of the information transmitted with respect to individual territories: (1) summaries of statistical data to supplement the full summaries published during 1949; and (2) summaries of the progress achieved under development programmes. These summaries were included in the following documents: with respect to information transmitted by Australia, A/1275 & A/1283; by Denmark, A/1272 & A/1280; by France, A/1270, A/1269/Add.2 (with reference to New Hebrides) & A/1278; by the Netherlands, A/1273 & Add.1 & A/1281; by the United States, A/1268 & A/1276; by the United Kingdom, A/1269 & Add.1-3, with corrigenda, & A/1277 & Add.1 & 2.

Since for the first time information was transmitted on Netherlands New Guinea—which had formed part of the former territories of Indonesia—as a separate Non-Self-Governing Territory, a full summary of this information was prepared (A/1273/Add.1). The Secretary-General's analyses of the information transmitted related to agricultural and economic conditions (A/1297), public health (A/1299), labour (A/1298 & Corr.1) and social welfare (A/1300).²

These summaries and analyses, in addition to numerous documents on education,³ were discussed in the Special Committee on Information Transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter, which met from 18 August to 12 September 1950, and in the Fourth Committee during its general debate on Non-Self-Governing Territories, from its 180th to 185th meetings, 16 to 22 November.

³ Ibid., Vol. III, "Special Study on Education".

Several reservations were made in the Fourth Committee concerning United Kingdom sovereignty with respect to certain territories on which it had transmitted information during 1950. The representatives of Argentina, Guatemala and Yemen made formal reservations regarding the sovereignty of their Governments over the Islas Malvinas (Falkland Islands), Belize (British Honduras) and Aden, respectively. In reply, the representative of the United Kingdom in each case formally reserved the position of his Government, which, he stated, had no doubts as to its sovereignty over the Falkland Islands, British Honduras and Aden.

A. CESSATION OF THE TRANSMISSION OF INFORMATION

The Non-Self-Governing Territories on which Members had transmitted or undertaken to transmit information under Article 73 e of the Charter were enumerated in resolution 66(I) adopted by the General Assembly on 14 December 1946. As enumerated, these territories numbered 74. Subsequently, information ceased to be transmitted with respect to a number of these territories. In compliance with a later Assembly resolution (222(III)), the administering Members concerned informed the Assembly of the constitutional changes which had led to their action.⁴ After noting the reasons given, the Assembly declared, by resolution 334(IV) of 2 December 1949, that it could express its opinion on the principles which should guide Members in determining the territories on which they were obliged to transmit information and it invited the Special Committee to examine the factors which should be taken into account in deciding whether or not a territory was non-self-governing.

In 1950, the permanent representative of the Netherlands to the United Nations informed the Secretary-General, by letter of 29 June (A/1302/Rev.1), that his Government was no longer transmitting information on Indonesia. Sovereignty over Indonesia, with the exception of Netherlands New Guinea, had been transferred on 27 December 1949 to the Republic of the United States of Indonesia, the letter explained, and, as a result, Chapter XI of the Charter had ceased to apply in this case. The letter further stated that in all probability no further reports would be submitted on the Netherlands West Indies and Surinam after 1950, since both these territories would then have acquired an autonomous status and a full measure of self-government. In that event, the Netherlands Government intended to inform the United Nations of the changes in the constitutional position and status of these territories, pursuant to resolution 222(III).

Background data on the factors relating to the application of Chapter XI of the Charter

(A/AC.35/L.8 & Corr.1) were compiled by the Secretariat to aid the Special Committee in its task under resolution 334(IV). In view of the complexity of the problem and the limited time available at the 1950 session of the Special Committee, however, the representative of Egypt proposed that the question be deferred until 1951. The Committee accepted this suggestion.

The question was again raised during the 183rd, 184th and 185th meetings of the Fourth Committee, on 20 and 22 November. The representatives of Cuba and Yugoslavia expressed regret that the Special Committee had been unable to deal with resolution 334(IV). It was suggested by the Cuban representative that, in view of the importance of the principle and practical policy involved, the matter might be discussed by the Fourth Committee itself. Commenting on the statement that the Netherlands might cease to transmit information on the Netherlands West Indies and Surinam (see above), he stated that the Committee might note the Netherlands communication in a formal resolution. Reference was also made by the representative of Yugoslavia to the earlier discontinuance of the transmission of information by the United Kingdom with respect to Malta, and by France on a number of territories, including Guadeloupe, Martinique, Guiana, New Caledonia, and certain French possessions in the Pacific. While he would like to see the number of Non-Self-Governing Territories reduced as soon as possible, he considered that only after the factors referred to in resolution 334(IV) had been defined could the United Nations determine whether an administering Power had acted correctly in ceasing to transmit information on a Non-Self-Governing Territory. The representative of the Dominican Republic believed it essential that Non-Self-Governing Territories not lose their special position and become incorporated into the Metropolitan country.

A draft resolution (A/C.4/L.115) on the development of self-government in Non-Self-Governing Territories, later introduced by the representative of India, was considered and approved (see text below) by the Fourth Committee at its 190th meeting on 29 November. The representatives of the USSR and the United Kingdom indicated that they could not support the resolution although they welcomed the admission of Indonesia to membership in the United Nations. The United Kingdom was prepared to transmit information in accordance with resolution 222(III), but could not agree to the discussion of such information by either the Special Committee or the Assembly. The USSR representative explained that he would abstain since the status of Netherlands New Guinea and its relationship to Indonesia was not clear to his delegation.

The preamble and paragraph 1 of the operative part of the draft resolution received 35 votes to none, with 5 abstentions, and the final paragraph 29 votes to none, with 13 abstentions. The Committee then approved the resolution as a whole by 30 votes to none, with 12 abstentions. The resolution (448(V)) was adopted without change at the 320th plenary meeting of the Assembly, on 12 December 1950, by 41 votes to none, with 8 abstentions. It read:

The General Assembly,

Considering that resolution 222(III) adopted by the General Assembly on 3 November 1948, while welcoming any development of self-government in Non-Self-Governing Territories, considers that it is essential that the United Nations be informed of any change in the constitutional position and status of any such Territory as a result of which the responsible government concerned thinks it unnecessary to transmit information in respect of that Territory under Article 73 e of the Charter,

Noting the communication dated 29 June 1950 from the Government of the Netherlands in which it is stated that the Netherlands will no longer present a report pursuant to Article 73 e on Indonesia with the exception of West New Guinea,

Noting that the full independence of the Republic of Indonesia has been followed by the admission of that State to membership in the United Nations,

1. Takes note with satisfaction of the communication of the Government of the Netherlands with reference to the cessation of the transmission of information on Indonesia;

2. Requests the Special Committee on Information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter to examine such information as may be transmitted in future to the Secretary-General in pursuance of General Assembly resolution 222(III), and to report thereon to the General Assembly.

B. PARTICIPATION IN THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON INFORMATION TRANSMITTED UNDER ARTICLE 73 e OF THE CHARTER⁵

On 1 and 2 December 1949, the representatives of Belgium, France and the United Kingdom in the General Assembly had expressed the reservations of their Governments with respect to resolution 332(IV) establishing the Special Committee. At the opening meeting of the Committee on 18 August 1950, the representatives of these States announced that they would nevertheless participate in its work in a spirit of conciliation and co-operation.

The Belgian Government, in a letter read by its representative to the Committee, reiterated its conviction that "the Special Committee, by reason of the powers conferred upon it and the manner in which it conducts its work, exceeds the limits of the competence conferred by the Charter on United Nations bodies", and emphasized that Belgium's participation in the Committee's work did "not imply any agreement, express or tacit, which might restrict its rights and affect its full freedom of action, whatever the circumstances". The Committee was also informed that the reservations of a constitutional nature made by the French Government remained in force. The United Kingdom representative stated that, while his Government intended to participate fully in the work of the Committee, its participation was subject to the general reservation that there was nothing in Chapter XI of the Charter to justify the claims of those Members who held that the Charter gave the United Nations the right to supervise the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories or to make Metropolitan Governments accountable to the United Nations in respect of such territories.

Commenting on these statements, the representatives of India, the Philippines and the United States observed that the position of the administering Members was fully safeguarded by the terms of Chapter XI of the Charter.

During the general discussion of the Special Committee's report in the Fourth Committee, several representatives, including those of Egypt, Haiti and Yugoslavia, expressed their gratification that Belgium, France and the United Kingdom had participated in the work of the Special Committee. Other members, in particular, Cuba, Lebanon and Syria, considered the reservations of those administering Members unfortunate and the representative of Lebanon indicated that he hoped they would soon be able to give the Special Committee their unreserved support. It was argued by the representative of Pakistan, however, that the views of the three administering Members concerning their legal rights in relation to Non-Self-Governing Territories were not in accordance with the spirit and principles of the Charter. He appealed to the administering Powers to be more generous and prepare the people of the territories for self-government.

C. VISITS TO NON-SELF-GOVERNING TERRITORIES

At the invitation of the Government of Denmark, two Secretariat officials—Dr. Victor Hoo, Assistant Secretary-General in charge of the Department of Trusteeship and Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories, and Mr. Wilfrid Benson, Director of the Division of Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories—visited Greenland, from 15 June to 8 July 1950.

The representative of Egypt in the Special Committee commended the Danish Government's action and expressed the hope that other administering Members would follow its example. During the general debate on the Special Committee's report at the 180th to 185th meetings of the Fourth Committee, from 16 to 22 November, this view was also expressed by the representatives of Cuba, the Dominican Republic, Lebanon and Pakistan. The representative of Cuba felt that a report on the visit should be published under resolution 335(IV) of 2 December 1949, which authorized the Secretary-General to periodically publish data on special aspects of the progress achieved in Non-Self-Governing Territories. The Committee was informed by the representative of the Secretary-General that the Secretariat had had no opportunity to publish any data under this resolution and might still be unable to do so in 1951 due to its work load. With respect to the Greenland report, he stated, there was some doubt as to whether it fell under the resolution.

A draft resolution (A/C.4/L.113/Rev.1) introduced by Cuba was discussed in the Committee during its 189th and 190th meetings, on 28 and 29 November. By adopting this draft, the Assembly would propose that information transmitted under Article 73 e might be supplemented by visits made to Non-Self-Governing Territories, at the invitation of the administering Member, and that reports on such visits be made available to the Assembly. It would express its gratification at the invitation extended by Denmark and call this Government's action to the attention of the other administering Members. Finally, it would request the Secretary-General to publish the report on the visit to Greenland.

The representative of Denmark explained that his Government had issued the invitation in the belief that Secretariat officials should be given an opportunity to become familiar at first hand with conditions in a territory with which their duties required them to deal, and he was convinced that the visit had produced the favourable results expected. His Government had no objections to the publication, in a suitable manner, of the report prepared by these officials. His delegation could not, however, endorse the Cuban draft resolution, primarily because the Danish Government did not want its invitation to be used as the basis of a resolution indirectly calling upon other administering Powers to issue similar invitations, which should be absolutely free and spontaneous. The purpose of such visits, the representative of Denmark emphasized, was to encourage contacts and the exchange of useful experience between United Nations officials and the officials of the countries administering Non-Self-Governing Territories, but the resulting reports should not be placed on the same footing as information transmitted by the responsible Governments.

Owing to the limited time available for discussion, the representative of Cuba withdrew his draft resolution, reserving the right to re-open the question at a later session of the Assembly. At his request, the full statement of the representative of Denmark was circulated to the Committee (A/C.4/L.127).

D. REVISION OF THE STANDARD FORM

To guide administering Members in preparing information transmitted annually under Article 73 e of the Charter, the Assembly adopted, on 3 November 1946, a Standard Form⁶ covering information of an optional nature, i.e. geography, history, people, government, and human rights, and information on social, educational and economic conditions. The revision of the Standard Form, which had been postponed by the Special Committee in 1949, was again discussed during 1950. The Secretariat had prepared a document (A/AC.35/L.4 & Add.1) containing all the changes suggested and comments made earlier, as well as detailed suggestions submitted during 1950 by the Food and Agriculture Organization, the World Health Organization and the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization, and relevant comments by the International Labour Organisation.

Because of the heavy work during the 1950 session, members of the Special Committee agreed to postpone the revision until 1951. This would be particularly convenient, it was felt, since the revised Form could be used as a guide for preparing information transmitted in 1952, on which the Secretary-General would base his next full summaries and analyses.

The representative of the United Kingdom stated that it would be inadvisable to make the Standard Form over-elaborate because it would be impossible for colonial secretariats to prepare detailed information covering a very large number of points within the time limit prescribed by the General Assembly (218(III))—i.e. six months from the close of the administrative year. While agreeing that it was not desirable to overload the Standard Form, the representative of India considered that the Special Committee must nevertheless have sufficient information at its disposal to enable it to draw conclusions as to the fundamental policy followed by the administering Members. He was aware, as the representative of the United Kingdom later observed, that there was no obligation on the part of the administering Members to adhere to the Standard Form.

The representative of the United States introduced a draft resolution (A/AC.35/L.23), proposing, inter alia, that a sub-committee be appointed to meet during 1951 to prepare a revised text for consideration by the Special Committee.

The Special Committee unanimously adopted an amendment submitted by Australia that the revision be made in time to guide administering Members in preparing information to be transmitted in 1952 and subsequent years; the United States draft referred only to 1952.

A Belgian proposal that the sub-committee's meeting be held in the week immediately preceding the meeting of the Special Committee was accepted by the United States.

The representative of India felt that the sub-committee should meet early enough to permit all the Members of the Special Committee to consider its recommendations before the Special Committee itself met and suggested an amendment to that effect. He also pointed out that the discussion of economic problems and of important items deferred at the current session indicated that the 1952 session of the Special Committee would necessarily be long. The Indian amendment was rejected by a vote of 6 in favour and 6 against.

After deciding on the membership of the sub-committee, the Special Committee unanimously adopted the United States draft resolution, as amended:

The Special Committee,

Having decided that a revision of the Standard Form should be made in time to be used as a guide for the preparation by the Administering Members of the information to be transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter in respect of 1952 and subsequent years,

Considering that such revision, while taking account of suggestions made by the Committee and various specialized agencies, should be drawn up in a manner which will facilitate the preparation of papers by the Secretary-General, based on this information, showing the broad economic, social and educational trends of development in the territories concerned,

Considering also that an undue elaboration of the Standard Form would not facilitate the purposes of the Special Committee and the General Assembly and should therefore be avoided,

1. Appoints a Sub-Committee consisting of the following six members: Brazil, France, India, the Philippines, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the United States of America, to meet in 1951 in the week immediately preceding the meeting of the Special Committee, in order to undertake the task of revision in time for the consideration of the Committee at its 1951 session; and

2. Requests the Secretary-General for this purpose to prepare a working paper for the use of the Sub-Committee, taking into account the wishes of the Committee as expressed in this resolution.

1. Information Transmitted under the Optional Category of the Standard form

By resolution 327(IV) of 2 December 1949,⁷ the General Assembly recommended that in the proposed revision of the Standard Form, information on geography, history, people and human rights should cease to be classified under the optional category of that Form. It also expressed the hope that Members which had not already done so would voluntarily transmit details on the government of Non-Self-Governing Territories.

In 1950, information under the optional category was transmitted by the Governments of Australia, Denmark, the Netherlands, New Zealand and the United States and summarized by the Secretary-General (A/1295). During the discussion of these summaries, members of the Special Committee expressed their appreciation of the action taken by the five Governments and the hope that all administering Members would find it possible to supply information under the optional category. While sharing in this expression of appreciation, the representative of the Philippines considered that, since the revision of the Standard Form had been postponed, the Committee should encourage those Members transmitting information under the optional category to submit even more detailed data and should request the other three administering Members to furnish such information for discussion by the Committee in 1951. He further suggested that information on the observance of human rights in the Non-Self-Governing Territories should be treated under the heading of social conditions instead of under the optional category with information of a political nature and that the administering Members might transmit data concerning the teaching and dissemination of information about the United Nations in Non-Self-Governing Territories.

The representative of France said that his Government was prepared to submit in 1951 the fullest possible information, in particular on the teaching of United Nations activities and on human rights. He nevertheless pointed out that the submission of political information had in the past led to unjustified attacks on the administering Members concerned. The French Administration was under no obligation to submit information on political conditions under Article 73 e and, since questions of sovereignty were involved, it no longer transmitted such information. The representative of the United Kingdom pointed out that some data invited in the optional part had been included by his Government in the remaining parts when it had considered it necessary for a proper understanding of the other information transmitted. Furthermore, additional information relating to economic, social and educational conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories under the British administration, including data on the observance of human rights and the teaching of United Nations activities, could be found in various reports to the United Nations.

The representative of Belgium stated that, as in the past, his Government would continue to consider the Standard Form as a document intended to serve it as a guide in transmitting information. The solution of the problems relative to subjects listed under the optional category, he felt, should be sought on a universal basis; this would require a study of the position of all peoples who in fact were not fully self-governing.

The representative of India considered that the distinction between the optional part of the Standard Form and the remainder was illogical and arbitrary. He urged the administering Powers which still insisted on this distinction not to deny the Committee the documentation it needed to obtain a clear and complete picture of the situation in the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

2. Information on Human Rights

During the examination of the Special Committee's report (A/1303) in the Fourth Committee, a joint draft resolution (A/C.4/L.108) was introduced by Haiti, Mexico, the Philippines and Syria; it invited the administering Powers to transmit in 1951 a summary of the extent to which the Universal Declaration of Human Rights⁸ was implemented in the respective Non-Self-Governing Territories and asked the Special Committee to include in its report to the Assembly such recommendations as it thought desirable regarding the application of the principles contained in the Declaration. There was considerable discussion of this draft, at the 186th and 187th meetings of the Fourth Committee, on 24 and 25 November.

A number of members, including Argentina, Australia, Belgium, Canada, Denmark, the Dominican Republic, the Netherlands and Norway, considered the draft resolution premature. Before adopting such a resolution, it was argued, it would be advisable to await the final drafting and adoption of the Covenant on Human Rights, which was to provide measures for implementing the aims and principles set forth in the Declaration. Moreover, the sub-committee on the Standard Form would consider in 1951 the form in which information on the application of human rights in the Non-Self-Governing Territories should be submitted. The representatives of Argentina, Australia and Canada, stressing the importance of the question, urged that consideration of the draft resolution be postponed to permit a more thorough study. A formal proposal to this effect, moved by the representative of Canada, was rejected by a roll-call vote of 24 to 14, with 4 abstentions.

The representative of the United Kingdom objected to the draft resolution. Referring to the fact that the Universal Declaration of Human Rights did not require Members of the United Nations to report to the Assembly on the extent to which they had been able to attain the objectives set forth in the Declaration, he did not see why only Members responsible for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories should be required to do so. This argument was supported by Australia, Belgium, Greece, New Zealand, Peru and the United States. The representative of the United Kingdom also considered that it was neither desirable nor proper to vest in the Special Committee the functions proposed for it in the matter. Observing that the United Kingdom had decided to participate fully in the Special Committee's work in spite of its reservations, he appealed to members of the Fourth Committee to show the same spirit of co-operation and to abstain from proposing further extensions of the Special Committee's functions every year.

All members opposing the draft resolution made it clear that their opposition was based on legal and procedural considerations, as they upheld the principle that human rights should be respected both in Non-Self-Governing Territories and independent countries. The representatives of the United Kingdom and Belgium observed that they had already undertaken to supply information with respect to territories under their administration for inclusion in the Yearbook on Human Rights, and they would abide by any further obligations incurred under the proposed Covenant on Human Rights, which, it had already been decided in the Third Committee, would make no distinction between Non-Self-Governing Territories and independent States.⁹ The representative of Belgium added that his Government would in the meantime incur no other obligations. Other administering Members, including Australia, Denmark, the Netherlands, New Zealand and the United States, pointed out that, as suggested in the optional part of the Standard Form, they were supplying data on human rights in the information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter in addition to that provided for the Yearbook on Human Rights. The representative of the United States further stated that, should the draft resolution be adopted despite the objections to it, his Government would comply with its provisions.

The representative of France spoke in favour of the draft resolution. He indicated that in the territories administered by France the fundamental principles of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the dignity of the human person were fully respected. These principles were also embodied in the French Constitution, which was applied in all these territories. His delegation therefore did not consider that the adoption of the draft resolution would mean an unjustified distinction with regard to Non-Self-Governing Territories. However, he proposed the deletion of paragraph 2 of the operative part of the draft, requesting the Special Committee to make recommendations on the application in Non-Self-Governing Territories of the principles set forth in the Declaration; this he considered a legal task more within the competence of the Third Committee. This proposal was supported by India and Peru.

Other arguments in favour of the draft resolution were advanced by its sponsors and by the representatives of Brazil, Cuba, Ecuador, Egypt, Guatemala, Haiti and the USSR, all of whom considered it realistic and timely. It was contended that the draft was a further expression of the general tendency shown by the Third Committee's decision to delete the colonial clause from the draft Covenant on human rights on the ground that no distinction should be made with respect to Non-Self-Governing Territories, a principle also recognized in article 2 of the Declaration. In view of the special Charter obligation undertaken by the administering Powers to promote to the utmost the well-being of the people of the Non-Self-Governing Territories, the supporters of the draft resolution held that an analogy between measures applied in these territories and in sovereign States was out of place. As to postponing a decision until the adoption of the Covenant on Human Rights, it was pointed out that the draft resolution sought information on the extent to which the principles of the Declaration, not the provisions of the Covenant, were applied in the territories. Due to the importance of the question, it was felt that the communication of the information requested should not be postponed until the Standard Form had been revised. In any case, it was stated, the Assembly had already approved the principle contained in the draft resolution when it adopted resolution 327(IV), recommending that, in the revised version of the Standard Form, information on human rights cease to be classified as optional. Moreover, there was no reason to fear any increase in the powers of the Special Committee, a subsidiary organ of the Assembly, as the latter would not call upon it to do anything which the Assembly itself could not do.

Drafting amendments to the preamble were proposed by the representatives of Ecuador and the USSR. After the sponsors had accepted these amendments, the draft resolution (see below) was put to the vote, at the 187th meeting of the Fourth Committee. The preamble, as amended, and operative paragraph 1 of the draft resolution were adopted by a roll-call vote of 29 to 10, with 4 abstentions. Operative paragraph 2 was also adopted, by a roll-call vote of 25 to 11, with 7 abstentions. The Committee then adopted the resolution as a whole by a roll-call vote of 26 to 10, with 7 abstentions, and included it in its report to the Assembly (A/1638).

Following the vote in the Fourth Committee, the representative of France expressed regret that paragraph 2 of the operative part had been retained. Because of this, he stated, his delegation had been forced to abstain from voting on the resolution as a whole.

The position of their Governments with respect to the implementation of the resolution were expressly reserved by the representatives of Australia and the United Kingdom, the latter because of the procedure embodied in the resolution, and the former because it would impose on the administering Powers obligations for the transmission of information on the observance of human rights which, he said, were not laid down in the Charter or in any other United Nations instrument, and which no Government represented in the Fourth Committee had assumed with respect to its own country.

The draft resolution was considered by the General Assembly at the 320th plenary meeting on 12 December 1950. It was adopted, as resolution 446(V), by a roll-call vote of 37 to 10, with 9 abstentions. The text read:

The General Assembly,

Recalling the recommendation contained in resolution 327(IV) adopted by the General Assembly on 2 December 1949,

Noting the provision contained in article 2 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights that no distinction shall be made on the basis of the political, jurisdictional or international status of the country or territory to which a person belongs, whether it be independent, Trust, Non-Self-Governing or under any other limitation of sovereignty,

Having regard to the mission which has been given by the General Assembly to the Commission on Human Rights with a view to the drafting of an International Covenant on Human Rights which will also be applicable to Non-Self-Governing Territories,

1. Invites the Members responsible for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories to include, in the information to be transmitted to the Secretary-General in 1951 under Article 73 e of the Charter, a summary of the extent to which the Universal Declaration of Human Rights is implemented in the Non-Self-Governing Territories under their administration;

2. Requests the Special Committee on Information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter to include in its report to the General Assembly at its sixth session such recommendations as it may deem desirable relating to the application in Non-Self-Governing Territories of the principles contained in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

E. EDUCATION IN NON-SELF-GOVERNING TERRITORIES

The General Assembly, by resolution 333(IV) of 2 December 1949, invited the Special Committee on Information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter to give special attention in 1950 to the problems of education in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. In four other resolutions, adopted on the same day, the Assembly dealt further with the question of education. It drew attention to the principle of equal treatment among the inhabitants of the Non-Self-Governing Territories in matters relating to education (328(IV)), invited UNESCO to undertake an over-all study of the question of the language of instruction in Non-Self-Governing Territories (329(IV)); asked UNESCO to inform administering Members of measures for suppressing illiteracy and recommended that the administering Members continue to co-operate with UNESCO with a view to the eradication of illiteracy in Non-Self-Governing Territories (330(IV)); drew attention to the importance of promoting the technical training of the peoples of the Non-Self-Governing Territories and referred, among other problems, to the question of higher education (331(IV)).¹⁰

To assist the Special Committee in its task the Secretariat prepared documents dealing with the eradication of illiteracy (A/AC.35/L.11), equal treatment in matters relating to education (A/AC.35/L.17), participation of the inhabitants in the formulation of educational policy and in the administration of education (A/AC.35/L.18), higher education (A/AC.35/L.7 & Corr.1) and teacher training (A/AC.35/L.13) and UNESCO prepared papers on the eradication of illiteracy (A/AC.35/L.16) and on the language of instruction (A/AC.35/L.15). This information was discussed in the Special Committee from its third to eleventh meetings, 21-25 August. The representatives of the administering Members provided further information on the development of education in the territories under their administration. The representatives of a number of the non-administering Members outlined the manner in which problems of education were being treated in their own countries in cases where these problems were similar to those arising in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. Apart from this interchange of experience, there was a substantial interchange of ideas on problems and objectives, in which most of the members of the Committee took part.

Educational advisers attached to the delegations of Australia, the Netherlands, the United Kingdom and the United States also took part in the discussions on education; after the conclusion of these discussions, the Committee unanimously adopted a resolution, introduced by the representative of the Philippines, expressing its appreciation of the valuable contribution to the work of the Special Committee made by these educational experts.

On 24 August, the Special Committee established an Education Sub-Committee with broad terms of reference to prepare a special report on education for the consideration of the full Committee.

The representatives of Australia, Brazil, India, the Philippines, the United Kingdom and the United States constituted the Sub-Committee, which held seven meetings, from 28 to 31 August, under the Chairmanship of the representative of the Netherlands. Its report (A/AC.35/L.21) was considered by the Special Committee at its 21st to 25th meetings, 5-7 September. The text, revised in some particulars by the Special Committee, formed the second part of its report to the Assembly (A/1303/Add.1). Comments on the various educational problems considered by the Special Committee were prefaced in its report by a statement of the Committee's general view, that:

(a) A realization of the need for education is widespread and strong. Even though there are resistances to be overcome and the content and purposes of education are not always well understood, the peoples of the Non-Self-Governing Territories require assurance that all practical steps are being taken as rapidly as possible to provide them with adequate means of education.

(b) Education in its broadest sense is a necessary basis for progress in economic, social, cultural and political knowledge and responsibility.

(c) There would be an inadequacy and even a folly in regarding general literacy or universal school attendance or any other fundamental objective of programmes of instruction as an end in itself.

(d) Nevertheless, the extension of schooling and the raising both of literacy rates and of the standard expressed by the term "literacy" are pre-requisites for the raising of general conditions in all fields.

(e) The administrative solution of the problems of education in Non-Self-Governing Territories, as elsewhere, must be solidly based on the economic resources, cultural aspirations and general conditions of the peoples.

(f) The existence of limitations imposed by reasons of finance on necessary developments in all aspects of economic and social life is recognized. Yet, it is hoped that a still wider recognition of the essential importance of education will result in devoting the maximum available resources to its furtherance.

The Committee also indicated that the separate problems of education considered were closely inter-related. It was aware that, in the final analysis, the solution of these problems was the responsibility of the administering Members.

1. Eradication of Illiteracy

The information before the Special Committee showed a wide range of literacy levels in Non-Self-Governing Territories. In some territories with a small population, there was almost complete literacy; in others, such as Alaska, Guam and some of the Caribbean territories, over 70 per cent of the population was literate; in Cyprus, Fiji, the Federation of Malaya and Singapore, Jamaica, Puerto Rico and Trinidad, literacy had increased by 10 per cent or more over the last ten or fifteen years. Nevertheless, in the majority of Non-Self-Governing Territories and in the world as a whole, literacy levels and the rates of increase had been far lower.

In considering the general problem of "literacy" or "illiteracy", however, it was recognized that the meaning of the terms and the statistics dealing with them were not adequately standardized. With respect to the information on Non-Self-Governing Territories, it was suggested in the Special Committee that a greater degree of uniformity might be possible if the total population over ten years of age were taken as the basic figure for any calculation of literacy percentage of those able to read and write.

One of the principal means for the eradication of illiteracy, in the Committee's opinion, was the extension of primary education. In many territories the number of children receiving some school education had increased substantially over the last few years, although in some instances these increases had been balanced by an increased child population. But even if primary education could rapidly become general, free and compulsory, illiteracy would not be eradicated. Experience had demonstrated that children who had had a long and regular period of schooling could relapse into illiteracy. The ability to read and write should be considered only a means by which, given the proper incentives, knowledge may be acquired and put to use.

As a means of creating those incentives, the Committee stated, two examples illustrated that it sometimes was essential to do some preliminary work before the usual school programme was introduced. In Netherlands New Guinea, an educational centre was established, which has no age-limit for the pupils and which gives particular attention to agriculture, the Malay language and indigenous arts, rather than to reading and writing. In the case of Papua, it was found necessary to train Australian teachers in local requirements and special techniques before they started to teach. Another approach in Papua was to set up an Area Education Centre where an educationist with training in social anthropology and linguistics determined the type of instruction most useful to the population, as touching on every facet of the life of the people. The Committee considered such experiments important and expressed the hope that detailed information on their progress would be supplied in the future. However, it was agreed that the development of schools, of teachers and of school instruction remained the basis for the eradication of illiteracy.

In the documents before the Committee, it was shown that some territories were considering a reduction in the primary school period in order to make elementary school teaching available to more children. UNESCO urged caution in regard to such a programme. However, it was thought that information on experiments of this nature would be of value to other countries faced with similar problems. UNESCO commented on the success of an experiment among the American Indians whereby it was found that special schools organized for children of the twelve to eighteen year age group would give quicker results than normal school instruction for young children. This, it was stated, merited further consideration. Nevertheless, account must be taken of economic and social factors: in many countries of an agricultural or pastoral character, it might be difficult for parents to spare children the time to attend school.

In a number of territories plans had been made for providing, within a set period of years, either for an elementary course for all children of certain age groups or for a substantial increase in the number of schools. The Committee hoped that information would continue to be provided on the progress of these scheduled school expansions.

The Special Committee was also informed of a number of examples of mass literacy campaigns. In some cases, the success of these campaigns had been spectacular, especially when they formed part of a wider communal social betterment project. The Committee expressed high appreciation of the purpose and value of literacy campaigns and suggested that UNESCO make available to those interested, information on particular methods of instruction, such as the global method and the project for literacy education undertaken in the United States in 1949. However, it cautioned against using these projects for adult learning as a substitute for a school programme. During the course of its discussions, the Special Committee reached the following conclusions:

(a) The eradication of illiteracy is a problem of the utmost urgency in the majority of the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

(b) UNESCO should, in order that the campaign against illiteracy may be pursued effectively, seek to define the term "literacy" and suggest a uniform method for presenting statistics of percentages of illiteracy.

(c) In order to eradicate illiteracy, facilities for primary education should be developed as rapidly as possible, so that all children of all races will receive sufficient schooling to endow them with a desire for further education and to equip them with the means of satisfying that desire.

(d) The content and methods of education—the school curricula, the character of text books and all other aids to education—should be designed to achieve the above end and be planned in the light of the cultural heritage, the economic and social circumstances, and the progressive development of the free political institutions of the peoples concerned.

(e) The greatest effort should be made to ensure that girls, as well as boys, receive the full benefit of education, and that any inequalities at present existing in the development of educational facilities should be corrected.

(f) The speedy provision of an adequate supply of suitable reading material for school children and newly literate adults is of the greatest urgency.

(g) The eradication of illiteracy should also be pursued through special schemes for the teaching of adults and, in general, it should be recognized that the education of children themselves will be hindered so long as the adult population is not fully converted to a belief in the need for and the purposes of education.

2. Language of Instruction

As requested in General Assembly resolution 329(IV), the General Conference of UNESCO held in Florence in 1950 adopted a resolution authorizing the Director-General to undertake an over-all study of the use of the language of instruction in Non-Self-Governing Territories. A meeting of experts was to be convened by UNESCO in November 1951 to study the use of vernacular or national languages and that of a second language for teaching purposes as well as the psychological and social aspects of bilingualism and multilingualism in education. The Special Committee was of the opinion that the preliminary survey on the problem prepared by UNESCO (A/AC.35/L.15) contained a number of valuable considerations. Nevertheless, it stated, the progress of the study in the international field of this important and difficult question since the adoption of General Assembly resolution 329(IV) had not enabled the Special Committee to do more than exchange preliminary observations and general ideas.

In the view of the Special Committee, the choice of the basic language of instruction in Non-Self-Governing Territories should take into account the following two considerations which, it stated, were not always compatible: (a) the necessity of ensuring that the populations of the territories shall have access to world culture and civilization; and (b) the necessity of not depriving them of their own cultural heritage. In most cases, the Committee realized, traditions had already been established and basic decisions taken. It was no longer a question of initiating a new policy, but of deciding in what manner a policy may have to be adapted to new circumstances.

In the experience of the administering Members, some difference had been noted on the extent to which early education in the indigenous language placed the student at a disadvantage if he proceeded later to studies in a language with wider currency. In some cases it was thought to be slight, while in others the disadvantages were considered substantial. It was suggested that the experts to be convened by UNESCO might be asked to give the results of their experiences on this question. It was also felt that the technical and psychological problems, on which there was much national experience, provided material for international discussion among experts. Accordingly, the Committee considered that, in general, for a full interchange of ideas and experience on the problem of the language of instruction, it should await further progress in the studies which UNESCO could undertake with the collaboration both of the Members responsible for administering Non-Self-Governing Territories and of its own Members with similar problems within their national frontiers.

Meanwhile, the Special Committee recorded its view that:

(a) The first approach to the inculcation of literacy should wherever possible be through the mother tongue.

(b) The peoples of the Non-Self-Governing Territories whose languages differ from those of the authorities responsible for their administration, should neither be deprived of their own cultural heritage nor denied access to world culture.

(c) In cases where an indigenous language is already sufficiently developed to be a vehicle of world culture, there is a strong presumption that by the use of that language at all levels of instruction the cultural heritage and the world needs of the people concerned may be satisfied.

(d) In cases where an indigenous language has local currency only, a language of wider currency should be introduced in instruction by means which will keep psychological strains to a minimum but provide the opportunity for students eventually to take their place in any educational course for which their capacities would normally qualify them.

(e) The views of the qualified leaders of the peoples should be of predominating importance in deciding particular problems relating to the use of languages in instruction.

3. Equal Treatment in Education

General Assembly resolution 328(IV) on this subject invited administering Members, in cases where for exceptional reasons separate groups of educational facilities were provided for the different communities, to transmit full data on their costs and methods of financing. The Secretariat accordingly outlined the general education organization and the financial systems in territories where different school organizations were provided for different sections of the population (A/AC.35/L.17). This situation, it was stated, existed in relatively few territories, mainly, but not only in Africa.

Representatives of the administering Members pointed out that for various reasons the figures on the per capita cost of African and European education, for example, were often misleading. Even so, some of the other representatives on the Special Committee expressed the opinion that the financial data showed that wide disparities still existed in some territories between the opportunities made available to pupils of different groups. There was, however, a strong belief that the principle of equal treatment in education had so many ramifications that its consideration could be adequate only within a picture of the whole cultural organization and the complete social context of any territory. While it recognized that the costs of educational institutions may not always give a complete picture, the Committee felt that such data provided some guide to the extent to which equality of opportunity was being promoted. It therefore considered this information of real importance and expressed the hope that it would be supplied in all necessary detail in future years. After completing its study of the question of equal treatment in education, the Special Committee made the following observations:

- (a) In the field of education no principle is more important than that of equality of opportunity for all racial, religious and cultural groups of the population.
- (b) Respect should be paid to the wishes of any group desiring to establish particular educational facilities for its members, but this should be subject to the overriding consideration that the general welfare of the whole community is not thereby prejudiced and that the practical operation of any system of differentiation does not lead to discrimination against any group.
- (c) While the programmes and organization of different types of schools may properly be designed to meet the needs of different groups of pupils, it should be accepted as a general principle that no school should exclude pupils on grounds of race, religion, or social status.
- (d) Differentiation in school facilities and programmes should not militate against the development of mutual sympathy and a feeling of common citizenship among the inhabitants of a Territory.
- (e) Where separate systems exist, each group in the community should be given a fair share of the public funds used for educational purposes.

4. Participation of the Inhabitants

Referring to the principle that the interests of the inhabitants of the Non-Self-Governing Territories are paramount, as recognized in Chapter XI of the Charter, the Special Committee adduced that this principle would be made effective in the educational field only if the inhabitants were fully associated, first, in the formulation of educational policy and, secondly, in the administration of the educational systems. The development of central educational councils, the exercise of executive or advisory authority by district or school boards, the work of parent-teacher associations, and the control of local legislative bodies over educational expenditure and programmes, in the Committee's opinion, were important factors not only in the growth of the school system, but also in the expansion of general interest in the problems of education. Certain of the administering Members felt that the participation of the inhabitants in formulating educational policy in certain territories would be premature; these Members held that this would not be practicable at the present level of education. On the other hand, it appears that in many of the Territories administered by other Members provision for such participation had been made, often in great detail.

The Special Committee considered that:

- (a) The indigenous population is directly concerned in all questions affecting education.
- (b) No educational system can be completely effective unless the people have control over educational policies.
- (c) The form of this participation is less important than its spirit and effectiveness.
- (d) While the Administering Member has a responsibility to put its experience at the service of the makers of educational policy in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, it is, in general, local representative opinion, constitutionally and regularly expressed, which should determine all decisions taken in respect of educational policies and programmes.

5. Higher Education

Because of the interdependence of education at all levels, the Special Committee considered that the vicious circle of educational inadequacies could be broken only by the development of higher educational facilities simultaneously with those for primary and secondary schools.

From the Secretariat's brief survey of higher education in Non-Self-Governing Territories (A/AC.35/L.7), the Committee observed that the older institutions of higher education in Alaska, Hawaii, Hong Kong, Morocco, Puerto Rico and Tunisia had grown both in enrolment and in the scope of the courses offered. In the Gold Coast, Nigeria, French West Africa, Uganda, Madagascar, Singapore and Jamaica, either new institutions of higher education had been established or existing institutions had reached or were approaching university standard. These institutions were designed to serve the needs of the regions in which they were situated.

Plans were being completed for the establishment of two such institutions in the Belgian Congo. In addition, in recent years, a rapidly increasing number of students from some of the Non-Self-Governing Territories had entered institutions of higher education in the metropolitan countries or in foreign countries. The Committee found these developments commendable and expressed the hope that they would continue. It considered significant the fact that a substantial number of the students seeking higher education in the metropolitan countries were self-supporting. This, the Committee felt, was indicative both of a widening desire among the peoples of the Non-Self-Governing Territories for higher education and of a lack of adequate facilities in the territories. The Committee suggested that existing institutions of higher education in Non-Self-Governing Territories should be encouraged to a greater extent to direct their attention to the development of those studies which are most basic to conditions in the territories; it cited agriculture and animal husbandry as two particularly important examples but also drew attention to other subjects, such as medicine, technology, business administration, law and journalism. It also suggested that every effort should be made to extend the provision of higher education for women and that consideration should be given to the manner in which institutions of higher education should provide services to other than residential students. In this connexion it had been pointed out in the Secretariat survey that enrolment in certain institutions was limited by the number of residential buildings available.

The Special Committee recorded its view that:

- (a) While the pressing need of education at all levels is apparent, both the principles of the Charter and the practical problems of the implementation of educational programmes make of outstanding importance the expansion of opportunities for higher education.
- (b) Consideration should be given to the provision of education programmes of an intermediate level such as the community college.
- (c) Of great significance are the expanding institutions of higher education within the Non-Self-Governing Territories, since, apart from the immediate services they can provide, it is through them that local needs and aspirations may be translated into practical and responsible citizenship.

(d) These institutions should be given every liberty to develop within their local circumstances; and while they should not be required to follow precedents suited to circumstances other than those of the Territories, care should be taken that the highest possible standards are maintained.

(e) Yet isolation would be a grievous evil; it is to be hoped that some students, especially qualified graduate students of sufficient maturity, will continue to go to metropolitan and foreign institutions.

(f) Advantage should be taken of fellowship and scholarship programmes sponsored by the United Nations and the specialized agencies, not only in order to provide practical experience to people of the Non-Self-Governing Territories but also to foster broad contacts with the modern world which the Territories will require for their progressive development.

6. Teacher Training

The information before the Special Committee showed that many teachers would have to be added in the Non-Self-Governing Territories and their professional skills substantially improved for the educational programme of the administering Members to be pursued successfully.

It was estimated under the French plan for Overseas Territories that the primary teaching staff alone would have to be increased from about 12,500 teachers in 1949 to 50,000 by 1956; and in the single United Kingdom territory of Kenya, it was estimated that the 1949 figure of 3,148 teachers would have to be increased to 8,905 by 1957. It was apparent from information before the Committee that in many cases the quality of teachers would have to be improved.

Teaching, however, was a career as well as a vocation, the Committee pointed out. As a career, teaching needed to be made more attractive. Remuneration had in some cases been improved, and in some cases it was reported that the profession attracted a sufficiency of recruits. But, in general, in the Non-Self-Governing Territories as elsewhere, the salaries of teachers were low. Every effort should be made, the Committee considered, to enhance the status of the profession. The development of teachers' associations, not only for negotiations on the service conditions of teachers but also for the discussion of general educational problems, would encourage among the whole community an informed interest in and a feeling of responsibility for educational advancement and respect for the teaching profession. Vacation and extension courses for teachers would also serve to prevent intellectual stagnation. The parent-teacher association could help to establish the teacher as an effective influence in the local community and to widen his own interests. All these methods were being used. But they should be intensified, the Committee suggested, with particular attention to the position of the regular working teacher in the field. The conclusions of the Special Committee were stated as follows:

- (a) The development of the technically skilled and socially conscious teacher is essential to the educational advancement of the Non-Self-Governing Territories.
- (b) Teacher-training institutions should be of high quality and directed by those having deep sympathy with and knowledge of indigenous life.

(c) Such training institutions should have a wider aim than the mere inculcation of routines of instructional methods; they should endeavour to produce teachers with a basic knowledge of the purpose of their teaching.

(d) Teacher-training institutions should therefore be in close and fruitful contact with the general life of the communities, with other institutions of higher education and with practising teachers.

(e) Even so, the teaching profession cannot attract candidates of the type required unless more attention is given to the needs of the profession, in terms of conditions of service and of the place given to its members in public life.

F. TRAINING IN THE ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL FIELDS

General Assembly resolution 333(IV), in inviting the Special Committee to give special attention to the problems of education in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, requested that particular attention should be given to the development of training in the economic and social fields. Accordingly, the Secretary-General placed before the Committee documents relating to the training of indigenous medical personnel (A/AC.35/L.5 & Corr.1), of social workers (A/AC.35/L.3 & Corr.1), of agricultural technicians (A/AC.35/L.6), and of labour and trade union officers (A/AC.35/L.2). An extended general debate took place on these documents.

With respect to the training of medical personnel, the representative of the World Health Organization (WHO) stated that the information before the Committee showed that, in the majority of Non-Self-Governing Territories, existing training facilities were limited and inadequate in comparison to the immensity of the need. He suggested that it might be possible to pool the resources of several territories, or of several administering Members, and promised WHO's co-operation in any co-ordinated action designed to solve this problem. He also called attention to a conclusion reached by an Expert Committee of WHO to the effect that professional and technical personnel should receive training under conditions similar to those in which they would have to work.

The representative of India felt discouraged by the assessment of available training facilities as it appeared impossible to provide, within the foreseeable future, the required number of medical personnel for the territories. He suggested that the administering Members should make greater efforts to train medical personnel, and should place more stress on preventive medicine. It was contended by the representative of France that far greater progress had been made than had been indicated and that the situation should be appraised in terms of the efforts made and the results achieved. The representative of the United Kingdom stated that the development of the medical facilities in the colonial university colleges would lead in the near future to a considerable increase in the supply of doctors. He described the measures being taken in the teaching of hygiene and in malaria control as evidence of the great concern of his Government with preventive medicine.

In any programme for the training of social workers, the representative of the United States stated, indigenous inhabitants should participate to a considerable extent in order to ensure that the conditions peculiar to the territories and to the needs of the people receive adequate attention. The representative of the United Kingdom explained that in the territories under British administration this type of work was performed largely by missions and voluntary organizations; it was a policy of his Government to encourage and assist them without encroaching on their activities. The United Kingdom was, however, training all available candidates from the indigenous inhabitants to fill senior posts in this field, and many territories now had separate departments of social welfare. In territories under French administration, social and sanitation services were often closely linked and sometimes completely merged; many of the medical institutions also trained social workers.

Without considering these and similar official and private services, the representative of France observed, the efforts of his Government could not be fully appreciated. The representative of India was pleased that the information showed that administering Members attached much importance to the training of social workers and had accepted the principle that it was better to train indigenous social workers than to wait until European candidates could be found; he expressed the hope that they would give more attention to training indigenous personnel. He suggested that consideration be given to employing war veterans in this field, indicating that his Government had found that they made valuable social workers.

The representative of the Philippines thought a certain number of United Nations fellowships should be made available to enable young people who had completed their studies to supplement their training and to acquire wider experience in social work. He indicated, however, that the administering Members should not lessen their own efforts to train social workers by reason of such fellowships.

On the question of training agricultural technicians, the representative of the Food and Agriculture Organization confirmed the conclusions set forth in the document presented by the Secretary-General (A/AC.35/L.6). He agreed that the vital role played by agriculture in the economic life of the Non-Self-Governing Territories, and the importance of agricultural education to the masses of the peoples should be stressed. To combine elementary agricultural education with general elementary education was one way to reduce the gap in knowledge and outlook between the technician and the non-technician. The test of the success of any agricultural training would be provided by evidence of a desire on the part of the trainee to return to agriculture. This could be achieved by locating and organizing training in such a way that the trainee spent part of each year in field work in contact with farmers.

The representative of the United States stated that the training of agricultural technicians was vital in the task of increasing food production. He described the agricultural extension work carried out in certain of the Non-Self-Governing Territories administered by the United States, such as the adult demonstration work, the work of the boys' and girls' clubs known as the 4-H Clubs, and school garden programmes.

The representative of India observed that there was a real shortage of staff, schools and training centres which hampered the development of agriculture in the French and United Kingdom territories and it appeared as though many of the new institutions of higher education did not sufficiently recognize the need for an expansion in agricultural training. One reason for the small number of students attracted to agriculture was the fact that government service was their only prospect, with a future financially much less rewarding than that offered in other fields.

It was pointed out by the representative of France that the shortage of staff referred to in the ten-year plan of development for the French Overseas Territories must be considered in relation to existing conditions. The plan provided for an expansion in all fields of education and would be continuously adjusted with due regard for the rapid population growth.

The representative of the Philippines suggested that FAO should study the problem of the lack of balance in agricultural production in the territories to see whether it arose from pressure exerted on the agricultural patterns by the predominant economic interests of the administering Members. He was also interested in the effects of land tenure systems on agricultural development in the territories.

The representative of the United Kingdom agreed with the principle that training should be given not only to government agricultural technicians but also to the people who lived on the land in order to preserve and stimulate their interest in agriculture. He doubted whether the influence of the ordinary village primary school could be sufficiently strong to keep the children on the land in the face of other influences drawing them away from it. The need for an expansion in agricultural training facilities was fully recognized but the fact was that there was a lack of candidates to fill vacancies in the existing agricultural training schools. It was difficult to persuade the indigenous inhabitants to remain on the land or to influence their children to take up a farming career. The migration from the land to the towns was serious even where a good land tenure system existed. Health, education, agriculture and world economics were all inter-dependent factors. As regards any lack of balance in agricultural production, while private interests in certain cases might exercise considerable influence, the Metropolitan country as such could not correctly be charged with retarding more diversified developments.

During the discussion on the subject of the training of labour and trade union officers, the representative of the International Labour Organisation stated that ILO was giving high priority to the problem of training skilled labour, foremen and supervisors in industry and agriculture. In respect of the training of labour officers, ILO attached the greatest importance to the establishment, whether in Metropolitan countries or in Non-Self-Governing Territories, of labour inspection services staffed by adequately trained personnel. The functions of those services and the standards required of their staffs had been defined by international labour conventions in 1947. He informed the Committee that the United Kingdom had ratified the convention concerning labour inspectorates in non-metropolitan territories, and Belgium, France, the Netherlands and the United Kingdom had announced that they accepted in principle the ideas underlying this and other related conventions.

The representative of the United Kingdom stated that, although there were not many official programmes for training experts in the territories administered by the United Kingdom, labour officers from those territories were in fact receiving training in the United Kingdom. The representative of India welcomed the assistance which the Trade Union Congress of the United Kingdom had given in the development of trade unions in certain of the Non-Self-Governing Territories. He drew attention to the conclusions of the 1950 Asian Regional Conference of ILO which had recommended that the fullest consideration should be given to establishing one or more regional centres for the training of labour inspectors. The Philippine representative felt that the administering Members should encourage the training of trade union officers for Non-Self-Governing Territories.

The representative of France observed that trade union and Government action were closely linked in the territories of the French Union, particularly in the field of labour inspection. The trade union movement was highly developed in those territories. He pointed out that the Governments of Belgium, France and the United Kingdom had exchanged information on labour conditions in the territories which they administered, and that two African conferences had recently been held to study questions of that kind.

The representative of Belgium referred to the fact that in the Belgian Congo the Labour Inspection Service had recently been reorganized and the staff increased on the principles laid down in the international labour conventions. The information to be transmitted with respect to 1950 would make it possible to assess the progress made.

G. ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL CONDITIONS IN NON-SELF-GOVERNING TERRITORIES

The Special Committee considered together the Secretary-General's summaries of information on the progress achieved in accordance with development programmes and his analyses of information relating to agricultural and economic conditions (A/1297), public health (A/1299), labour (A/1298 & Corr.1) and social welfare (A/1300).

The representative of FAO informed the Committee that in 1949, in order to assist and encourage Governments in planning and carrying out agricultural development programmes, a series of regional conferences had been organized, and representatives of Non-Self-Governing Territories had occasionally attended. The question of agricultural prices, he stated, was of primary importance for the agricultural production and economic position of the Non-Self-Governing Territories in relation to the world.

The representative of India cited several questions which deserved consideration and on which further information was desirable. Among these he listed land tenure and its relation to the standard of living of rural populations; the allocation of crops, since prices varied for each crop and the growers' profit depended on the choice; and agricultural debt and credit associations. He also wanted to know what benefits the people of the Non-Self-Governing Territories had derived from the participation of colonial territories in the European Recovery Programme. He was glad to note that the administering Members had taken measures to improve health conditions, water supply, and housing. He stressed the need for improvement in vital statistics, and inquired whether WHO had made any estimates of errors affecting the figures compiled. He emphasized the need for studies on malnutrition and occupational diseases. He thought that WHO might supply information on the results of studies on preventive action against blindness. He would like to see steps taken in the various territories to provide employment for seasonal workers who were regularly unemployed for prolonged periods, particularly in the agricultural areas. The speedy development of a system of rural industrial co-operatives would be useful.

It was stated by the representative of the United Kingdom that much of the information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter answered the questions raised by the representative of India. However, the Secretariat had to be selective in the information which was summarized in order to keep the papers prepared for the Committee within reasonable limits. He also referred to the measures being taken to improve working conditions, to deal with malnutrition, with occupational diseases and with blindness.

The representative of France drew attention to an example of collective ownership of agricultural land in some of the territories administered by France. Under it, companies had made agreements with the Government to furnish to a specific region all the materials necessary for the cultivation of a particular crop. The companies were responsible for transporting and exporting the crops. He thought it would be advantageous to extend the system to other parts of Africa. The French programme of development was ambitious but the present state of insecurity throughout the world affected the pace of the development programmes. With regard to preventive medicine, excellent results had been obtained in the territories under French administration; he referred in particular to French Equatorial Africa, where sleeping sickness, malaria and other diseases were being brought under control. Substantial progress had also been made in providing housing. The Committee should study more closely the information before it for the purpose of determining to what extent the administering Members were fulfilling the responsibilities which they had undertaken.

The action of the administering Members in developing integrated plans for the promotion of the welfare of the inhabitants, as evidenced by the documents before the Committee, constituted, in the view of the representative of the United States, a most impressive record. The old idea according to which each territory must pay for itself had been abandoned; the Metropolitan Powers were now contributing funds to help the peoples of the Non-Self-Governing Territories to obtain schools, scholarships, doctors, roads, aid for agriculture and industry, and many other benefits. He drew the attention of the Committee to the information relating to research work on the fisheries resources of the South Pacific.

Referring to the Asian Regional Conference of 1950, the representative of ILO stated that the Conference had invited ILO to prepare a study of unemployment and under-employment in agriculture in Asia.

The representative of WHO stated that that organization was prepared to assist any of the Non-Self-Governing Territories when requested by the responsible Members. As had been pointed out by the representative of India, it was most important to expand the application of preventive medicine in the territories. WHO was giving continuous attention to the problem of preventive treatment of blindness.

The representative of the Philippines drew attention to the problems arising out of the system of small land holdings which prevented the introduction of modern methods of agriculture, and of the practice of bringing large tracts of land under cultivation through the system of land grants to private individuals or corporations leading to a maldistribution of the land. He was also interested in information indicating the presence or absence of private financing of development plans. It was desirable that the profits of private firms should be ploughed back for the further development of the territories. In regard to labour conditions, the question whether discrimination in wages was practised against Native workers was of fundamental importance. He hoped that, despite all difficulties, social welfare services in the territories would be extended.

Economic conditions in the African territories under the administration of Belgium, France and the United Kingdom were reviewed by the representative of Brazil. He noted that, with regard to the Belgian Congo, the proposed development plan emphasized the economic aspects. He paid a tribute to the sense of duty shown by the Belgian senators in the report of the Senatorial Commission on the Belgian Congo. The broad outlines of the ten-year plan were designed to improve conditions and were proof that Belgium would spare no effort in executing its mission. He noted with great satisfaction that penal sanctions for breaches of labour contracts had been abolished in the Non-Self-Governing Territories under French administration. In the French development programmes, more than half of the total of $1,000,000,000 would be available for Tunisia and Morocco. That was a tremendous sum considering the resources of France. In the economic and social development programmes, an appreciable share of available funds had been set aside for public health, education and housing. With respect to the territories administered by the United Kingdom, he referred to the document entitled "The Colonial Territories 1949-1950", which made it clear that the central purpose of United Kingdom colonial policy was to guide the territories to responsible self-government under conditions that assured a fair standard of living. He referred to the accomplishments in public health and education, and noted that capital was being provided for roads and railroads, for power for new industries, and for the development of agriculture and mineral resources. Private enterprise, as well as the Metropolitan and the territorial Governments, were providing the necessary funds. He realized that progress could be achieved only by taking steps in the economic, social and political fields simultaneously and concluded that it was an error to subordinate the development of the Non-Self-Governing Territories to the commercial and industrial needs of the Metropolitan country and that any effort to achieve progress would encounter grave difficulties and might fail altogether unless the support of the local population were enlisted. The administering Members should prove to the indigenous people that they were working for their welfare. Reforms with respect to racial and labour discrimination, he stated, would be required to achieve this.

The representative of Belgium pointed out that some of the suggestions of the Senatorial Mission to which reference had been made had already been acted upon and that others were being considered by the Administration.

The representative of the United Kingdom emphasized that his Government was fully aware of the need for diversifying the economies of its Non-Self-Governing Territories, always having regard to climatic and other physical circumstances. He also recalled that it was the declared policy of his Government to remove any vestiges of racial discrimination.

H. DISCUSSION IN THE FOURTH COMMITTEE OF CONDITIONS IN NON-SELF-GOVERNING TERRITORIES

During the general debate which took place in the Fourth Committee, from the 280th to 285th meetings, 16-22 November, most members affirmed their support of the Special Committee's report on education (A/1303/Add.1) and the conclusions reached by that Committee. Some members, however, expressed certain reservations or made additional comments and suggestions.

In the opinion of the Byelorussian SSR, the Special Committee had adopted a purely academic attitude in its special study on education. The representative of Poland expressed his doubts that the administering Members would make the suggested improvements in educational facilities and conditions.

It was generally agreed that the specialized agencies could offer valuable assistance in the work of the Special Committee. The representatives of Cuba, India and Syria cautioned, however, that the Committee must not allow itself to be dominated by experts. The specialized agencies were primarily interested in promoting measures which would improve conditions in the world as a whole, it was pointed out, whereas the Special Committee was bound to ensure the strict application of the principle that the interests of the people of the Non-Self-Governing Territories were paramount. In conformity with its responsibility, the representative of Egypt stated, the Committee had laid down the general principles which should govern the solution of technical problems in the territories; these problems, such as the preparation of suitable textbooks and the training of teachers, should receive the urgent attention of UNESCO.

The representative of Peru considered the Special Committee's report on education acceptable on the whole, but thought it might be amended in some instances. He questioned the reliance on public opinion for the formulation of educational policy in the territories, as this might be dangerous at the present stage of social evolution. In his opinion, the Committee's recommendations on teacher-training merely repeated well-known generalities without shedding any new light on the solution of the problem. With respect to the use of indigenous languages in teaching, he felt that it was not enough to ask UNESCO experts the results of their experience. Experimental schools should be established to compare the progress made by pupils receiving their early education in indigenous languages with those being taught in the more widely used languages. He thought the best solution would be to institute a bilingual system of education.

The use of indigenous languages for teaching purposes was supported by a number of other members, including China, Egypt, Lebanon, Syria and Yugoslavia. The representative of Yugoslavia regretted that, as pointed out by the Special Committee, little progress had been made in the international study of the use of indigenous languages for instruction since the previous session of the Assembly. He suggested that the experience of European countries with many indigenous languages and dialects might be drawn from with benefit to the Non-Self-Governing Territories. The representative of Lebanon complained that in Morocco Arabic took second place. It was charged by the representative of Iraq that France neglected Arabic, the language of the entire population, in both Morocco and Tunisia. He also contended that there was inequality of opportunity between French nationals and indigenous inhabitants and that France did not ensure the observance of human rights and freedom of information.

In reply, the representative of France described the educational progress in these territories and stated that Arabic was widely used in both, being almost on the same footing as French in education. Inequality of opportunity he denied, pointing out that the wealth of the indigenous population was increasing at the same time as that of foreigners.

The representative of Haiti thought the transmission of information on the total number of school children inadequate. He thought the data on primary education should include details as to the length of school attendance and the percentage of pupils admitted to advanced classes.

The Special Committee's conclusions regarding equal treatment in education, it was stated by the representative of Cuba, should have been drafted in more specific terms since the laudable principles listed were not always observed in practice. He, as well as the representatives of China and Egypt, considered it one of the most important future functions of the Special Committee to see that the general principles were translated into law and practice in the educational policies of the administering Powers.

Commenting on the information transmitted under Article 73 e, the representatives of Czechoslovakia, Poland, the Ukrainian SSR and the USSR found this information inadequate and stated that it did not reflect the situation existing in the territories. They charged that the administering Powers, in particular France and the United Kingdom, were systematically exploiting the inhabitants and natural resources and completely disregarding the interests of the inhabitants in all fields. They alleged the existence of racial discrimination and cited, in particular, the difference in wage rates paid to indigenous and European inhabitants. The representative of the Byelorussian SSR considered that the Assembly should take effective steps to ensure progressive development in the territories and should call upon the administering Powers to comply strictly with their Charter obligations. The representative of Pakistan expressed the hope that the United Kingdom would implement its declared policy of removing any vestiges of racial discrimination in the territories under its administration.

An appeal to the administering Powers to interpret Chapter XI in a liberal and broad spirit was made by the representatives of Egypt and Syria. The peoples of the Non-Self-Governing Territories, they indicated, should not receive treatment inferior to that extended to the peoples of the Trust Territories. The representative of Syria, referring to the fact that Somaliland under Italian administration had been promised its independence after ten years, raised the question of the future of more advanced countries like Morocco and Tunisia. The representative of France replied that, although these two territories were developing rapidly, they were still at the initial stage of their evolution.

Referring to the shortage of trained personnel in the territories, the representative of Pakistan considered that greater efforts should be made to train persons from among the indigenous population. It was suggested by the representative of the Dominican Republic that the status of women, particularly the equal treatment of men and women, should be studied more thoroughly than in the past. While there was much to be desired in certain fields, he observed that encouraging improvements had been made, especially by France in connexion with social insurance and agricultural policy. The representative of Pakistan also considered that the people would be helped immensely if the measures taken by France for the collective ownership of agricultural land, for example, were continued. He praised the United States for introducing legislation to enable Puerto Rico to draft its own constitution. Signs of increased co-operation between the administering Powers and the people in some of the territories were noted by the representative of Iraq, who expressed the hope that the people would play, an ever-increasing role in the development of their countries.

I. RESOLUTION ON THE WORK OF THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Following its examination of its special report on education (A/1303/Add.1), the Special Committee considered a joint draft resolution (A/AC.35/L.22) proposed by the representatives of India, the Netherlands, the Philippines and the United States. The draft resolution provided that the Assembly take note of the Special Committee's report (A/1303), approve its special report on education and invite the Secretary-General to communicate the latter to the administering Members and to UNESCO. An Australian amendment was accepted, inviting the Assembly to approve the special report "as a brief but considered indication of the importance of educational advancement and the problems still to be faced in the Non-Self-Governing Territories", and the Committee unanimously adopted the amended text. The Special Committee later unanimously agreed that the discussion of its report by the Assembly would be facilitated if the resolution adopted were expanded to cover the general work performed by the Special Committee in 1950. It accordingly invited the Assembly, in addition to taking note of its general report and approving its special report, to approve the arrangements proposed by the Special Committee for its work in 1951.¹¹

The Special Committee's draft resolution (A/1303, Annex II) was considered by the Fourth Committee at its 186th meeting on 24 November.

The representative of the USSR observed that the proposed resolution placed emphasis on the special report on education (A/1303/Add.1), but it was on the progress actually made in education that emphasis should be placed. He therefore submitted an oral amendment in that sense. An objection to this amendment was made by the representative of Australia, who thought it would imply that the Assembly did not approve the special report. The Fourth Committee rejected the proposed amendment by 11 votes to 9, with 25 abstentions.

The addition of three paragraphs was suggested by the representative of India (A/C.4/L107). The purpose of these amendments, he stated, was to strengthen the Special Committee's position with regard to information transmitted under Article 73 e and to ensure the widest possible collaboration by the specialized agencies in the economic and social field. The suggested additions, which became paragraphs 2, 6 and 8 of the final resolution (see below), were respectively accepted by the Committee by votes of: 46 to none, with 2 abstentions; 48 to none, with no abstentions; and 45 to none, with 2 abstentions.

Another amendment, submitted jointly by Chile and Peru (A/C.4/L.114), was adopted by 43 votes to none, with 5 abstentions, and became paragraph 5 of the final text.

Paragraph 1 was adopted without vote, paragraph 3 by 41 votes to none, with 5 abstentions, paragraph 4 unanimously, and paragraph 7 by 43 votes to none, with 5 abstentions. Together, these four paragraphs formed the text of the original draft resolution as submitted by the Special Committee.

The Fourth Committee approved the amended draft resolution as a whole by 43 votes to none, with 6 abstentions. It was later adopted in the Assembly, at the 320th plenary meeting on 12 December, by 49 votes to none, with 4 abstentions, as resolution 445(V):

The General Assembly,

1. Takes note of the report of the Special Committee on Information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter on the work of its 1950 session;

2. Confirms its recognition of the importance of international collaboration in regard to economic, social and educational conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories as expressed in resolution 331(IV) adopted by the General Assembly on 2 December 1949;

3. Approves the special report on education as a brief but considered indication of the importance of educational advancement and the problems still to be faced in the Non-Self-Governing Territories;

¹¹ See pp. 697-98.

4. Invites the Secretary-General to communicate this special report to the Members of the United Nations responsible for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories and to the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization for their consideration;

5. Notes with interest the special studies carried out by the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization for the education and training of teachers, and expresses the hope that full account will be taken of such studies in the formulation of policies on this matter in the Non-Self-Governing Territories;

6. Notes the intention of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization to place before the Special Committee for its consideration at its 1951 session documents relating to the use of the indigenous or national languages for teaching purposes and the eradication of illiteracy;

7. Approves the arrangements¹² proposed by the Special Committee for its work in 1951;

8. Invites the specialized agencies concerned, with a view to the preparation of studies, based on the information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter and relevant supplemental information, in respect of economic conditions and development to be considered by the Special Committee in 1951, to collaborate with the Secretary-General in the study of problems of the prices of tropical export crops and arrangements for their marketing, migrant labour in Africa, the development of co-operative societies in peasant communities and the economic value of preventive medicine.

J. USE OF COMPARABLE STATISTICAL INFORMATION

In 1947, the General Assembly, by resolution 143(II), authorized the Secretary-General to include in his summaries and analyses, for purposes of comparison, all relevant and comparable official statistical information which was available in the statistical services of the Secretariat and which might be agreed upon between the Secretary-General and the Member concerned. The following year, the Assembly stated, in resolution 218(III), that it considered that the previous resolution required adaptation and amplification. It therefore invited the Secretary-General to extend the use of supplemental information, including all relevant and comparable information communicated to the United Nations or the specialized agencies, in order to provide a means of assessing the information transmitted under Article 73 e.

In the course of the discussions in the Special Committee in 1950, members expressed satisfaction with the documentation prepared by the Secretary-General, as well as the increased volume of information transmitted by the administering Members. The extended use of supplemental information and the improvement in the use of relevant and comparable statistical information were noted. Some members observed that the availability of comparable information enabled the Committee to approach its task of objectively and scientifically assessing the information before it. In this connexion, the Committee noted that the Dominican Republic had supplied information concerning the operations of the University of Santo Domingo in the belief that it would be useful to the Committee in its consideration of the question of education. This was regarded as a commendable response to resolution 218(III). It was hoped that other delegations would follow this constructive example.

The representative of the Philippines indicated that comparisons could be made between conditions in (1) different Non-Self-Governing Territories; (2) the Non-Self-Governing Territories and the Metropolitan country; and (3) Non-Self-Governing Territories and non-administering Member States. In his view, the peoples of the Non-Self-Governing Territories, as well as the administering Members, would benefit from the three types of comparison.

The representative of Egypt noted that although the function of the Committee was to examine information from Non-Self-Governing Territories the document prepared by the Secretariat on the training of indigenous medical personnel (A/AC.35/L.5) contained information on a number of sovereign States and some of the information cited was out of date. It had never been the intention of the General Assembly that the internal affairs of sovereign States should be discussed, he stated. Such information should not be included without the consent of the Member concerned. Accordingly, he introduced a resolution which would have invited the Secretary-General to secure, before using comparable information on sovereign States, the consent of the Member to which the information related. He later withdrew his proposal in view of the short time available for the completion of the Special Committee's work, but reserved the right to re-introduce it on another occasion. This he did in the Fourth Committee.

¹² See pp. 697-98.

The Egyptian draft resolution (A/C.4/L.110/Rev.1) was considered by the Fourth Committee from its 187th to 189th meetings, 25-28 November. After referring in its preamble to resolution 218(III), the draft resolution provided that the Assembly

Desirous of arriving at correct conclusions from the use of such information,

1. Invites the Secretary-General to secure from each Member State concerned any official statistical information which he considers necessary in so far as it relates to conditions within that State, informing it of the purpose thereof;

2. Invites the Secretary-General in making use of such information to take into account all elements necessary for scientific and objective comparison.

In introducing his draft resolution, the representative of Egypt contended that, although resolution 218(III) did not repeat the conditions laid down in resolution 143(II), those conditions were still valid. Furthermore, he thought the two resolutions put the Secretariat in an embarrassing position by exposing it to criticism, on the one hand, from certain administering Powers which wished to extend the use of information from independent countries, and, on the other, from non-administering Members which insisted that the use of such information should be strictly limited. While he was in favour of scientific and objective comparisons and recognized that information supplied by sovereign States could in some instances facilitate the study of the situation in Non-Self-Governing Territories, he believed that comparisons made under the two resolutions would lead to unsound conclusions. The statistical information available was not comparable. He cited, for example, document A/1271, which stated that in the Belgian Congo approximately one third of the population was able to read. Yet, according to document A/AC.35/L.11, the Belgian Government had explained that every child who had been baptized was considered able to read; the Secretariat itself had indicated in that document that the figures given for literacy or illiteracy were not comparable. Moreover, it was unjust to make comparisons between old and recent statistics, and, unlike the administering Powers, other Members were not compelled to promptly transmit to the Secretary-General or the specialized agencies the most recent statistics at their disposal.

The draft resolution, and the arguments advanced by the representative of Egypt were supported by Brazil, China, Cuba, Iraq, Pakistan, the Philippines and Syria.

The representative of China introduced amendments (A/C.4/L.111) to the draft resolution to add a reference to resolution 143(II) in the preamble and a statement in paragraph 2 of the operative part to make it clear that the Secretary-General, in using comparable information, was required to obtain the consent of the Member concerned.

The representative of the Secretary-General on the Fourth Committee, pointing out that neither resolution 143(II) nor 218(III) contained a reference to prior consent of the countries concerned, stated that it would be most difficult for the Secretariat to do its work if it could not use the statistical material at its disposal without prior authorization.

The representatives of Denmark, the Dominican Republic, France, India, Poland, the USSR, the United Kingdom and the United States, among others, were opposed to the draft resolution. It was considered impracticable, restrictive and retrogressive, and it was felt that it implied criticism of the work of the Secretariat, although the representative of Egypt had stated that he intended no such criticism. The representatives of Denmark, the United States and the United Kingdom held that resolution 143(II) had been superseded when the Assembly had adopted resolution 218(III). Under the terms of the latter resolution, it was stated, all Members were safeguarded against the use of extraneous material since any data used must already have been submitted by the Government concerned to the United Nations or a specialized agency. If the Secretary-General were required to communicate with Members to secure additional or up-to-date data, it could not prepare the documents necessary in time to be of any use to the Special Committee. A proposal by the representative of Denmark, that the question of the implications and practical application of resolutions 143(II) and 218(III) be referred to the Special Committee for further study was supported by the representatives of the Dominican Republic, France, India and the United Kingdom.

The representatives of Cuba, Egypt and the Philippines denied that the draft resolution was restrictive. They argued that, on the contrary, it extended the scope of the Secretary-General's functions by enabling him to request from Members any statistical information he thought necessary for the preparation of the summaries and analyses.

Following further debate, during which the Egyptian representative remarked that the Secretary-General would not have to obtain the consent of his Government before using information regarding Egypt, several delegations asked for a clearer interpretation of the draft resolution.

According to a statement then made by the representative of Egypt, the Secretary-General, under the terms of the draft resolution, could make use of the information transmitted to the United Nations or to the specialized agencies without first having to approach the Government concerned and obtaining its permission to use the information. The representative of Egypt further stated that, in a spirit of conciliation, he was willing to delete paragraph 1 of the operative part of his draft (see above). In view of this amendment, the representative of Denmark indicated that he could now support the draft resolution.

The Chinese amendments (see above) to the preamble and the operative part of the draft resolution were put to the vote and approved by 22 votes to 10, with 13 abstentions, and by 19 votes to 12, with 13 abstentions, respectively.

An amendment submitted by the representative of the Union of South Africa, to add a final paragraph to the draft resolution, was adopted by 20 votes to none, with 24 abstentions.

The amended draft resolution was adopted by the Committee by a roll-call vote of 25 to 18, with 6 abstentions. The representative of the Philippines explained that he had withdrawn his support of the resolution because of the amendments to which it had been subjected. Other representatives again stated their objections to the resolution, especially as a result of the adoption of the Chinese amendment requiring the Secretary-General in using comparable information to obtain the consent of the Member concerned.

There was no further discussion of the draft resolution in the Assembly, which considered it at the 320th plenary meeting on 12 December. The Assembly adopted the resolution (447(V)) by 32 votes to 13, with 13 abstentions, as follows:

The General Assembly,

Having regard to paragraph 6 of resolution 143(II) adopted by the General Assembly on 3 November 1947 and paragraph 3 of resolution 218(III) adopted by the General Assembly on 3 November 1948 and relating to the use of comparable statistical information,

Desirous of arriving at correct conclusions from the use of such information,

1. Invites the Secretary-General, in making use of such information, to obtain the consent of the Member State concerned and to take into account all elements necessary for scientific and objective comparison;

2. Invites the Secretary-General to bear in mind that an objective comparison can be made only if the comparable information is representative of the whole region concerned.

K. INTERNATIONAL COLLABORATION AND TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE

1. Action in the Economic and Social Council

At the 413th meeting of its eleventh session, on 15 August 1950, the Council considered General Assembly resolution 331(IV)¹³ recommending measures for closer international collaboration with regard to economic, social and educational conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories. An account of the action taken under the terms of this and other relevant Assembly resolutions (220 and 221(III), and 336(IV)) was furnished by the Secretary-General (E/1714), who also proposed a draft resolution for adoption by the Council. Amendments to this draft were introduced by the United States (E/L.85).

During the debate which followed, the representative of Canada expressed concern that only two administering Powers, the Netherlands and the United Kingdom, had availed themselves of the technical assistance facilities offered by the United Nations and the specialized agencies. He hoped that others would follow this example. These observations were supported by the Chilean delegation. Both were in favour of the Secretary-General's draft resolution and the United States amendment. A reservation concerning these proposals on the ground that they made a distinction in the economic and social field between non-self-governing and self-governing territories (see below) was voiced by the representative of France, who indicated that he would therefore have to abstain from voting. The representative of Belgium stated that he would also have to abstain since legal and political arguments had been introduced into the discussion.

Put to the vote, the United States amendment was adopted by 14 votes to none, with 1 abstention, and the amended resolution as a whole by 13 votes to none, with 2 abstentions.

By this resolution (321(XI)), the Council noted, as had been recommended by the Secretary-General, that the Non-Self-Governing Territories were eligible to receive assistance under the Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance for Economic Development established under Council resolution 222 A (IX) and drew the attention of the administering Members to the technical assistance facilities available for economic development and social welfare services. It further decided that social and economic conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories should be included wherever possible in all relevant studies undertaken under its authority. As proposed in the United States amendment, the Council also drew the attention of the Technical Assistance Board (TAB) and the Technical Assistance Committee (TAC) to General Assembly resolution 331(IV) as a guide in examining the annual programmes of the participating organizations and in the allocation of funds by TAB.

2. Action in the Special Committee on Information Transmitted under Article 73 e

In September, the Special Committee considered the Council's resolution, together with relevant documents prepared by the Secretary-General (A/AC.35/L.14 & Add.1 & 2; A/AC.35/L.19) and special reports prepared by FAO (A/AC.35/L.10), UNESCO (A/AC.35/L.12) and WHO (A/AC.35/L.9).

Members of the Committee agreed on the importance of the fullest possible collaboration of the inhabitants of the Non-Self-Governing Territories in the meetings of the specialized agencies and their participation in the fellowship and scholarship programmes of the United Nations and the specialized agencies and representatives of the administering Members indicated that the people of the territories were given much encouragement in both respects. The representative of the United Kingdom explained that, since his Government offered a large number of scholarships and fellowships for which suitably qualified persons were not always available, it had considered it inappropriate to apply for too great a proportion of the fellowships and scholarships offered by the United Nations and the specialized agencies, as this would have been to the detriment of other under-developed countries less fortunately placed. The representative of Brazil considered that, while the number had increased, a still greater proportion of fellowships and scholarships should be granted to the people of Non-Self-Governing Territories by the United Nations and the specialized agencies.

The importance of collaboration between the specialized agencies and the United Nations on the basis of a complete exchange of all relevant information and of frequent consultations was emphasized by the representative of the Philippines. In particular, it was suggested by the representative of India, information on the recommendations of the Conference of Soil Scientists of the Caribbean Area, and the plans for the world Census of Agriculture, as well as further details on fellowships and scholarships, the Press and the import of books, newspapers and other educational materials, would be of value to the Special Committee.

With respect to the Economic and Social Council resolution, the representative of India introduced a draft resolution (A/AC.35/L.24) noting the Council's action with approval and inviting the administering Members which "need technical assistance for the educational advancement of Non-Self-Governing Territories to submit their requests. Reference was also made in the draft to the Economic and Social Council's resolution (320(XI)) on higher education in Trust Territories in Africa.¹⁴

The representative of Belgium expressed doubts regarding the need for an additional resolution on technical assistance, in view of the series of resolutions on this subject adopted by various organs of the United Nations. Moreover both he and the representative of the United Kingdom thought reference to higher education in the Trust Territories inappropriate in a draft on technical assistance for Non-Self-Governing Territories. Deletion of this reference was proposed by the representative of the United States, who also suggested that the text cover technical assistance for economic and social, as well as educational advancement. Further changes, to bring the text into closer harmony with the Council's resolution, were introduced by New Zealand.

The representative of India accepted the United States and New Zealand amendments and the Special Committee adopted the amended draft resolution by 12 votes to none, with 2 abstentions (A/1303, Annex II) and submitted it to the General Assembly for consideration.

3. Action in the General Assembly

This draft resolution was discussed in the General Assembly during the 185th and 186th meetings of the Fourth Committee, on 22 and 24 November, at which time the representative of the Philippines introduced an amendment (A/C.4/L.109) to replace the Special Committee's draft. By this amendment, the Assembly would not only draw the attention of the administering Powers to the facilities available under the expanded programme of technical assistance but would also invite those needing such assistance for the advancement of territories under their administration to submit requests to that effect. In addition, the amendment recommended that the administering Powers supply information on all applications made on behalf of their respective territories and the manner in which the assistance received was integrated into the long-range territorial development programmes.

Preference for this amendment was expressed by the representative of the USSR, who found it more complete and specific than the Special Committee's draft resolution. The Special Committee's text, on the other hand, was favoured by the representatives of Australia and the United Kingdom, the former adding, however, that he had no formal objections to the Philippine amendment. The Belgian representative, stating that his delegation could not in any event accept the Philippine amendment, questioned the usefulness of inviting the administering Powers to submit their requests for technical assistance as they would surely do so without an invitation and pointed out that in resolution 336(IV) the Assembly had already asked the Secretary-General to keep the Special Committee informed regarding technical assistance accorded to Non-Self-Governing Territories by international organizations. The representative of Brazil, maintaining the position earlier taken by his delegation in the Special Committee, indicated that he would abstain from voting on either text. While it hoped that the administering Members would take full advantage of all facilities available under the technical assistance programme, his delegation still considered that the administering Powers themselves had the primary responsibility for providing such assistance to the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

After the debate, the Committee, on 24 November, approved the Philippine amendment by 30 votes to 3, with 12 abstentions, thereby automatically rejecting the Special Committee's draft resolution.

At the 320th plenary meeting on 12 December, the Assembly, without further discussion, approved the resolution as recommended by the Fourth Committee (A/1638). The text follows (444(V)).

The General Assembly,

Considering that, under the expanded programme of technical assistance for economic development of under-developed countries (resolution 222(IX) of the Economic and Social Council), the Non-Self-Governing Territories are eligible to receive technical assistance on the request of the Administering Members concerned,

Noting with appreciation that resolution 321(XI) of the Economic and Social Council draws the attention of the Administering Members to the facilities available under the expanded programme of technical assistance,

1. Invites the Administering Members which need technical assistance for the economic, social and educational advancement of their Non-Self-Governing Territories to submit their requests;

2. Recommends that the Administering Members include yearly in the statistical information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter as full a report as possible on all applications made in behalf of their respective Non-Self-Governing Territories and on the manner in which technical assistance received from the United Nations and the specialized agencies has been integrated into long-range development programmes in such Territories.

L. FUTURE WORK OF THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON INFORMATION TRANSMITTED UNDER ARTICLE 73 e OF THE CHARTER

At its twenty-second meeting, the Special Committee decided that at its 1951 session it should pay special attention to economic conditions and development in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, without prejudice to the consideration of the other two functional fields. After discussing the treatment to be given to its special study, the Committee instructed the Secretariat to prepare a list of subjects on the basis of the points made during its discussion. At its twenty-eighth meeting on 12 September, the Committee examined the resulting list. It was accompanied by an explanatory statement referring in particular to the assistance which should be sought in the prosecution of the necessary studies and the possibility that extra expenditure would be incurred.

The representatives of Brazil, France and the United States found the list satisfactory, while the representative of the United Kingdom thought it somewhat long. They were agreed that the programme of work need not call for any additional expenditure. The representative of Egypt, however, did not think the Committee should be too restrictive on this question.

It was observed by the representatives of Brazil and France that the list did not include anything on labour conditions. At the suggestion of the representative of the United States the Committee added an item on programmes for training workers in agriculture and industry; items on handicrafts and research programmes were included at the suggestion of the Philippines and Australia, respectively. The representative of the Philippines suggested that fisheries should be presumed to be included in the topics and a similar statement was made by the representative of India with respect to forestry, irrigation and hydro-electric production.

The following list was then agreed on by the Committee and recommended for approval by the Assembly:¹⁵

1. Major economic problems of Non-Self-Governing Territories: (a) economic objectives as declared by the administering Members; (b) development programmes and their progress; (c) difficulties encountered in the execution of development programmes.

2. Rural economy: (a) export and subsistence production; (b) credit facilities; (c) co-operative organization; (d) other forms of assistance for marketing, the use of equipment, the provision of seeds and fertilisers, the improvement of stock; (e) rural health and welfare; (f) general aspects of land distribution; (g) international programmes for the exchange of information, technical assistance and economic aid: (i) United Nations and the specialized agencies, (ii) regional organizations, (iii) bilateral arrangements; (h) research programmes.

3. General programmes of industrial development: (a) processing of agricultural products; (b) handicrafts and other rural industries; (c) mines; (d) manufactures.

4. Transport and communications: (a) roads; (b) railways; (c) maritime and inland waterways; (d) air.

5. Social factors in economic development: (a) relationship of health and social services to economic development; (b) general organization of public health services; (c) collaboration of the inhabitants; (d) indications given by the administering Members of improvements in standards of living resulting from economic development; (e) problems of social adjustment consequent upon economic change; (f) programmes for the training of workers in agriculture and industry.

VI. Questions Concerning the International Trusteeship System

A. CONDITIONS IN TRUST TERRITORIES IN WEST AFRICA

Annual reports submitted by the Administering Authorities on the administration of the two Cameroons and the two Togolands during 1948 were examined during the Trusteeship Council's sixth and seventh sessions.¹ The United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization presented to the Council its observations on these reports (T/439); these were considered by the Council in connexion with its examination of educational conditions in the Territories.

A total of 331 petitions concerning these Territories, 254 of them received by the Visiting Mission, were examined by the Council in 1950.² The Council's ad hoc Committee on Petitions in its fourth and fifth reports (T/L.101 & 103) drew attention to the fact that the Mission, presumably for lack of time, had been unable to make a study of these petitions. It considered that its own task and the Council's would have been easier if the Mission had found it possible to comment specifically on the communications received, and it felt that the Council should bear this in mind in drafting the terms of reference of future Visiting Missions. With regard to petitions raising general questions, the Council informed the petitioners that the questions raised in their petitions had already been and would continue to be examined in connexion with the examination of the annual reports of the Administering Authority, and, in cases where a specific related recommendation had already been adopted by the Council, the Council drew it to the attention of the petitioner.

The Visiting Mission to Trust Territories in West Africa, the second regular Visiting Mission sent out by the Council, was composed of Awni Khalidy (Iraq) as Chairman, Alfred Claeys-Bouúaert (Belgium), Benjamin Gerig (United States) and Antonio Ramos Pedrueza (Mexico). Accompanied by six members of the Secretariat, the Mission left New York on 28 October 1949, arriving in West Africa on 31 October. It visited the Cameroons under British administration from 1 to 11 November and from 22 to 24 November; the Cameroons under French administration from 12 to 21 and 25 to 26 November; Lagos, Nigeria, the seat of government of the Cameroons under British administration, from 27 to 29 November; Togoland under French administration from 30 November to 8 December; Togoland under British administration from 9 to 16 December; and Accra, Gold Coast, the seat of government of the latter Trust Territory, on 17 and 18 December. Leaving Accra on 19 December, the Mission proceeded to Geneva, where it prepared its reports to the Council. On 6, 8 and 10 February 1950, the Mission unanimously adopted five separate reports: on the Cameroons under British administration (T/461), the Cameroons under French administration (T/462), Togoland under British administration (T/465), Togoland under French administration (T/464), and a special report on the Ewe problem, relating to both Togolands (T/463). Everywhere it went in the four Trust Territories, the Mission found the extent of freedom of speech worthy of commendation. Whether in public meetings or private interviews, it reported, people expressed themselves with the utmost freedom, many times in the presence of members of the Administration concerned.

The United Kingdom, in submitting to the Council its observations on the Mission's reports on the Cameroons (T/522) and Togoland (T/638 & Corr.1) under its administration, praised the Mission for its balanced and objective survey of the conditions in these Territories and of the steps being taken by the United Kingdom to further the development of the Territories. The Council also had before it the observations of the French Government with respect to Togoland under French administration (T/673).

By resolution 298(VII), adopted without objection on 20 July 1950, the Council took note of the reports of the Mission and the observations of the Administering Authorities. The Council stated that it had taken these reports and observations into account in formulating its own conclusions and recommendations on the annual reports and petitions relating to the four Territories, and that it would continue to take them into account in the future when it considered matters relating to these Territories. It expressed its appreciation of the work accomplished by the Mission, and invited the Administering Authorities to give the most careful consideration to the Mission's conclusions and the related comments made by members of the Council. On the same day, the Council decided (299(VII)) that the Mission's reports, together with the observations submitted by the Administering Authorities and the action taken by the Council, should be printed in a single volume in each of the working languages.³

A brief description of the situation in each Territory,⁴ the observations of the Visiting Mission, the conclusions and recommendations of the Council with respect to petitions and the annual reports of the Administering Authority, as well as its special study of the administrative arrangements affecting the Cameroons and Togoland under British administration, are summarized below in connexion with the individual Territories. The Ewe problem is dealt with separately, following the sections on the two Togoland Territories.

1. Cameroons, Administered by the United Kingdom⁵

This Territory, which covers an area of 34,081 square miles, had an estimated indigenous population of about 1,027,100 according to the Administering Authority's annual report.⁶

a. ADMINISTRATIVE ARRANGEMENTS

This Territory is administered as an integral part of the neighbouring British Protectorate of Nigeria. The Governor of Nigeria is responsible for the administration of the Territory; the seat of government is at Lagos, Nigeria. The Territory shares with Nigeria a common legislative, judicial, customs and budgetary system.

Within this framework, the Cameroons is divided for administrative purposes into four parts. In the south, the Cameroons and Bamenda Provinces, which were placed early in 1949 under the administrative control of a Commissioner who is to direct their joint development, form part of the Eastern Provinces of Nigeria. The other units of the Cameroons form part of the Northern Provinces of Nigeria: the small Tigon-Ndoro-Kentu area, administered as part of a division of Benue Province; two areas further north and physically divided by Nigerian territory, administered as part of the Adamawa Division of Adamawa Province; finally the Dikwa Emirate, forming a division of the Bornu Province.

No indigenous inhabitant of the Cameroons, the Administering Authority's annual report indicated, served on either the Executive or Legislative Council, but the Cameroons was represented on two regional councils, which exercise financial and deliberative functions.

A full review of the Constitution of Nigeria to be undertaken in 1950 was recommended by the Governor in August 1948. A Select Committee, established in 1949 to investigate how best the Constitution might be adjusted, recommended a comprehensive procedure by which the deliberations and recommendations of the people at every level from the village upwards would be taken into full consideration.

The effect on the Territory of its administrative integration with Nigeria was examined by the Visiting Mission, which reported its findings to the Council (T/465). It had been pointed out by the Administering Authority (T/AC.14/24), the Mission recalled, that the people of the Territory possessed no ethnic, social or political homogeneity, but were more closely related ethnically to the inhabitants of adjoining parts of Nigeria and of the Cameroons under French administration. The differences between the component parts of the Trust Territory and the geography of the Territory made it virtually impossible, the Administering Authority stated, to administer it as a single homogeneous unit; furthermore, separate administrative, judicial and technical departments would have imposed an unjustifiable burden on the limited resources of the Territory. On the other hand, petitions about the effects of the present form of integration were received by the Mission from the Cameroons National Federation (T/Pet.4/16-5/7), the Cameroons Federal Union (T/Pet.4/61-5/66), Mr. F. T. Tambe (T/Pet.-4/41), the Douala Branch of the Bakweri Land Committee (T/Pet.4/59) and Mr. F. E. Burnley (T/Pet.4/11-5/5). The development of the Territory had been hindered, it was claimed, by its administration as a number of integral portions of Nigeria. The petitions contained requests for the unification of the Cameroons as a region within the framework of the Nigerian Constitution, direct representation in the Legislative Council, and a separate territorial budget.

While leaving to the Council the problem of evaluating the principles of the administrative association, the Mission found that the sharp differences between the north and south of the Territory and the affinities between the north and the Northern Provinces of Nigeria did not support the argument of a total separation from Nigeria; it considered that the north might be more smoothly administered under the present arrangement than in conjunction with the south. The economic and financial aspects of the question were of somewhat different character, the Mission felt. It observed that the integration of the economy and finances of the Cameroons with those of Nigeria should have no disadvantageous effect on the Trust Territory. The Mission found no reason to think that the absence of a separate budget for the Cameroons was in itself a hindrance to the economic development of the Territory, but it observed that evaluation of the situation was difficult since the figures and statistics in the Nigerian budget could not be adequately separated to give full knowledge of the extent of expenditure on development within the Trust Territory. The Mission believed that the present administrative integration with Nigeria had reached its maximum and was being modified in the opposite direction to some extent through the proposed constitutional reforms and by recent administrative changes, such as the appointment of a Commissioner for the two Southern Provinces. In its opinion, however, the way should be left open, irrespective of the constitutional reforms being formulated in Nigeria, for a careful and separate examination by the people of the Cameroons and the Administering Authority of the practicability of establishing some administrative, legislative and budgetary autonomy in the Territory.

The observations of the Mission were welcomed by the Administering Authority (T/522) which supplied the Council with additional comments on the reasons for integration and gave the steps taken to preserve the political identity of the southern Cameroons. The Administering Authority also explained the present status of the review of the Constitution, stating that the stage of public discussion had been completed, with the adoption of recommendations by a general conference, at which the Cameroons had been represented. These recommendations, as they affected the Cameroons, proposed increased representation of the northern and southern sections of the Territory in the Regional Legislative Councils and in addition, representation of the Cameroons and Bamenda Provinces of the southern section in other Councils as follows: one unofficial member of the Central Executive Council, at least one unofficial member of the proposed Eastern Regional Executive Council, and, from each Division, at least one unofficial member of the Central Legislative Council.

The Council, in its report on the Territory, indicated satisfaction at the appointment of a Commissioner for the Cameroons and noted an assurance by the Administering Authority that further efforts were being made to provide the Council with separate and more precise data and statistics concerning the Territory. The Council postponed its consideration of the question of the administrative integration with Nigeria, since this question was still being reviewed by its Committee on Administrative Unions. It recommended, however, that the Administering Authority give due attention, when adopting proposals for constitutional reform, to representation of the Cameroons on the various Legislative and Executive Councils concerned with the government of the Territory. By resolution 168(VI) of 3 April 1950, the Council decided to draw this recommendation to the attention of the five petitioners referred to above.

On the same date, the Council took similar action (137(VI)) with respect to a petition from the Dikwa Literary Society (T/Pet.4/20), which requested that the Dikwa Division have its own representative in the Nigerian Northern Regional House of Assembly and in the Central Legislative Council. The Council noted at the same time a statement by the special representative of the Administering Authority that the proposed constitutional reforms met the wishes of the Dikwa people for representation in the Regional House of Assembly and that their representation in the Central Legislature was under consideration.

Observations concerning the various aspects of the problem of the administrative relationship between the Cameroons and Nigeria were later made by the Committee on Administrative Unions (T/L.96). This Committee noted that since 1922, when the Territory was placed under League of Nations Mandate, it had been administered as part of the adjacent territory of Nigeria and that the Permanent Mandates Commission had stated that the "measure of administrative incorporation adopted . . . might be the best calculated to ensure good administration and consequently the well-being of the population". The Committee further noted that the administrative integration, constitutionally deriving from the Nigeria (Protectorate and Cameroons) Order in Council, 1946, (T/AC.14/4) represented a complete amalgamation and had the character of a political union.

In its observations and conclusions with respect to General Assembly resolution 326(IV) on administrative unions, the Committee stated its opinion that the part of this resolution relating to the establishment of separate judicial and legislative systems with headquarters in the Trust Territory was inapplicable to the Cameroons under British administration. It felt that the existing arrangements were not disadvantageous to the Territory, but that they nevertheless deserved the constant attention of the Council. It expressed the hope that the Administering Authority would inform the Council of any contemplated change with regard to the existing administrative arrangements, would continue to co-operate fully with the Council, in particular by furnishing clear and precise separate financial, statistical and other data relating to the Territory, and, finally, would continue to take into account the freely expressed wishes of the inhabitants of the Cameroons on matters pertaining to administrative arrangements affecting the Territory. These observations by the Committee were called to the Assembly's attention by the Trusteeship Council, in its resolution 293(VII) on administrative unions.⁷

b. POLITICAL DEVELOPMENT

The Visiting Mission which went to the Territory in November 1949 reported (T/461) that progress towards self-government seemed to be retarded principally by the difficulty of creating an adequate basis for political organization among the broad mass of the population. Under the British method of local administration, the objective was to develop the traditional organization into a system which would ultimately be able to meet the demands and responsibilities of self-government. The general tendency in the traditional system was for the ruler to come to power on the basis of inheritance rather than merit. Progress therefore seemed dependent, the Mission observed, on the calibre of these rulers, on the improvement of the traditional system, on education, and on the number of European officials available to advise and teach. The encouragement of the younger educated Africans, and of their acceptance by the rulers, it felt, could also contribute much to this end.

The Trusteeship Council in its report on the Territory recommended that modern democratic processes, particularly an elective system, be introduced in the Territory as soon as practicable, and that all possible steps be taken to increase the number of administrators and technical officers to advise and train the indigenous inhabitants to assume increasing responsibilities in the administration.

In applying its principles of Native administration in the southern section of the Cameroons, the Administering Authority reported that it had been confronted with the fact that inherent authority, beyond the village level, was almost non-existent. The replacement of the existing system of Native Authorities in the south by a system of local government, with county, district and local councils, based on the elective principle and composed predominantly of educated and progressive Africans, had been recommended, it reported, by a Select Committee of the Eastern House of Assembly, established in 1948 to review local government in the region.

These proposed reforms were reviewed by the Visiting Mission, which regarded them as evidence of a desire to improve the local administration. It was of the opinion that by introducing the elective principle and restricting the term of office of each council, the proposals would place traditional rulers on an equal footing with others in each community as candidates for local leadership, making competence and the will of the people the new criteria for office. It felt that greater advances in education and training were required to create qualified African personnel and to establish an informed public opinion on a wider scale. The need for care in the transition from theory to practice, should the reforms be adopted, was stressed by the Mission. This view was shared by the Administering Authority, which stated that the reforms would be applied only when conditions had become suitable and public opinion generally favourable to their introduction; energetic steps in this respect were being taken in the meantime.

The Trusteeship Council, after noting the report and recommendations of the Select Committee, recommended in its report on the Territory that the Administering Authority, in consultation with the inhabitants of the Territory, introduce basic reforms in the system of Native administration in order to accelerate the development of local government units along democratic and progressive lines. By resolution 169(VI) of 3 April 1950, the Council decided to draw this recommendation to the attention of petitioners⁸ who had criticized the existing system of Native administration and its results, in some cases alleging that the inclusion of educated young men in the Native Authorities was opposed both by the old chiefs and their councillors.

After examining a petition from the Assumbo Native Authority (T/Pet.4/44) asking for the establishment of a government station in Assumbo, which is in the Mamfe Division of the southern Cameroons, the Council at its sixth session expressed the hope that, in accordance with the Administering Authority's assurance, all possible steps would be taken for the general development of this area (171(VI)).

The Fon of Bali and the Bali Native Authority (T/Pet.4/43) alleged that they were politically undermined by the neighbouring areas of the Bamenda Province and requested stronger protection from the Government. The Council, on 3 April, noted the assurance of the Administering Authority that no discrimination among various tribal groups was allowed by the local administration and expressed its hope that this policy of equal treatment would continue (159(VI)).

In the less developed northern part of the Territory, the Mission found that the political situation differed from that in the south. In the north, the organization of the Emirates was rigid and highly centralized. The Mission indicated that the Administration recognized the need to develop representation of wider elements in political affairs and commended its efforts as an approach to the objective of broadening the popular basis of the Emirate governments and absorbing into their service the progressive-minded younger element.

The Council requested the Administering Authority to intensify its efforts for the rapid development of the northern section of the Cameroons, with a view to reducing the difference in levels of development between the north and south. It also suggested that, in examining the budgets of the Native Authorities in the north, the Administering Authority should keep in mind the desirability of maintaining a proper balance between the cost of administration, which was the largest budget item, and expenditure on social and other essential services.

Two petitions concerning the system of indigenous law and Native courts in the Territory were examined by the Council. In one of these, the Cameroons National Federation (T/Pet.4/16—5/7) asked for the codification of traditional laws and customs; in the other, Mr. Godlove Ndangbe and Chief M. M. Gaforgbe alleged (T/Pet. 4/50—5/64) that the chiefs presiding over Native courts were prejudiced and stated their preference for magistrates' courts with European judges. The Administering Authority informed the Council (T/486) that a commission had recently been appointed to inquire into the operation of the Native court system. By resolution 170(VI) of 3 April 1950, the Council decided to inform the petitioners that no action on its part was called for until the results of this investigation were made known.

c. ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

The Administering Authority reported that no significant changes occurred during 1948 in the acreages devoted to the principal agricultural products. Except for the plantation enterprises of the Cameroons Development Corporation in the south (see below), agricultural production is primarily for local consumption. Primitive methods of farming are used by the peasant farmers, who, together with herdsmen, form the majority of the inhabitants of the Territory. A considerable increase over 1947 in the Territory's stock population, which, in 1948, included 13,412 horses, 274,934 sheep, 571,112 cattle and 589,220 goats, was shown in the annual report. Bananas, palm kernels, palm oil, cocoa and rubber from the south and groundnuts, hides and skins from the north comprise the main exports. The Nigerian Cocoa Marketing Board continued to control cocoa marketing and export and to fix a guaranteed annual price to the producer, the Administering Authority reported. Legislation being drawn up for the establishment of similar marketing boards to protect the producers of palm oil, groundnuts and certain other oil seeds, and cotton was scheduled to become effective early in 1949. The formation of co-operatives has been encouraged by the Administration as a means of enabling the indigenous inhabitants to participate in trade and commerce. The number of co-operative cocoa marketing societies increased during 1948 to 38, with a membership of 2,287, as against 35, with 1,442 members, the year before. There were also six co-operative thrift and loan societies and two co-operative coffee marketing societies.

Total foreign trade in 1948 consisted of exports valued at £542,781 (including re-exports of £1,527) and imports valued at £383,307, showing an increase of £142,430 and £238,369, respectively, over 1947. According to the Administering Authority's report, 99-65 per cent of the Territory's exports went to the United Kingdom, which supplied 75.15 per cent of the imports, smaller amounts coming from the United States, Germany and Belgium. Territorial revenue and expenditure was estimated at £272,800 and £541,080, respectively, for 1947-48, an increase of £95,700 and £69,630 over the previous financial year. Additional estimated expenditure to be made available during 1947-48 from the Colonial Development and Welfare Funds was cited at £87,083. Actual expenditure for the various schemes under the development plan amounted to £74,035, the Administering Authority reported, an increase of £26,130 over the year 1946-47. Of the total, £47,850 was spent on road development.

By virtue of the Ex-Enemy Lands (Cameroons) Ordinance, 1946, and the Cameroons Development Corporation Ordinance, 1946, approximately 395 square miles of land alienated in the southern Cameroons during the period of German administration were declared to be Native lands and leased to the Cameroons Development Corporation for development for the common benefit of the inhabitants of the Territory. The purchase of these lands by the Nigerian Government at a total cost of £845,000, to be repaid in the form of annual rental by the Corporation, was completed in 1948. The Corporation's main products—bananas, palm products and rubber—are all marketed in the United Kingdom. Its exports of bananas, the most profitable product, increased from over 1,000,000 stems in 1947 to about 4,000,000 in 1948. The Corporation's annual report, made available by the Administering Authority, showed a profit of £343,397 in 1948, £165,122 more than in 1947. Of this amount, £209,000 was appropriated for future payment of income tax. Of the balance, in accordance with the Corporation's statute, £100,000 was set aside as reserve for hospitals, dispensaries, medical equipment, educational facilities, rehousing, replanting and hurricane risk, and the surplus profits, amounting to £54,352, was made available for the benefit of the Territory as a whole.

A major portion of the observations of the Visiting Mission in the economic field (T/461) related to the Cameroons Development Corporation, which it described as the largest productive and export enterprise in the Territory. A study of the Corporation's financial operations in its first two years of existence, the Mission found, showed that a much greater share of the returns from the plantations had been retained in the Cameroons and Nigeria than at any time during their operation by private companies. The Mission pointed out, however, that the amount of surplus profits set aside for the Cameroons itself had been small compared with the amounts payable to the Nigerian treasury, including, through 1948, £367,000 in income tax alone.

Among other suggestions, it recommended that an experiment be made in posting suitable Africans as assistants to the more senior officers, and that it should be the publicly stated objective of the Administration to reduce by half the period of 40 years considered as the minimum period in which transfer of control to African management could be expected. The Mission emphasized the importance of showing the people tangible results in the disposition of surplus corporate profits, and it welcomed the Corporation's policy of opening its schools, medical and welfare facilities to persons other than employees as one means of showing the people the extent to which they benefited from the operations of the Corporation.

The Administering Authority stated (T/522) that the progressively increasing participation of the people in the affairs of the Corporation and their eventual control of the Corporation was an objective of government policy. In view of the over-riding consideration of efficient management, the Administering Authority observed, it would not be practicable to introduce the elective principle, as suggested by the Mission, into the selection of Corporation members, nor would any useful purpose be served by stating a conjectural target date for the transfer of control of the Corporation to African management.

In its report on the Territory, the Council recommended that the Administering Authority continue to consider the possibility of increasing the membership of indigenous inhabitants in the Corporation with a view to transferring its management and control to the inhabitants of the Territory at the earliest practicable date. The formation of small committees of indigenous inhabitants to consult with the Corporation on a local level was noted with satisfaction by the Council; it expressed the hope that a similar committee be set up at a higher level to enable the Corporation's management to maintain closer contact with the population.

The Council further suggested that the Administering Authority review the tax position of the Corporation to determine whether it was possible to increase the proportion of profits made available for the direct benefit of the Trust Territory.

By resolution 175(VI) of 3 April 1950, the Council decided to draw these recommendations to the attention of the Bakweri Land Committee (T/Pet.4/3/Add.3), Mr. F. E. Burnley (T/Pet.-4/11-5/5), the Cameroons National Federation (T/Pet.4/16-5/7), and the Cameroons Federal Union (T/Pet.4/61-5/66), who had asked for measures to bring about an early transfer of control of the Corporation to the people of the Cameroons.

The question of ownership of lands alienated in the Southern Cameroons during the German régime and now for the most part reclassified as Native lands and operated by the Cameroons Development Corporation formed the subject of a number of petitions examined by the Trusteeship Council.⁹ The first of these, submitted in 1946 by the Bakweri Land Committee (T/Pet.4/3), claimed that the alienated lands were taken illegally by the Germans from the Bakweri people. This situation, they alleged, had been perpetuated by the British administration and the Bakweri people, deprived of their most fertile lands, had had to resort to difficult and uneconomical farming on rocky mountain slopes and were suffering malnutrition and other hardships. In subsequent petitions, sent after the establishment of the Cameroons Development Corporation, the Bakweri people insisted on their rights of ownership of the land and asked for greater control over the operation of the plantations than that afforded to them through the Corporation. In March 1949, the Trusteeship Council had instructed its Visiting Mission to make a special study of the problem (80(IV)). In the meantime, the Administering Authority undertook an investigation which revealed the extent of the difficulties of the Bakweri people and it informed the Council of the measures it would take to alleviate the situation. It announced that some 25,000 acres of land would be taken from the Corporation to the extent that each indigenous family might have at least fifteen acres, and that a community development programme aiming at the social regeneration of the inhabitants and the spreading of new interest in agricultural advances would be undertaken (T/182 & Add.1, 2 & 3).

After an investigation on the spot, the Visiting Mission stated that it fully concurred in principle with the measures taken and proposed by the Administering Authority. It stressed the importance of explaining more clearly to the people the significance of the establishment of the Corporation and suggested means of accelerating their participation in its operations and control. The Mission also reported at length on the historical background of the problem and indicated that the standards of sanitation, housing, health, nutrition and general moral well-being of the Bakweri were at such a level that active and positive assistance must immediately be given by the Administration or the Cameroons Development Corporation or both. This view was endorsed by the Council in its report on the Territory. The Council expressed the hope that the Bakweri and other peoples living in the neighbourhood would co-operate fully in the implementation of the commendable plans of the Administration and the Corporation for the solution of their problems by means of a policy of controlled and assisted resettlement on a maximum of 25,000 acres of land to be taken from those now leased to the Corporation. Accepting the conclusions and recommendations of its Mission, the Council recommended to the Administering Authority that further steps be taken: that increased efforts be made to explain to the Bakweri that the ex-enemy-owned lands have in fact reverted to the people of the Trust Territory and that ownership is now legally vested in them; that increased emphasis be given to the adequate training of the indigenous inhabitants to enable them to participate increasingly in the Corporation's affairs; that a constant programme of public relations be developed to demonstrate to the people the extent to which the operations of the Corporation are of real benefit to them; that special attention be given to the rehabilitation of the Bakweri by means of special contributions from the Corporation's earnings; and that the policy of controlled and assisted resettlement be put into effect as quickly as possible and extended whenever appropriate to all people living in the neighbourhood of the plantations or in other areas where similar conditions exist. By resolution 174(VI), of 3 April 1950, the Council decided to inform the interested petitioners of these recommendations.

The Council adopted a separate resolution with regard to a petition from the Bonjongo Group of the Bakweri Land Committee (T/Pet.4/3/Add.5). In this petition, the Bonjongo people asked for the recognition of their right to ownership of all the land which they had given to a Roman Catholic Mission for ecclesiastical purposes and which, they alleged, the mission had later commercialized. The Council was informed by the Administering Authority (T/182/Add.3 & T/486) that the Roman Catholic mission was willing to consider exchanging the land held at Bonjongo for parcels of land in other parts of the Territory, provided the Bonjongo land would be included in the Bakweri resettlement programme. By resolution 138(VI) of 3 April, the Council invited the Administering Authority to consult with representatives of the mission in order to devise a scheme which might lead to the amelioration of the land situation in the Bonjongo area.

The Council was of the opinion that the merits of the claims made in several other petitions¹⁰ concerning land disputes could be determined in local courts and it considered that no action on its part was therefore necessary (resolutions 132, 135, 136, 176 and 185(VI), of 3 April 1950).

In its comments on economic conditions in general, the Visiting Mission observed that simple, primitive agricultural methods existed, with few exceptions, throughout the Territory. It noted the efforts of the Administration to improve the basic economy by teaching more efficient methods, but felt that the facilities available thus far were incapable of more than touching on the problem. Both the Administering Authority and the Mission emphasized the importance of more and better roads. The Mission remarked on the dependence of the people, even where roads existed, on travel and transportation of foodstuffs by foot and felt that an excessive amount of time and energy which might otherwise be devoted to actual production was spent in the slow and laborious carrying of head-loads to sometimes distant markets.

The Administering Authority, in its observations on the Mission's report, as well as on various petitions¹¹ which asked for improvements in the territorial economy (T/522, T/486), described its large-scale plans, some of which were already being implemented, for the development of the Territory. In spite of the excessive costs of road construction through difficult terrain, it explained, a motor road now extends the whole length of the Territory. It assured the Council that the development of communications facilities, which it considered the first essential for material and social progress, would continue as fast as money and man-power would permit. With the improvement in communications and the progress in education, the problem of developing the African economic system became mainly one of providing technical education. The Administering Authority reviewed the measures taken in this direction, including the work of the Government's 1,500-acre experimental and training farm at Bambui and the establishment of a trade training centre at Ombe.

From the information before it, the Council recognized that much remained to be done in developing the Territory's economy. In its report on the Territory, it recommended to the Administering Authority that a special effort be made to accelerate the rate of progress in this sphere. By resolution 173(VI) of 3 April 1950, the Council decided to inform the interested petitioners of this recommendation, noting at the same time the Administering Authority's assurance (T/486) that particular attention would be paid to the economic development of the Bamenda Province and the Mamfe District.

The Council suggested in its report that the Administering Authority expand and develop diversified training facilities for young people in the Territory. It noted with satisfaction that a technical training centre had already been established in the Southern Cameroons. The Council also urged the Administering Authority to intensify its programme of introducing modern agricultural methods in the Territory and to improve and develop the Territory's road system. Since the subject of inadequate communications had been raised in petitions,¹² the Council, by resolution 180(VI) of 3 April 1950, drew the petitioners' attention to its recommendation on the subject.

Several petitioners^{12a} alleged that the establishment of forest reserves reduced the amount of available farmland and was regarded by some Africans as a means of alienating land. It was maintained by the Administering Authority (T/486) that forest reserves were in the interest of economic development, that their creation involved no land alienation and that all resulting profits remained in the ownership of the Native community. The protection of the Territory's forest resources was regarded by the Council as a duty of the Administering Authority; it approved the steps already taken in this direction by the Administration and recommended that more energetic measures be undertaken. The Council decided, by resolution 177(VI) of 3 April 1950, to inform the petitioners of this recommendation, which was included in its annual report on the Territory.

Comments with respect to commerce and trade and the alleged monopoly of the United Africa Company in the Mamfe Division and the Bamenda Province were made in several petitions examined by the Council.¹³

In reply to the various allegations in these petitions, the Administering Authority assured the Council that companies other than the United Africa Company were free to establish themselves in the area in question, that the practice of "conditional" or "tie-in" sales was illegal, and that every effort was being made to develop consumer co-operatives (T/486). The Council, in resolution 182(VI) of 3 April, informed the petitioners of the comments of the Administering Authority and expressed the hope that all possible steps would be taken to encourage the establishment of consumer co-operatives.

After noting the following observations of the Administering Authority on two other questions, the Council, on 3 April, found that no action on its part was necessary. The Administering Authority had adduced, with respect to an allegation by the Cameroons Federal Union (T/Pet.4/61-5/66) concerning the construction of an airfield at Besongabang, that compensation had been paid as the result of a freely negotiated agreement and further, that the petitioners were not the persons directly concerned; this statement was recorded by the Council in resolution 178(VI). The Council informed the Bamenda Improvement Association (T/Pet.4/52-5/65) of the Administering Authority's assurance that there were no obstacles to the production and free sale of coffee (179(VI)).

d. SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT

The Administering Authority indicated in its annual report that no cost-of-living surveys had been carried out in the Territory owing to lack of trained staff. In the Cameroons Province, however, records of prices of essential foodstuffs were maintained. While there were no serious fluctuations of market prices, successive rises in the prices of foodstuffs and slight changes in the prices of manufactured goods occurred as a result of the irregularity of supplies. Increased imports, the report stated, helped to check the inflationary pressure.

In the Cameroons Province, there were in 1948 approximately 28,399 wage earners, including some 16,000 in the plantations. Monthly wage rates, according to the report, ranged from 30 shillings to 42 shillings, 6 pence, for unskilled labour, 40 shillings to 112 shillings for semi-skilled and from 118 shillings to 211 shillings for skilled. With reference to the situation in the northern section, it was stated that no labour statistics or comparable data on wages were available for 1948. The Administering Authority considered that the principal labour problem was still the proper development of a trade union organization for the plantation workers. It reported an increase in the number of trade unions from three with 11,126 members in 1947 to six with 17,351 members in 1948.

The Visiting Mission to the Territory observed (T/461) that, although the majority of inhabitants were subsistence farmers and traders, wage earners formed an important element of the economic structure in the southern plantation areas. On the whole, it found the standard of living low and considered wage rates inadequate in comparison with the cost of consumer goods.

Improved living conditions and increased wages for plantation workers, as well as lower prices, were requested by the Cameroons National Federation (T/Pet.4/16-5/7), the Kom Improvement Association (T/Pet.4/35) and the Cameroons Federal Union (T/Pet.4/61-5/66). In its observations (T/506, T/486, T/513) on these petitions, the Administering Authority explained that, following a noticeable increase in the cost of living during the first half of 1949, the Cameroons Development Corporation workers had gone on strike for higher wages in November. The settlement of this dispute included a general rise in the basic wage, the setting up of a worker-management consultative committee, establishment of plantation shops for the sale of essential commodities at controlled prices, the building of modern labour accommodations and other measures.

The Trusteeship Council, in its report on the Territory, urged the Administering Authority to intensify its efforts to increase real wages and raise the standard of living of the indigenous inhabitants and recommended that it adopt measures to ensure that essential consumer goods be priced within the range of the average wage earner. On 3 April 1950, by resolution 184(VI), the Council called these recommendations to the attention of the above petitioners; it noted at the same time the Administering Authority's statement of the measures taken by the Cameroons Development Corporation to improve living conditions. The Council also drew its recommendation concerning the standard of living to the attention of the Domestic Servants' Union, Bamenda (T/Pet.4/55), which sought higher pay and fixed working hours for domestic servants 161(VI). According to the Administering Authority's annual report, total trained medical and public health personnel in the Territory rose from 137 in 1947 to 187 in 1948. This total included seven government physicians, six of whom were stationed in the Cameroons Province and one in the northern areas. Nineteen dispensaries were established during 1948, bringing the total to 59. There were also two new government medical field units, two new maternity homes and one additional mission leprosy treatment centre. In addition, a new nurses' training school was established. The two medical field units carried out a survey in the Territory, but this was not entirely satisfactory, the Administering Authority indicated, because a high percentage of the population in the areas under survey failed to present themselves for examination. Total expenditure on public health in 1947-48 amounted to £40,800, an increase of £3,500 over the previous fiscal year.

Requests for more medical officers and hospitals, more and better-equipped dispensaries and clinics, leper settlements, ambulance services, and touring medical officers for rural areas were made in a number of petitions¹⁴ examined by the Council.

The Administering Authority, in its observations on these petitions (T/486), stated its constant concern with the expansion of health facilities. It recognized the need for further expansion in the Bamenda Province and Mamfe District, and indicated that new proposals for leprosy control were under consideration. Charges for medical services, it assured the Council, were only nominal and were waived if necessary.

In its report on the Territory, the Council expressed concern at the inadequacy of medical and health facilities and reiterated its previous recommendation on the subject. It asked the Administering Authority to take immediate steps to improve and expand medical services in order to provide fully for the needs of the population. This decision and the statements of the Administering Authority were called to the attention of the petitioners by resolution 183(VI) of 3 April.

The Administering Authority, commenting (T/495) on requests by the Bafaw and Banyang Improvement Unions (T/Pet.4/14 & 42) for a better water supply in the Mamfe Division, pointed out that the rural areas of this Division had fairly good water supplies; however, improvements in those villages where shortages occur were contemplated after the completion of more urgent tasks elsewhere. The Council, by resolution 181(VI) of 3 April, expressed the hope that the Administering Authority would take all possible steps to improve the water supply whenever necessary.

Two further recommendations concerning social conditions were included in the Council's report on the Territory. It again recommended the abolition of whipping;¹⁵ the Administering Authority's report had indicated that certain offenders were still being punished in this manner. After noting that prospective newspaper publishers had to post a bond of £250, the Council asked the Administering Authority to ensure that this did not act as a restraint on the freedom of the Press and to bear in mind the desirability of modifying this provision.

The practice of polygamy was investigated by the Mission as directed by the Council in 1948, following the latter's examination of a petition from the St. Joan's Social and Political Alliance (T/Pet.2/4); this petition quoted from a newspaper article describing the alleged taking by force of a young girl to be the wife of the Fon of Bikom. From inquiries made after the receipt of the petition, according to information supplied by the Administering Authority, it had been ascertained that the Fon had 110 wives within his compound. The Mission visited the Fon, one of the chiefs of the Tikar communities of the Bemenda Province. The Fon presented a petition (T/Pet.-4/36) stating that he strongly resented the libellous charges made and intended to seek redress through litigation. He affirmed that his wives were there of their own free will and had full opportunity to leave his compound if they wished, and that some forty women had in fact left. The Fon's statement was supported by the Kom Improvement Association (T/Pet.4/35) and the women of Kom (T/Pet.4/38), among them some of the Fon's wives. The Mission found (T/461) that this marriage custom was not peculiar to the Fon and other Tikar chiefs. It was common practice in other parts of the Territory as in many parts of Africa, for any man to take as many wives as he could afford to maintain his household and his fields, and that it was often the wives themselves who asked their husbands to take additional wives to lighten the burden of their work. It did not appear advisable to the Mission for the Administration to prohibit polygamy as long as most of the people remained attached to the custom; the desired change should come about through education. The Mission suggested that the right of women and girls to refuse to take part in any forced union and to release themselves from such unions should be proclaimed and protected and that the wives of polygamists should be allowed to withdraw from their marriages if they no longer wished to accept their position as additional wives. Full agreement with the Mission's conclusions was voiced by the Administering Authority (T/522), which stated that the specific measures suggested were already part of its policy. The Council itself, by resolution 186(VI) of 3 April 1950, noted that the misunderstanding with regard to the question of the alleged libellous nature of the petition from St. Joan's Social and Political Alliance had arisen out of factors over which it had no control and decided that no action on its part was called for in the circumstances.

In connexion with a request by the Bamenda Improvement Association (T/Pet.4/53—5/65) for the removal of liquor restrictions in the Bamenda Province, the Administering Authority explained that it was bound by the Convention of St. Germain-en-Laye of 1919, which governed liquor control in this area. The Association also alleged that petitions are often withheld by local authorities. This was stated by the Administering Authority to be without foundation in fact; it (T/513) assured the Council that administrative officers were meticulous in respecting the right of petition. The Council, by resolutions 187(VI) and 188(VI) of 3 April, respectively decided to inform the petitioners that no action on its part was called for with respect to either question.

On the same date, after it received the assurance of the Administering Authority that immigrants enjoy equal privileges with the local inhabitants of the Territory, the Council also decided to take no action on allegations of the French Cameroons Welfare Union (T/Pet.4/19-5/8) concerning the status of immigrants from the Cameroons under French Administration (172(VI)).

e. EDUCATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

A detailed account of the educational situation in the Territory contained in the Administering Authority's annual report indicated, inter alia, that increases had been made in 1948 over the previous year in educational expenditure, Government grants-in-aid to voluntary agencies, and the number of teachers, schools and students. Primary schools, most of which are run by missions, increased by 21 during 1948; this brought the number to 245 in the Southern Provinces and 25 in the northern areas. In addition, there were in the south four teacher-training schools, one government vocational school and one aided mission secondary school; another secondary school was later established. Of the school-age children in the Territory, 21.6 per cent were enrolled in schools in the Southern Provinces and 1 per cent in the primary schools in the northern areas.

The Visiting Mission gained the impression that popular demand for education was far outstripping the rate at which facilities could be provided. It received petitions¹⁶ asking for expansion in every field—the development of free and compulsory primary education; the establishment of secondary schools to serve the whole Territory; expansion of vocational and trade training; provision of higher educational facilities for girls; allocation of more scholarships tenable in Nigeria and overseas. The Mission suggested (T/461) that ways should be considered to attract more European teachers to the Territory and to train more teachers from among the indigenous population. The efforts and surplus funds of the Cameroons Development Corporation, the Mission stated, could be spent with advantage for education.

The Administering Authority, among other observations (T/522), pointed out that there was still a long way to go before the demand for education became general; until such improvement occurred, the two secondary schools were quite adequate to deal with that part of the primary school output suitable for secondary education.

The Council in its report on the Territory noted with approval the expansion in the financial appropriations for education, the progress in vocational training, the number of pupils preparing to become teachers, and the Administering Authority's willingness and efforts to maintain instruction in the local languages. It recognized nevertheless the general inadequacy of educational facilities, especially in the north of the Territory, where between 95 and 100 per cent of the people were illiterate, and the need for increased grants to the Native Authorities in this area. It recommended that the Administering Authority make a vigorous effort in the immediate future to overcome existing deficiencies, and participate more directly if necessary in developing education in that area.

Although the work being done in primary and secondary education by voluntary agencies, assisted by government subsidies, was noted with approval by the Council, it considered that the Administering Authority should give further attention to the desirability of establishing more government schools, especially in areas where no schools existed.

The Council noted that a commission of inquiry, set up by the Governor of Nigeria, to report on measures to accelerate the appointment of Africans to senior posts in the Government, considered that special attention should be given to the award of scholarships to backward areas such as the Cameroons. This was being done by the Cameroons Development Corporation, the Council observed. It recommended, however, that the Administering Authority adopt measures to increase the number of scholarships to students from the Territory and accelerate the appointment of indigenous inhabitants to responsible positions in the Government.

By resolution 190(VI) of 3 April, the Council drew these recommendations, as well as those adopted at its fourth session in 1949, to the attention of the interested petitioners; at the same time, it expressed the hope that the further extension of educational facilities for girls would be seriously considered by the Administering Authority and the Native Authorities and that the former would take all measures to develop secondary and technical education.

The Council decided to take no action with regard to an allegation made by the Cameroons Federal Union (T/Pet.4/61-5/66) that religious missions did not train Africans to replace the European missionaries, since it considered that this was the responsibility of voluntary agencies (189(VI)).

f. OTHER QUESTIONS

(1) General Conclusion of the Council

With respect to the measure of progress in the Territory during 1948, the Council commended the Administering Authority.

(2) Relationship between the Territory and the United Nations

This question was raised in three petitions examined by the Council. The Cameroons Federal Union (T/Pet.4/61-5/66) considered that the Council should have a resident minister in the Territory, who could check the facts given in the official reports, attend the Nigeria Legislative Council as an observer and receive petitions for transmission to the Trusteeship Council. The Fon of Bikom (T/Pet.4/36) suggested that the Cameroons should have its own member in the Trusteeship Council, and Mr. Godlove Ndangbe and Chief Gaforgebe (T/Pet.4/50-5/64) asked that a United Nations mission visit the Territory every year.

The Council decided, by resolution 163(VI) of 3 April, that no action on its part was called for, since the Trusteeship Agreement for the Territory contained no provision either for the direct representation of the people of the Cameroons in the Trusteeship Council or for the appointment by the Council of a resident minister. It informed the petitioners, however, that oral presentations could be made before the Council in support of petitions and that Visiting Missions were being sent to each Trust Territory every three years.

(3) Problems Arising from the Division of the Two Cameroons

Various difficulties arising from the existence of customs and exchange controls between the two Cameroons, which had been under one administration prior to the First World War, and requests for the unification of the Territories, in part or in their entirety, were brought to the Council's attention by the Visiting Mission (T/461, T/462). While stating that it did not wish to exaggerate the importance of the problem as it now appeared to exist, the Mission described the complaints it had heard, which were included in petitions¹⁷ before the Council.

On the level of political and social development, it was said that population groups having the same origin or similar customs and traditions had been arbitrarily split by the division of the old German Kamerun Protectorate; that different political policies, educational systems, cultures and languages introduced by the British on one side of the frontier and the French on the other were accentuating this division and obstructing what should be the natural emergence of the Cameroons into a single territory; and that the frontier controls militated against freedom of inter-marriage and other social contacts. On the economic level, especially among people living close to the frontier, complaints were made about the rigour of customs and exchange controls and their interference with what were said to have been traditionally the normal channels of local trade.

The Administering Authorities, commenting on this question (T/486, T/517, T/AC.15/SR.15), were agreed that the issue of unification was not an active problem at the present time and that the frontier did not seriously interfere with the relations between members of the frontier tribes. They assured the Council that, within the framework of existing exchange regulations, all possible steps for the amelioration of frontier difficulties were taken.

A recommendation of the Visiting Mission that frontier regulations be eased was endorsed by the Council. In its report on the Cameroons under British administration, the Council asked the Administering Authority to simplify as far as possible the requirements for passports and similar formalities not only by means of a tolerant attitude in the application of existing regulations, but by the adoption of less strict regulations. It further recommended that the two Administering Authorities consult whenever necessary to that end. By resolution 164(VI), adopted on 3 April 1950, the Council informed the interested petitioners of this recommendation and at the same time expressed the hope that the Administering Authorities would continue to take all possible steps to ameliorate frontier difficulties.

On the same date, the Council adopted separate resolutions on three specific issues. The Lamido of Adamawa in the Cameroons under British administration asked (T/Pet.4/21-5/9) for the unification of the Adamawa Emirate, over which he claims traditional jurisdiction, and which is now divided between Nigeria and the two Cameroons, and for the abolition of Trusteeship for this area. His claims were opposed by the Lamidos of the Benue Region in the Cameroons under French administration (T/Pet.5/76-4/64). The Trusteeship Council decided that no action on its part was called for with respect to either the question of unification (165(VI)) or the question of the dissolution of Trusteeship for the Adamawa area (166(VI)). The Council took a similar decision with respect to a petition from the Dikwa Native Authority in the Cameroons under British administration (T/Pet.4/- 22-5/10) requesting the merger with the Dikwa Emirate of the Shuwa Arab peoples, who are divided between the two Cameroons (167(VI)).

(4) Petitions Containing Personal Requests

In addition to petitions concerning political, economic, social and educational conditions in the Territory, the Council, during 1950, examined petitions of a more personal nature. With one exception, specified below, the Council's decisions on these petitions were taken during its sixth session, on 3 April 1950. In each case, it unanimously adopted the recommendations of its ad hoc Committee on Petitions.

The Ex-Servicemen's Union (T/Pet.4/18) made a series of requests on behalf of ex-servicemen, alleging that promises, made to them by the British Government during the Second World War had not been carried out. After noting a detailed account by the Administering Authority (T/489) of the measures taken to aid in the rehabilitation of ex-servicemen, the Council expressed the hope that such efforts would be continued and if necessary increased so that any legitimate grievance might eventually be met (133(VI)).

Chief M. M. Gaforgbe requested the payment of £100 awarded to him by the Provincial Council of Bamenda for his services (T/Pet.4/53). Having received the assurance of the Administering Authority (T/516) that the petitioner was under a misapprehension since his gratuity had already been paid in full, the Council referred the matter to the Administering Authority with a request that the misunderstanding be explained to the petitioner (143(VI)). Another petition (T/Pet.4/45) from Chief Gaforgbe was declared inadmissible by the ad hoc Committee on Petitions (T/L.74), since it dealt with a land claim which was sub judice.

Two petitioners, the Fondefru of Bande (T/Pet.4/39) and Chief V. Vuga (T/Pet.4/58), who laid claim to the headship of their respective clans and requested that a chief's salary be paid them, were advised by the Council to submit their cases to the Native Authorities of their respective Federations (141 and 144(VI)).

After examining the request (T/Pet.4/60) of Mr. John E. Talbot for compensation for his house, which, he said, was destroyed on instructions of the District Officer, the Council invited the Administering Authority to examine the petitioner's case further and report on its conclusions (145(VI)).

The Council advised several petitioners whose claims were within the competence of the courts that, if they wished to seek redress, they should do so in the local courts. The petitioners concerned were: Mr. Joseph Mosenja, who requested (T/Pet.4/6) compensation for a leg lost in an accident while he was allegedly on duty (130-(VI)); Mr. G. P. Malafa, who requested (T/Pet.4/62) repayment of a loan (146(VI)); Chief Fonjengo Mbakurewan (T/Pet.4/40), Mr. Joseph L. Fokum (T/Pet.4/54) and Mr. Tita Nyambi (T/Pet.4/56), who set forth in three separate petitions grievances against the Fon of Bali (134(VI)); and Mr. James Toe, who complained (T/Pet.4/65) of the non-payment of allotment money to his wife (resolution 236(VII)), of 29 June 1950.

The Council decided, after noting the observations of the Administering Authority (T/510, T/492, T/501, T/511), that no action on its part was called for on four petitions. These involved requests by Mr. V. Loko (T/Pet.4/34) for payment of an annual allowance as, he stated, was the practice for retired Native Administration employees (139(VI)) and by Mr. S. E. Arreneke (T/Pet.4/48) for re-engagement as a government teacher (142(VI)), and complaints from Mr. Sama C. Ndi (T/Pet.4/37) against the allegedly distrustful attitude of the Administering Authority towards educated Natives (140(VI)) and from Mr. R. N. Ayuk (T/Pet.4/49) that the Government refused to elevate his African school to standard III level (160(VI)).

2. Cameroons, Administered by France¹⁸

This Territory, which covers an area of 432,000 square kilometres (approx. 166,800 square miles), had an estimated indigenous population of about 2,902,400 in 1948, according to the Administering Authority's annual report.¹⁹ The non-indigenous population numbered 5,800, of whom 1,971 were French.

a. POLITICAL DEVELOPMENT

Since 1946, the Cameroons has been administered as an "Associated Territory" within the French Union and French legislation is applied to it. It is accordingly granted the right of representation in the central organs of the French Union in which legislative powers and the right of political discussion with respect to the Territory's affairs are vested. As indicated in the Administering Authority's annual report, the Cameroons elects three deputies to the French National Assembly, three representatives to the Council of the Republic, five to the Assembly of the French Union and two to the Economic Council. The chief of local administration is the Haut Commissaire de la République, who represents the French Government and is directly responsible to the Minister for Overseas Territories.

The local Representative Assembly, comprising sixteen representatives elected by an electoral college composed of French citizens and 24 elected by an electoral college composed of certain categories of Africans, deliberates and takes decisions on various territorial administrative matters, including road construction, tax assessment, etc. The territorial budget requires the approval of the Representative Assembly, which must also be consulted on other subjects. The Assembly is not authorized to initiate legislation or to discuss political questions.

The Administering Authority reported that it had contemplated making the Douala municipal elections a first test of universal suffrage, but the experiment had been rejected by the Representative Assembly as premature. The question of establishing in the main urban centres communes mixtes similar to those at Douala and Yaoundé was under study. Under this system of municipal government, the mayor-administrator is assisted by an advisory municipal commission of six appointed members, two of whom are required to be indigenous notables who are French subjects. It was planned to replace the municipal commissions by elective municipal councils with wide powers of deliberation and decision. The Administering Authority also described its plan of reorganizing the Councils of Notables, as from January 1949, to provide broader participation of the population in the management of public affairs.

The Mission to the territory reported (T/462) that there had been a considerable development of political activities in the Territory during the past three years. There could be no doubt, it stated, that the Administering Authority was engaged in a process of political transformation which, if continued, was destined to perfect a modern system of central government superseding the system of tribal chiefs.

While visiting the Territory, the Mission stated, it heard many comments, some critical, some commendatory, as to whether a central government was being developed too rapidly at the expense of local and tribal institutions or whether, on the contrary, feudalistic and traditional institutions were permitted to retard the development of a central government.

In its report on the Territory, the Council noted with approval the Administering Authority's practice regarding traditional indigenous institutions; these, although accorded due respect, it noted, are not permitted to hinder the development of more modern and progressive forms of government.

By resolutions 156 and 198(VI), adopted on 3 April, the Council informed interested petitioners²⁰ of this statement and, in resolution 198(VI), expressed the hope that the Administering Authority would take all possible steps to place Native administration on a more representative basis.

The Visiting Mission was of the opinion that the Representative Assembly, in spite of its limited powers, was an excellent school in self-government, bringing together Africans drawn from the most varied spheres to study problems from the standpoint of the Territory as a whole. It recognized a desire among the inhabitants, as evidenced in several petitions,²¹ to see the powers and competence of the Assembly extended.

The Trusteeship Council in its report on the Territory took note of this situation and recommended that the Administering Authority progressively extend the powers of the Representative Assembly, particularly in the legislative field. In conducting its policy in the Territory, the Administering Authority was asked to be guided by the following conclusion of the Visiting Mission, which the Council endorsed:

The Cameroons is rapidly approaching the time when a sufficient number of its nationals will have reached the stage of maturity required to enable the country to be given a broadly independent Legislative Assembly elected by a single college on an electoral basis gradually approaching universal suffrage. While it is impossible to predict exactly when this stage of maturity will be reached, the Mission has the impression that the establishment and functioning of the Assembly have enabled the country to take a big step forward in this direction. The problem now is to adjust the development of that organ to a rate of progress which meets the desires of an increasingly better educated population, while remaining within reasonable limits of the possibilities of a country which, after all, is still at the beginning of the modern phase of its development.

By resolutions 194(VI) and 242(VII) of 3 April and 29 June, the Council called to the attention of the petitioners the above recommendations, as well as the decision of its fourth session welcoming the progressive introduction of universal suffrage.²²

The need for further political development below the level of the Representative Assembly was noted by the Council in its report. It commended the Administering Authority for the steps already taken to reorganize the Councils of Notables by increasing the number of members in each and broadening their representative character, and urged the Administering Authority to consider vesting the Councils with power to make decisions on certain matters as well as to give advice.

The Council, by resolution 195(VI) of 3 April, drew these conclusions to the attention of several petitioners,²³ who had asked that the Councils of Notables be replaced by deliberative councils elected by the people.

The Council, by resolution 196(VI) of 3 April, noted that the creation of mixed communes for every municipality, as requested in three petitions,²⁴ was in full accordance with the established policy of the Administering Authority (see above) and expressed the hope that the latter could carry out its plans with regard to the communes mixtes as soon as possible.

The Administering Authority reported increases during 1948 in the number of both African and European officials in the common civil service, established in 1947, and stated that African officials of the higher grades had been appointed to certain posts formerly held by Europeans. In connexion with several petitions²⁵ asking that indigenous inhabitants be placed in responsible posts in public services, the Council referred the petitioners to a recommendation along these lines made at its fourth session²⁶ and noted at the same time the Administering Authority's assurance that its policy was to encourage access of Africans to responsible administrative posts (199(VI) of 3 April).

In its annual report, the Administering Authority described the improved judicial system which was replacing the indigent system. Under the new system, it stated, all penal cases are brought before a single type of tribunal; civil cases are brought before Courts of French law unless they are exclusively concerned with Africans, in which case they are judged by African judges in accordance with customary law and local custom. Eight petitions,²⁷ stating that in practice, administrative officials continued to serve as magistrates as under the indigénat system, asked for the complete separation of administrative and judicial powers. Four petitions²⁸ alleged that, in the administration of justice, Europeans and Africans were not treated equally; others²⁹ indicated that the same laws should not be applied to Europeans and Africans in view of the differences in their ways of life and asked that customary law be codified. Four petitions³⁰ alleged abuses by the militarized police, and asked that it be dissolved and replaced by civil police. The Visiting Mission reported (T/462) that the Administering Authority was anxious to transfer judicial powers from administrative officers to career magistrates, but this had not yet been possible owing to the shortage of magistrates. Noting this desire, and the substance of the relevant petitions, the Council in its report urged the Administering Authority to intensify its efforts to appoint more career magistrates. It informed the petitioners concerned of this recommendation (197(VI) of 3 April and 238(VII) of 29 June). By resolution 201(VI) of 3 April, the Council noted the Administering Authority's assurance that there was no discrimination in the administration of justice and drew the attention of the interested petitioners to its recommendation commending the Administering Authority on the measures it had taken to eliminate racial discrimination in the Territory (see below).

On the question of the codification of customary laws, the diversity of such laws and the need for constant revision of such a code, should it be established, was pointed out by the Administering Authority; after noting this statement, the Council in a resolution (202(VI)), adopted at its sixth session, invited the Administering Authority to make a general study of the most significant aspects of customary law and to report its findings to the Council.

In another resolution, adopted at the same session (200(VI)), the Council expressed the hope that the Administering Authority would continue to pursue its stated policy of punishing police abuses when discovered and of making every effort to ensure correct behaviour on the part of the police towards the inhabitants.

After noting the Administering Authority's statement that the dispatch of gendarmes to Mbouroukou, mentioned by the Union des populations du Cameroun, Comité directeur (T/Pet.5/-81), was aimed purely at maintaining order in the region, the Council decided on 29 June that no action on its part was called for on this question (241(VII)).

The Visiting Mission reported that, while in the Territory, it heard statements regarding the relationship between the Cameroons and the French Union, a question also raised in petitions³¹ examined by the Council. Allegations were made that, despite its special status as a Trust Territory, the Cameroons was treated as if it were a French colony even though special legislation might be required on such questions as land tenure, immigration, exchange controls or international trade and commerce. It was further stated that the Territory's evolution toward self-government or independence should not be retarded by general legislation covering other territories which might not have the same goal. On the other hand, the Mission heard certain notables speak of the advantages of representation in the French National Assembly and the Council of the Republic, in that it enabled Cameroonians to participate in providing legislation for the Territory and gave them experience in the functioning of representative government.

After noting the Administering Authority's assurance that at the appropriate time the inhabitants could choose for themselves whether they should remain in the French Union or have independence outside the Union, the Council informed the petitioners that it reviewed this question regularly (193(VI) of 3 April and 242(VII) of 29 June).

Suggested revisions of the Trusteeship Agreement, especially the clauses relating to the Territory being governed "as an integral part of French territory", were included in eleven petitions³² presented to the Mission. Several of these claimed that the population had not been consulted before the Agreement was concluded. The Council decided on 3 April that no action on its part was required with regard to this question (191(VI)); a copy of this resolution was later sent to Mr. Daniel Kemajou (T/Pet.5/82), whose petition the Council examined at its seventh session (242-(VII), of 29 June). In seven petitions³³ the related question of the Territory's relationship with the United Nations was raised. The petitioners asked for the right to submit comments on the annual reports, the establishment of a permanent supervisory commission of the Trusteeship Council and for representation of the people of the Territory in the Council or the General Assembly. The Council informed the petitioners that the inhabitants of the Territory had the right to submit petitions to the United Nations (192(VII)). In view of the terms of the Charter and the Trusteeship Agreement, however, the Council took no action on the specific requests made by the petitioners.

In connexion with a petition from the Union des populations du Cameroun, Comité directeur (T/Pet.5/81), relating, inter alia, to supervision of the administration of Trust Territories by the United Nations, the Council on 29 June invited the Secretary-General to inform the petitioners that United Nations publications were available in libraries, many administrative offices in the Territory, and through designated sales agencies (241(VII)).

b. ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

In agriculture, the Administering Authority aduced in its annual report, 87.8 per cent of the acreage cultivated was devoted to local needs, and 12.2 per cent for export. During 1948, specialized departments were added to the Central Agricultural Service to study methods of intensifying the cultivation of food crops and supplying food to urban centres and to promote rice production; heavy tractors and other equipment were ordered for pilot projects to foster the cultivation of food crops near large urban areas. Work was started on two experimental stations to cultivate groundnuts by mechanized methods and the erection of a disinfection-disinsectization plant to improve the quality of export products was ordered. Efforts were also being made to improve stock-breeding and fisheries.

With respect to industrial development, the Administering Authority reported, metropolitan France gave the Cameroons two pilot plants for processing oils and oil-seeds; 50 per cent of the shares of the company administering these plants were reserved for African investors. The establishment of a modern tobacco factory at Yaoundé, and the construction of an important hydro-electric plant, begun at Edéa, on the Sanaga River, were among other industrial improvements described in the annual report.

Imports and exports during 1948 amounted to 4,995,000,000 francs^{33a} and 4,121,000,000 francs, respectively, more than four times the amount in 1946. A compensation fund, established in 1948 to counteract the effects of the devaluation of the French franc in January 1948, had collected, by 31 July, more than 310,000,000 francs in duties and utilized 170,000,000 francs for the stabilization of import prices. Its operation accomplished, the fund ceased to operate in April 1949. The revision in October 1948 of the par value of the CFA (Colonies françaises d'Afrique) franc in relation to the metropolitan franc, the Administering Authority reported, compensated to a large degree for the inflation which might otherwise have followed the devaluation of the French franc.

Territorial revenue and expenditure were estimated at over 1,193,000,000 francs in 1948, a 59 per cent increase over the previous year. In addition, by the end of 1948, the Territory had drawn 624,000,000 francs (75 per cent for economic expenditure and 25 per cent for social expenditure) from the ten-year FIDES (Fonds d'Investissement pour le Développement économique et social des Territoires d'Outre-mer) plan.

The Visiting Mission was impressed (T/462) by the vigorous economic activity it found in the Territory, including the development of towns, construction of buildings, establishment of industries, new plantations, electrification, road building, equipment of harbours, schemes to extend the railway system and prospecting for minerals. The FIDES plan and a favourable economic situation, the Mission stated, were among the factors contributing to this development. The establishment of co-operatives, more than a hundred of which had been formed since 1946, was also an important factor in the Territory's development, the Mission indicated. The measures taken by the Administering Authority to improve agricultural methods in order to increase yields and quality of produce and concurrently to maintain or improve soil fertility and prevent soil erosion were described in the annual report and noted with satisfaction by the Council. The Council, in a resolution adopted at its sixth session, drew this statement to the attention of Mr. Gaston Medou (T/Pet.5/21) and the Comité féminin de l'Union des populations du Cameroun (T/Pet.5/60-4/32) who had asked for agricultural extension services (205(VI)). The Comité féminin, as well as the Comité régional de Moundou, l'Union des populations du Cameroun (T/Pet.5/42/4/29) and the Union des Syndicats confédérés du Cameroun (T/Pet.5/52) also requested freedom of cultivation and, in particular, the annulment of the Order of 10 May 1937 regulating coffee cultivation. Informed by the Administering Authority that this order had been introduced to reserve land for the cultivation of essential foodstuffs, the Council decided on 3 April to take no action on this question (206(VI)).

The Council, in its report, commended the Administering Authority for establishing these producing, processing, marketing and consumer co-operatives among the indigenous inhabitants as a means of bringing about their more effective participation in the Territory's economy. The value of the co-operatives was also recognized in several petitions³⁴ examined by the Council. The petitioners ask that financial assistance be given the co-operatives by the Administering Authority and that indigenous inhabitants be trained in the working of the co-operative system. The Administering Authority had described in its annual report the steps taken to assist the co-operatives. It contemplated sending suitable persons to France to study co-operative organization, and stated that chiefs from the Territory had already visited co-operative societies in France. With respect to financial assistance, the Administering Authority indicated that the Representative Assembly had refused to make further loans to co-operatives since 70 per cent of the past loans had not been repaid; but the Crédit du Cameroun^{34a} would make loans to any co-operatives offering some guarantee of competent management. On a request, in one of the petitions (T/Pet.5/56-4/31), that production co-operatives be given an equitable quota for the export of bananas, the Administering Authority explained that transport limitations made banana exports dependent on quotas, and the quota for indigenous planters had risen from 24 per cent in 1947 to 34 per cent in 1949. Noting these statements, the Council, in a resolution adopted at its sixth session, expressed the hope that the Administering Authority would continue to foster the development of co-operatives by education and all other means, and that indigenous producers would receive an adequate quota for bananas and have such shipping as practicable made available to them (225(VI)).

Two of the above petitions (T/Pet.5/52 & 5/62), as four others,³⁵ sought the abolition of the sociétés indigènes de prévoyance as being superfluous. These sociétés, the petitioners stated, had become purely administrative bodies and constituted an unjustifiable burden on the indigenous planters. The sociétés, as described by the Mission, are strictly controlled by the Administration; unlike co-operatives, membership is obligatory for indigenous farmers and stock-breeders in each administrative district. The Administering Authority considered their abolition desirable only when independent co-operatives became more stable. By resolution 226(VI) of 3 April, the Council asked that its resolution 225(VI) concerning co-operatives be sent to these petitioners and urged the Administering Authority to increase the participation by Africans in the management of the sociétés.

On requests, made in three petitions,³⁶ for the revaluation of agricultural products, the Council expressed the hope that the Administering Authority would continue its policy of ensuring payment of fair prices to indigenous planters and would foster in every way the development of producer co-operatives (204(VI)).

The Union des Syndicats confédérés du Cameroun (T/Pet.5/52) protested, inter alia, against the policy of giving Europeans preferential treatment in buying goods. This situation, which had existed for certain goods in short supply, mostly imported from Europe, the Administering Authority informed the Council, had disappeared now that there was an abundance of the goods in question. Noting this, the Council decided on 3 April that no action on its part was called for (214(VI)).

The establishment of economic organizations with an indigenous majority or equal representation in the existing organization was sought in three petitions.³⁷ Explaining that the petitioners were asking for wider participation in the three-fold Chamber of Commerce, Agriculture and Industry, the Administering Authority stated that the members were elected by all registered traders and producers, who inevitably chose Europeans, since their enterprises were on a larger scale; in view of the system of free election, however, it would be difficult to impose wider representation of indigenous concerns. Noting this statement, and that the Chamber of Commerce, Agriculture and Industry was a private concern, the Council decided that no action on its part was called for (215(VI)).

The Administering Authority stated that the requests, made by the Union des populations du Cameroun, Comité directeur (T/Pet.5/53-4/30) and the Union régionale des Syndicats confédérés de Bamiléké (T/Pet.5/33-4/27), for the progressive industrialization of the Cameroons, with indigenous participation, corresponded to the actual policy of the Administration. The Council noted this statement and drew the attention of the petitioners to a decision of its fourth session³⁸ recommending that the Administering Authority do everything in its power, by making grants and loans or other forms of assistance available, to encourage and enable indigenous inhabitants to take a full part in the industrial development of the Territory (207(VI) of 3 April). It made a similar recommendation after examining petitions from the Ngondo, Assemblée traditionnelle du peuple, Douala (T/Pet.5/56-4/31) and the Union des Syndicats confédérés du Cameroun (T/Pet.5/52) asking that loans and subsidies be granted most generously to indigenous undertakings (216(VI)). After examining requests from Mr. Michael Nguéguim (T/Pet.5/34 and the Artisans de Dschang (T/Pet.5/-41) for the development and improvement of handicrafts, the Council invited the Administering Authority to give all possible assistance to the indigenous inhabitants to this end (210(VI) of 3 April). The Artisans de Dschang, as well as several other petitioners,³⁹ asked that indigenous traders be exempted from paying licence fees. By resolutions 210 and 217 (VI) of 3 April, the Council recommended that the Administering Authority consider the possibility of reducing existing licence fees for small traders.

Liquor trade in the Territory is governed by the Convention of St. Germain-en-Laye of 1919. Commenting on several petitions,⁴⁰ which claimed that the most lucrative activities, in particular the liquor trade, were conducted by Europeans, the Administering Authority assured the Council that its policy was to permit no discrimination. It found it difficult, however, to carry out this policy with regard to the liquor trade, since the sale of liquor to Africans was forbidden by the Convention. The Administration had therefore imposed high licence fees on the sale of strong alcohol, but allowed African restaurants to obtain licences to sell alcoholic beverages with a low alcoholic content. In general, however, there was complete freedom of trade and no discrimination of any kind. After noting the Administering Authority's statement, the Council, in resolutions adopted at its sixth and seventh sessions, expressed the hope that it would continue to take all possible steps to demonstrate to the local population that equality of commercial opportunity exists (213(VI) and 242(VII)).

The Administering Authority reported that gold, tin and alluvial titanium were the only mineral deposits being worked. During 1948, it established the Bureau of Mines of Overseas France. The Bureau is to draw up an inventory of the mineral resources of the Territory and to further their exploitation. The building of a chemical and mineralogical laboratory at Yaoundé was completed at the beginning of 1949 and European technicians were training an African staff which will specialize in mineralogical problems and mining production. With respect to the alleged European monopoly of mining activities, referred to in four petitions,⁴¹ the Council in a resolution adopted at its sixth session informed the petitioners of its statement at its fourth session,⁴² when it expressed the hope that the share of the indigenous inhabitants in the Territory's mineral wealth would be greatly increased through the progressive expansion of the activities of the newly created Bureau of Mines of Overseas France (209(VI)).

The replacement of the poll tax by a proportional tax was requested in three petitions.⁴³ Because of the impossibility of identifying a large proportion of the indigenous inhabitants and the difficulty of ascertaining all incomes, the Administering Authority explained, it had so far been impossible to make such a reform. The Council, by resolution 217(VI) of 3 April, expressed the hope that the Administering Authority would study further the possibility of replacing the poll tax by a tax based on the principle of ability to pay.

In describing transport and communications in the Territory, the Administering Authority reported that a programme for the construction of 4,600 kilometres (approx. 2,850 miles) of roads was started in 1948, and plans were drawn up and other measures taken to improve river-crossings, ports and railways.

In its annual report on the Territory, the Council commended the Administering Authority for its zeal in improving the road system.

Commenting on petitions⁴⁴ alleging a grave lack of communications, the Administering Authority stated that its efforts could be gauged by the fact that in 30 years the Territory's road network had been expanded from 360 to 100,000 kilometres (approx. 225 to approx. 62,000 miles) and that the ten-year economic and social development plan provided for the further development of roads, railways, ports and bridges. Special appropriations, it stated, had been made in the 1950 budget for the river network of the Sanaga-Maritime region, requested in another petition, from Cri de la Sanaga côtière (Edéa), Yaoundé Delegation (T/Pet.5/46). A high priority could not be given, however, to the contemplated development of roads in the Subdivisions of Edéa, Eséka and Balimbi, urged in an eighth petition, from the Association amicale de la Sanaga maritime (T/Pet.5/61). These statements were noted by the Council, which, in resolution 212(VI), adopted on 3 April, expressed the hope that the planned improvements would be made as soon as possible.

Commenting on petitions, from the Solidarité Babimbi (T/Pet.5/70) and Messrs. Frédéric Makanda and Gilbert Bilong (T/Pet.5/49), alleging the slow development of the Babimbi Subdivision, the Administering Authority stated that this was mainly due to the community's isolated position, but that three schools and a post office had recently been opened, and a new road into the area was planned. The Council, in two resolutions adopted on 3 April, invited the Administering Authority to continue its efforts to develop this Subdivision (156 & 157(VI)).

The Administering Authority indicated in its annual report that Africans, especially in the south of the Territory, were growing more and more conscious of the value of land. The administrative staff, it was stated, was overwhelmed by an increasing flow of applications for recognition of land rights. This was due, among other causes, to land speculation in urban areas and to the requirement of a land title to obtain a mortgage from the newly established Crédit du Cameroun, a banking corporation which makes loans on favourable terms to small enterprises for the development of trade and the building of houses. The Administration intended to recruit more surveyors in 1949 to ensure the prompt settlement of land claims. During 1948, the report showed, 93 final concessions were granted, mainly to indigenous inhabitants, compared with 21 concessions in 1947.

The Mission reported that the whole problem was complicated by widely different conceptions of ownership and land practices reflected in customary laws and French law. It reported that the Administering Authority had set up fourteen commissions on which the Representative Assembly, indigenous notables, merchants and planters were represented, to study ways of reconciling these different concepts, with a view to effecting a general reorganization of the land tenure system. A number of Africans, the Mission indicated, claimed that they had difficulties in obtaining recognition of their land rights and alleged that land concessions were made to private persons, companies and missions. The Mission also heard objections to the classification of "vacant and ownerless land", which under French law becomes the property of the Territory. As in the case of all public property, the Africans maintained that all lands have owners. This was equally true of forest lands. Consequently, the Mission reported, there was much opposition to the Administration's apparently reasonable programme for the classification of forests; this programme, it was stated by the Administering Authority, was intended to ensure the preservation and improvement of a certain area of forests for the benefit of the whole Territory. The Administering Authority hoped to convince the people of the long-term benefits, but, if this failed, it felt that its duty nevertheless was to ensure the protection of the Territory's resources. Dissatisfaction at the size of cutting concessions granted to Europeans was also expressed in several petitions. The Administering Authority explained that no discrimination was exercised in forest management, but few Africans had the necessary technical competence and financial resources.

The Mission's report, the numerous petitions, and the statements of the Administering Authority on the questions of land and forests were noted by the Council. In its report on the Territory, the Council asked the Administering Authority, in enacting land legislation and classifying forests, to take into account, on the one hand, the traditional rights of all kinds which the indigenous communities may exercise and, on the other hand, the future economic requirements of the Territory. In order to accelerate the procedures open to indigenous inhabitants for recognition of their land rights, the Council asked the Administering Authority to recruit a sufficient number of surveyors. It also requested a more precise definition of the conception of "vacant and ownerless lands". The Council further requested the Administering Authority, in granting land concessions for agricultural purposes, to give preference as a matter of principle to settlement projects undertaken by indigenous inhabitants themselves; and, in granting forest concessions, to be guided by consideration of the economic benefits accruing to the Territory, without neglecting the traditional communal rights of the indigenous inhabitants. By resolutions 154 and 211(VI) of 3 April and 242(VII) of 29 June, the Council drew these recommendations to the attention of twenty⁴⁵ petitioners and its recommendation concerning forest concessions to the attention of four petitioners⁴⁶ (208(VI)). In resolution 154(VI) the Council further expressed the hope that, in the classification of forest reserves, the Administering Authority would ensure that no injustice was done to the Mbartsog-Owontsog Community, which had alleged, as stated in a petition from the Union des populations du Cameroun, M'Balmayo (T/Pet.5/55), the expropriation of some 4,500 hectares (approx. 11,250 acres) of land, constituting its sole patrimony.

Several other specific land disputes were brought before the Council. The Union des populations du Cameroun, Comité central du groupement de Bafou, alleged (T/Pet.5/38), inter alia, that the "Pastorale" Company had expropriated land from the people of Bafou. After noting the Administering Authority's assurance (T/518) that this land problem was being considered by the Council of Notables and would later be dealt with by the Representative Assembly, the Council, in a resolution adopted at its sixth session, on 3 April, urged the Administering Authority to intensify its efforts to settle the problem and to report on any action taken (149(VI)). With regard to a land dispute between two indigenous communities, described in a petition (T/Pet.5/59) from the Collectivité de Bonamikengue-Akwa-Douala, the Council expressed the hope that the Administering Authority would do everything in its power to hasten a satisfactory solution (158(VI)). Mr. Mathias Mbongue Minyangadou, who described (T/Pet.5/77) a long-standing dispute with the Administration over the title to certain land, was advised by the Council in a resolution adopted at its seventh session, on 29 June, that he could have the question decided by following the normal legal procedure for establishing title to land (237(VII)). The Council on 3 April informed two other petitioners, Messrs. Paul Ndzana Ntsama (T/Pet.5/18) and Jean Nyoungou Ngua (T/Pet.5/47), that their land disputes could be settled in the competent courts (148 and 150(VI) of 3 April), and, noting that a third petitioner, Mr. Carl Peter Albrechtsen (T/Pet.5/3 & Add.1), had already been so advised by the Administering Authority, the Council decided that no further action on its part was required (131(VI)).

c. SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT

Describing the general situation in the Territory, the Administering Authority stated in its annual report that the urban population was increasing at the expense of the rural population; from 1946 to 1948, the number of workers employed at Douala rose from 10,370 to 20,084. The construction of 280 dwellings, undertaken to meet the growing need for dwellings in Douala and Yaoundé, was almost completed and the construction of a number of model villages throughout the Territory was provided for under the FIDES ten-year plan. The installation of a water supply system, started in 1946 in the three main urban centres, was also nearing completion; the work at Yaoundé was expected to be finished by the end of 1949 and that at Douala and N'Kongsamba somewhat later. A Social Welfare Committee, which includes indigenous members, was set up in 1948 to co-ordinate the various social welfare activities and promote action in new fields. The Administering Authority also reported, inter alia, that the circulation of the principal newspapers had increased during the year.

The number of medical centres rose from fifteen in 1947 to 25 in 1948 and consultation centres increased from 57 to 75, according to the annual report. Medical staff in the government health services rose from 69 Europeans and 932 Africans in 1947 to 87 Europeans and 1038 Africans in 1948. The total staff in 1948 included 34 European doctors and 58 African doctors, apart from eighteen private practitioners or mission doctors and other non-government auxiliary personnel. The medical services of the Administration were provided free of charge to all indigenous inhabitants. During 1948, the Administering Authority reported, health activities on behalf of school children increased, medical inspections for detecting endemo-epidemic diseases and treatment were made compulsory and a Commission on Nutritional Hygiene was appointed to organize health propaganda throughout the Territory.

The Visiting Mission (T/462) was very favourably impressed by the efforts of the Administering Authority in the field of public health. It stated that the African population showed great confidence in the medical services. The Mission was aware, however, that much remained to be done, and it had received a number of petitions requesting the extension of medical and public health facilities.

The Council, in its report, expressed the hope that the Administering Authority would do its utmost to increase the number of African medical personnel, and recommended more intensive efforts to bring adequate medical care within the reach of all. By resolutions 227(VI) and 242-(VII), the Council called this recommendation to the attention of the petitioners concerned.⁴⁷

The Mission felt (T/462) that the relationship between wages and the cost of living in the Territory could not be appreciated objectively in the absence of adequate studies of living standards. Noting this statement, as well as allegations made in petitions⁴⁸ to the effect that wages were low in terms of purchasing power, the Council in its report on the Territory reiterated the recommendation adopted at its fourth session in 1949.⁴⁹ It expressed the hope that the results of the study of standards of living recommended at that time would be laid before it in 1951. Indicating that it did not underestimate the complexity of the problem, the Council suggested that the Administering Authority consider taking all adequate measures to increase real wages and improve the standard of living in terms of housing, clothing and medical and social services. By resolution 222(VI), the Council informed the interested petitioners of these recommendations. In another resolution (228(VI)) the Council dealt specifically with living conditions in the workers' township of New Bell, described in one of the petitions (T/Pet.5/71); the Council expressed the hope that all possible steps would be taken to improve housing and living conditions in the area and to improve water supplies, the scarcity of which, the Administering Authority indicated, was due to an unexpected and rapid rise in the population.

The Administering Authority indicated in its annual report that the recruitment of labour was still a problem in the Territory. It considered the rapid growth of industrial undertakings responsible for the big demand for skilled workers, and stated that apprentices were being engaged before they had even finished their apprenticeship. The promulgation of a labour code for the Territory, under consideration since 1947, was anticipated in 1950. The Visiting Mission was informed by the Administration that this code, as drafted, would apply to all workers in the Territory, without any racial distinction whatsoever. Freedom of work, equality of pay, total payment of wages in cash, prohibition of fines or stoppages of pay, and freedom to organize in trade unions and to strike constituted the basic principles underlying the proposed legislation. These principles, the Administering Authority asserted, were already being applied in the Territory and were guaranteed by law.

Requests for a genuine labour code and allegations of violations of trade union rights were included in thirteen petitions⁵⁰ examined by the Council.

In a resolution adopted on 3 April, the Council expressed the hope that the Administering Authority would continue to foster trade unionism in the Territory and that a labour code applicable to the Territory and embodying the principles of the appropriate International Labour Conventions would soon be adopted (221(VI)). One trade union, the Confédération générale du travail—Force ouvrière du Cameroun, alleged (T/Pet.5/-50) that it was not receiving assistance from the French Administration, which had not made available the premises in Douala as promised and which, it stated, favoured the Confédération Générale du Travail (CGT). The Administering Authority explained that, to encourage the trade union movement, it had placed a house at Douala at the disposal of the local trade unions, at that time united to the CGT. After the separation of the petitioners and the Confederation of Christian Workers from the CGT, the Administration had agreed to provide new quarters for the two new unions, but, owing to the budgetary position, this had not yet been done.

The Council recommended that the Administering Authority continue to take steps to ensure that all forms of trade unionism be allowed to develop freely and expressed the hope that all possible steps would be taken to provide the buildings required by the unions in the area (153(VI)).

One of the above petitioners alleged (T/Pet.5/43) that indigenous workers in Abong Mbang were obliged to work long hours seven days a week. In this area, according to the Administering Authority, local trade employees having a share in the profits had asked that the regulations governing hours of work be waived as they wished to keep open their shops. In a resolution adopted at its sixth session, on 3 April, the Council asked the Administering Authority to take appropriate action on this question after consultation with the persons concerned (223(VI)).

The Visiting Mission, in describing the complexities of the labour problem in the Territory, reported that the abolition of forced or compulsory labour by the Law of 11 April 1946, in the opinion of some elements of the population, had been interpreted by many Cameroonians to mean that it was no longer necessary to work in order to live; others alleged that the law was ignored and that forced labour practices had never ceased to exist and submitted petitions⁵¹ to that effect. The Administering Authority vigorously denied the existence of forced labour and stated that penalties had been applied whenever abuses had come to the notice of the authorities. The Trusteeship Council, after noting the petitions and the Administering Authority's statement, suggested in its annual report that the administrative officers concerned should guard against any practices that the people might construe as meaning that forced labour had not been eradicated.

It was alleged in one of the petitions (T/Pet.5/58) that the Chief in the subdivision of M'Balmayo forced several persons to work without pay on a road and had several times requisitioned sheep from the villages by fraud. The Administering Authority stated that these measures conformed to indigenous custom and that the livestock contributed by this community toward provisioning the district had been quite moderate. By resolution 155(VI) of 3 April, the Council referred to the Administering Authority the charges regarding the arbitrary requisitioning of sheep. By this resolution and resolutions 224-(VI) and 238(VII), the Council informed the petitioners concerned of its recommendation concerning forced labour. Related allegations that forced labour without pay was imposed on African prisoners and even on persons awaiting trial were made by the Comité directeur de Kumzse (T/Pet.5/32-4/26) and Mr. Gustave Ekotto (T/Pet.5/39). The Administering Authority denied that accused persons awaiting trial were forced to work. After noting this statement, the Council, by resolution 229(VI) of 3 April, notified the petitioners of recommendations adopted at its fourth session⁵² concerning, inter alia, the establishment of prison conditions no less favourable to indigenous prisoners than to Europeans.

The Administering Authority outlined the measures taken to overcome what it described as the low output and productivity of indigenous labour. These included increased mechanization, replacement of local labour by European personnel; and improvement of African labour, which it considered the most practicable and desirable solution.

The Council, in its report on the Territory, recognized that the Administering Authority had had to bring in European skilled workers, and that their assistance, within limits and with proper safeguards, could be beneficial to the Territory at its present stage of development. At the same time, the Council urged the Administering Authority to accelerate the training of the indigenous inhabitants in the same technical skills. By resolution 203(VI) of 3 April, the Council called this recommendation to the attention of petitioners⁵³ who had protested against the increasing European population, which rose from 3,875 in 1946 to 5,800 in 1948; it also expressed the hope that European immigration would not be allowed to prejudice the economic development of the indigenous inhabitants.

On the question of racial discrimination, the Council noted in its annual report that positive measures had been taken by the Administering Authority towards the elimination of discriminatory practices by individuals. Commending it for these measures, the Council urged it to continue its efforts to eliminate all forms of racial discrimination in the Territory. By resolution 220(VI), of 3 April, the Council drew this recommendation to the attention of petitioners⁵⁴ who had alleged the existence of various forms of racial discrimination; it later directed (239(VII)), on 29 June, that this resolution be sent to Mr. J. E. Albert Tognéy (T/Pet.5/79). Seven petitions⁵⁵ also urged full implementation of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and three⁵⁶ asked for the liberation of women. In two resolutions, both adopted at its sixth session, the Council expressed the hope that the Administering Authority would continue to take all possible steps to ensure the observance of human rights (218(VI)), and would attempt to improve the social status of women in the Territory (219(VI)).

d. EDUCATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

According to the annual report of the Administering Authority, educational expenditure had increased from 6.6 per cent of the territorial budget in 1947 to 9 per cent in 1948. Twenty public primary schools were opened during 1948, making a total of 157, and attendance rose from 18,600 in 1947 to 19,067 in 1948. The staff of public secondary and technical schools had increased from three in 1944 to nineteen in 1946 and 60 in 1948, and 194 scholarships for study in France were granted in 1948.

The Mission endorsed (T/462) the Council's previous commendation⁵⁷ of the Administering Authority for having established free education on its own initiative. While much had to be done before elementary education could be extended to the entire population of school age, the Mission stated, remarkable efforts were being made in this direction and appreciable results had been obtained. The Mission further considered that opportunities for secondary education and teacher and technical training were still too limited. Many petitions received by the Mission asked for more schools and better facilities for secondary education; the satisfaction of these demands was regarded by the Mission as worthy of the highest consideration.

The Council, in its report on the Territory, commended the Administering Authority for the progress made in the field of education. In view of the Mission's observations and the petitions, however, the Council recommended that the Administering Authority intensify its efforts to develop secondary education and technical and teachers' training in the Territory. Recalling its resolution 110(V) on higher education in Trust Territories, which recommended, inter alia, that the Administering Authority consider establishing higher educational facilities in the Cameroons, the Council expressed the hope that future annual reports would indicate the steps taken towards implementing this resolution.

These recommendations, as well as the statements made by the Council at its fourth session, were brought to the attention of 24 petitioners⁵⁸ by resolution 230(VI) adopted by the Council on 3 April. In this resolution, the Council further invited the Administering Authority to adapt textbooks and educational facilities as far as possible to local needs, and to consider consulting the indigenous inhabitants to this end.

e. OTHER QUESTIONS⁵⁹

(1) General Conclusion of the Council

The Council, in its report, commended the Administering Authority on the sense of drive and energy apparent in the development of the Territory, and expressed the hope that this development would be progressively continued.

(2) Petitions Containing Personal Requests

In addition to petitions which raised questions concerning political, economic, social and educational conditions in the Territory, the Council, during 1950, examined petitions containing personal requests or complaints. Its decisions were taken in each instance by resolutions recommended by its ad hoc Committee on Petitions and unanimously adopted by the Council on 3 April 1950, during its sixth session, and on 29 June, during its seventh session.

On five of these petitions, the Council, after noting the observations of the Administering Authority, decided by separate resolutions that no action on its part was required. These involved a protest from Mr. Manuel María Do Rio (T/Pet.5/11) against his expulsion from the Territory (147(VI)); a complaint from Mr. Nsangou Moussa (T/Pet.5/31) against the Commander of the Gendarmerie Brigade at Fouban (152(VI)); a request from Mr. Yerima Abbo Mouhamadou (T/Pet.5/57), in enforced residence at Doua, for permission to return to Meiganga (151(VI)); a protest from Mr. Ernest Eyoum (T/Pet.5/48) against a fine imposed on him by the Administrative Council (243(VII)); and a petition from Mr. Njaillou Ousmanon (T/Pet.5/80), who challenged his conviction of a criminal offence and asked to be restored to his post (240(VII)).

Two petitions⁶⁰ were declared inadmissible under rule 81 of the Council's rules of procedure since they were directed against judgments of competent courts. The petitioners complained of their unlawful arrest in 1941 for pro-German, anti-French propaganda, and asked that they be compensated.

(3) Anonymous Petitions

By resolution 162(VI) of 3 April 1950, the Council decided that four communications (T/Pet.5/R.1 to 3 relating to the Cameroons under French administration and T/Pet.5/R.4-4/R.1 relating to both Cameroons), being anonymous, called for no action as petitions. It merely took note of these communications for all useful purposes.

3. Togoland, Administered by the United Kingdom⁶¹

This Trust Territory, according to the Administering Authority's annual report,⁶² had a total indigenous population of 382,564 in 1948. The Territory, which has a total area of 13,040 square miles, consists of a strip of land about 320 miles long and, on an average, about 40 miles wide.

a. POLITICAL DEVELOPMENT

Togoland is administered as an integral part of the Gold Coast. Responsibility for its administration is vested in the Governor of the Gold Coast, who is assisted by an Executive Council on which there are no members from Togoland. As in the case of the Cameroons under British administration, Togoland is divided into two sections. According to the annual report, the northern section is further sub-divided to form one district and parts of three other districts of the Northern Territories of the Gold Coast Protectorate. The Governor is the sole legislative authority for the Northern Territories of the Gold Coast (including the northern section of Togoland); a Territorial Council for the unified area, composed of representatives of Native Authorities of the Protectorate and the Trust Territory, functions as an advisory body. The more advanced southern section forms part of a district of the Eastern Province of the Gold Coast Colony; the 31-member Gold Coast Legislative Council enacts legislation for the unified administration.

In addition to common administrative and technical services and legislative machinery, the Trust Territory shares with the Gold Coast a common budget, revenues accruing in Togoland being included without distinction in the Gold Coast budgets, and expenditures being allocated not on the basis of the over-all needs of the Trust Territory but on the basis of the needs of the joint administrative parts of the Gold Coast and Togoland.

Proposals^{62a} for reform of the Constitution of the Gold Coast and Togoland, the Trusteeship Council was informed, had been made in 1949 by an all-African committee, the Coussey Committee, set up by the Gold Coast Government. The Committee proposed the establishment of local authorities, regional administrations and a central legislature; the majority of members of each body would be elected. It considered that the northern section of Togoland had such strong ties with the Northern Territories of the Gold Coast Protectorate that it should be included in a proposed regional organization of the Protectorate, with the possible exception of the Krachi District in northern Togoland, the population of which had indicated by plebiscite that it wished to be transferred to the southern section of Togoland. The southern section, the Coussey Committee proposed, should be merged in a Trans-Volta-Southern Togoland administrative region with the Gold Coast Native Authority areas east of the River Volta.

The Visiting Mission to the Territory observed (T/465) that these proposals would have the effect of strengthening the integration of the two sections of Togoland with the neighbouring parts of the Gold Coast. Opposition to the creation of a unified Trans-Volta-Southern Togoland region was expressed in petitions from the Natural Rulers of Togoland under United Kingdom Trusteeship (T/Pet.6/18, T/Pet.6/78-7/78) and the Togoland Council (T/Pet.6/151), both petitions emanating from the southern section of the Trust Territory. These petitioners desired primarily unification of the Territory with Togoland under French Administration.⁶³ But they asked that, so long as Togoland under British administration continued to be administered as part of the Gold Coast, it should be governed as an administrative unit, having a northern and a southern council and a joint legislative assembly. The Administering Authority was of the opinion, as stated in its observations on the Mission's report (T/638), that the present local authorities still had too little experience to undertake the full measure of political responsibility suggested in these petitions. It further indicated that the northern peoples had not expressed any desire for a council.

In a dispatch to the Governor of the Gold Coast (Colonial No. 250), the United Kingdom Secretary of State for the Colonies commented on the opposition from certain parts of southern Togoland to the establishment of the Trans-Volta-Southern Togoland region. Because of this opposition and the special position of Togoland as a Trust Territory, he felt that he must examine the proposal of the Coussey Committee with particular attention and stated that the decision to be taken on it must clearly depend on the interests of the people in the area. He suggested that arrangements be made in the meantime for the representation of southern Togoland on the Gold Coast Legislative Council.

Select Committees had been appointed, the Administering Authority informed the Trusteeship Council, to work out the details of constitutional reform. This step was welcomed by the Trusteeship Council, which also expressed satisfaction at the assurance that the wishes of the people would be carefully considered before any decisions were taken on the proposed regional arrangements for the Territory.

The measures taken in response to complaints from leaders in the southern section were described by the Administering Authority and the Mission, the latter indicating that they did not seem to satisfy the wishes of most of the Native Authorities concerned. A Southern Territorial Council, composed of persons chosen by Native Authorities from among their own members, was formed to meet the popular desire for a regional body. It had elected a Togoland member to the Gold Coast Legislative Council, increasing total membership in that body to 32, and appointed in each case one Togolander to represent the southern section on the Gold Coast Cocoa Marketing Board and on the other Gold Coast bodies affecting the southern section.

These measures were noted with satisfaction by the Trusteeship Council in its report on the Territory. But it urged the Administering Authority to take any steps necessary to ensure that Togoland representation on such Gold Coast bodies was proportionate to the Territory's population or interests and to continue to develop as rapidly as possible local and sectional representative organs in the Trust Territory. It expressed the hope that the Southern Territorial Council would provide increasing opportunities to develop the people's capacities for self-government.

A petition from the Secretary, Togoland United Nations Association (T/Pet.6/152), stating that the farmers, unions and the general population of Togoland protested the unconstitutionality of the election of the Togoland representative on the Gold Coast Legislative Council, was examined by the Trusteeship Council. On one of the complaints, the Administering Authority observed (T/697) that the three states of Nkonya, Anfoega and Santrokofi had been left out of the elections because of their refusal to amalgamate to form one Native Authority or to join existing Native Authorities under the system of local government introduced by the Administering Authority in 1933 for the federation of the smaller Native Authorities. Furthermore, the petitioners had not availed themselves of their right under the electoral regulations to protest against the election procedure to the competent court. In the circumstances, the Council decided, on 10 July 1950, to take no action on this petition (248-(VII)). It took a similar decision (261-(VII)) with respect to an allegation by the Nkonya State Council (T/Pet.6/147), concerning the status of chiefs; in this case the Administering Authority stated that the petitioners had not been deprived of their traditional titles and that when Nkonya decided to amalgamate it would be granted full rights of legislation and jurisdiction vested in Native Authorities. Hodo VI, Fiaga of Anfoega Division, alleged (T/Pet.6/19) that the ordinance governing local government was undemocratic, unconstitutional and foreign to Native tradition. Because his Division had refused to amalgamate, he maintained, the Administering Authority had wilfully retarded its progress. This was denied by the ⁶³ See pp. 752-53.

Administering Authority, which explained (T/478) that it had made constant efforts to educate the people on the advantages of amalgamation; they would in any case be incorporated under some local authority under the projected Coussey proposals. The Council, in resolution 282(VII) of 17 July, called these observations to the petitioner's attention and asked the Administering Authority to continue its efforts to convince the people of the advantages of amalgamation or other reforms envisaged.

Another petition, from Samuel Walter Atsri-dom IV, Divisional Chief of Kpedze (T/Pet.6/74-7/77), complaining of the whole system of amalgamated divisions, was dealt with by the Council in a resolution (272(VII)) covering political, economic, social and educational questions.⁶⁴ In this resolution, the Council also dealt with the question of the operation of the Trusteeship System, raised in petitions from the Buem Native Authority (T/Pet.6/116-7/107) and the Togoland United Nations Association (T/Pet.6/118). The former expressed the hope that although the Trusteeship Agreement did not mention the termination of Trusteeship, this termination "would be early considered for a change into self-government". The latter alleged that the Council's earlier recommendations for measures to hasten the political advancement of the Trust Territories, as well as its resolution 36(III)⁶⁵ on the provision of information concerning the United Nations to the peoples of Trust Territories, were not being implemented.

Allegations to the effect that the selection of non-chiefs as members of Native Authority Councils was undemocratic were made by the youth of Krachi, Buem, Atando, Akpini, Avatime, Aso-gli, Nkonya, Anfoega and Santrokofi (T/Pet.6/88) and the Togoland United Nations Association Youth Section (T/Pet.6/121). The petitioners also asked that the members of the Southern Togoland Council be elected by public vote. In reply, the Administering Authority indicated (T/685 and 693) that the non-chiefs, who formed about one third of each Native Authority, were at present nominated in consultation with the people, but would in future be elected. Describing the modifications introduced by the Native Authority Ordinance, 1949, the Administering Authority indicated that the composition of the Native Authorities had been made more rather than less democratic. The more advanced pattern of Native administration provided by this Ordinance was noted with approval by the Council in its annual report. The proposals of the Coussey Committee for the introduction of limited suffrage at all levels of government were also noted with satisfaction. While it appreciated the difficulty of introducing at once a modern system of suffrage, the Council recommended that all necessary educative measures be taken to prepare the people for the adoption of universal suffrage with the least delay possible. By resolution 262(VII) of 17 July 1950, the Council notified the petitioners of this recommendation.

In reply to another petition, from the Convention Peoples' Party, Upper Trans-Volta Region (T/Pet.6/115), alleging that District Commissioners exercised judicial as well as executive powers in Togoland and in fact had more power than the traditional chiefs, the Administering Authority stated (T/679) that its policy was to build up Native Authorities into local government bodies. It assured the Council that the powers of District Commissioners were becoming increasingly advisory and would become almost entirely so under the reforms proposed by the Coussey Committee. Noting this statement, the Council, by resolution 260(VII) of 17 July, expressed the hope that the Administering Authority would pursue its policy of progressively increasing the responsibilities entrusted to the indigenous inhabitants.

With regard to the northern section of the Territory, the Administering Authority had described in its annual report the changes made in the system of local government in the Dagomba District. These changes, inter alia, provided that sub-chiefs be elected by secret ballot instead of appointed. Noting this progress with satisfaction, the Council, in its report on the Territory, urged the Administering Authority to push forward as rapidly as possible with the political education of the inhabitants so that they could participate fully in the political advancement of the Territory.

The question of the administrative integration of the Territory with the Gold Coast was examined by the Visiting Mission and by the Council's Committee on Administrative Unions.⁶⁶

The Mission considered that an appraisal of the future political development of the Territory depended to a large extent on the solution of the problems raised by the demand for unification of the two Togolands.⁶⁷ In view of the small size and population of the Territory under British administration and its largely artificial boundaries, the Mission stated, it was difficult to contemplate its future except in association with Togoland under French administration or with the Gold Coast. The choice between these alternatives depended on whether unification of all or part of the two Togolands was to take place. The proposed revisions of the Gold Coast Constitution, the Mission noted, revealed that the Territory was being directed as an indistinguishable part of the Gold Coast and also revealed that the joint administration was making rapid strides toward some form of autonomy.

Public opinion in the Territory was divided. In the south, the Mission stated, the administrative unification of the northern and southern parts of the Territory was sought, as a step toward the unification of the two Togolands. There were many objections⁶⁸ to the administration of the Territory as part of the Gold Coast and to the powers exercised over Togoland by the executive and legislative organs of the Gold Coast. In the north, as indicated in four petitions⁶⁹ received by the Mission, most of the chiefs asked that Trusteeship over their area be abolished and that their people be absorbed completely as part of the population of the Gold Coast; if the views of these chiefs could be taken as representing the views of their people, the Mission adduced, nearly half of the people of the Trust Territory shared this desire.

Other territorial adjustments were requested in four additional petitions from the northern section. In one, the transfer of the Krachi District from the northern to the southern section of the Territory was sought by the State Council of the Krachi Native Authority (T/Pet.6/14) on the grounds that the people of Krachi were more closely related to those of the south. Certain tribes in the Gonja state, as indicated in petitions from the Head Men of Nawuli (T/Pet.6/69) and the Nana Kojo Kuma of Nanjoro (T/Pet.6/70), did not share the common desire of the Gonjas for annexation to the Gold Coast; these petitioners asked to be administered as part of the Krachi District, where, they said, their people really belonged. Another petition, from Chief Tabi Nambiema and other chiefs in the name of the population of Mango (T/Pet.6/65-7/74), requested the unification, under a single administration, of the Tchocossi tribe, which was divided between the two Togolands.

The Mission concluded that four points should be borne in mind in connexion with the over-all question of integration with the Gold Coast:

- (1) the difference between the north and south;
- (2) if the Trust Territory is not economically viable, its total separation would be a blessing of doubtful value;
- (3) the political movement of unification was so advanced that for the Togoland under British administration to stand alone appeared to be neither desirable nor practical; and
- (4) the Territory, which was being directed constitutionally along the same lines as the Gold Coast, should be able to derive from this association the same benefits that accrue to the Gold Coast.

The Administering Authority observed (T/638) that it fully appreciated these four points, which it had itself emphasized in the past.

The Council's Committee on Administrative Unions reviewed the existing laws governing the administrative integration of Togoland with the Gold Coast and the proposed constitutional reforms. As in the case of the Cameroons under British administration, the Committee was informed that the character of the administrative arrangements was affected by the fragmentary nature of the Territory, the configuration of the land and the ethnic affinities of the people, and that the establishment of a separate administration would have imposed an unjustifiable burden on the Territory's limited resources. The administrative arrangements for the whole of the Trust Territory, the representative of the United Kingdom further informed the Committee, would be studied by the enlarged Anglo-French Standing Consultative Commission for Togoland Affairs, which the two Administering Authorities had decided to establish in connexion with the Ewe problem. The requests from the northern section for territorial adjustments, both Administering Authorities agreed, would also be considered by this Commission.

The Committee concluded (T/L.96) that because of the various proposals under consideration, further examination of the administrative union of the Territory with the Gold Coast could not usefully be undertaken at that time. This conclusion was accepted by the Council and included in its resolution 293(VII) of 17 July 1950 on the question of administrative unions.

With respect to the petitions from the northern section described above, the Council, by resolution 295(VII) of 20 July 1950, drew the petitioners' attention to the statements of the Administering Authority and asked the latter to keep it informed on future developments. The Council also informed the petitioners that their requests would be further examined at the same time as future annual reports and explained that the question of altering the boundary between the Gold Coast and the Trust Territory was outside the Council's competence.

The other questions raised in petitions, including the status of the Territory and its integration with the Gold Coast, were dealt with by the Council in a comprehensive resolution (272-(VII)), covering economic, social and educational, as well as political questions.⁷⁰

b. ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

The economic basis of the Territory, according to the Administering Authority's annual report, is almost wholly agricultural and pastoral, approximately 95 per cent of the people being full-time peasant farmers, living slightly above subsistence level. Under normal conditions, no serious deficiency in food supplies exists, it was stated, except in the north. During 1948, food crops were grown on all cultivated land, with the exception of a small proportion devoted to cocoa and coffee, for local consumption and export. Cocoa, coffee and palm kernels were the Territory's chief exports. The Territory's cocoa production during 1948, according to the annual report, amounted to 19,072 tons, an increase of 3,519 tons over 1947, and about 500 tons of coffee and 450 tons of palm kernels were marketed during the year.

In its annual report on the Territory, the Administering Authority stated that, as in 1947, no separate trade or financial figures were available for the Trust Territory. It was estimated, however, that for the financial year ended 31 March 1948, the proportion of Gold Coast public revenue and expenditure figures relating to Togoland totalled £363,900 for revenue and £625,540 for expenditure. The Trust Territory's proportion of Administering Authority grants could not be given, it was explained, until the revision of the ten-year development plan of the Gold Coast, including Togoland, was completed. The Economic and Social Commission of the Togoland Association for the United Nations (T/Pet.6/81-7/79) and the Togoland United Nations Association (T/Pet.6/119) requested that the total revenue of Togoland be separately determined, the latter Association suggesting that the estimates of revenue and expenditure given in the annual report should not be taken seriously. The Administering Authority observed (T/709) that the figures given in the 1948 report were provisional estimates and it was expected that the 1949 report would contain more accurate estimates. But there was no doubt, it stated, that the expenditure on Togoland greatly exceeded the revenue from the Territory.

The Trusteeship Council, in its report on the Territory, noted with appreciation the Administering Authority's efforts to provide more accurate accounts for Togoland and welcomed the assurance that methods of providing separate and detailed import and export statistics would be studied. It recommended that the Administering Authority make a further thorough study of possible methods of providing the Council annually with separate and precise figures relating to the Trust Territory.

With respect to requests from Mr. E. A. Anthonio and nine others (T/Pet.6/103-7/95) and Mr. E. K. Akotia (T/Pet.6/126) that a progressive tax should replace the poll tax, the Administering Authority stated (T/651) that everyone in the Territory could afford the tax payments, which varied from 4 to 6 shillings per year for men and half those amounts for women.

Cocoa, which is produced in the southern section of Togoland, is the principal cash crop of the Trust Territory. All the cocoa produced in Togoland, as in the Gold Coast, is purchased (through agents, established firms and co-operatives) and marketed by the Gold Coast Cocoa Marketing Board, which began operating in 1947. During 1948, according to the Administering Authority's annual report, the Board continued to fix a guaranteed annual price to the producers. In 1947-48, the mean price c.i.f. New York was £207 per ton and that paid to the Togoland producers at Ho was £73. No separate account was kept of surplus funds derived from the sale of Togoland cocoa. For the year ending 30 September 1948, the Board realized a net surplus on operations of £24,069,380, bringing net available funds to £36,236,885. Of this amount, some £20,000,000 was set aside for stabilization reserve; some £9,000,000 for the rehabilitation of areas affected by the swollen shoot disease, which had infected about 60,000,000 cacao trees in the Gold Coast; and smaller amounts for development purposes, including £1,000,000 to the Gold Coast University College, for agricultural research. In 1948-49, the Cocoa Marketing Board increased the producers' price to £121; this price had to be met in part from the stabilization reserve, since the New York price had dropped to £105 by April 1949. The Board incurred a net deficit of £134,000 for the year. Complaints that the Board was set up without consultation with the Togoland cocoa producers and that the latter were not represented on the Board had been made by the Conference of Farmers of Togoland under United Kingdom Trusteeship (T/Pet.6/15). It demanded the immediate return to the Togoland farmers of their proportionate share of the accumulated profits and the re-establishment of free marketing. These complaints were referred by the Trusteeship Council in 1949 (94(V)) to the Visiting Mission for investigation.

The Mission reported (T/465) on the development of cocoa marketing in the Gold Coast and in Togoland, and gave its views on the operations of the twelve-member Cocoa Marketing Board and the complaints of the petitioner. Although there had been no direct representation of the Togoland farmers on the Board, it noted that, according to the Administering Authority, each member of the Board has had the interests of the whole industry at heart but that it was intended, nevertheless, to increase the membership by one Togoland member selected by the Southern Togoland Council. With respect to the Board's first two years of operations, the Mission noted that except for part of the 1948/49 season, the price paid to the farmer was considerably below the world price, even allowing for freight and other costs, and the Board was therefore able to put substantial profits into reserve. Quoting the prices for the first part of 1949/50, the Mission adduced that the Board could be expected to make a further large profit for that season, unless there was a serious drop in the world price. The Mission indicated that the Board Chairman, in his annual report for 1947/48, had stated that it was essential that some £30,000,000 should eventually be devoted to the stabilization reserve fund to protect the farmer against the vagaries of the world market. However, in discussions with members of the Board, the Mission was informed that the future outlook seemed good and that no difficulty in disposing of the crops could be foreseen for several years to come. With its stabilization reserve at £20,000,000, the Mission stated, the Board felt that it was in a position to spend for development projects. Its policy, it was explained, would be to make allocations on the basis of the whole area, without distinguishing between Togoland and the Gold Coast.

Commenting on the petition (T/Pet.6/15), the Mission considered that, in general, in view of the chaotic state of the cocoa industry in the past as a result of violent price fluctuations, the present stabilized marketing policy was sound in principle. It also believed that the policy was basically in the interests of the producers. On the other hand, the Mission considered that the Togoland farmers' desire to see concrete benefits brought to the Trust Territory from the surplus profits was worthy of consideration, especially if, as seemed the case, they were prepared to see these benefits applied to the community as a whole and not exclusively to the farmers.

The Administering Authority, in its observations (T/638) on the Mission's report, noted the Mission's agreement with the principle of stabilization in the interests of the producers. It explained, however, that the stabilization fund of £20,000,000 was not regarded by the Chairman and the General Manager of the Cocoa Marketing Board as a safe figure; it represented only about 40 shillings a load on one year's average crop and the range in selling prices during 1947/48 was 43 shillings a load. The Administering Authority further stated that the desire of certain Togoland farmers to see concrete benefits brought to the Territory from the surplus funds would be kept in mind by the Board when it was in a position to devote funds for development.

The petition from the Conference of Farmers of Togoland under United Kingdom Trusteeship (T/Pet.6/15) as well as similar views expressed in additional petitions⁷¹ received by the Mission, were considered by the Council at its seventh session, together with the relevant observations of the Mission and of the Administering Authority (T/358, 656, 666, 679, 683, 689, 690, 706, 709). The latter informed the Council, inter alia, that Togoland was now represented on the Cocoa Marketing Board by a divisional chief of Buem. With respect to the disposition of funds, it was of the opinion that these were being spent in the interests of all the inhabitants of the Territory. It further stated that in the absence any constructive suggestions, no changes in the cocoa-marketing organization were contemplated.

In its report on the Territory, the Trusteeship Council welcomed the appointment of a representative of the Togoland farmers to the Board and expressed the hope that this appointment would prove to be a successful means of bringing the farmers and people of the cocoa areas of Togoland into consultation with regard to the allocation of funds from the Board's reserves for developments in Togoland.

A request from representatives of the Conference of Farmers of Togoland under United Kingdom Trusteeship to speak in support of their written petition was granted by the Council. Accordingly, Messrs. F. Y. Asare and S. G. Antor were heard in the Council on 10 July and in the ad hoc Committee on Petitions on 14 July. They stated that Togoland had to supply a high percentage of West African cocoa, owing to the cocoa disease and the cutting down of cacao trees in the Gold Coast. Yet the figures issued by the Cocoa Marketing Board had credited all of the profits, which were substantial, to the Gold Coast, leaving Togoland out of account. When the farmers had inquired as to the tonnage of Togoland cocoa, in order to estimate the Territory's share in the profits, the answer had been that no separate accounts were kept for Togoland. It was not possible to get the figures on the amounts sold from individual cocoa farmers, as they sold their cocoa in small amounts throughout the season and, being unable to read or write, could not keep records of their transactions. Neither were they able to determine whether any of the profits were being used in the interest of the Trust Territory. It was later estimated, according to local newspapers, that Togoland had produced over 21,000 tons of cocoa per year, but the Togoland farmers had refused to accept this figure, which they felt fell far short of the truth. The petitioners demanded a separate cocoa marketing board for southern Togoland. Togoland representation on the Gold Coast Board, Mr. Antor stated, was entirely inadequate, and, as a result of the method of election of the one Togoland member on the Board, the member elected did not adequately represent the cocoa farmers of Togoland and was not in any way responsible to them.

The special representative of the Administering Authority disputed this statement, stating that the Togoland member had been elected by the Southern Togoland Council, a representative and constitutionally elected body, and that he was truly representative of the Togoland farmers. Should the Board decide to allocate funds from the reserves for development, he assured the Council, it would take fully into account the interests of the cocoa areas in Togoland. The establishment of a separate board for Togoland, however, was considered impracticable. Referring to the estimate of 19,000 tons given in the 1948 annual report as the total cocoa production of Togoland (see above), the special representative thought that, in the light of more recent information, the figure could be put at 24,000 tons for that year, and that of the Gold Coast for the same period at some 268,000 tons. The Council was further informed that the Administering Authority was prepared to ask the Cocoa Marketing Board to make public, and in particular to make known to the petitioners, as soon as possible, the figures for cocoa produced in the Trust Territory both during the current year and in subsequent years.

The Council, on 20 July, adopted a draft resolution proposed by its ad hoc Committee on Petitions (T/L.106). By this resolution (294-(VII)), the Council called the petitioners' attention to the statement in its report with respect to the appointment of a Togoland member to the Cocoa Marketing Board (see above). It expressed the hope that the Administering Authority would, in accordance with its assurance, obtain from the Board separate figures on the tonnage of cocoa produced in Togoland and that such figures would be made available annually. It recommended that the Administering Authority invite the Board to consider setting aside a fair and adequate proportion of its surplus funds—over and above reasonable stabilization reserves—for developments in Togoland or for other benefits of the inhabitants. The Council further recommended that the Administering Authority keep under constant review the representation of Togoland interests on the Board and continue to bear in mind the principle that the Trust Territory be adequately represented.

Commenting on an allegation by Mr. Winfried K. Etsi Tettey (T/Pet.6/133-7/111) that, in spite of existing laws, large fractions of land had been bought by non-indigenous Africans, mostly from the Gold Coast, the Administering Authority explained (T/690) that the alienation of land to a foreigner without the consent of the Governor was prohibited by law. Existing laws governed only transfer by purchase, however; consequently, some land might be leased to foreigners, but no sales of land had been permitted. Moreover, enforcement of the observance of the land tenure system was left to the people and the chiefs were responsible for ensuring that the land was preserved for the people's benefit. These statements were referred to Mr. Tettey by the Council, which decided on 17 July that no action on its part was called for in the circumstances (263(VII)).

About 40 square miles of new forest reserves were demarcated in southern Togoland during 1948, the Administering Authority reported, bringing the total of reserved hill areas to 230 square miles; a further 67 square miles in the northern section were examined for possible reservation. The Chiefs, Councillors, Elders and people of Luvudo asked in a petition to the Council (T/Pet.6/89) that the law relating to the forest reserve in the Dodome District be modified to allow the people to earn a living. After noting the Administering Authority's observations (T/647) that forest reserves were essential to the welfare of the people, and that ownership of the land involved did not change, the Council expressed the hope (267(VII)) that the Administering Authority would keep trying to make the petitioners understand their own interest in the establishment of the reserves.

Three other petitions relating to land problems were examined by the Council. In one of these, from Mr. Weto Klu and others, for the people of Awudome (T/Pet.6/97), the petitioners objected to a court decision on their land dispute with the Abuties and asked for a reconsideration of their case. It was explained by the Administering Authority (T/687) that the time-limit for appeals had long since expired and that the case was therefore res judicata and could not be reopened. Claiming to be the natural ruler of Nawuri Division, Adewamena, Blagyaehene, stated (T/Pet.6/113) that he and his followers had been driven off their lands by the Government and that, in his attempt to save his land and people, he had been arrested, beaten and imprisoned for four months without trial. On behalf of the Administering Authority, it was stated that the petitioners and some others, to escape direct taxation, had voluntarily left Nawuri to go to Krachi before 1932, that there was no Nawuri Division and Adewamena had no claim or right to represent the Nawuris or to use the title Blagyaehene, and that he had been arrested, tried and convicted by a competent court for a criminal offence. In both instances, by resolutions 244 and 291(VII) of 10 and 17 July, the Council referred the petitioners to the statements of the Administering Authority and decided that no action on its part was required. Chief Gazari III of Aveme Gbohome, Head of Aveme and President of the Ewe Union, complained (T/Pet.6/87) that the boundary between the Gold Coast and Togoland had divided the Ewe community and created land problems between the Ewes and the Twis. The Council, on 20 July, decided to take no action on this petition since the question of proposed changes in the boundaries was outside its competence and the land disputes could be dealt with by local courts (296(VII)).

With reference to a recommendation made by the Trusteeship Council in 1948 that measures be taken to develop rapidly the northern section of Togoland, the Administering Authority gave in its report a comprehensive description of the situation in this area. The northern section, it explained, was relatively undeveloped because of its natural handicaps, chiefly climate, soil, water shortage and transport problems. The urgent need to overcome these handicaps was fully realized, as well as the necessity to risk undertaking certain types of development without fully adequate basic data in order that the northern section might reach a stage of economic advancement on a level with that of the south. To minimize the risks, a preliminary economic survey of the Northern Territories of the Gold Coast, including the northern section of the Trust Territory, was being conducted, and it was anticipated that more detailed surveys into particular subjects might be required. A soil fertility survey had been undertaken in the Gold Coast under the direction of a specialist in this field, but there were difficulties in getting the staff for all the surveys required and there was no immediate prospect of a full reconnaissance soil survey in the northern section of Togoland. Plans had been completed for a large-scale scheme of mechanized farming—farming with bullock-drawn ploughs—on a co-operative basis in the Northern Territories and the Administering Authority considered that the results obtained in the first five years might provide data for a similar scheme in the northern section of Togoland if suitable soils could be found. Meanwhile, farmers were being encouraged to grow cash crops as a result of a government guarantee to buy surpluses of a number of the principal food crops at fixed minimum prices.

A full programme to develop adequate water supplies had been drawn up and was being executed as fast as available finance, staff and equipment permitted. Transport and marketing problems were also being reviewed. Experts were examining the question of establishing a hydro-electric project at Ejena in the Gold Coast, which would make the Volta River navigable beyond Yeji in the northern section of Togoland and would be combined with a scheme of river transportation. The exploitation of the Volta was considered by the Visiting Mission as the most important single item of development under examination. In describing the project, however, the Administering Authority estimated that it would not be possible, under the most favourable circumstances, to operate any scheme of river transportation before 1955.

The Administering Authority emphasized in its report that the utmost potential economic development of northern Togoland might still prove extremely limited. Furthermore, it was stated, it was necessary first of all to stress the provision of essential needs, such as an uncontaminated and regular water supply near every village and agricultural area, the eradication of debilitating diseases, improvement of nutritional standards and replacement of apathy with a genuine enthusiasm for education and advance in all fields.

The Visiting Mission, in its observations on the economic development of Togoland under British administration (T/465), noted the frankness with which the Administering Authority revealed the problems and difficulties inherent in a land poor in natural resources and showing little evidence of development in the modern sense. It found the people equally frank in expressing their impatience at the relatively slow rate of progress. The Mission was particularly impressed with the inadequacy of road communications. The maintenance of privately owned ferries over rivers where bridges might normally be expected it considered obsolete and inefficient. Two of these ferries, over the Oti and Asukawkaw rivers in Togoland, were described by the Mission. Commenting on the Mission's report, the Administering Authority stated (T/638) that the policy was to replace ferries by bridges, where practicable. With regard to road communications, the Administering Authority adduced that in actual mileage as related to area and economic requirements, the Territory had a close network of roads. These were constantly being improved and extended, it stated, but over-all requirements and priorities had to be taken into account.

A number of petitions from the Territory⁷² complained of the limited number of roads, the poor conditions of existing roads and the complete lack of railways and the resulting hardships suffered by the people both commercially and otherwise. Commenting on these petitions, the Administering Authority (T/358, 365, 647, 656, 664, 669, 683, 684) referred to its observations on the Mission's report. It also stated that hold-ups were bound to occur after torrential rain until the roads were tarmetted, but that the money available for road maintenance had been greatly increased during 1948-49 and the results would soon become apparent. It considered, however, that there was no economic justification for a railway.

The lack of postal, telephone, telegraph and radio facilities and the limited contact of large areas of the Territory with the outside world were referred to in ten petitions.⁷³ It was observed by the Administering Authority (T/647, 649, 669, 683, 709) that these facilities were being developed in accordance with a comprehensive ten-year plan and the services were extended to different areas as priorities and shortages of materials permitted.

The Mission considered that the Administering Authority should propose a satisfactory and long-term solution for the problem of providing adequate water supplies. This problem, especially in the middle of the Territory, impressed the Mission as being one of the most important aspects of the social well-being of the people, apart from its economic importance. Describing the situation during its visit, when the rainy season was past, the Mission reported that streams and wells were drying up and the people were beginning to face their annual problem of finding and carrying water to their homes. It was confronted with many complaints of hardship, fears of illness and infection from polluted water sources, and pleas for help in securing adequate supplies. These complaints were also contained in petitions,⁷⁴ some of which also referred to the absence of electricity.

The Administering Authority, in its observations on the Mission's report (T/638) and on the petitions (T/657, 664, 670, 677, 679) indicated that it fully appreciated the urgency and importance of the problem of water supplies, and provided details on their development, which was being hampered by the shortage of staff and serious delays in the delivery of materials. Nevertheless, improvements had been made in the piped water supply at Ho, and a second piped supply in the Territory, for Yendi, was being put into operation by the end of 1949. Elsewhere, among other measures taken or planned, wells were being dug, and dams and some cisterns were being constructed. In its report on the Territory, the Council recommended that the Administering Authority devote the closest attention to securing as rapidly as possible an adequate water supply for the inhabitants of Togoland.

It noted with appreciation the Administering Authority's full account of the difficulties it was trying to overcome in order to develop the backward northern section of Togoland, as previously recommended by the Council. It expressed the hope that the Administering Authority would accelerate its efforts to develop this area more rapidly, that the soil fertility survey being made could be extended to the northern section soon, and, further, that the Administering Authority would consider providing the services of an agricultural officer for the area.

The inadequacy of roads and river-crossings as reported by the Mission was noted by the Council, which concurred with the Mission's observations on the importance of better communications for the general economic development of the Territory. The Council accordingly recommended that the Administering Authority intensify its programme of road communications in order to provide more adequate communication facilities in the Territory. Recognizing the need to introduce new methods to improve communications and increase agricultural production in order to raise the Territory's economic level and the standard of living of the people, the Council recommended that the Administering Authority explore and use every possible means of securing the necessary technical equipment and advice. It also suggested that the Administering Authority examine the possibility of securing aid under the United Nations Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance for Economic Development.

By resolution 265(VII) of 17 July, the Council called its recommendations on technical equipment and assistance to the attention of a number of petitioners⁷⁵ who had asked that modern methods of farming be introduced in the Territory. It noted the assurances of the Administering Authority (T/365, 648, 656, 677, 684, 689, 690, 692) that farmers are given every encouragement to improve their agricultural methods and that the Government's advice and assistance is always available. The Council expressed the hope that the Administering Authority would increase its efforts to assist farmers in developing their farms and improving agricultural methods and to instruct them in ways of counteracting problems of terrain and soil erosion, and that it would continue to develop scientific research on these matters.

General improvements in the Vakpo and Liat Divisions of the Akpini State were asked for by Togbui Gbogbolulu, Divisional Head Chief of Vakpo (T/Pet.6/84), and the Liat Literate Union (T/Pet.6/77). The former complained about the medical facilities, economic development, water supply, town planning and postal and telecommunication services in Vakpo; the latter requested the establishment of a post office and a medical dispensary and the provision of sanitary officers in Liat. The Administering Authority stated (T/688, T/642) that there were 23 divisions in the Akpini State, with a total population of less than 34,000. Since improvements were dependent on available funds and personnel, it suggested that the people of Vakpo and Liat, if they wished, could pay higher taxes to obtain better facilities. Neither division had a volume of mail sufficient to justify the establishment of a post office. The people of Vakpo, the Administering Authority stated, could probably obtain assistance from Government funds if they undertook to build a dispensary for themselves, and they could apply to the Rural Development Committee, established in the Southern Section in 1949, for financial assistance for road repairs. The Council noted with sympathy the desire of the Divisional Head Chief of Vakpo for the economic and social improvement of his division and expressed the hope that the Administering Authority would try to encourage by all means at its disposal the development of this division (251(VII) of 17 July). In a separate resolution (253(VII)), the Council decided that no action on its part was called for regarding the establishment of a post office at Liat; it expressed the hope, however, that the Administering Authority would develop the medical facilities in that division to the utmost within the limits of available funds and personnel.

In its annual report, the Administering Authority stated that there were 12 registered primary co-operative societies in Togoland in 1948, all in the southern section of the Territory. Ten of these, it was reported, were engaged primarily in marketing agricultural products and were handling approximately 18 per cent of the Territory's cocoa production.

The establishment of an indigenous controlled farmers' co-operative society to enable farmers to get higher prices for their products was sought by the Convention Peoples' Party, Upper Trans-Volta Region (T/Pet.6/115) and the establishment of consumer stores was requested by the Conference of Farmers of Togoland under United Kingdom Trusteeship (T/Pet.6/15 & Add.1).

Commenting on the petitions, the Administering Authority assured the Council that there was nothing to prevent the inhabitants from forming co-operative societies and that their creation had been encouraged for years. Noting this assurance, the Council, by resolution 269(VII) of 17 July, expressed the hope that the Administering Authority would continue to foster the creation and development of such societies.

The Conference of Farmers of Togoland (T/Pet.6/15 & Add.1), as well as the Communal Development Commission, Kpandu (T/Pet.6/76) and the Youth of Krachi, Buem, Atando, Akpini, Avatime, Asogli, Nkonya, Anfoega and Santrokofi (T/Pet.6/88) petitioned for the development of community centres. In its observations on these petitions, the Administering Authority stated (T/693) that, although increased provision had been made for mass education and communal development schemes, the ultimate success of the community development drive depended on local initiative. The Rural Development Committee was prepared to aid applicants in meritorious cases, the Council was further informed. By resolution 264(VII) of 17 July, the Council drew the petitioners' attention to the statement of the Administering Authority and expressed the hope that the latter would continue taking all possible steps to foster communal development and that the indigenous inhabitants would fully co-operate in this work.

Most of the complaints raised in the following petitions, as well as those concerning water supplies, roads, communications, taxation and finance described above, were dealt with by the Council in a comprehensive resolution covering political, economic, social and educational questions (272(VII)).⁷⁶

The establishment of a national bank was requested by the Economic and Social Commission of the Togoland Association for the United Nations (T/Pet.6/81-7/79), and a credit society to act as a medium for the sale of agricultural produce was considered desirable by the Conference of Farmers of Togoland under United Kingdom Trusteeship (T/Pet.6/15 & Add.1). These petitioners and Nana Yao Buakah IV, Sub-Divisional Chief of Baglo, Buem State (Pet.6/86-7/82), also asked for the removal of trade restrictions.

On this question, the Administering Authority stated (T/358, T/365) that the import licensing system was the same as in most parts of the sterling area, and that there were no restrictions on the marketing of produce other than those imposed for health reasons and the laws restricting the time period for selling the cocoa crops. Other petitioners⁷⁷ considered that local industries such as the weaving industry at Avatime and the brick and tile industries at Dzokpe, should be re-established and developed. It was stated by the Administering Authority (T/649, 669, 684, 690, 693) that the Government was willing to assist local industrial enterprise wherever it showed itself. One petition concerning the Avatime weaving industry, from the Weavers of Amedzofe (T/Pet.6/130), was dealt with in a separate Council resolution. The petitioners sought help in procuring weaving machines, looms and other material. The Administering Authority explained (T/661) that subsidies for this industry had been considerable during the war but were not thought justified after that time and the industry failed. After the Rural Development Committee was inaugurated, however, attempts were made to revive the Avatime weaving industry and the aid of the Gold Coast Industrial Development Corporation, set up in 1948, had been obtained. After noting the Administering Authority's statements, the Council, by resolution 252(VII) of 17 July, expressed the hope that the Administering Authority would continue to encourage the weavers of Amedzofe.

In response to a query from Mr. W. K. E. Tettey (T/Pet.6/133-7/111) as to whether the iron ore mines could be developed, the Administering Authority declared (T/690) that there was no prospect of the economic utilization of the Territory's mineral resources, which were practically non-existent. The Convention Peoples' Party, Upper Trans-Volta Region (T/Pet.6/115), Mr. E. K. Akotia (T/Pet.6/126), Mr. A. A. Abaye (T/Pet.6/128) and the Togoland Council (T/Pet.6/151) alleged that the Territory as a whole had a backward economy and they sought improvements in the general economic situation. The Administering Authority, in its observations on this question (T/663), described its efforts to foster the economic advancement of the Territory. It would continue these efforts, it stated, but indicated that there was little hope of economic progress apart from cocoa growing.

c. SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT

In describing social conditions in the Territory, the Administering Authority reported that the availability of consumer goods had improved in 1948 as against the year before, and the further increase in cocoa prices had resulted in increased purchasing power in the cocoa areas. However, it stated, the average level of market prices in the southern section rose slightly during the year, as did working-class monthly rents and the prices of most imported goods. While no cost-of-living indices were currently kept for the Territory, an extensive survey of the Territory, including cost-of-living studies, was planned as soon as qualified staff became available. The Administering Authority pointed out the problems attendant upon sociological research in the area in view of the complexities of the existing social structure; as an example, it referred to the difficulty of obtaining reliable figures for the cost of any particular goods to an average family, given the elaborate system of petty trading which was prevalent.

According to the Administering Authority's annual report, approximately 20,000 to 25,000 workers were employed in cocoa farming, 700 by the Government and 1,200 by the Native Authorities during 1948. Wage rates remained the same as in 1947. Wages in the southern section varied from 2 shillings, 6 pence, per day for labourers to a maximum for overseers of 200 shillings per month and were lower in the northern section. There was little opportunity for the absorption of skilled labour in the southern section; in the northern section, the supply of unskilled labour exceeded the demand.

In a petition examined by the Trusteeship Council, the Togo Political Road Labourers' Union claimed (T/Pet.6/136) that their wages of 2 shillings, 6 pence, per day were low in relation to the high cost of living. The Council was informed by the Administering Authority that increased cost-of-living allowances had come into force on 1 April 1950 and there had been no further complaints on the subject. The measures taken to meet the demands of the petitioners were noted with satisfaction by the Council, which expressed the hope that the Administering Authority would continue its efforts to improve the living and working conditions of all indigenous labourers (256(VII) of 17 July).

The Ex-Servicemen's Union of Togoland (T/Pet.6/138) alleged that the promises made to them during the Second World War had not been fulfilled and that their needs and welfare were being ignored by the Administering Authority. This was denied by the Administering Authority which stated (T/655) that the Labour Department continued to watch over the needs of ex-servicemen, most of whom had been resettled without difficulty. The few applicants for whom employment could not be found had either left the Territory or found posts themselves. By resolution 257(VII), the Council, on 17 July, expressed the hope that the Administering Authority would increase its efforts, if necessary, so that any legitimate grievance on the part of the ex-servicemen might eventually be met.

Allegations that persons from the Gold Coast were occupying most of the important positions in Togoland while Togolandese were paid low wages were contained in a petition from Mr. W. K. E. Tettey (T/Pet.6/133-7/111). Serious unemployment was cited as one of the social problems facing the Territory by the Youth of Krachi, Buem, Atando, Akpini, Avatime, Asogli, Nkonya, Anfoega and Santrokofi (T/Pet.6/88) and the Convention Peoples' Party, Upper Trans-Volta Region (T/Pet.6/115); the latter also claimed that housing accommodations were inadequate. These petitions, as well as petitions alleging the slow rate of social advancement in general⁷⁸ and eighteen petitions, referred to below, concerning the Territory's medical and health facilities, were dealt with by the Council in the comprehensive resolution (272(VII)) mentioned above.

The Administering Authority informed the Council that all kinds of services, including social welfare, were dealt with by the Rural Development Committee and by the Southern Togoland Council, which had recently been set up to advise on matters affecting the interests and welfare of the people in that area. The Administering Authority further indicated, in its observations (T/638) on the Visiting Mission's report, that a social development team was working in the southern section to train leaders who would be able to stimulate village life generally; this team had so far concentrated on mass and adult education.⁷⁹

The Council, in its report on the Territory, noted with approval the operations of this team. It further noted that the Administering Authority planned to have eight such teams in the field during the course of a four-year period and expressed the hope that the experiment would be extended to the northern section.

⁷⁹ See p. 737.

In 1948, according to the Administering Authority's report, there were two medical officers in the Territory, both stationed in the southern section, one licensed midwife, sixteen qualified nurses, four sanitary inspectors and 34 others engaged in health work. There were three government hospitals, ten government and Native Authority dispensaries and clinics and two mission dispensaries, two leper settlements and five ante-natal and child welfare clinics.

The Visiting Mission referred to the allegations it had heard concerning the inadequacy of medical personnel and facilities in the Territory. Petitioners⁸⁰ asked for more hospitals, dispensaries, doctors, nurses, etc. They stated that patients in some cases had to travel 30 to 60 miles before reaching the nearest medical facilities and that the mortality rate in the Territory was high. The Mission was impressed, however, by the work being carried out at Ho at the larger of the two leper settlements. The Administering Authority stated (T/358, 365, 638, 649, 651, 656, 657, 664, 669, 670, 677, 679, 683, 689, 691) that medical facilities were admittedly inadequate but that it was doing its best to recruit the staff necessary to improve them. Plans were being considered for the provision of one hospital bed for every 2,000 inhabitants as against the present ratio of one for every 3,000, and hospital facilities were being increased to achieve this aim.

The Council, in its report, commended the Administering Authority for the excellent work being done at Ho, as reported by the Mission, and emphasized the pressing need for an increase in medical officers and health services, particularly in the northern section.

After examining a petition from the Women Teachers of Togoland (T/Pet.6/123) alleging the inadequacy of medical care for pregnant women, nursing mothers and infants, the Council, by resolution 254(VII) of 17 July, expressed the hope that the Administering Authority would redouble its efforts to improve the medical facilities in the Territory and devote special attention to developing medical care for pregnant women and nursing mothers. The Council also called the petitioners' attention to the statement in its annual report and to its earlier recommendation, in 1947, asking the Administering Authority to provide for the medical and health needs of the people of Togoland.

By resolution 270(VII), the Council also drew these recommendations to the attention of the Traditional Native Herbalists, Rulers and Subjects of Togoland under British Trusteeship (T/Pet.6/- 80) and the Avatime Native Authority (T/Pet.6/117). The former suggested that, in view of existing health facilities, the Administering Authority should allow the establishment of Native herbal medicine dispensaries and aid them with grants; the latter considered that training the best of the herbalists would benefit the country. The Administering Authority (T/646) informed the Council that the activities of Native herbalists were not regulated by the authorities, though occasional prosecutions took place when treatment was considered dangerous. There was nothing to prevent the establishment of herbal medicine dispensaries, however, but the Government was not prepared to assist them.

An inmate of the leper settlement at Ho, Mr. S. A. Azuma, alleged (T/Pet.6/148) that lepers were forced to do heavy work despite bi-weekly injections and their resulting discomfort. The petitioner, it was stated by the Administering Authority (T/698), was one of the few who disagreed with the recent reconstitution of the settlement into a self-supporting community which had proved of benefit to most patients, who now lived as nearly normal lives as possible. The Council decided (255(VII)) to take no action on this petition other than to refer the petitioner to its statement commending the Administering Authority for the work being done at Ho.

Appeals were made in several petitions⁸¹ for assistance from the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations and the World Health Organization to study the Territory's nutrition and health needs. The Council noted with satisfaction the interest shown in the activities of the specialized agencies and expressed the hope that the Administering Authority would call upon the agencies whenever appropriate (266(VII)). The Council also drew the petitioners' attention to a resolution of its fourth session (47(IV)) concerning the collaboration of the specialized agencies with respect to the Trusteeship System.⁸²

The repeal of all laws and ordinances restricting the import and sale of liquor was sought by the State Council of the Krachi Native Authority (T/Pet.6/14 & Add.1). The Council decided (268(VII)) to take no action on this question, after noting the observations of the Administering Authority (T/365) to the effect that it was bound by the Convention of Saint-Germain-en-Laye of 1919 which had been adopted to prevent the spread of the liquor trade.

Referring to a previous recommendation of the Trusteeship Council for the abolition of corporal punishment, the Administering Authority indicated that the laws permit sentencing adults to flogging only for such serious offences as rape or robbery with violence and that elaborate safeguards exist with respect to carrying out the sentence. No sentences of flogging had been awarded for many years, it stated. For boys under sixteen, whipping with a light cane might be ordered in all serious crimes, but this punishment was decreasing; 28 juveniles, or 9 per cent of those appearing before the magistrates' courts, were sentenced to whipping in 1948, as against 80 per cent in 1946. The Administering Authority maintained that it was not considered desirable to abolish as yet the power to award corporal punishment; the policy aimed "at the gradual reduction of the use of corporal punishment with the object of abolition as soon as may be practicable". The decrease in the imposition of sentences of corporal punishment and the Administering Authority's statement of policy were noted by the Trusteeship Council. It expressed regret that the Administering Authority had not yet seen its way clear to the complete and immediate elimination of corporal punishment, and reiterated its previous recommendation "that the Administering Authority immediately abolish this practice".⁸³

d. EDUCATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

The Administering Authority reported that there were 372 primary schools in the Trust Territory in 1948, an increase of two over the previous year. Most of the schools were managed by churches and missions; all were subject to Government inspection and were non-profit-making. With the exception of two two-year post-primary teacher training schools, there were no secondary schools, technical schools or institutions of higher learning in the Territory. However, excellent school facilities in the Gold Coast, the Administering Authority stated, were available and used by Togoland. The University College of the Gold Coast, it stated, opened in October 1948 with 30 students, among them a Togolander.

The school age population for 1948 was estimated at 76,500. Of the total enrolment in primary schools, most of which was in infant-junior schools, 25,030 were in the southern section and 762 in the northern section, showing an increase of 3,045 and 171, respectively, over the previous year. In 1948, there were 145 students attending the two teacher-training colleges in the southern section. In addition, there were 119 students from Togoland studying in institutions for secondary and higher education in the Gold Coast, and five in the United Kingdom. Eight scholarships were awarded during the year to Togoland students.

Education was free only at the non-mission day schools in the northern section, school fees in southern Togoland being 15 shillings a year for infant classes, 30 shillings for junior classes and 42 shillings for senior classes.

The Visiting Mission reported to the Council (T/465) that the opinions expressed by Togoland, together with its own observations, tended to confirm the views expressed in 1949 by the Trusteeship Council. The Council had noted, inter alia, that education was still backward and almost entirely being carried on by private initiative, that it was not available free of charge and that generally the fees payable were too high, and had urged improvements. Petitioners,⁸⁴ mainly from the south, where education was nevertheless further advanced than the north, stated that educational facilities in general were inadequate and demanded more and better education in all its forms.

They asked for improvements in the administration of education, for more and better facilities for elementary and secondary education, teacher training, technical and vocational training, mass education, for the granting of more scholarships, and for assistance to youth clubs.

The Mission observed that, apart from requests for general improvements, the petitions raised two aspects of education which appeared important: the provision of free education, and the control of schools by religious missions. The Mission observed that it was surprising to note how many people, particularly among the younger generation, were familiar with the views of the General Assembly and the Trusteeship Council on the question of free education. In discussing the question of free elementary schooling with the local authorities, the Mission was informed that it would be unfair for children to attend school entirely at the community's expense, since there were not enough schools for all. School fees collected amounted to about one third of the total expenditure on schools. Existing fees were not too high in the opinion of the Administration; as evidence of this, it was pointed out that most schools were full and places in many had to be reserved in advance. The complaints it heard, the Mission stated, also reflected an uneasiness at the absence of Government schools even as an alternative to mission schools; and some petitioners asked that the entire school system be taken over by the State.

The Mission was particularly impressed with the extensive experiment in mass education being carried out in southern Togoland by the social development team. It witnessed classrooms filled with adults learning to read and write, other groups busy with crafts and knitting and still others learning organized games. Present indications, the Mission stated, showed that the objective of the experiment was proving successful in that those who had attended courses were making a genuine attempt to impart what they had learned to others in their villages. The people were responding with enthusiasm and many asked that full-time teachers be appointed and other forms of assistance provided.

The Administering Authority, in its observations on the Mission's report (T/638), and on the petitions (T/358, 365, 643, 645, 646, 651-653, 656, 664, 671, 672, 679, 682-684, 689, 691, 693, 709) stated that, while education was still backward, progress was being made according to a plan which provided for the maximum practicable progress. It described the improvements made and planned in both the southern and northern sections of the Territory. The training of more teachers, cited as the controlling factor in educational progress, was being undertaken and more schools would be opened.

The Council, in its report on the Territory, noted the progress achieved, particularly in the increased school enrolment, the increase in teachers, the moderate expansion of teacher-training facilities and the opening of the University College. Referring to the fact that the management of schools was left largely to religious missions and the Native Authorities, the Council considered that the Administering Authority itself had the primary responsibility of ensuring adequate educational opportunities for all the people of the Territory and should therefore take more initiative in this respect. It urged the Administering Authority to give every possible encouragement to continued expansion of teacher-training facilities and to increasing opportunities for secondary and higher education. Because of the difficulties impeding educational advancement in northern Togoland, the Council considered that special attention and vigorous efforts should be devoted to the educational needs of that area.

Commending the Administering Authority for the notable progress in adult education as reported by the Mission, the Council expressed the hope that the start which had been made would lead to adult education programmes on the widest possible scale.

The problems relating to education raised in the 32 petitions referred to above the Council dealt with in a comprehensive resolution (272-(VII)) covering political, economic and social as well as educational questions (see below). With respect to some petitions, however, it adopted separate resolutions.

The Women Teachers of Togoland alleged (T/Pet.6/123) that girls completing their primary education had no chance to continue their education or learn a trade, and suggested that, in view of health conditions in the Territory, scholarships for training in nursing and midwifery be given to girls with primary education. It was stated by the Administering Authority (T/653) that, apart from the two teacher-training colleges in Togoland, there were available in the Gold Coast four secondary schools for girls and adequate facilities for training in nursing. Noting this statement, the Council expressed the hope that the Administering Authority would provide in the Trust Territory further educational facilities for girls (254(VII)).

The Chiefs, Elders and Councillors of Worawora petitioned (T/Pet.6/185 and Add.1) for the Council's assistance in obtaining better secondary educational facilities in their division. A request for an oral hearing, made on behalf of the petitioners by Mr. Theodore O. Asare, attorney, was denied on the ground that full information on secondary education was already available. On the substance of the petition, the Administering Authority explained that the existing secondary school at Ho, which was being expanded, was expected to meet the requirements of southern Togoland for some years, and the Council decided that under the circumstances no action by it was called for (297(VII), of 20 July). It referred the petitioners, however, to the recommendations concerning education which it had included in its report on the Territory (see above).

A request that Togoland scholarships be awarded through the Togoland Union was made by Mr. G. K. Noamesi (T/Pet.6/120), who stated that scholarships intended for Togoland teachers had been awarded to non-indigenous teachers. It was explained by the Administering Authority (T/672) that two scholarships had erroneously been awarded to non-indigenous persons but that members of the Scholarship Committee would be instructed to base their awards on a more accurate interpretation of nationality and there was no danger that similar mistakes would be repeated; the Administering Authority could not accept the suggestion regarding the Togoland Union, since the latter was a political party and scholarships were awarded irrespective of party or creed. These statements were noted by the Council, which decided (271(VII)) that in the circumstances no action by it was called for.

The Chief, Elders and People of Biakpa requested (T/Pet.6/20) that only the Ewe Presbyterian school be retained in their village, which, they stated, was not large enough to support two schools; the petitioners claimed that the presence of the second school, a Roman Catholic school, was creating dissidence in the village. After explaining the background of the two schools, the Administering Authority stated (T/480; T/AC.20/L.4) that it was not the Government's policy to close down schools to suit denominational convenience and that, in its opinion, both schools were necessary to satisfy the educational needs of the area. By resolution 258(VII), the Council expressed the hope that the Administering Authority would continue its policy of religious tolerance in education, particularly in areas where schools of different denominations existed.

The Boy Scouts' Association of Togoland (T/Pet.6/127) asked that the Government protect the legal status of the Association and that the educational authorities give more attention to scouting; the petitioners also requested financial help from the United Nations to aid in their various scouting activities. The Administering Authority indicated (T/650) that the Government's interest in the Association was demonstrated by its grants in the last two years. This was noted with satisfaction by the Council (259(VII)), which expressed the hope that the Administering Authority would continue to support and encourage the activities of this and similar associations by all suitable means.

e. GENERAL DEVELOPMENT

(1) General Conclusion of the Council

With respect to the administration of Togoland in general, the Council in its report noted with appreciation evidences of progress during 1948. However, after noting further the need for more improvement and that the deficiencies were recognized by the Administering Authority, the Council reiterated the recommendations made at its fourth session in 1949 in the course of its examination of the 1947 annual report on the Territory.⁸⁵

(2) Questions of a General Nature Raised in Petitions

The Council, on 17 July, adopted a comprehensive resolution (272(VII)) dealing with some of the questions of a general nature, as described above, raised in 42 petitions. These included questions relating to the political advancement of Togoland, such as the operation of the Trusteeship System, the status of the Trust Territory, administrative integration with the Gold Coast, and amalgamated divisions; the economic advancement of Togoland, such as industrial development, mining, trade, banking facilities, water supply and electricity, roads and railways, postal services, telegraph, telephone and radio, and taxation and finance; the social advancement of Togoland, such as medical and health facilities, housing, employment of Natives and wages; and the educational advancement of the Territory. The Council decided to inform the petitioners that the general questions raised in their petitions had been and would continue to be examined by the Council in connexion with its annual examination of the conditions in the Territory. It invited the Secretary-General to provide the petitioners with the text of its report on Togoland, the report of the Visiting Mission, the observations of the Administering Authority on the Mission's report and on the relevant petitions, and the records of the discussions in the Council during its examination of the annual report for 1948.

(3) Petitions Containing Personal Complaints or Requests

In addition to the many petitions of a general nature, the Council examined petitions of a personal nature from the following persons.

Mr. Godfried K. Dzasimatu charged (T/Pet.6/140-7/113) that although he had been employed in 1915 by the British Authorities to do post office work in West Africa, he was not given the war bonus allegedly received by other employees at the end of the First World War. He stated that the British Authorities had refused to grant him a pension and had suggested that he approach the French Authorities with his claim. The Administering Authority indicated that no record of the petitioner's service with the Gold Coast post office had been found; it again suggested that the petitioner submit his claims to the French Authorities, but pointed out that the time-limit for such claims had probably lapsed. These comments were called to the petitioner's attention by the Council (285(VII)), which decided that under the circumstances no action on its part was called for.

Mr. Joh. A. Agboka, on behalf of the German-trained employees in Togoland, claimed, inter alia, that, following the outbreak of the Second World War, he and other members of his organization were arrested and the association's property as well as his personal belongings confiscated (T/Pet.6/28-7/26). It was stated by the Administering Authority (T/644) that the organization was considered during the war as subversive and that none of the petitioner's property, other than documents of a security nature, was confiscated. After noting this statement, the Council decided that no action on its part was called for on the petition (283(VII)).

Several persons asked for assistance in continuing their own education or that of members of their family. Acting on a petition from Mr. Sam Kwasi Asase (T/Pet.6/137), who asked that a scholarship for medical studies be given to his son, the Council referred the petitioner to the Administering Authority's suggestion (T/654) that he apply to the Director of Education in the Gold Coast, and expressed the hope that Mr. Asase's son would be enabled to continue his studies (246(VII)). With respect to three other requests for scholarships, however, the Council, after noting the observations of the Administering Authority, decided to take no action (284, 247 and 292(VII), respectively). On one of these requests, a petition from Mr. Doji Lartey Tychs-Lawson (T/Pet.6/108-7/99), for a scholarship to study in the United States, the Administering Authority suggested (T/682) that the petitioner might obtain information concerning such scholarships from an advisory committee in Accra, but felt that since the petitioner had failed to obtain a scholarship in the United Kingdom, it was unlikely that his qualifications were sufficient. Mr. Moses Donya (T/Pet.6/149) asked to be allowed to complete his studies, which had been discontinued due to illness from which he had recovered. It was stated by the Administering Authority (T/668), however, that the Director of Medical Services, who examined the case personally, had advised that the petitioner was unfit to pursue the course which he had begun with promise. Mr. A. Y. Kpeglo (T/Pet.6/157) asked that he be given a further scholarship to specialize in gynaecology. The Administering Authority pointed out (T/713) that this question was not within the Council's competence, since the petitioner was a Native of the Gold Coast Colony; moreover, he was studying with scholarship aid and would not be eligible for a scholarship for special medical studies until he had practised medicine in the Gold Coast and demonstrated his special qualifications.

Anthonio K. Agbale, an orphan school boy, stated in a petition (T/Pet.6/134) that excessive school fees and other expenses had forced him to discontinue his education. It was stated by the Administering Authority (T/662) that in appropriate cases students were wholly or partly exempted from paying school fees and, further, that there was ample provision of scholarships. It assured the Council that the educational Mission concerned would inquire into the circumstances and make a decision. The Council, by resolution 245(VII), asked the Administering Authority to refer this case to the competent educational authorities for their sympathetic consideration in the hope that they would enable the petitioner to continue his studies. By another resolution (249-(VII)), the Council asked that the attention of the competent educational authorities be drawn to the difficulties claimed by Mr. Siegfried Kwami Etse (T/Pet.6/153) with regard to the education of his children. On this petitioner's request for the issuance of a druggist's licence, the Council decided to take no action, after noting the Administering Authority's statement that he did not fulfil the conditions imposed under the Pharmacy and Poisons Ordinance, No. 46, and could therefore not be registered as a pharmacist.

4. Togoland, Administered by France⁸⁶

This Territory, which covers an area of 55,000 square kilometres (approx. 21,250 square miles), had an estimated indigenous population of 970,983 at the end of 1948, according to the Administering Authority's annual report for that year.⁸⁷ The European population numbered 841, as against 1,082 in 1947.

There were 43 civil registry centres in the Territory, but civil registration was not compulsory. Noting this, the Trusteeship Council recommended in its report on the Territory that the Administering Authority inaugurate a system of compulsory registration in certain communities or districts where facilities already existed. This, it suggested, should be a first step toward the eventual extension of the civil registry throughout the Territory.

a. POLITICAL DEVELOPMENT

Since 1946, Togoland has been administered as an "Associated Territory" within the French Union and French legislation is applied to it. The Territory is accordingly granted the right of representation in each of the organs of the French Union, in which legislative powers and right of political discussion with respect to Togoland affairs are vested; it elects one deputy to the French National Assembly, two representatives to the Council of the Republic, and one to the Assembly of the French Union. Responsibility for local administration of the Territory is vested in the Commissaire de la République, who represents the French Government and is directly responsible to the Minister for Overseas France.

The local Representative Assembly (Assemblée Représentative du Togo), according to the Administering Authority's annual report, participates in association with the Administration in the exercise of administrative and financial responsibilities affecting Togoland. Consultation with the Assembly on local regulations in certain specified fields is required and the territorial budget requires the approval of the Assembly. The Assembly has no power of initiating legislation or of discussing political matters, however. Qualifications for election to the Assembly include the ability to read, write and speak French fluently. The Assembly has 30 members, six elected by an electoral college consisting mainly of French citizens, and 24 by a second electoral college consisting of qualified indigenous inhabitants. This second college, the Administering Authority reported, is limited to chiefs, notables, persons who have been members of trade unions, co-operatives and indigenous provident society councils, permanent employees, persons able to read French or Arabic, and a number of other groups. Eligible voters in this college increased from 7,563 in 1947 to 12,793 in 1948. Further increases, the Council was informed, had been made in 1949 and 1950, and, on 1 January 1951, the right to vote would be given to all heads of families. The Administering Authority contemplated the eventual introduction of universal suffrage.

These steps, as well as the steps taken by the Administering Authority to encourage the registration of eligible indigenous inhabitants, to explain their rights to them, and to promote their exercise of these rights, were welcomed by the Council in its report on the Territory. It recommended that the Administering Authority continue its efforts to bring about universal suffrage and conditions in which a single electoral college could be established.

The Assemblée Représentative du Togo (T/Pet.6/23-7/21) and Mr. Max Ahtson (T/Pet.6/143-7/116) suggested that membership in the French Union was incompatible with the status of Togoland as a Trust Territory. The former alleged that 90 per cent of the laws enacted for the Territory by the French Parliament took no account of the real interests of the Territory and stated that they had only agreed to send representatives to the French organs after a formal assurance by the Minister for Overseas France that this would not affect the status of the Territory; they indicated that they would be more interested in having a permanent representative in the Trusteeship Council. The Parti Togolais du Progrès, Anécho Togo Section (T/Pet.6/44-7/51), sought wider prerogatives for the Togoland representatives in France. It was pointed out by the Administering Authority that membership of the Territory in the French Union conformed to the provisions of the Trusteeship Agreement; in any case, the people of the Territory would have the right, at the appropriate time, to determine for themselves whether they should remain in the French Union or assume a status of independence outside the Union. Noting this assurance, the Trusteeship Council, by resolution 274-(VII) of 17 July, informed the petitioners that it had and would continue to examine the question in connexion with its examination of annual reports on the Territory.

Another petitioner, Mr. J. Tuleasi (T/Pet.7/-69), also raised the question of sending a permanent representative from Togoland to the Trusteeship Council, and asked whether the United Nations could establish a consulate in the Territory.

He also asked whether the practice of sending visiting missions to the Territory would be continued. The Council decided (273(VII)) on 17 July to inform Mr. Tuleasi that on the first two questions no Council action was called for in view of the terms of the Charter and the Trusteeship Agreement. It referred to the right of the inhabitants to submit petitions concerning territorial affairs, and informed the petitioner that the present practice is to send visiting missions to each of the Trust Territories once every three years.

Members of the Representative Assembly claimed (T/Pet.6/23-7/21) that this body was in all respects similar to the conseils généraux in France and French Overseas Territories. Its members were elected under a dual electoral college system and its functions were far from appropriate to the real needs of a Trust Territory. The Assembly, the petitioners stated, was a superstructure without a foundation, since there were no local councils with any real powers. Apart from its power of decision in budgetary matters and in the administration of movable and immovable public property, the Assembly had a purely advisory role; moreover, the budget was largely composed of items of compulsory expenditure and the Assembly had no right of supervision over the budget it had voted. The petitioners stated that they had consistently called upon the French Government to grant the Representative Assembly of Togoland legislative powers. They felt that a legislative assembly empowered to discuss all public questions, including political questions, would further the Territory's attainment of the aim of the Trusteeship System, namely self-government or independence. They also asked for the creation of an executive organ, with broad indigenous participation, responsible to the Legislative Assembly. Two other petitions, from the Parti Togolais du Progrès (T/Pet.6/44-51) and Mr. Messan Komédja (T/Pet.6/22-17), also requested that more powers be granted to the Representative Assembly.

The question of the status and powers of the representative Assembly was examined by the visiting Mission to the Territory. It reported (T/464) that the Administering Authority considered the powers of the Assembly quite extensive and that it had been informed by the Administering Authority that it would be premature to grant legislative powers or power to deal with political questions to a people under Trusteeship, the Administering Authority claimed that the complete autonomy demanded by the Representative Assembly closely resembled absolute independence and would be contrary to the Trusteeship Agreement. Stating its own views on the question, the Visiting Mission reiterated the recommendation adopted at the fourth session of the Trusteeship Council in 1949: that the Administering Authority, irrespective of the present or future relationship of the Territory to the French Union, should progressively extend the powers of the Representative Assembly, particularly in the field of legislation. In this connexion, the Mission noted that a bill to modify and extend the powers of the Representative Assembly had been presented to the Assembly of the French Union by the deputy from Togoland. The Council was further informed, by the Administering Authority, that the reservation concerning political questions was omitted from this bill, which also provided for reforms in the election and composition of the Representative Assembly. It was up to the Parliament to pass judgment on the differences between this bill and Government bills on the same subject. Both the Government and Parliament, the Administering Authority stated, favoured a progressive extension of the powers of the Representative Assembly. This stated policy was endorsed by the Trusteeship Council in its report on the Territory. At the same time, the Council expressed the hope that the Administering Authority's policy also contemplated widening the scope of debate and granting the Representative Assembly that part of the legislative power currently being exercised by the French executive agencies.

As instructed by the Council in 1949, the Visiting Mission examined the question of the status of chiefs, which had been the subject of a petition (T/Pet.7/14) from Mr. Augustino de Souza. Other petitions⁸⁸ later received also alleged that, under Order No. 113/APA of 1 March 1945, chiefs had been transformed into agents of the Administration, being appointed, paid, promoted, suspended or dismissed by the Administration. The petitioners asked that traditional rules be restored to allow the people to choose their chiefs, who should be vested with real authority according to custom. The Mission ascertained that in 1949 a draft law to replace Order No. 113 had been submitted to the Togoland Representative Assembly by the Ministry of French Overseas Territories and accepted with minor changes by that Assembly. Pending enactment of the new law by the French National Assembly, Order No. 113 was declared obsolete, and, according to the Administering Authority, traditional rules for the appointment of chiefs were again observed.⁸⁹ The enactment of the new law governing the status of chiefs was noted with interest by the Trusteeship Council, which expressed the hope that the indigenous inhabitants would thereby be permitted a greater degree of initiative and responsibility in the conduct of local affairs.

A ruling by the United Nations to solve a dispute concerning the succession to the traditional chieftainship of Afagnagan was requested by Mr. Voudou-Adjonon Aglamey and eight other petitioners from Afagnagan (T/Pet.7/43). The Administering Authority informed the Council that this matter was in the process of settlement by dividing the canton of Afagnagan into two parts. Another dispute, arising from the desire of Les Originaires de Voudou-Atakpamé (T/Pet.7/65) to be separated from the Gnagna Tribe and to be given their own regional chief, was also being settled, the Administering Authority stated. After noting the Administering Authority's statements, the Council decided on 17 July that no action on its part was called for with respect to either petition (288 and 289(VII)).

In its report on the Territory, the Council noted with satisfaction that the Representative Assembly had adopted an Order to replace the Councils of Notables by elected district councils (Conseils de Circonscription). It considered the proposed councils an effective medium of political education and recommended that the Administering Authority implement its plans for their early establishment and give them progressively increasing powers.

Existing district or regional councils, three petitioners⁹⁰ alleged, did not possess a democratic character. Two of these petitions (T/Pet.6/23-7/21 & 6/45-7/52) also made the same complaint with respect to municipal councils. The petitioners demanded that the members of these councils should be elected by universal suffrage rather than appointed by the Government, and that the councils should possess broader powers. The Administering Authority assured the Trusteeship Council that it aimed at the ultimate establishment of regional representative bodies and at granting full deliberative powers to local bodies. It pointed out that the status of both the regional and municipal councils had been changed subsequent to the petitions and that the towns of Lomé and Aného now elected their own councils.

The question of regional and municipal councils, as well as many other questions of a general nature raised in 26 petitions, were dealt with by the Trusteeship Council in a comprehensive resolution (281(VII)) adopted on 17 July. Other questions covered by this resolution related to: political conditions, such as the status of chiefs, executive organs, the powers of the Representative Assembly, and justice; economic conditions, such as agricultural development, forests, co-operatives and indigenous provident societies, trade and commerce, taxation, roads and bridges, and water supply; social conditions, such as housing and urban development; and educational conditions, such as local school needs, subsidies for mission schools, mass education, use of the vernacular, and scholarships. The Council noted that the Visiting Mission, which had received most of these petitions, had made no specific observations on the majority of them. By resolution 281(VII), the Council decided to inform the petitioners that it had and would continue to examine, in connexion with its annual examination of conditions in the Territory, the questions they had raised. It asked the Secretary-General to provide the petitioners with the texts of the Council's report on the Territory to the General Assembly in 1950, the Mission's report and the observations of the Administering Authority and the official records of the public meetings of the Council during which the Administering Authority's annual report had been examined.

Describing the judicial system in the Territory, the Administering Authority reported that in civil cases involving only Africans, customary law is applied as far as possible; in other cases, including all criminal cases, French law is applied. Most civil cases involving indigenous inhabitants do not go beyond the stage of chiefs' conciliation tribunals; if conciliation fails, they are brought before higher courts, comprising tribunals of the first and second degree, presided over by senior administrative officers, assisted by indigenous assessors, and courts of first and final appeal. In December 1948, it was stated, an indigenous court of the first instance presided over by an educated indigenous inhabitant assisted by two Togolese assessors was established at Palimé. This experiment with a court composed of indigenous inhabitants and its proposed extension to other parts of Togoland were noted with approval by the Council in its report on the Territory. Since it considered the separation of administrative and judicial functions essential to the proper administration of justice, however, the Council expressed the hope that, to eliminate the need of assigning judicial functions to administrative officials, the Administering Authority would intensify its efforts to recruit more career magistrates. In one petition examined by the Council, the Canton and Village Chiefs, members of Unité Togolaise (Akposso Section), District of Atakpamé, requested (T/Pet.6/111-7/103) that preliminary judgment be rendered by the traditional chiefs following the proper customary procedures of each group of the Ewe tribe. This question was dealt with by the Council in the comprehensive resolution referred to above.

Apart from the many petitions examined by the Council relating to the unification of the Ewe people or the unification of the two Togolands,⁹¹ the Council examined two other requests which could involve changes in the boundaries of Togoland. Mr. Foligbo Loko-Ahoussan sought (T/Pet.7/20 & Add.1) the unification of the Kingdom of the Plas and Mr. I. Sanvee Ahlonkor de Kartraya (T/Pet.7/29) the incorporation of Agoué with Togoland under French administration. Since both of these petitions related to the boundary between Dahomey, which is not under the Trusteeship System, and the Trust Territory, the Council informed the petitioners that their requests did not fall within its competence (286 and 287(VII) of 17 July).

b. ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

The Territory's economy is essentially agricultural, and most of the indigenous inhabitants are engaged in subsistence farming. The Territory's industry is limited mainly to processing agricultural products; local industries include oil and soap works, rope and esparto works, fisheries and fish-drying yards. According to the Administering Authority's report, total production of food crops amounted to 556,275 tons in 1948 and industrial crops to 79,113. Agricultural exports rose from 31,169 tons in 1947 to 39,314 tons in 1948. Apart from foodstuffs, the most important agricultural products are palm oil and kernels, copra, cotton, cocoa, coffee, peanuts, tapioca and karite (a vegetable butter).

The quantity and quality of agricultural production is limited by the rainfall distribution, lack of transport facilities and the primitive agricultural techniques. The land is not very fertile, and in the densely populated Lama-Kara subdivision it is almost exhausted. The Visiting Mission to the Territory was particularly concerned (T/464) with the threat of famine implied by the conditions in this area. It noted that the Administering Authority was alive to the dangers of population pressure and famine in Lama-Kara and had sought to alleviate the situation by moving the inhabitants to more sparsely-occupied sections. Some 30,000 persons had been resettled between Atakpamé and Sokodé since 1926. Transport expenses and costs of small equipment to resettle an additional 500 families during 1948-49 were covered by a credit of 3,500,000 francs^{91a} under the FIDES (Fonds d'investissement pour le développement économique et social) plan. These measures were also described by the Administering Authority in its annual report and referred to in its observations (T/673) on the Mission's report. The Administering Authority further stated that all necessary precautions had been taken against the possible danger of famine, which, in fact, had never been seriously threatening. The establishment of a soil conservation office was also planned as soon as sufficient technical staff was available. Endorsing the conclusions of its Visiting Mission, the Council recommended that the Administering Authority continue to keep the problem under review and to consider ways and means of attracting the population to other parts of the Territory and exploiting the latter's resources, should a dangerous saturation point be reached in the Lama-Kara area of Togoland under French administration.

In its report, the Administering Authority described the measures taken to improve agricultural methods in the Territory, including the establishment of four training farms for demonstration purposes. Seven indigenous provident societies, comprising 249,300 members in 1948, continued to provide farmers with credits for the purchase of seed and equipment, the establishment of nurseries, the purchase of bulls and boars for breeding purposes, etc. Each member contributed ten francs to the societies in 1948 and the Government continued to subsidize the societies by assuming their debit accounts up to 3,830,000 francs. Although the Administration favoured the progressive replacement of the indigenous provident societies by producers' co-operatives, the report indicated, several attempts to set up co-operatives had failed.

⁹¹ See p. 749 ff.

Commenting on requests for the mechanization of agriculture from the Committee of the Unité Togolaise, (Sokodé Section) (T/Pet.6/61-7/70) and Messrs. Georges Komotane and Awanou Nambiema in the name of the population of Mango (T/Pet.6/64-7/73), the Administering Authority stated that its policy was to proceed with agricultural development, which was covered under its ten-year agricultural plan. Similar requests were also made in four other petitions,⁹² which alleged that the provident societies were not fulfilling their purposes and that their members, whose subscriptions maintain the societies, had no voice in the investment of the funds or the operation of the societies, these powers being exercised by the Commandant de Cercle. Three of these petitions (T/Pet.6/22-7/17, 6/46-7/53 and 6/54-7/61) also complained of the difficulties in marketing produce due to the poor condition of such roads and bridges as existed and the lack of transportation facilities.

It was pointed out by the Visiting Mission that the production of foodstuffs throughout the Territory in 1948 suffered as a result of drought. The lack of water was also referred to in several petitions,⁹³ which sought particularly the provision of drinking water. It was stated that water sometimes had to be obtained from a distance of several kilometres, that public latrines did not exist and that polluted drinking water resulted in a high incidence of disease. The Administering Authority stated that it was making great efforts to improve the water supply by constructing new wells, boreholes and reservoirs. In its annual report, it said that it planned a vast modernization programme in both urban and rural areas in order to arrange for the distribution of drinking water and to provide water supply works and an electrification system. Improvements had already begun in several towns and appropriations of approximately 200,000,000 and 100,000,000 francs for water supplies in urban and rural areas, respectively, had been allocated under the ten-year economic and social development plan (FIDES). In addition, a territorial grant of 8,000,000 francs in 1948 made it possible for the first of a series of urban sanitation projects to be carried out.

The various questions raised by the petitioners were dealt with by the Council in the comprehensive resolution described above, covering political, social and educational questions as well as problems of an economic nature.

In its report on the Territory, the Council expressed the hope that the programme undertaken by the Administering Authority to increase the water supply would be carried forward as rapidly as possible. It recommended that intensive programmes for land reclamation and conservation be instituted as soon as possible to prevent further exhaustion of the land's fertility, particularly in Lama-Kara, and to ensure adequate food resources for both the densely populated and newly settled areas. It also expressed the hope that the Administering Authority would press forward with its plans to encourage the formation of agricultural co-operatives, and that the people would be given a real opportunity for responsible participation in these co-operatives so that they might have further experience in managing their own economic affairs. Noting the existence of an active fishing industry in the coastal area, the Council recommended that the Administering Authority increase its efforts both to encourage fisheries development by financial and technical assistance, and to facilitate the marketing of fish.

Several petitions⁹⁴ examined by the Council complained that, under the present system of exchange control, the export of certain commodities (coffee, peanuts and cotton) was permitted only to France. The petitioners asked that a free price system for their products be provided and that the provisions of Article 76 of the Charter requiring absolute freedom of trade and equal treatment in commercial matters for all Members of the United Nations be implemented in the Territory. To make this possible, two of the petitioners (T/Pet.6/22-7/17; T/Pet.6/23-7/21) stated, free convertibility of foreign exchange in the Territory was necessary. The Visiting Mission inquired into this situation and was informed by the Administration that the restrictions, which were a consequence of exchange control resulting from the Second World War, had been relaxed in large part during 1949. They now applied only to the three above commodities, which represented only 10 per cent of total exports. Nor could they be regarded as discriminatory as they applied to everyone, regardless of nationality. The Administering Authority further stated, in its observations on the petitions, that there was no discrimination against any Member of the United Nations having commercial relations with Togoland, as the same regulations and tariffs applied in all cases. With regard to the question of foreign currency and exchange, the Administering Authority pointed out that the question was a matter of international concern outside the control of the Council; in so far as it related to the frontier between the two Togolands, however, the problem would be dealt with by the enlarged Standing Consultative Commission.⁹⁵ In the circumstances, the Council decided, by resolution 276(VII) of 17 July, to take no action on the question of exchange control. The other questions it dealt with in the comprehensive resolution referred to above.⁹⁶

Commenting on the establishment of forest reserves in the Territory, the Visiting Mission stated that 22 forests comprising 31,230 hectares (approx. 78,075 acres) had been classified between 1939 and 1947 and another 22,000 hectares (approx. 55,000 acres) were in the process of classification in 1947. The people of the Territory, however, were unable to understand the general aim of forest classification and felt that it was a restriction of their liberties. Most of the indigenous members of the Representative Assembly, which had direct jurisdiction in the matter, had also declared against the establishment of forest reserves, the Mission observed. It was informed by the Administration that because of this opposition no forests had been classified in 1948 and 1949. The restitution of classified forests to the owners of the land was requested by Mr. Mensah Komedja (T/Pet.6/22-7/17) and Yawovi Kossi Ganou, Chief of Amakpapé, and four chiefs of Nuatja (T/Pet.7/41). The Administering Authority explained in this connexion that forest classification had been carried out in the general interest of the Territory, but it was experiencing difficulty in finding a satisfactory compromise between local desires and the interests of the Territory as a whole. Acting on these petitions, the Council, by resolution 275(VII) of 17 July, recommended that the Administering Authority intensify its efforts to convince the people that forest classification was in the general interest of the Territory. It also drew the attention of the Representative Assembly to the necessity of co-operating actively with the local administration in this matter.

Mr. Komedja also alleged that bush fires caused by persons unknown were always falsely ascribed to the people of Nuatja; he asked that forest wardens refrain from catechizing an entire village which had nothing whatever to do with the outbreak of these fires. On this question, which was dealt with in the Council's comprehensive resolution, the Administering Authority explained that there was no proper system of fire control in the area, and the chief was subject to fine when forest fires broke out as it was felt he was responsible for supervision.

c.SOCIALDEVELOPMENT

According to the Administering Authority's annual report, basic human rights to all sections of the population are guaranteed by the French Constitution of 1946. Press privileges recognized in France are extended to the Territory, where eight newspapers are published. Freedom of association is guaranteed, and all persons are protected by law against arbitrary arrest and are guaranteed individual liberty. The report also indicated that slavery and practices akin to slavery have been suppressed.

In addition to the extensive programme to modernize the water supply system, as described above, the Administering Authority reported that for 1948-49 further credits for town planning and housing were provided in the ten-year plan.

Four trade unions with a total membership of 725 were formed during 1948, making a total of 25 unions with 3,076 members. The Administering Authority indicated that the Advisory Labour Board met twice during the year to adjust wage scales to the cost of living.

The Visiting Mission was informed by the Administering Authority that 9,065 persons were gainfully employed, showing a low proportion of wage earners to the total population. It reported that wages, which are fixed periodically to correspond with cost-of-living increases, ranged from an average of 50 francs per day for unskilled labourers in industry to 14,350 francs per month for highest-paid employees in commerce, industry and banks. Workers also received seniority bonuses, and in some cases other gratuities. According to a statement by the Administering Authority, workers above unskilled labourers are classified into categories, each of which has a minimum wage. On the basis of an agreement reached at the end of 1948 between employers' and workers' organizations, the minimum basic wage rate for employees and workmen in the lowest category, comprising skilled labourers, watchmen, illiterate orderlies, illiterate sales assistants, carters and assistant labourers, was fixed at 2,835 francs per month. This minimum subsistence wage level was based chiefly on the staple diet of the indigenous inhabitant and his minimum requirements, the Administering Authority indicated. A draft labour code, presented in 1947 to the French National Assembly, was being examined by the appropriate committees of the Assembly. The Government was anxious to conclude the matter as soon as possible and was urging debate on the draft.

⁹⁵ See pp. 751-52.

The Council, which had referred to this draft at its fourth session in 1948, noted with regret in its report on the Territory at its seventh session that the labour code had not yet become law. It expressed the hope that the legislation would soon be enacted and that its provisions would fully safeguard the rights and interests of labour. It further considered that, in determining a scale of minimum wages, labourers should be ensured a decent standard of living, that they should be protected with respect to illness and accidents arising from employment, and that labour unions should be allowed to participate in studies on such questions as illness and old age.

A petition from Mr. Stephan L. Combey (T/Pet.7/102) alleging that he had been unable to find steady employment because of his ignorance of the French language was examined by the Council. Mr. Combey stated that he had had to resort to the "perilous" occupation of a black market dealer and had consequently been subjected to a number of arrests and fines. He appealed for assistance in finding employment. The Council, by resolution 290(VII) of 17 July, noted the Administering Authority's statement that Mr. Combey was not barred from employment because of his ignorance of French and decided that in the circumstances no action on its part was called for.

At its fourth session in 1949, the Council had noted the Administering Authority's assurance that all vestiges of racial discrimination had been eliminated and expressed the hope that it would be furnished an account of the effective implementation of this policy. With reference to this statement, the Administering Authority informed the Council, at its seventh session, that no legislation containing racial discrimination existed in the Territory and that any act implying racial discrimination would be the object of legal prosecution.

Two petitions, from the Committee of the Unité Togolaise (Sokodé Section) (T/Pet.6/61-7/70) and the Assemblée Representative du Togo (T/Pet.6/23-7/21), alleged the existence of racial discrimination. The latter stated that no indigenous inhabitant of Togoland could be a member of the jury of the Cour d'Assise unless he was a French citizen. Commenting on this question, the Administering Authority explained that the requirement of French citizenship was not evidence of racial discrimination, which did not exist in the Territory, but was merely intended to ensure that jurors were able to read and write French. Nevertheless, it had recognized the validity of the complaint, and had altered the requirements to include all inhabitants of the Territory who could read and write French. This decision was noted with satisfaction by the Council, which decided to inform the petitioners that it periodically examined the question of racial discrimination. The Council also drew the petitioners' attention to its abovementioned statement at its fourth session.

The need for improving deficient housing conditions was referred to by the Assemblée Representative du Togo (T/Pet.6/23-7/21). The Committee of the Unité Togolaise (Sokodé Section) (T/Pet.6/61-7/70) alleged that Sokodé, a large trading centre, was nothing but a large village of thatched huts without streets or lighting; only the European quarter was illuminated, while the indigenous quarter revealed the very low standard of living of Africans. These questions were dealt with by the Council in resolution 281(VII), which also covered political, economic and educational problems raised in petitions.⁹⁷

These petitioners, as well as Mr. D. A. Kumadi (T/Pet.6/39-7/40), complained of the devastating effects of alcohol on the indigenous inhabitants and asked that measures be taken to control its importation. Commenting on this situation, the Administering Authority stated that it was trying to reduce the consumption of alcoholic beverages in the Territory, but was meeting with difficulties, particularly the opposition of large commercial firms and the refusal of the Representative Assembly to take action restricting imports of alcoholic beverages. Moreover, it added, restrictions alone would not solve the problem, since the indigenous inhabitants manufactured liquor locally if they were unable to get imported liquor. The Administering Authority's efforts to control excessive alcoholic consumption were noted with satisfaction by the Council, which recommended that it energetically continue taking control measures in the interests of the inhabitants (279-(VII)).

Budget credits for public health, according to the Administering Authority's report, increased from 44,767,000 francs in 1947 to 66,321,200, or over 16 per cent of the total territorial budget, in 1948; at the same time, FIDES credits for the financial years 1947-48 and 1948-49 rose from 33,200,000 to 87,400,000 francs. In addition, a subsidy of 8,000,000 francs was granted by metropolitan France to continue and intensify the campaign against endemic and epidemic diseases, the most common of the former being yaws, malaria and syphilis. The personnel of the Medical and Public Health Department consisted in 1948 of the Director of Medical Services, 28 medical officers, one dental surgeon, 22 midwives, 28 sanitary assistants and 270 nurses. The Territory had one hospital, at Lomé, with 149 beds, and one polyclinic, nine medical centres, 43 dispensaries, four sleeping sickness camps, one dental clinic, one mental hospital, eleven maternity centres and two leprosaria. A total of 13,282 in-patients and 2,521,517 out-patients were treated during the year. All indigenous inhabitants are provided with free medical attention. A mobile medical and prophylactic service engaged largely in preventive medicine, operated in such a way that the total population of the Territory was checked once a year.

A new hospital, capable of accommodating 550 in-patients, was under construction near Lomé to replace the existing hospital, which was no longer considered adequate. The Visiting Mission was impressed by the plans as well as by the vastness and modernity of the project, which was scheduled for completion by the end of 1951.

The Mission noted that an epidemic of cerebro-spinal meningitis had occurred in the subdivision of Lama-Kara during 1949. It was informed by the Administering Authority that prior to 1948 such epidemics were restricted to the subdivision of Mango. In 1948, however, there was an outbreak in Lama-Kara; 512 cases and 56 deaths were recorded. The epidemic of 1949 reached greater proportions. At its peak in February, 4,030 cases were recorded; by July, the number of cases had declined to 24 cases. For the period from January to July, there were 7,655 cases and 405 deaths. The Administering Authority described conditions in the subdivision as propitious for epidemics of cerebro-spinal meningitis, i.e. the high density of population, the large markets held every six days in each canton, and proximity to Dahomey, where epidemics had occurred in previous years. On the other hand, it stated, the road system and the presence in each canton of a sleeping-sickness camp facilitated the task of combating the epidemic. This situation was noted by the Trusteeship Council in its annual report on the Territory. It urged the Administering Authority to intensify its efforts to control the spread of the disease by all means possible, including an increased staff of doctors serving centres established to treat the disease.

In general, the Council commended the Administering Authority for the steps taken in the field of public health, particularly with respect to increased expenditures, the new hospital, and the opening during 1948 of eight rural dispensaries. It considered, however, that the Administering Authority should give particular attention to training African medical personnel in greater numbers. The Council endorsed a tribute paid by the Mission to the zeal of the French women who, with the aid and guidance of the Administering Authority, devoted themselves to the thankless task of providing help and attention to the lepers at the isolation and treatment centre at Abota.

Several petitions⁹⁸ examined by the Council asked for more and better equipped hospitals and dispensaries in specific areas; the petitioners complained that maternity and infant care was inadequate and that there was a shortage of medicines. By resolution 278(VII) of 17 July, the Council referred the petitioners to the recommendations on medical services and public health included in its annual report and notified them that it examined the question annually. It also expressed the hope that the Administering Authority would continue to give special attention to improving the conditions for pregnant women, nursing mothers and infants.

d. EDUCATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

According to the Administering Authority's report, budget credits for education in 1948 amounted to 57,245,492 francs as against 32,592,425 francs in 1947. In addition, credits allocated for 1948-49 under the FIDES ten-year plan amounted to 57,100,000 francs, compared to 13,900,000 for the previous financial year.

Primary education in 1948-49 was given in 81 government and 83 private schools, eleven more than the previous year. School attendance increased from 18,693 in 1947 to 24,601 in 1948. Secondary schools, attended by 507 students in 1948, included five colleges, three of which were private, one a trade school and one a teacher-training school. The Administering Authority expected to have provided accommodation, as a result of its school building programme, for almost the whole school-age population before the end of 1957.

Public education throughout the Territory is provided free of charge, the Administering Authority reported, and the curricula in both Government and private schools are identical. Teaching in all schools is in French. In 1948, the staff of the primary and secondary schools consisted of 56 Europeans and 488 Africans. Most of the latter are pupil-teachers (moniteurs), who are deficient in training. Training courses were organized to give them further instruction and competitive examinations for recruiting pupil-teachers were introduced in 1948, the Administering Authority stated. A teachers' training institute was scheduled to open at Lomé in the near future.

In addition to the educational facilities provided in the Territory, scholarships for study in France were made available to indigenous students. During 1948, 39 indigenous students attended secondary schools in France, sixteen attended special schools and nineteen held scholarships to higher educational institutions.

The Administering Authority described the increased emphasis being placed on mass education. Instruction in the vernacular was also under consideration with respect to adult education groups; in this connexion, informal talks in the vernacular on personal hygiene, domestic and food hygiene, and child welfare were planned.

The Visiting Mission to the Territory found (T/464) that the indigenous inhabitants were much interested in educational development. Satisfaction was expressed with the advances made by the Administering Authority and the religious missions and with the results of the initial scheme in the field of mass education. Nevertheless, the need for further development was recognized and stressed in many petitions.⁹⁹ Among other requests, petitioners asked for: the expansion and improvement of local school facilities, particularly in the northern section of the Territory, where, it was stated, illiteracy was universal; the greater development of mass education; the provision of higher educational facilities; and the introduction of a mass scholarship system. It was pointed out in a number of petitions that the education of girls lagged far behind that of boys. Some referred to the lack of instruction in the vernacular, particularly in the Ewe language, which, it was proposed, should be adopted and officially recognized as the national language of the Territory. The Mission considered the requests for the further extension and development of education worthy of the Administering Authority's most sympathetic consideration. The Mission reported that an estimated 20 per cent of the African population could read or write French or English and that 5 per cent were literate in an indigenous language.

The Administering Authority drew the Mission's attention to certain difficulties with regard to the use of the vernacular as well as French as a medium of instruction, but indicated that, beginning in 1950, the Ewe language would be taught a few hours each day in primary schools. The Mission was of the opinion that the question of teaching in the vernacular was a matter for the Council's consideration.

Three petitioners, la delegation pour le "Jeune Togo", Association Culturelle, Lomé (T/Pet.7/-19), the Assemblée Représentative du Togo (T/Pet.6/23-7/21) and Mr. Kodjo Emmanuel Gagli, African doctor, and four others (T/Pet.7/105) considered that technical and financial assistance from the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization would be desirable to help meet the educational needs of the Territory. This evidence of interest in the activities of specialized agencies was noted with satisfaction by the Trusteeship Council in resolution 280(VII) of 17 July. It expressed the hope that the Administering Authority would call upon the specialized agencies for assistance whenever appropriate.

The other complaints and requests concerning education were dealt with by the Council in resolution 281(VII),¹⁰⁰ which also covered questions of a political, economic and social nature raised in petitions.

In its report on the Territory, the Council commended the Administering Authority for the progress it had made in developing education, particularly the increase in the number of schools, students and teachers and in the budgetary allocation for education. It noted the interest on the part of Africans in educational development. The Council also recognized the great need for further development and therefore recommended that the Administering Authority afford broader, more complete and widespread education to the inhabitants, particularly in the northern areas of the Territory. The retarded development of this area as compared with the southern section was partly due, it felt, to the lack of adequate educational facilities. It also recommended that teacher-training facilities in the Territory be expanded. Noting the limited number of girls attending schools, the Council suggested that the Administering Authority continue its efforts to increase their enrolment.

The use of pilot farms to provide training in the field of agriculture¹⁰¹ was noted by the Council with satisfaction. The Council repeated the recommendation made at its fourth session that the Administering Authority carry out its plan for extending facilities for technical education with the utmost vigour.

The Council also recommended that the Administering Authority increase its efforts to enable persons to continue their education after leaving school and that it pursue a vigorous programme to reduce illiteracy. It considered that libraries played an important part in maintaining permanent literacy among both the graduates of primary schools and those reached by the literacy programmes. It found existing library facilities insufficient for the ever-increasing needs of the inhabitants and recommended that libraries be established in as many communities as possible and that they be integrated with the programmes of adult and mass education. Noting with approval the steps taken to preserve indigenous cultures, as it had earlier recommended, the Council expressed the hope that the Administering Authority would continue to give increasing attention to this matter.

5. The Ewe Problem

The Ewe people were estimated in 1947 to number 800,000, of whom 330,000 lived in the British Gold Coast Colony, 126,000 in Togoland under British administration and 290,000 in Togoland under French administration. According to these estimates, they represent between one third and one half of the population of Togoland under British administration and more than one third of that of Togoland under French administration. The Ewes themselves claim to number about one million.

Their separation under these three administrations had resulted from Anglo-German conventions of 1890 and 1900 establishing the boundaries between Togoland and the Gold Coast and the partition of German Togoland after its military occupation in 1914 into the two Togoland Territories, one under French and one under British administration. The Ewe people had petitioned¹⁰² the Trusteeship Council in 1947 for the unification of "Eweland" on the grounds that its division was unjust and that its development was impeded by its being placed under two different administrations with completely different policies. As a result of their separation by frontiers, arbitrarily established, the Ewe people alleged to have suffered many hardships in every field—social, cultural, economic, political and educational. The two Administering Authorities, the United Kingdom and France, submitted a joint memorandum outlining the economic, fiscal and cultural measures they proposed to take to alleviate the frontier difficulties. To implement these proposals, the two Governments established in 1948 a joint Standing Consultative Commission for Togoland Affairs, composed of the Governor of the Gold Coast and the Commissioner of the Republic of Togoland under French administration as Co-Chairmen, and two representatives of the inhabitants of each Trust Territory. The Council welcomed these measures and invited the Administering Authorities to consult with each other and with the Ewe representatives with a view to evolving further steps to fulfil the wishes of the Ewe people. It directed its first Visiting Mission to West Africa to devote special attention to the problems complained of by the Ewes and agreed to re-examine the whole question after receiving the Mission's report. The Council postponed its examination of eight additional petitions on the same question until it had received the Mission's report.

By its sixth session, the Council had before it a total of 140 petitions, most of them received by the Visiting Mission, relating to the Ewe question, frontier difficulties and the unification of the two Togolands.¹⁰³ Opinion as to the kind of unification desired by the petitioners was divided. One group demanded the immediate unification under one administration of the area inhabited by the Ewe people in the southern sections of the two Togolands and in the Gold Coast Colony. Another sought the unification of the two Trust Territories, but apparently did not support the inclusion of the Ewe-inhabited territory of the Gold Coast unless it should be placed under Trusteeship. A third group opposed the unification of either "Eweland" or the two Trust Territories, favouring the maintenance of the status quo.

a. REPORT OF THE VISITING MISSION

The Visiting Mission made a special report to the Council concerning this question (T/463).

¹⁰¹ See p. 743.

¹⁰² Petitions from the All-Ewe Conference (T/Pet.6/1-7/1, 6/3-7/4, 6/4-7/5, 6/5-7/6 & Add.1), Mr. Augustino de Souza (T/Pet.6/2-7/3), the Council of African Affairs, Inc., New York (T/Pet.6/6-7/8, and the African Academy of Arts and Research, New York (T/Pet.6/7-7/9). For further information see Y.U.N., 1947-48, pp. 764-67, and Y.U.N., 1948-49, pp. 841-42.

¹⁰³ For list of these petitions, see pp. 822 and 829 ff.

It reviewed the background of the problem, the work of the Anglo-French Standing Consultative Commission, the organizations concerned with the question of unification and the scope of unification requested in the various demands.

The Mission considered that the idea of unification, which was now supported in principle by large sections of the population, had gained strength and impetus by the sudden aggravation in 1940 of the frontier restrictions between the two Trust Territories, one administered by a nation at war, the other by France under the Vichy régime. Neighbouring and related populations were separated by almost impassable barriers. As a result, relations between families had been hampered, and considerable material privations had been imposed, mainly on the inhabitants of Togoland under French administration. The efforts of the Consultative Commission, in the Mission's opinion a most valuable institution which might be further developed, had to some extent reduced the inconveniences caused by the frontier, but the different economic systems, exchange control, customs difficulties, etc., still imposed constraints upon the frontier population which it found difficult to bear. The Mission suggested that the Trusteeship Council should ask the Administering Authorities not only to continue the efforts they were making to reduce or even abolish the customs barriers, but also to increase their collaboration with a view to unifying and co-ordinating the legislation and practice in both territories with respect to fiscal, economic, cultural, educational, health, transport and public service matters in such a way as to eliminate at least the non-political aspects of the problem. However, these measures would not solve the whole problem.

The problem was no longer only an economic one, the Mission stated. Many Togolandese, citing frontier difficulties as merely one argument among others, were claiming that unification was an essential stage in their advancement towards self-government or independence. The Mission considered that unification might not be the only solution and suggested three ways in which the problem might be solved: a political solution within the framework of the two existing Trust Territories, an economic solution within the same framework, or a general solution within a wider political and economic framework embracing both Territories. It felt that the details of an overall plan should be left to experts and, above all, should await knowledge of the attitude of the two Administering Authorities. Whatever opinion might be held as to the ultimate objective, the Mission indicated, it was nevertheless certain that the desire for unification, which was quite legitimate in itself, was now widespread in the south of both Territories and must be regarded as a deeply rooted political force.

The Mission found that four organizations were actively interested in the unification movement. Two supported the unification under one administration of all the Ewe people: the All-Ewe Conference, composed of traditional chiefs, elders, representatives of several Ewe Unions and other people of Ewe-inhabited territory in the two Togolands and the Gold Coast; and the Comité de l'Unité Togolaise, a political party of considerable influence among the population of Togoland under French administration, claiming in 1947 a membership of 18,600. The Togoland Union, a political organization in Togoland under British administration, including among its members most of the natural rulers and an apparently large section of the people, sought the unification of the two Togolands. The fourth organization, Parti Togolais du Progrès, said to comprise 14,500 members in 1947, opposed the unification aims of the other three parties.

The Mission stressed that the problem had attained the force and dimensions of a nationalistic movement and that a solution should be sought with urgency in the interest of peace and stability in that part of the world. It urged that the following factors which had emerged from an objective study of the problem should be taken into account in seeking a solution:

The unification movement in the southern sections of the two Togolands, and apparently in the Keta District of the Gold Coast Colony, had assumed the character of a popular nationalistic movement;

The population of the Keta and Peki Districts of the Gold Coast Colony was a prominent segment of the unification movement;

If the unification movement were not satisfied to some appreciable degree, the danger of an intensification of local nationalism, perhaps stimulated by nationalistic forces in the neighbouring territories or by outside forces of a different character, seemed unavoidable;

The Ewe groups were not the only tribal groups advocating unification, and, even among the Ewe, the territorial scope of unification sought was not identical;

The unification movement, as a popular movement, was not prominent in the northern section of either of the two Togolands;

In northern Togoland under British administration, some chiefs desired unification with the Northern Territories of the Gold Coast;¹⁰⁴

The existing frontiers were a hardship, economically, socially and culturally, to the inhabitants of the southern sections of both Togolands and also, to some extent, to the inhabitants of the other sections;

¹⁰⁴ See p. 726.

The removal of the economic disabilities resulting from the existing frontiers did not fully meet the objectives of the unification movement.

b. CONSIDERATION IN THE TRUSTEESHIP COUNCIL

At the 53rd meeting of the sixth session of the Trusteeship Council on 13 March 1950, the representatives of France and the United Kingdom suggested that the whole question be deferred until the Council's seventh session, on the understanding that the two Administering Authorities would be able at that time to give a final reply on the political aspects of the question. The two Governments agreed to make every effort to eliminate the difficulties of a non-political character pointed out by the unification movement and to seek a solution which, within the limits of their responsibility, would enable them to take fully into account all the aspirations and desires of the population of the two Trust Territories (T/PV.255). The Council accepted this suggestion, and postponed its examination of all petitions and reports relating to both Territories.

Since representatives of the All-Ewe Conference, invited earlier to present their views before the Council, were already en route, the Council decided to hear them but to postpone any further discussion. Messrs. Sylvanus Olympio, E. Amu and A. M. Simpson, named to represent the All-Ewe Conference, took their seats at the Council table on 20 March, at the 63rd meeting.

Mr. Olympio, who was also a member of the Anglo-French Consultative Commission and President of the Representative Assembly of Togoland under French administration, made a statement and replied to questions put to him by members of the Council. He reviewed the history of the Ewe unification movement, and stated the conviction of the All-Ewe Conference that an orderly solution to the problem could be found. Although it would prefer that a unification plan be presented by the Administering Authorities, the Conference wished to suggest that a five-year plan might be drawn up providing for measures to bring all aspects of the two administrations into harmony, to increase the participation of Africans in the administration and to make possible the self-government of the Ewes at the end of the five-year period. The All-Ewe Conference did not demand the creation of a completely independent Ewe State, but hoped rather that the Ewe people might take a logical place in whatever system of federated States might eventually be devised for West Africa or for Africa as a whole. It hoped that the Council would be in favour of a solution along those lines. The fact that there were difficulties in the way of reaching a simple solution of the problem and that much must be left to the joint attitude and action of the Administering Authorities was appreciated by the All-Ewe Conference. It hoped that the two Administering Authorities concerned would work out an appropriate plan so that the Council could arrive at a final decision at its next session, thus bringing about the realization of the desires of the All-Ewe Conference.

(1) Proposals of the Administering Authorities

The two Administering Authorities presented to the Council at its seventh session a joint memorandum (T/702) in the form of joint observations on the Mission's report on the Ewe problem, outlining the decisions they had taken. They stated that the Ewe and other inhabitants of the two Trust Territories were far from being agreed among themselves upon a political and administrative solution, as had been pointed out in the Mission's report. Since the publication of that report, they continued, representatives of the inhabitants of the northern sections of both Togolands had expressed very decided views against the unification of the two Trust Territories. Moreover, even among those who favoured unification, there were not only differences of view as to the areas to be united, but there was little evidence in their petitions as to how unification could be brought about and how the many intricate economic and social problems involved could be dealt with. They noted that the Mission itself had not felt able to propose any concrete solution and they themselves remained of the opinion that there was no one political solution which readily offered itself as being clearly preferable to the present state of affairs. They considered that no further progress could be made towards a solution of the problem until the real wishes and interests of all the peoples of the two Trust Territories had been ascertained. As the instrument to accomplish this, they had decided to expand both the composition and the functions of the Standing Consultative Commission on Togoland Affairs. The Commission was to continue its previous functions of considering economic, social and other measures designed to ameliorate the frontier difficulties, and in addition was to make a detailed study of the representations made and any further investigations necessary to enable it to ascertain the real wishes of the whole population. It was to submit to the two Governments its conclusions concerning practical means whereby the various points of view could be satisfied within the framework of British and French administration. Provisionally, the enlarged Commission would be composed of the Governor of the Gold Coast and the Commissioner of the Republic of Togoland under French administration as co-chairmen; two other officials as vice-chairmen; seventeen representatives of the people of Togoland under British administration (fifteen elected and two nominated—one each by the All-Ewe Conference and the Togoland Union); and 28 representatives of the people of Togoland under French administration (26 elected and two nominated—one by the Parti Togolais du Progrès and one by the Comité de l'Unité Togolaise).

(2) Views of the Petitioners

The Council granted requests from the following petitioners, permitting their representatives to be heard at the seventh session in support of their written petitions: the All-Ewe Conference, which designated Mr. Sylvanus Olympio; the Togoland Union, the Natural Rulers of Western Togoland and the Togoland Farmers' Association, which designated Mr. S. G. Antor and Mr. F. Y. Asare; the Parti Togolais du Progrès, which designated Mr. Pedro Olympio; and the Chiefs and People of Northern Togoland, which designated Mr. Dermann Ayéva. These representatives presented their views at the 20th to 22nd meetings from 5 to 7 July 1950, and the Council held a general discussion on the Ewe and related questions at its 24th to 27th meetings from 11 to 14 July.

The representative of the All-Ewe Conference stated that the Ewe people had been deeply disappointed by the joint proposals of the Administering Authorities. These proposals were based on the opposition in the Territories to the demands of the Ewes, an echo of which the Visiting Mission had caught. They were retrogressive, in that they provided for the establishment of yet another body to determine the aspirations of the Ewe people as if these were not well known. That the great majority of the Ewe people wanted unification had been recognized by the Trusteeship Council at its second session in 1947 and by the Mission in 1949. The All-Ewe Conférence was most anxious that the unification of the Ewe people and the unification of the two Territories of Togoland should be treated as two separate questions. The proposals of the Administering Authorities confused the question by assuming that the issue was whether the two Territories should be united. The Ewe people sought only their own unification; whether or not their unified administration formed part of a larger federation did not matter. As to the Administering Authorities' statement regarding the solution of economic and social problems resulting from unification, the Ewe people were aware of these problems, which were merely matters of detail, and were prepared to discuss them with representatives of the Administering Authorities. The All-Ewe Conference had no alternative but to reject the joint proposals as a solution of the Ewe problem, nor did it intend to take part in the establishment of the new Consultative Commission as it was convinced that this body would not be permitted to study the question of the unification of the Ewe people as it ought to be studied. The Ewe people would not consent to being allowed only a minority representation on a body which was to determine their future. With regard to the reduction of frontier difficulties by the new Commission, Mr. S. Olympio adduced that the present Commission had already taken all measures possible under existing circumstances and had outlived its usefulness.

In the name of the All-Ewe Conference, he appealed to the Council for the following measures:

- (1) it should be definitely decided that the Ewe people should be unified under one and the same administration;
- (2) the northern tribes should decide, through the Consultative Commission or by plebiscite, whether they wished to form a union of their own or unite with the Ewe people;
- (3) if they decided to unite with the Ewe people, they should consult with the Ewes concerning the form of such unification;
- (4) the manner of unification and the relationship with neighbouring territories should be worked out by the Ewe people.

Messrs. Asare and Antor, speaking on behalf of the Togoland Union, the Natural Rulers of Western Togoland and the Togoland Farmers' Association, described the difficulties resulting from the arbitrary partition of German Togoland. The Anglo-French frontier had made it practically impossible for the peoples of Togoland to advance politically, economically, socially or educationally. The problem of Togoland was a human problem which needed both a social and a moral solution. The partition of the Territory prevented members of the same family from taking part in indigenous customs, funeral ceremonies, marriages and yearly festivals. Members of the same family living on different sides of the frontier could not attend together any of the ceremonies held between 6 P.M. and 8 A.M. Moreover, written communication between the Ewe people was becoming impossible. While the Ewe language was taught in schools in Togoland under British administration, only French was taught in schools across the frontier.

The petitioners felt that the Administering Authorities, by stressing the diversity of views regarding unification, were attempting to confuse world opinion. The people of Togoland, Messrs. Asare and Antor maintained, were unanimous in demanding unification under a single government. They felt that the Administering Authorities sought to delay the solution of the problem by proposing to increase the number of members of the Consultative Commission, which, they stated, should be dissolved since it was in fact instrumental in maintaining the barrier dividing Togoland. The petitioners sought the removal of the frontier and the establishment of a representative assembly with both legislative and executive powers as the nucleus of the Togoland central government.

The Administering Authority of the unified Togoland, they suggested, should be determined by a plebiscite conducted under the supervision of a United Nations commission. Prior to the assumption of authority by the new administration, a new constitution for the united Togoland should be drawn up by its inhabitants, assisted in an advisory capacity by this commission. The petitioners also felt that the Trusteeship Council might initiate a programme of development which would enable Togoland to attain self-government within five years. The petitioners would have no objection, Mr. Asare stated, if the area of the Gold Coast inhabited by the Ewe people were also included in this unified administration.

The representative of the Parti Togolais du Progrès, Mr. Pedro Olympio, stated that the primary objective of his organization was to achieve self-government for the people in Togoland under French administration. It felt that it was its duty to work in close and loyal co-operation with France so as to attain this goal. It was categorically opposed to the unification of the Ewe people as this implied a change of administration and any such change could only retard the progressive development of the people towards self-government. Nor did it feel that unification met a real need of the Ewe people. Their unification would separate them from the other peoples of the north with which they had formed a single administration for two generations; it would result in similar demands by other tribes for unification under an administration of their choice, and Togoland would be split up into small tribes. The Ewe movement would disappear of its own accord, the Parti Togolais du Progrès believed, once the customs difficulties were solved.

Speaking on behalf of the Chiefs and People of Northern Togoland under French administration, Mr. Ayéva also opposed unification of the Ewe people or of the two Togolands because this would interrupt the course of development under the current administration, but mainly because unification implied the subjugation of the northern tribes to the unified Ewe people. Domination of other tribes, these petitioners felt, was the aim of the Ewe movement. The people of the north expressed confidence in France to supply their needs and improve their position and in the United Nations concerning their attainment of self-government in due course.

(3) Discussion in the Council

During the general discussion which followed, several members of the Council indicated that the joint proposals of the two Administering Authorities concerned, by directing the proposed Consultative Commission to submit conclusions concerning practical means whereby various points of view could be satisfied "within the framework of the British and French administration", did not seem to permit it to consider the question of unification. To clarify their intentions, the representatives of France and the United Kingdom added to the Commission's terms of reference the words "and not precluding the unification of any parts of the two Trust Territories".

Asked whether the All-Ewe Conference would participate in the work of the Commission in view of this amendment, Mr. S. Olympio indicated that the text excluded all the Ewes living in the Gold Coast Colony, and included elements which did not share his concern for the unification of the Ewe people. While he could not accept the proposals, he would nevertheless inform the Ewe people of the concession which had been made.

The representative of the United Kingdom indicated that his Government had no intention of placing any part of the Gold Coast Colony under the International Trusteeship System. Since it was not a Trust Territory, this area was outside the competence of the Trusteeship Council. With regard to the problem concerning Togoland, the representatives of the United Kingdom and France affirmed the duty of the Administering Authorities to all the peoples of both Trust Territories, and again stated that it was impossible to reach substantive decisions before all views had been examined by the Consultative Commission. While the final decisions might prove disappointing to the Ewes and to some others in the two Trust Territories, the Administering Authorities would continue to do everything in their power to reach a solution of the problem which would give the maximum satisfaction to the maximum number of the people concerned.

The proposals of the Administering Authorities were supported by a majority of the Council members, who stressed the complexity of the problem. Pending a final solution, however, it was recognized that steps should be taken to alleviate some of the more pressing difficulties caused by the division of Togoland. For example, as suggested by the representative of Belgium, rigid and inflexible frontier regulations should be avoided and the Ewe language should be used in education in both Territories to help the Ewes maintain a common link among themselves while perfecting their European culture.

A draft resolution, in which the Council would express the hope that the Administering Authorities would proceed along the lines of their joint proposals, was put forward by the representatives of Argentina and the United States (T/L.100).

Opposition to the joint proposals of the Administering Authorities was expressed by the representatives of China, Iraq and the Philippines, who fully supported the demands of the All-Ewe Conference and urged that concrete steps be taken to satisfy the legitimate demand of the Ewes for unification. They proposed amendments (T/L.102) to the draft resolution of Argentina and the United States. The amended draft would, inter alia, have the Council recall its earlier affirmation, in 1947, that the petition of the All-Ewe Conference represented the wishes of the majority of the Ewe people and note various conclusions of the Visiting Mission. The Council would note that the wishes of the Togoland Union and the All-Ewe Conference were not mutually exclusive. It would also note that the attitude of the people in the northern parts of the Territories towards unification was not clearly established, and suggest that their wishes might be determined by plebiscite; however, the Council would affirm that whatever their attitude, it should not be allowed to prejudice the question of the unification of the Ewes.

These amendments were rejected by the Council on 14 July 1950, by a roll-call vote of 3 in favour to 8 against. By a roll-call vote of 8 to 2, with one abstention, the Council then adopted the resolution proposed by Argentina and the United States (250(VII)).

By this resolution, the Council noted the joint proposals of the Administering Authorities, in particular that the Consultative Commission was required to make a "detailed study of the representations which have been or may be made" and that it was not precluded from recommending the "unification of any parts of the two Trust Territories". The Council expressed the hope that the Commission would equitably represent the different sections and groups of the two Territories. It asked the Administering Authorities to report to its next session on the progress made and recommended that they take all the necessary and appropriate measures to ensure that, until a definitive settlement was reached, the common traits and traditions of the Ewe people should be preserved.

c. CONSIDERATION IN THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY AT ITS FIFTH SESSION

The Ewe question came before the 147th to 150th, 153rd, 161st and 162nd meetings of the Fourth Committee, on 9, 11, 12, 18 and 31 October 1950 and the 316th plenary meeting on 2 December.

During the general discussion in the Fourth Committee on the report of the Trusteeship Council, the representative of the Philippines called the Committee's attention on 9 October to petitions recently received from Mr. Augustino de Souza, President of the Comité de l'Unité Togolaise (T/Pet.6/194-T/Pet.7/160 & Add.1-5). These petitions concerned the election of members of the Consultative Commission in Togoland under French administration. Since the Trusteeship Council was not to meet again until January 1951, the representative of the Philippines considered it essential that these petitions should be considered in the Committee.

(1) Petitions from l'Unité Togolaise

The petitioner transmitted extracts from the journal Le Togo Français and communications and correspondence concerning the election procedure. According to the announced procedure, grand electors would be chosen in the villages and would in turn elect the members of the Commission.

Although the Comité de l'Unité Togolaise had objections and proposals to make on a number of points, its chief concern was the method of appointment of the grand electors. The first detailed announcement of the procedure, as published in Le Togo Français on 7 September, stated: "The people of the villages will appoint a certain number of grand electors according to customary methods and without the intervention of the Administration. By 'customary methods' it is meant that the choice of the grand electors will be made by the chiefs in council in accordance with the rules established by custom." The election procedure had been disclosed by the Commissioner of the Republic to representatives of l'Unité Togolaise and of the Parti Togolais du Progrès at a meeting on 4 September. This meeting gave rise to a considerable exchange of correspondence between l'Unité Togolaise and the Commissioner. L'Unité Togolaise felt that it was impossible to reconcile the assurance that there would be no intervention by the Administration with the announced method of choosing the grand electors "by the chiefs in council", since the chiefs in Togoland under French administration were in effect officials appointed by the Administration before the application of a new decree restoring customary methods of appointment, and chiefs' councils of the customary kind did not exist; therefore, the persons selected as grand electors would inevitably be those who faithfully reflected the views of the Administration-appointed chiefs and accordingly of the Administration itself. L'Unité Togolaise indicated that it had notified the Commissioner on 18 September that it would not participate in the elections if he was unable to modify the election procedure to give effect to the "real customs" of the people; under traditional customs, among the Ewe people at any rate, no traditional chief could take an important decision without consulting and obtaining the consent of his people as a whole.

L'Unité Togolaise informed the United Nations that when, in an official notice of 16 September, the description of the procedure was altered to read that "the population of each village" should appoint the grand electors "under the aegis of the village chiefs," it took this change to mean that the villages themselves could now elect their grand electors in the customary manner. It stated, however, that in actual practice this was not the case. It had found cause to complain to the Commissioner, in a letter dated 6 October, at which time the grand electors were already being appointed, that several of the district administrative officers had issued formal instructions to the effect that only chiefs and their immediate supporters were entitled to appoint grand electors. It had further pointed out to the Commissioner that in the northern part of the Territory not only the grand electors but also the delegates to the Commission had already been appointed by the village chiefs and higher chiefs. In the southern regions of Aného and Atakpamé there had been cases where village chiefs, who had appointed grand electors in accordance with the wishes of the villagers, had found that their choice had been invalidated by higher cantonal chiefs and district administrative officers. Many of the grand electors thus far appointed, it added, were the chiefs themselves and their ward chiefs.

L'Unité Togolaise also protested to the United Nations against the arrest of several persons, among them members of l'Unité Togolaise, who objected to the designation of the grand electors in a manner contrary to local customs. While asserting that the purpose of the arrests was to intimidate the people, l'Unité Togolaise stated that its technical basis was the strict application of a metropolitan decree applied for the first time in Togoland. The law in question required, inter alia, the prior notification of public meetings to the authorities. L'Unité Togolaise complained that, since Administration officials were widely scattered and notification would often require travel on foot for many miles and in any case 99 per cent of the population was entirely ignorant of the decree, a district officer "seeking a pretext for mischief" could easily have the inhabitants of a village arrested and imprisoned for convening a meeting without prior notification.

(2) Observations by the Administering Authority

Observations concerning these petitions were made by the representative of France at the 153rd and 162nd meetings of the Fourth Committee on 18 and 31 October 1950. He stated that the electoral system previously in use limited the suffrage to only a few thousand privileged persons, favouring the towns much more than the rural areas, and a new election procedure which was far more democratic and gave the vote to several hundred thousand persons had therefore been adopted for elections to the Consultative Commission. He denied that the grand electors were not really elected but merely appointed by the local chief, asserting that no chief had the power to impose his choice upon the people. He stated further that under the decree of 2 December 1949 the practice of appointing chiefs had been abolished; and under the previous practice the Administration had selected one of three candidates nominated by the villages themselves. L'Unité Togolaise had raised no objection to the election procedure at the meeting of 4 September, he stated, and, moreover, had taken part in the first stage of the elections. It was only after the party had seen that the results of the voting were not what it had anticipated that it had changed its mind and had put pressure on the electors by every available means. He denied the allegations of interference by the Administration in the elections. As to the arrests, he explained that the Administering Authority had felt it a duty to apply the regulations for the holding of meetings to protect the inhabitants against interference by other parties and to ensure that all points of view should be freely and publicly heard. The representative of France dealt with two incidents that had led to arrests. In the first, at Afagnan, the local chief had received from the local committee of l'Unité Togolaise a summons to attend a meeting, and on the same day three village chiefs had complained to the local court that the local head of the party had called a meeting without the required prior notification. This, the representative of France adduced, was a clear violation of the law, committed for the purpose of intimidating the voters, and the two offenders had been sentenced to imprisonment for two months and one month respectively. In the other case, a meeting at Attitongon had taken place without notification but no arrests had been made until the local head of l'Unité Togolaise, who was conducting the meeting, had uttered threats of armed violence.

(3) Other Petitions

The views of l'Unité Togolaise were challenged, in two additional petitions before the Fourth Committee, by the principal groups opposed to the unification of the Ewes or of Togoland. Mr. Dermann Ayéva, in the name of the Chiefs and People of Northern Togoland (T/Pet.6/197-T/Pet.7/163) protested against the false representation of their chiefs as administration officials and vigorously affirmed that the elections of grand electors was in conformity with local traditions and customs and calculated to reflect the wishes of the people. The Parti Togolais du Progres also objected to the accusations of l'Unité Togolaise (T/Pet.6/199-T/Pet.7/165); in a cablegram sent after the elections of 22 October of members of the Consultative Commission, the Parti Togolais du Progres stated that these elections confirmed the success of that Party, the anticipation of which had made l'Unité Togolaise "afraid to face popular suffrage" (T/Pet.6/199-T/Pet.7/165/Add.1).

In the meantime, the Togoland Union, in Togoland under British administration, notified the United Nations that the chiefs of political parties in that Territory had unanimously resolved that the Consultative Commission would not sit pending the rectification of the irregularities complained of (T/Pet.6/198-T/Pet.7/164).

(4) Discussion in the Fourth Committee

At the 161st meeting of the Fourth Committee, on 31 October, the representatives of India, Indonesia, Iraq, the Philippines and Yugoslavia presented a joint draft resolution designed to meet the situation which had arisen in Togoland under French administration (A/C.4/L.82/Rev.1). By this draft resolution, the Assembly would, inter alia, note the complaints of l'Unité Togolaise and comments contained in other related petitions, and recommend that the Administering Authority investigate the practices complained of and report to the Council. These representatives did not feel that the representative of France had satisfactorily answered the charges made.

The draft resolution received wide support. Several of its supporters, including Brazil, Burma, China, Poland and three sponsors of the draft resolution—Indonesia, the Philippines and Yugoslavia—felt that it did not go far enough. With regard to the formation of the Consultative Commission, it was suggested by the representative of the Philippines that other measures might be taken: an emergency session of the Trusteeship Council might be held to study and report on the problem; a special mission might be sent to investigate the complaints on the spot; or elections might be held under United Nations supervision. The representative of Yugoslavia asserted that a plebiscite rather than the Consultative Commission might have been a more satisfactory method of ascertaining the real wishes of the people. It was also indicated that the draft resolution offered no solution to the main problem—the unification of the Ewe people.

The divergence of views with respect to the question of unification was stressed by the representatives of Belgium and the Netherlands. These members, as well as Argentina, Cuba, and the United States, also spoke in support of the draft resolution which, they stated, did not prejudice the issues raised in the petitions.

The representative of France stated that, while the draft resolution quite rightly stressed the importance of the petitions from l'Unité Togolaise, it did not refer adequately to other petitions.

An amendment suggested by the representative of Argentina giving documentary references to the other petitions and indicating that they contained comments "to the contrary" was accepted by the sponsors of the draft resolution. A proposal by the Ukrainian SSR to re-introduce the original text, which merely noted "the comments contained in other related petitions", was defeated by 23 votes to 5, with 14 abstentions.

Several other amendments were introduced during the discussions in the Fourth Committee.

The Committee rejected, by 22 votes to 16, with 4 abstentions, a Belgian proposal to alter a reference to the importance of finding "an adequate solution" to the Ewe problem "as soon as possible and in full accordance with" the real wishes and interests of the people concerned, by substituting for the quoted words the following: "the most satisfactory solution possible in fullest possible conformity with".

The representative of India proposed an addition to the end of the draft resolution, suggesting that the Trusteeship Council take such action as it may consider appropriate in the light of the discussions in the Fourth Committee and the results of the Administering Authority's investigations. By 32 votes to none, with 11 abstentions, the Committee adopted this amendment. As a result, an amendment by China was automatically rejected; this would have asked the Council to examine the methods and results of the election and, if necessary, to send a special mission to investigate on the spot, and to report to the Assembly.

With the adoption by 26 votes to 8, with 9 abstentions, of a proposal by Cuba, the Council was asked to report on the Ewe question in "a special chapter or sub-chapter of its annual report" to the Assembly; an amendment by Poland that the Council make a "special report" on the question was automatically rejected.

The draft resolution as a whole, as amended, was then adopted by a roll-call vote of 40 to none, with 3 abstentions, at the 162nd meeting of the Fourth Committee on 31 October 1950.

(5) Resolution Adopted by the Assembly

It was adopted without further discussion at the 316th plenary meeting of the General Assembly on 2 December 1950, by 48 votes to none, with 6 abstentions (resolution 441 (V)). The text read:

The General Assembly,

Noting the action taken by the Trusteeship Council in respect of the Ewe unification movement and related questions in the Trust Territories of Togoland under French administration and Togoland under British administration,

Noting, in particular, the endorsement by the Trusteeship Council of the decision of the Administering Authorities concerned to establish an expanded Standing Consultative Commission for the purpose of ascertaining the real wishes and interests of the peoples concerned, and the expression by the Council of the hope that the Administering Authorities would take all appropriate steps to ensure that the Commission would equitably represent the different sections and groups,

Noting the complaints made by the President of the Comité de l'Unité togolaise in a petition to the Secretary-General (T/Pet.7/160-T/Pet.6/194; T/Pet.7/160-T/Pet.6/194/Add.1; T/Pet.7/160-T/Pet.6/194/Add.2; T/Pet.7/160-T/Pet.6/194/Add.3; T/Pet.7/160-T/Pet.6/194/Add.4; T/Pet.7/160-T/Pet.6/194/Add.5) against the methods of election prescribed by the Administering Authority of Togoland under French administration and the allegation that persons have been arrested and imprisoned because they wished to have indigenous customs observed in the elections,

Noting the comments to the contrary contained in other related petitions (T/Pet.7/163-T/Pet.6/197; T/Pet.7/165-T/Pet.6/199; T/Pet.7/165-T/Pet.6/199/Add.1),

Noting the declarations made on these matters by the representative of France in the Fourth Committee on 18 and 31 October 1950,

1. Recognizes the great importance of the Ewe problem, and impresses upon the Trusteeship Council and the Administering Authorities concerned the importance of finding an adequate solution as soon as possible and in full accordance with the real wishes and interests of the people concerned;

2. Impresses, in particular, upon the Administering Authorities the necessity of conducting elections to the Standing Consultative Commission in a democratic manner that will ensure a true representation of the people;

3. Recommends that the Administering Authority of Togoland under French administration investigate promptly the practices complained of in the petition of the President of the Comité de l'Unité togolaise and in other petitions on the subject with a view to ascertaining whether the methods of election which have been applied ensure that the views of all sections of the population are faithfully reflected, and report thereon to the next session of the Trusteeship Council for such action as the Council may consider appropriate in the light of the relevant discussions in the Fourth Committee and of the results of the investigations of the Administering Authority of Togoland under French administration;

4. Requests that the Trusteeship Council devote a special chapter or sub-chapter of its annual report to the next session of the General Assembly to setting forth all the steps undertaken in connexion with the Ewe question.

B. TRUST TERRITORIES IN EAST AFRICA

Annual reports submitted by the Administering Authorities on the administration of Ruanda-Urundi and Tanganyika during 1948 were examined by the Council at its sixth session, held from 19 January to 4 April 1950.¹⁰⁵ In examining these reports, the Council took into consideration the observations made by its first regular Visiting Mission (T/217 & Add.1; T/218 & Add.1),¹⁰⁶ sent to these Territories in 1948, and, in connexion with educational conditions, the observations of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization on the annual reports (T/439).

During 1950, the Council also examined, at its sixth session, two petitions concerning Ruanda-Urundi, four concerning Tanganyika, and twenty-two concerning both Territories.¹⁰⁷

On 20 July 1950, during its seventh session, the Council decided that its next Visiting Mission should again visit Tanganyika and Ruanda-Urundi, and, in addition, the Territory of Somaliland under provisional Italian administration, for which a Trusteeship Agreement was later approved in 1950 by the General Assembly.¹⁰⁸ The four-member Mission should spend a total of three months in the Territories, and a month at Headquarters for writing its report. The Council agreed that it would appoint the members of the Mission at its next session, in 1951.

A brief description of conditions in Ruanda-Urundi and Tanganyika is given below,¹⁰⁹ together with the relevant decisions taken by the Council in connexion with its examination of annual reports and petitions and its special study of the administrative arrangements involving each of the two Trust Territories.

1. Ruanda-Urundi, Administered by Belgium¹¹⁰

Ruanda-Urundi, the most densely populated Trust Territory in Africa, covers an area of 54,172 square kilometres (approx. 20,900 square miles). In 1948, according to the Administering Authority's report,¹¹¹ African inhabitants numbered 3,793,922, Europeans 2,805 and Asians 2,504.

a. STATUS OF THE TERRITORY

The Territory remains united administratively with the Belgian Congo Colony, as provided for by the Law of 21 August 1925, which made Ruanda-Urundi a Vice-Government-General. The Territory retains its distinct juridical personality and its own finances and assets. It is administered by the Vice-Governor-General, who is administratively subordinated to the Governor-General of the Belgian Congo, but acts independently with regard to legislative texts and regulations. Laws of the Belgian Congo are applied to Ruanda-Urundi with his concurrence. Furthermore, under the Law of 21 August 1925, no legislation of the Congo which is contrary to the terms of the former Mandate is to be made applicable to Ruanda-Urundi.

A twenty-two member advisory body, the Council of the Vice-Government-General, established in 1947, considers, inter alia, budgetary proposals and all questions submitted to it by the Vice-Governor-General.

During its examination of the various aspects of the administrative union (T/L.96), the Council's Committee on Administrative Unions noted the observations (T/217) of the Visiting Mission which went to the Territory in 1948. It appeared to the Mission that Ruanda-Urundi had a distinct personality which did not seem to be threatened by the union. The Territory in fact derived some advantages from the union; it was enabled, for example, to benefit from the skilled technical services of the Government-General and to participate in the Native Welfare Fund. On the other hand, the Territory under the present system was

¹⁰⁷ For list of petitions examined during 1950, see table, pp. 822 ff.

placed on the same footing as a province of the Belgian Congo and the Mission consequently felt justified in recommending that the Belgian Government render the administrative union more flexible in order to give Ruanda-Urundi a more independent character.

The Committee found the present operation of the administrative union well within the framework of the Charter and the Trusteeship Agreement. It agreed that there was no evidence to indicate that the separate legal status of the Trust Territory was endangered or likely to be endangered in the foreseeable future by the administrative union. But it felt that the Administering Authority should consider reviewing the legal form of the administrative arrangements with a view to bringing it more fully into accord with existing practices.

The Committee took special note of the assurance by the representative of Belgium (T/AC.14/28) that his Government was prepared to envisage modifications of the present arrangements should the Council come to the opinion that the existing union had become detrimental to the interests of the inhabitants of Ruanda-Urundi. Moreover, the whole scheme would be reviewed if there were substantial opposition to it on the part of the indigenous population.

In its observations regarding resolution 326-IV of the General Assembly concerning administrative unions, the Committee noted the statements of the representative of Belgium to the effect that his Government did not intend to extend the scope of the existing union, but that it would be reviewed if there were substantial opposition to it. It agreed that the Administering Authority was furnishing clear and precise separate data relating to the Trust Territory as required by the Council for the effective discharge of its responsibilities. The Committee observed that a separate judicial organization existed in Ruanda-Urundi and that no legislative body with headquarters in the Belgian Congo has authority over the Trust Territory. It noted further that the Vice-Government-General's Council, which may in future be developed into a legislative body, has its headquarters inside Ruanda-Urundi. These observations were called to the attention of the General Assembly by the Trusteeship Council, in its resolution 293(VII).¹¹²

b. POLITICAL DEVELOPMENT

The Trust Territory is divided into two Native states, Ruanda and Urundi, each headed by an hereditary Mwami. These states are further divided into chiefdoms and sub-chiefdoms. The Bami (plural of Mwami), the chiefs and the sub-chiefs are responsible for indigenous administration and for numerous functions prescribed by law. The Administering Authority indicated that proposed reforms involved the creation of sub-chiefdom councils and a Territorial council in addition to existing chiefdom and state councils. Members of the various councils, it stated, would be elected according to a procedure corresponding to the stage of development of the people concerned.

In its conclusions with respect to the Territory's political development, the Trusteeship Council noted with satisfaction that the two Bami had been appointed as permanent members on the Council of the Vice-Government-General. It favoured the Administering Authority's plan to increase the number of Africans on this Council in the near future and expressed the hope that the Council would be given some legislative powers. Observing with regret that an election experiment in Usumbura in 1949 had not met with the expected success, the Council expressed its hope that such experiments would be more successful in the future; it asked the Administering Authority to keep it informed of developments in this matter and of the reforms contemplated in the indigenous political structure.

The Council commended the Administering Authority for the progress already achieved in the political field and expressed the hope that it would carefully consider all the recommendations of the Council and the suggestions of the Visiting Mission.

c. ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

Ruanda-Urundi is primarily an agricultural country. The Administering Authority reported that approximately 20.3 per cent of the total land area was under cultivation, principally for indigenous foodstuffs. Other crops included Arabian coffee and cotton seed, of which, respectively, 11,000 and 3,656 tons were produced in 1948 by the indigenous population. It was stated that the Administration was attempting to reduce the number and improve the quality of cattle, which numbered 965,884 head, all belonging to the indigenous inhabitants. Although of indifferent quality, cattle were considered as a sign of wealth in Ruanda-Urundi, but, as indicated by the Administering Authority, pasture land was encroaching to a dangerous extent on land available for cultivation.

¹¹² See p. 795.

Although mining was entirely in the hands of mining companies and settlers, the Administering Authority stated, the Territory was guaranteed the right of control, supervision and participation in profits through the allocation to the Government of a certain number of mining company shares.

Imports in 1948 totalled 50,503 tons, valued at 671,000,000 francs,¹¹³ as against 46,200 tons at 647,000,000 francs in 1947; exports totalled 73,489 tons, valued at 713,000,000 francs, as against 57,622 tons at 624,000,000 francs in 1947. Principal imports were cotton goods, salt, cement, petrol, industrial machinery, vehicles, etc., and the principal exports were coffee, cattle, skins, tin ore, gold and cotton; the main suppliers and customers were the Belgian Congo, Belgium and the United States.

National income of the Territory was estimated at 2,830,018,000 francs. For 1948, estimated revenue was 200,458,000 francs, derived from indigenous taxes (poll, polygamy and cattle), customs duties, etc.; estimated expenditure was 230,464,000 francs for the ordinary budget and 28,365,000 francs for the extraordinary budget.

The efforts of the Administering Authority to overcome the danger of famine, which remained a major problem in the Territory, were considered praiseworthy by the Council. These efforts included the compulsory production of food crops by the indigenous population, the introduction of improved production methods, the bringing of new land under cultivation, and the provision of food storage facilities. The Council drew the Administering Authority's attention to the need for further measures to deal with this problem and recommended the continued use of the services of the Food and Agriculture Organization and the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization. It also urged the Administering Authority to maintain its restrictions on the settlement of agricultural land by non-indigenous persons and to continue to study the possibility of persuading the excess population to migrate to less-populated neighbouring territories.

d. SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT

The Administering Authority reported that there were no unemployment and no industrial disputes during 1948. The total number of workers in permanent employment rose from 51,948 in 1947 to 59,515 in 1948; in the latter year, 21,656 were employed in industry, 7,289 in agriculture, 5,869 in commerce, 14,215 in the missions, 7,178 in the administration and the rest in various other jobs. Although wages had showed a steady increase, they had not kept pace with rising prices. As a result, the standard-of-living index was going down. Indicating its conviction that lowering the cost of living was what was needed rather than a sharp increase in wages by legislative action, the Administering Authority stated that it was trying to resolve the problem by controlling prices and establishing "fair-price shops" supplied through Government channels.

In 1948, 330 convictions were recorded in the courts for breaking the labour contract by quitting work, and 503 for other derelictions of duty. The local Administration considered that the abolition of these penal sanctions, as previously recommended by the Council, would immediately give rise to social unrest; it was explained that the labour force as yet showed little sense of duty in the observance of contracts and the need to work had not yet become essential. The Government was nevertheless considering what improvements could be made in the law.

The Council found that the existing scale of wages was low in comparison with prices and recommended that the Administering Authority consider raising real wages, which it believed to be a strong incentive to more efficient labour. It also suggested that penal sanctions for breach of labour contract be abolished as soon as practicable. The Administering Authority was commended, however, for its efforts to enable recruited workers to be accompanied by their families.

In its report, the Administering Authority indicated that certain types of compulsory labour without pay, such as work in connexion with afforestation or famine prevention, are required under the Ordinance of 4 October 1943. The Ordinance also provides for certain types of paid compulsory labour, such as the construction of medical establishments and schools. Unpaid compulsory labour for the upkeep of roads, however, was completely abolished, as had been recommended by the Visiting Mission, and was replaced as from December 1948 by an annual tax of 7 francs per taxpayer. The Belgian administration also had succeeded during the year in abolishing completely the compulsory tributes in kind or in labour formerly payable by the indigenous inhabitants to the Bami, the chiefs and sub-chiefs, and all tribal dues were accordingly replaced by taxes payable in cash; for this action the Administering Authority was commended by the Council.

¹¹³ Throughout this account of the Trust Territory of Ruanda-Urundi, francs=Belgian francs.

Referring to earlier General Assembly and Council resolutions concerning discrimination and corporal punishment, the Council asked the Administering Authority to continue reviewing all legislation involving social discrimination, particularly the laws on immigration, residence, alcoholic beverages, fire-arms and the penitentiary system. It again recommended that the Administering Authority consider the abolition of whipping and its replacement by other forms of penalties more in keeping with the Charter and the Universal Declaration on Human Rights.¹¹⁴ It further recommended that solitary confinement be limited in duration and be applied only in serious and exceptional cases.

Many improvements in the field of public health during 1948 were recorded by the Administering Authority, including, among others, an increase of almost fifty per cent in the medical staff, increases in the number of search teams for finding and treating victims of sleeping sickness and in the number of child welfare clinics, and the establishment of a medical research laboratory. While commending the Administering Authority on its achievements and on the steps taken to train African medical personnel for higher posts, the Council recommended that such services be improved and expanded.

e. EDUCATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Except for the official Astrida school group, all schools in the Territory, the Administering Authority reported, continued to be run by missions. The number of government subsidized elementary mission schools increased during 1948 by 312 to a total of 1,589, and non-subsidized by 1,772 to a total of 4,953. A teachers' training school, a student teachers' school, six domestic science sections and three technical training schools were also established during the year.

The total number of pupils rose from 326,550 in 1947 to 420,000 in 1948. About 72 per cent of the total of 315,000 boys between seven and fourteen years of age and 42 per cent of the total of 320,000 girls attended elementary schools; of the estimated total of 370,000 young people between fourteen and eighteen years of age, 4.4 per cent received some form of education.

The Administering Authority stated that a new set of regulations and curricula had been prepared for application as from January 1949. These regulations, inter alia, extended the scope of education for young girls, provided for adult education classes, and reorganized secondary and technical education to permit the introduction of a selective system for higher studies. Subsidies to missions were increased to meet the expenditure involved in reorganizing the schools. Pending the establishment, in the near future, of non-specialized secondary schools in Ruanda-Urundi, the Administering Authority observed, twenty students were, beginning in 1948, attending a classical secondary school in the Belgian Congo.

The Council indicated its satisfaction at the progress made by the Administering Authority in the educational field, particularly during 1948, and expressed the hope that improvements would continue to be vigorously pursued. It noted the increase in the budget for education and increases in the number of primary schools, teacher-training schools and trade schools, as well as in school attendance. Noting that all primary schools were run by religious missions, however, the Council recommended that the Administering Authority consider establishing official secular schools as well. It also suggested that studies be made of measures to establish a system of scholarships for secondary and higher education.

The Council considered that the indigenous inhabitants would benefit from a uniform system of notation and spelling of the vernacular; it accordingly invited the Administering Authority to consult with the Administering Authority of Tanganyika and study such standardization with respect to Kiswahili, and recommended that UNESCO be called upon to assist in this study, in so far as this might be useful.

f. OTHER QUESTIONS

(1) General Conclusion of the Council

The Council found that the Administering Authority's annual report showed a record of steady development and expressed the hope that continuing progress would be made in all fields of administration.

It further commended the Administering Authority for its constructive co-operation in having put into effect some of the suggestions made in 1948 by the Visiting Mission.

(2) Petition Containing a Personal Request

One petition of this nature was examined by the Council during 1950.

Mr. Mussa Kackesset bin Kalimba, whose previous petition (T/Pet.3/10) concerning his expulsion from Ruanda-Urundi had been dealt with by the Council in March 1949, complained (T/- ¹¹⁴ For action by the General Assembly on this question see p. 791.

Pet.3/25) that his wife's health had been impaired by the climate of their present location in the Belgian Congo. He again asked the Administering Authority to authorize his return to Ruanda-Urundi. The Council noted that the Administering Authority had re-examined the petitioner's case as requested in its earlier resolution (64-IV)) and had agreed to permit him to return to Ruanda-Urundi. It therefore decided, by resolution 125(VI) of 27 February 1950, that no further action on its part was required.

(3) Anonymous Petition

The Council merely took note of another petition (T/Pet.3/16), relating to Ruanda-Urundi, since it was informed by the Administering Authority that the signature Augustin Ndababara was a pseudonym and that the petition was therefore anonymous (resolution 126(VI) of 28 February 1950).

2. Tanganyika, Administered by the United Kingdom¹¹⁵

Tanganyika, with a total land area of 342,706 square miles, is the largest of the Trust Territories. As stated in the Administering Authority's annual report,¹¹⁶ a census in 1948 showed that Europeans (excluding Polish refugees) numbered 10,648, Asians 59,512 and Africans, according to preliminary figures, numbered approximately 7,004,000; these figures marked increases since the 1931 census of approximately 30, 82 and 28 per cent, respectively, in these three groups.

a. INTER-TERRITORIAL ORGANIZATION

The East Africa Order in Council, 1947 (T/AC.14/1), created an administrative union—the East Africa Inter-Territorial Organization—between the Protectorate and Colony of Kenya, the Trust Territory of Tanganyika and the Protectorate of Uganda. Common services listed in the Schedules of the Order in Council are administered by the East Africa High Commission, a permanent body consisting of the Governors of Kenya, Tanganyika and Uganda. The East Africa Central Legislative Assembly, subject to the assent of the three members of the High Commission, makes laws concerning these common services, which include defence, civil aviation, posts, telegraphs, telephones and radio-communication, railways and ports, administrative and general customs, excise and income tax provisions, Makerere College in Uganda, meteorological services, etc. The High Commission, with the approval of the Legislative Councils of the three territories and with the consent of a Secretary of State of the United Kingdom, may add to the established list of common services. In 1948 the three Legislative Councils agreed upon the amalgamation of their railway, port and customs services to form the East African Railways and Harbours Administration and the East Africa Customs and Excise Department. The High Commission may also make laws for the peace, order and good government of Kenya, Uganda and the Trust Territory, with the consent of the Legislative Assembly and of the three Legislative Councils. The High Commission is obliged, under the Instructions to the East Africa High Commission (T/AC.14/1) not to assent to any bill affecting Tanganyika which may appear to be inconsistent with the Trusteeship Agreement.

All provisions concerning the duration of the Central Legislative Assembly will cease to have effect on 1 January 1952, according to the Order in Council.

The Visiting Mission which went to the Territory in 1948 had observed (T/218) that, to the extent that the common services were transferred to the East Africa Inter-Territorial Organization, this organization might be considered as the Government of Tanganyika. It concluded that the Inter-Territorial Organization was more than a mere administrative organization, but fell short of a complete political union. The Administering Authority considered it improbable that the organization would have any effect upon the development of free political institutions suited to Tanganyika, or the progressively increasing participation of the inhabitants in advisory and legislative bodies and in the territorial government.

After examining all aspects of the question, the Trusteeship Council's Committee on Administrative Unions came to the conclusion (T/L.96) that continual examination by the Trusteeship Council would be required, both of the legal aspects of the Inter-Territorial Organization and of its probable and potential effect on the distinct status and independent development of the Trust Territory.

With regard to the supervisory functions of the United Nations, the Administering Authority undertook to continue to furnish full information concerning Tanganyika's participation in the inter-territorial arrangements, indicating at the same time that this did not imply that the United Nations had any function of supervision with respect to the High Commission and its organs. Moreover, the Administering Authority could not accept the "right" of a visiting mission to have access, in matters relating to Tanganyika, to establishments or common services situated outside the Trust Territory; but the members of visiting missions would be welcomed in London and would be received with pleasure should they be passing through Nairobi, the seat of the High Commission and most of the common services, if they cared to call on the Chairman or Administrator of the High Commission and make the acquaintance of its principal officers. In this connexion, the Committee noted that, in practice, the Administering Authority had fully co-operated with the Council in the past and expressed the hope that it would continue to do so in the future.

The Committee on Administrative Unions was of the opinion that consideration should be given to a number of basic problems connected with the employment of Tanganyikans in the High Commission and its different organs, as it felt that the High Commission's administrative policy, which affected many public employees of Tanganyika, might influence the development of the Territory. The employees of the amalgamated railway, posts and telegraphs services alone, the Committee noted, included almost two thirds of the total number of public servants of Tanganyika.

A number of comments were made concerning the economic implications of the Inter-Territorial Organization on the development of Tanganyika.¹¹⁷ The Committee referred to the Visiting Mission's report, which described the opposition of certain sections of the Tanganyika population to the Organization, owing to fear of too great economic influence on the part of Kenya Colony. The Committee also noted that the East African Industrial Council, which serves as an advisory body to the High Commission, has the power to decide in certain cases what industries are to be established in each area. Although the three territories were equally represented on the Industrial Council, the Committee observed, industrial incentive might be stronger in Kenya, where the major part of secondary industry is already located, where Europeans are more numerous and their influence is greater and where industrial development has in fact been stronger and more rapid. It felt that the Administering Authority should keep very careful watch over the matter, especially in the granting of licences, to ensure that the economic development of Tanganyika is not hindered. The special representative of the Administering Authority indicated that, in his opinion, commercial enterprises operating in the three territories tended to establish their main headquarters in Kenya rather than in Tanganyika or Uganda because British enterprise had been established there before the First World War. Nevertheless, there were Tanganyika companies operating in Tanganyika; for example, the largest African co-operative society in East Africa engaged in dealing with coffee was entirely a Tanganyika concern.

The Committee on Administrative Unions also referred to a conclusion of the Central Development Commission of Tanganyika to the effect that the existence of customs agreements had tended to hinder the development of secondary industries in the Territory and that it had also lost much revenue because of existing customs unions. The Committee observed that the Trusteeship Council should be informed as to the measures the Administering Authority proposed to take to safeguard to an appropriate degree the development of existing and potential secondary industries in Tanganyika.

In connexion with the General Assembly resolution on administrative unions, the Committee made a number of observations which the Council, by resolution 293(VII), called to the attention of the Assembly.¹¹⁸ The Committee noted that the provisions of the Order in Council, 1947, concerning the East Africa Central Legislative Assembly would cease to have effect on 1 January 1952, and considered that, in reviewing this Assembly's composition and functions, the Administering Authority should take all possible steps to ensure that the interests of Tanganyika were adequately safeguarded. It also referred to a resolution of the Trusteeship Council's third session, in which the Council expressed the hope that the Administering Authority would consult it before undertaking any extension or modification of the present arrangement which might affect Tanganyika's status.

Although a separate Legislative Council existed in Tanganyika with legislative and budgetary competence, subject to the Governor's right not to assent to any bills submitted to him, the Committee noted that laws affecting Tanganyika could also be enacted, subject to certain conditions, by the East Africa Central Legislative Assembly and the High Commission. It accordingly suggested that the Administering Authority periodically consider whether the allocation of legislative powers between the two legislatures was conducive to the advancement of the inhabitants of Tanganyika and to the attainment of the objectives of the Trusteeship System.

¹¹⁸ See p. 795.

The Committee referred to a statement by the representative of the United Kingdom that any addition to the list of scheduled common services was most unlikely if there were substantial opposition to it in the Legislative Council of any of the three territories, and that the High Commission could not, in any case, make an addition in the face of such opposition until the matter had again been debated by the opposing Legislative Council and the subsequent consent of a Secretary of State had been obtained. It noted the United Kingdom representative's assurance that fullest consideration would be given to the wishes of the people in this as in other matters.

With respect to the judiciary, the Committee observed that a separate judicial organization existed in Tanganyika and that local appellate jurisdiction, and then only under specific provisions, lay to the Court of Appeal for Eastern Africa, which has jurisdiction over Kenya, Uganda, Zanzibar and the Trust Territory.

The Committee agreed that the Administering Authority was furnishing clear and precise separate financial, statistical and other data concerning Tanganyika which the Council considered necessary for the effective discharge of its responsibilities.

b. POLITICAL DEVELOPMENT

In connexion with its examination of the Administering Authority's annual report on Tanganyika for the year 1948, the Council noted with approval the establishment by the Administering Authority of a Constitutional Development Committee, which included four African members, to review the constitutional structure of the Territory. It suggested that the measures envisaged by the Administering Authority for consultation with the people of the Territory be so carried out as to obtain the views of African political associations, tribal councils, trade unions and other representative groups. It recommended that the Committee take into account the suggestions on political advancement made by the Council and the Visiting Mission which went to the Territory in 1948. The possibility of introducing an electoral law should also be considered by the Committee, as well as measures for increasing African representation on the Executive Council, the Legislative Council and the proposed Provincial Councils.

The Council noted that a fourth African unofficial member had already been appointed to the Legislative Council and that the Administering Authority intended to increase the number of African unofficial members to eight, but recommended that the Administering Authority consider selecting such members on an electoral basis rather than by appointment.

The plans for setting up Provincial Councils representative of officials and non-officials of all communities and the establishment in one of the eight provinces of the first Provincial Council were noted with approval by the Trusteeship Council. It also commended the Administering Authority for its efforts to introduce into the Native Administrative Councils representatives nominated by the people and expressed its hope that these efforts would be continued.

Among other recommendations, the Council suggested that the Administering Authority foster the development of national consciousness through a sense of unity and common identity, which it felt essential for the evolution of the Territory into a distinct political entity.

c. ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

The principal agricultural products, as stated in the Administering Authority's report, are sisal, coffee and cotton. About 88 per cent of the total area under cultivation, estimated at 5,996,000 acres in 1948, was devoted to non-export crops for local consumption. Gold, diamonds, tin ore, salt and mica continued in 1948 to be the chief minerals exploited; there were 1,485 titles registered authorizing prospecting or mining over a total area of about 1,361 square miles, as against 1,113 registered titles covering an area of about 468 square miles in 1947. Few secondary industries had been established in the Territory and such local industries as existed in 1948 were generally concerned with producing and processing primary produce.

It was reported by the Administering Authority that progress in connexion with the broad scheme undertaken by the Overseas Food Corporation for the production of groundnuts was slower than expected. Of the three areas taken over for the scheme, extensive agricultural operations had only been undertaken in the Central Province, where some 45,000 acres had been brought under cultivation, work in the other two being limited to bush clearing and the building of communications and essential buildings.

Estimated revenue for 1948 on the territorial account amounted to £5,042,730, and on the development plan account to £1,796,464; estimated expenditure on the territorial account amounted to £5,025,875. As in 1947, the Administering Authority indicated, no reliable estimates of national income in 1948 were available, nor were particulars available on outside capital invested in the Territory.

The Council asked the Administering Authority to consider providing in its annual reports more comprehensive figures concerning the amount of national revenue, currency in circulation, capital investments and the Territory's economy generally.

With respect to the general economic development of the Territory, the Council considered that measures should be taken to increase substantially the participation of the inhabitants, particularly in the exploitation of minerals and other natural resources and the production of basic raw materials and consumer goods. It also considered the establishment of additional secondary industries as essential to the development of Tanganyika.

The Council indicated its satisfaction at the substantial subsidies allocated for the development of the Territory by the Administering Authority from the Colonial Development and Welfare Fund. This included £110,014 for soil conservation and £140,000 for forestry development. Several other steps taken by the Administering Authority during 1948 were also noted with approval by the Council—the enactment of a Natural Resources Ordinance providing for the conservation and development of the natural resources of the Territory, the establishment of a Land Bank to facilitate loans to farmers, co-operative societies and Native Authorities for agricultural purposes, and the establishment of a special soil conservation service.

Reference was made by the Council to the importance of the problem of land usage and land alienation in the Territory, and the Administering Authority's declared intention to re-alienate a number of ex-enemy-owned (i.e. German) estates to non-indigenous inhabitants. Observations concerning this question had been made in 1948 by the first Visiting Mission to the Territory (T/218); it had reached the conclusion that former enemy-owned land should come under African ownership, preferably on a co-operative basis. But the Administering Authority, in reply (T/333), had explained that this suggestion was impractical since the Africans did not yet sufficiently understand co-operative principles and practice to apply them to estate management, and that such a procedure would be "economically disastrous". The Council itself noted the desirability of training Africans in modern methods of agricultural production and of increasing their responsibility in the management and ownership of modern agricultural enterprises. It recommended in its report on the Territory that the Administering Authority consider establishing a public corporation or adopting other appropriate measures for the operation of ex-enemy estates and for applying the profits for the common benefit of the inhabitants of the Territory, with the purpose of eventually turning over such enterprises entirely to the indigenous inhabitants, probably as co-operative enterprises.

Related to this question was a petition from the Chagga Council complaining of the acute shortage of land suffered by the Chagga people and asking for the return of all alienated land in their tribal area and the reclamation and development of new lands (T/Pet.2/59). The Council had previously considered this petition at its fourth and fifth sessions in 1949, but had postponed action until further information had been received from the Administering Authority. At the sixth session, the Administering Authority informed the Council that it had made ex-German estates available to the Chagga people and had made plans for the reclamation of new lands. The Chagga people, it assured the Council, were satisfied with these measures. By resolution 119(VI) of 20 February 1950, the Council took note of these statements and recommended that the Administering Authority make available additional ex-German estates, press forward with its land reclamation and development programme and take such other measures as it might deem necessary for the speediest possible solution of the problem of land shortage. The Council invited the Administering Authority to keep it informed of the progress of this programme and of its effects on the development of the Chagga people.

d. SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT

On examining the information supplied by the Administering Authority in this field, the Council noted with approval the appointment of a Commissioner for Social Development and the enlargement of the Tanganyika Social Welfare Department. While it was satisfied that there had been a general improvement in the standard of living in the Territory in 1948, it suggested, in view of the low wage level, that efforts be made to establish wage rates which would not only enable workers to meet the costs of everyday living but would also progressively raise their standard of living.

Referring to an Ordinance which provides that any person wishing to establish a newspaper may be called upon to post a bond of up to 3,000 shillings, the Council asked the Administering Authority to consider modifying this provision as soon as practicable and to ensure in the meantime that it did not operate as a restraint upon the freedom of the Press.

The Council recommended the abolition of corporal punishment,¹¹⁹ the elimination of all discriminatory laws and practices and, as soon as practicable, the abolition of penal sanctions for breach of labour contracts. The removal of penal sanctions for the use of abusive or insulting language by an employee to an employer was noted by the Council with approval.

At the end of 1948, according to the Administering Authority's report, workers in paid manual employment numbered 365,500, an increase of 38,500 over 1947. The provision of skilled and semi-skilled workers, however, continued to be a major problem and the Government made additions to its training programmes and the Overseas Food Corporation established its own training centre. In an effort toward securing a rational utilization and distribution of the Territory's labour resources, legislation was adopted to establish a Labour Supply Corporation, whose functions would cover recruitment of labour, and its allocation and distribution to the various industries. In the meantime, recruiting continued to be undertaken by both professional and private recruiters. Labour migration continued during 1948; workers left Tanganyika for employment in Northern and Southern Rhodesia, the Union of South Africa and Kenya, and an arrangement with Belgian authorities for the recruitment of workers from Ruanda-Urundi for employment in Tanganyika remained in force. The Administering Authority reported a further acceleration of immigration during 1948 due to expanding development, in particular to meet the personnel requirements of the groundnut scheme.

A petition from one immigrant worker was examined by the Council at its sixth session. Mr. G. H. Wakefield, a Mauritian labourer recruited by the Overseas Food Corporation for work in Tanganyika, complained of personal ill-treatment and of poor living and working conditions in the camp used by himself and other Mauritian labourers (T/Pet.2/74 & Add.1 & 2). The Council decided, by resolution 120(VI) of 20 February 1950, that it could not deal with the personal aspect of the petition since this was a question which the courts could settle. As to the general grievances allegedly suffered by the Mauritian community, the Council decided to take no action in view of the assurances given by the Administering Authority (T/459) that Mauritian workers received equitable treatment and that a new form of contract was to be introduced.

With respect to medical and health services in Tanganyika, the Council noted in its report that there was still room for improvement, despite the tripling of the budgetary appropriation since the end of the war. It observed with approval that the Administering Authority had accepted the report of the Chief Medical Officer of the Colonial Office as a basis for a complete review of medical policy and that a vigorous campaign against leprosy was being conducted. Reiterating its previous recommendations, however, the Council expressed the hope that a great expansion and development of medical and health services would be undertaken without delay.

The Administering Authority had indicated in its report that, although considerable expansion of some branches of the Medical Department had been approved, the Administration had difficulty in recruiting the necessary staff, particularly medical officers and health inspectors. This was noted with concern by the Council. Nevertheless, the figures in the report showed that the personnel engaged in private practice or employed by non-governmental agencies had increased in a much larger proportion. Observing this, the Council suggested that the Administering Authority continue to recruit suitably qualified medical personnel from among the displaced persons in Europe.

e. EDUCATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

The Administering Authority observed that separate authorities exist to deal with African, European, and Indian-Goan education in Tanganyika. There were approximately 1,405 schools in the Territory in 1948, including primary schools run by the Government, voluntary agencies, and Native Authorities, and secondary, teacher-training and industrial and vocational schools run by the Government and voluntary agencies. Of the total, 1,304 (an increase of 128 over the previous year) were for Africans. No reliable figures on the number of school-age children were available, the Administering Authority indicated. The number of African pupils attending school in 1948 it reported as 149,317, as against 126,982 in 1947. Facilities for higher education did not exist in the Territory. In 1948, thirty-one students were attending Makerere College in Uganda and ten were attending institutions in the United Kingdom.

With regard to adult and mass education, the Administering Authority stated that its main efforts continued to be concentrated on the establishment of social welfare centres. During 1948, financial provision was made for social development pilot schemes in two areas; the first intensive experiment in the Territory in mass literacy was planned in connexion with one of these schemes. To stimulate the production and distribution of literature for African use and to train Africans in this kind of work in Tanganyika, Kenya and Uganda, a new inter-territorial service, the East African Literature Bureau, was established. It is administered by the East Africa High Commission.

The Council noted with concern the need for greatly expanded educational facilities, although it appreciated the achievements of the Administering Authority within the limited financial resources available. It suggested that the Administering Authority continue its efforts by adopting more vigorous measures to expand primary and full secondary education, by establishing institutions of higher learning in Tanganyika, by increasing provisions for students to attend overseas universities and colleges, by improving the teacher-training facilities of the Territory and by giving special attention to the education of girls.

It observed with satisfaction the steps taken to implement its previous recommendations on mass education, the prevention of relapse into illiteracy and the development of indigenous languages and culture.

Indicating that the segregation of European, Asian and African children in different schools might perpetuate feelings of racial discrimination, the Council endorsed the Visiting Mission's suggestion that the Administering Authority consider establishing in urban centres a system of inter-racial primary and secondary education whenever teaching is given in a common language.

f. OTHER QUESTIONS

(1) General Conclusion of the Council

The Council expressed its satisfaction that steady progress had been made in all aspects of the administration of the Territory. It congratulated the Administering Authority on its record during the year 1948, at the same time recognizing the need for further advancement.

(2) Petitions Containing Personal Complaints

The Council examined during 1950 two petitions of a personal nature relating to Tanganyika.

With respect to a petition from Mr. Josef Ganzenhuber (T/Pet.2/83 & Add.1), the Council decided, by resolution 121(VI) of 20 February, to take no action since the petition related to the Administering Authority's policy, previously approved by the Council, regarding ex-enemy aliens. This policy aimed at excluding from the Territory all Germans and Italians who had at any time held Nazi or Fascist sympathies or who would be personally undesirable residents.

In the other petition (T/Pet.2/92), Mr. D. M. Anjaria objected to the implication, in a statement made in 1949 by the special representative of the Administering Authority, that his action in filing an earlier petition (T/Pet.2/57)¹²⁰ bordered on contempt of court. The Council, by resolution 122(VI) of 20 February 1950, noted the special representative's apologies with respect to his previous incorrect statement and his affirmation that there was no intention of suggesting that the petitioner was trying to circumvent the normal proceedings of the courts.

3. Question of the Boundary between Ruanda-Urundi and Tanganyika

At its sixth session, the Council examined a petition from Mwambutsa, the Mwami of Urundi, who claimed the return to his kingdom of the Bugufi area, which had been included in Tanganyika Territory by the 1923 Boundary Commission (T/Pet.2/49-T/Pet.3/5). This petition had previously been considered by the Council, but decision had been postponed pending the results of consultations between the two Administering Authorities concerned.

Meanwhile, the Council received twenty-one other petitions from individuals or groups of individuals in the Bugufi area. Three supported Mwambutsa's petition¹²¹ and eighteen opposed it.¹²²

The conclusions arrived at by representatives of the two Administering Authorities (T/454; 460), on a visit to the Bugufi area, that any alteration of the status quo would be contrary to the express wishes of the overwhelming majority of the people of Bugufi, met with the concurrence of the Council, which accordingly decided, by resolution 116(VI) of 9 February 1950, that no action by it was called for.

C. TRUST TERRITORIES IN THE PACIFIC

During its seventh session, held in June and July 1950, the Council examined annual reports submitted by the Administering Authorities on the administration during the year 1948-49 of each of the four Trust Territories in the Pacific: Nauru, New Guinea, Western Samoa and the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands.¹²³

The United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization submitted observations on the reports concerning Western Samoa and the Pacific Islands (T/680); these observations were taken into consideration by the Council in its examination of educational conditions in these Territories.

Only two petitions, one relating to Western Samoa and one relating to New Guinea, were examined by the Council, at its sixth and seventh sessions, respectively.¹²⁴

The third regular Visiting Mission, as already decided by the Council in 1949, was sent to the Trust Territories in the Pacific. In the course of its sixth session, the Council appointed the members of the Mission: Sir Alan Burns (United Kingdom) as Chairman, Victorio D. Carpio (Philippines), T. K. Chang (China) and Jacques Tallec (France). It decided that the Mission should leave by 10 April 1950. On 31 January 1950, the Council adopted resolution 115(VI), directing the Mission to investigate and to report as fully as possible on the steps taken in the four Trust Territories towards the realization of the objectives set forth in Article 76 b of the Charter and resolution 321(V) of the General Assembly regarding the promotion of the political, economic, social and educational advancement of the inhabitants; to give attention, as might be appropriate in the light of discussions and resolutions by the Council and the General Assembly, to issues raised in connexion with the annual reports and petitions concerning the four Territories; to accept or receive petitions and to investigate on the spot, after consultation with the local representative of the Administering Authority concerned, such petitions dealing with the conditions of the indigenous inhabitants as were, in its opinion, sufficiently important to warrant special investigation; and to report to the Council as soon as possible.

After holding its first meeting at Lake Success on 3 April 1950, the Mission, accompanied by six members of the Secretariat, left New York on 5 April. Following a brief stay in Guam, the Mission visited the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands from 25 April to 2 May, Nauru from 5 to 10 May and New Guinea from 10 May to 14 June; proceeded to Australia until 27 June; and then visited New Zealand and Western Samoa from 2 to 15 July. Returning to Headquarters on 26 July, the Mission, on 14 August, adopted its four separate reports on the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands (T/789), Nauru (T/790), New Guinea (T/791) and Western Samoa (T/792).¹²⁵

A brief description of the conditions in each of the four Trust Territories in the Pacific is given below,¹²⁶ together with the relevant decisions taken by the Council in connexion with its examination of annual reports and petitions and its special study of the administrative arrangements involving New Guinea.

¹²⁵ The reports of the Mission, which were not considered by the Council in 1950, will be dealt with in the next volume of this Yearbook.

1. Nauru, Administered by Australia on behalf of Australia, New Zealand and the United Kingdom¹²⁷

As stated in the Administering Authority's report,¹²⁸ Nauru is an isolated island with a total area of 5,263 acres, 4,116 of which contain the phosphate deposits which give the island its importance. As of 30 June 1949, Nauru had a population of 3,269, of whom 1,524 were Nauruan, 58 Gilbertese, 247 European and 1,440 Chinese.

a. POLITICAL DEVELOPMENT

Full powers of legislation, administration and jurisdiction are vested in an Administrator appointed by Australia. In Nauruan matters, he is advised by the Nauruan Council of Chiefs, consisting of fourteen chiefs elected for life; the Council of Chiefs has advisory powers only. Following recommendations by the Trusteeship Council at its fifth session in 1949 for measures to afford the Nauruans a greater degree of self-government, the Administering Authority informed the Council at its seventh session that a basic plan for the reconstitution of the Council of Chiefs had been agreed upon with the Nauruans. The new body would be elected every four years and would be granted additional powers, both administrative and financial. Furthermore, the Head Chief had assumed the duties of Native Affairs Officer; he was the first Nauruan to hold such a responsible position. Other Nauruans were receiving training and guidance to fit them for higher positions.

The Council, in its report on the Territory, commended the Administering Authority for its intention to reconstitute the Council of Chiefs and invited it to transform that body into a real organ of self-government and to give it not only consultative and advisory powers, but also increasing legislative power. Noting with interest the appointment of the Head Chief as Native Affairs Officer, the Council expressed the hope that this experiment, which had already proved successful, would lead to the granting of increased administrative responsibilities to other indigenous inhabitants.

According to the Administering Authority's report, the Territory's judicial system provides for a Court of Appeal (the Administrator), and a Central and a District Court, each possessing civil and criminal jurisdiction. The judges and magistrates are appointed or removed by the Administrator. Commenting on this situation, the Trusteeship Council invited the Administering Authority to study the judicial organization with a view to ensuring to the judiciary all the independence compatible with the circumstances; it considered it desirable that judicial authority be independent from executive authority.

b. ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

According to the Administering Authority's report, the economy of Nauru is entirely dependent on the mining and export of phosphate deposits, which constitutes the only natural resource of the island. Efforts were made during 1948-49 to re-establish the copra industry. The land is not suitable for agriculture, and, except for local fishing, the Territory relies upon outside sources for its food supply. A co-operative society, operated by Nauruans under the direction of the Council of Chiefs, engages in general trading and conducts a piggery, poultry farm, bakery, etc.

The Trusteeship Council noted with appreciation the increased participation of Nauruans in the economic life of the Territory, particularly through the Nauru Co-operative Society, and expressed the hope that the Administering Authority would continue to give this enterprise every facility for development.

During the year 1948-49, the Administering Authority reported, the economic position of the Territory improved owing to increased exports of phosphate, which reached a total of 680,746 tons, more than double that of the previous year.

The phosphate remaining on the island has been assessed at about 70,000,000 tons and, it is estimated, will be exhausted in approximately seventy years. Concern at the fate of the Nauruans after that time had been expressed by the Council at its fifth session, when it had asked the Administering Authority to plan a sound future economic foundation for the Nauruans.

The Administering Authority informed the Council at its seventh session that it was aware that the island might not provide sufficient space or opportunity for the Nauruans after the phosphates were exhausted, and it was taking that possibility into consideration in planning for their future economic development. It further indicated that the two long-term trust funds created to meet the economic needs of later generations of Nauruans would together contain an estimated £3,000,000¹²⁹ by the year 2000. The Council recommended that the Administering Authority undertake studies to determine whether the island would remain habitable or whether the whole population would have to be removed. In particular, it recommended that the Administering Authority explore the possibility of expanding the copra industry, of establishing an indigenous commercial fishing industry and of promoting food production. The Council asked to be kept informed of the progress of these studies.

The phosphate industry is under the exclusive control of three British Phosphate Commissioners, appointed, respectively, by the Governments of Australia, New Zealand and the United Kingdom. Virtually all of the phosphate-bearing land is owned by indigenous inhabitants. Under a revised agreement reached in 1947 between the landowners, the Administration and the British Phosphate Commissioners, the Commissioners have the right to lease any phosphate-bearing land on the island, to mine it to any depth desired and to use or export the phosphate. They are required to pay, under the agreement, a lump sum of £45 per acre for such land as well as royalties of 13 pence on each ton of phosphate exported. This royalty is payable as follows: 6 pence to the owner of the land, 2 pence to a long term trust fund for the benefit of landowners, 3 pence to the Nauru Royalty Trust Fund created exclusively for the benefit of Nauruans, and 2 pence to the Nauruan Community Long Term Investment Fund; this last royalty was increased, by decision of the Commissioner, to five pence per ton effective 1 July 1950, bringing to a total of 8 pence each royalties for land owners and the Nauruans as a whole. Royalties are also payable to the Administration.

The total tonnage of phosphate exported in 1948-49, all of which went to Australia and New Zealand, was valued at £1,174,287; of this amount, £73,430 was payable in royalties and £12,000 was paid in commutation of payments due with respect to customs duties and other charges of the Administration.

The only direct taxation applicable in the Territory is an annual capitation tax on all men other than permanent employees of the Administration; this is levied at the rate of 15 shillings for Nauruans (paid into the Royalty Trust Fund), 20 shillings for Chinese and 40 shillings for Europeans. Except for this small revenue, the proceeds of the phosphate industry defray all expenses of the Administration either through direct royalties, special advances, the annual commuted payment of £12,000 (see above) or the Royalty Trust Fund.

The Council considered that the restoration of the phosphate industry to full production had been of general benefit to the Territory. It noted with satisfaction the decision to increase the royalty payments, especially since this increase would be devoted to community benefits, thus bringing the payments for this purpose equal to payments for individual landowners.

The Council had previously asked for full information on the operations of the Phosphate Commissioners with respect to Nauru, but the reports and financial accounts it received in this connexion covered both Ocean Island and Nauru. The Council noted, as a result, that it remained handicapped in its appraisal of the economic conditions because of the absence of information which would show, in particular, the separate financial operations of the Commissioners in respect of Nauru and the actual prices received for phosphate as compared with world market prices.

c. SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT

According to the Administering Authority's report, there are separate settlements for Chinese and Europeans. Immigrant communities are not permitted to settle in areas other than those prepared for them. There is a statutory provision, which, the Administering Authority stated, is liberally interpreted, to control the movement of indigenous inhabitants between 10:00 P.M. and sunrise and to control the movements of Chinese outside their location at all times. Movement of the indigenous inhabitants outside the Territory is discouraged but not forbidden. The Administering Authority informed the Council that it was reviewing existing legislation, as previously suggested by the Council, with a view to removing all discriminatory provisions.

The Council, at its seventh session, asked to be informed of the progress of this review and any steps taken as a result; it also asked that the regulations providing for a double censorship of films, first for Europeans and secondly for the indigenous inhabitants, be included in the review. After noting that the indigenous inhabitants were required to seek special permission to leave the Territory to visit relatives on other Pacific islands and that transport facilities were inadequate for this purpose, the Council further suggested that the Administering Authority should study the possibility of facilitating the movement of such persons.

As a result of a cost-of-living survey made in January 1948, the Administering Authority indicated, the wages and allowances of Nauruans employed by both the Administration and the British Phosphate Commissioners were increased, and a pension scheme for Nauruan widows was introduced. The Council observed at its seventh session that these increases had improved the economic situation of the Nauruans, but urged a continued study of the situation so that the Nauruan standard of living might be maintained, and, where possible, raised.

In reply to an earlier Council recommendation concerning disparities in wages paid to indigenous, Chinese and European workers, the Administering Authority explained that Nauruans were employed in all tasks for which they were qualified, and immigrant labour was employed only where indigenous labour was inadequate or insufficiently qualified. It indicated that Chinese employees, who formed the bulk of the semi-skilled and unskilled labour in the phosphate industry, worked 44 hours a week and were given six Chinese holidays a year. Gilbertese employees also worked 44 hours a week and received ten public holidays a year. Nauruans worked from 34½ to 44 hours and received, in addition to ten public holidays a year, fourteen days of recreational leave. European employees of the Administration worked 36 or 44 hours, depending on whether they were clerical or manual workers; European employees of the Phosphate Commissioners worked 44 hours and were granted three months' leave after 21 months of service. In its report on the Territory, the Trusteeship Council recalled its previous recommendation for a review of wages to the end that they be based on the principle of equal pay for equal work, and recommended that the Administering Authority take steps to increase the wages and assure to the Chinese, Gilbertese and Nauruan workers the most favourable system of holidays.

The practice of bringing Chinese workers to Nauru without their families had earlier been noted by the Council, which had considered that this practice might lead to serious consequences; at its fifth session in 1949, the Council had recommended, in its report on the Territory, that the Administering Authority try to find some humane solution for this problem. Informed at its seventh session that a solution had not yet been found but that the period of engagement had been reduced from two years to one year, the Council again urged the Administering Authority to take steps to comply with its previous recommendation.

In April 1949, arrangements were made for the construction of 250 European-style houses, at an estimated cost of £200,000, for rental by Nauruans at 5 shillings a week, based, the Administering Authority stated, not on the cost of the dwelling but rather on the capacity of the individual to pay, as had earlier been suggested by the Council. Informed that by May 1950 approximately 100 of these houses had been practically completed, the Council commended the Administering Authority for this progress.

In the field of public health, the Council commended the Administering Authority for increasing the facilities for medical treatment and hospitalization, for improving the provisions for maternity cases and infants and for the steps taken to train Nauruans as Native Medical Practitioners. The annual report indicated, however, that 32 Nauruans were employed in the Health Department as against 37 in the previous year, and the Council recommended that steps be taken to bring the number of personnel up to strength.

d. EDUCATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Education is compulsory for Nauruan children between the ages of six and sixteen. According to the annual report, there are six Government primary schools for Nauruans, one denominational school and a primary school for European children. Except for the teachers in the European school, all teachers in the Government schools are Nauruans, none of whom possess professional qualifications. Secondary schools which existed before the Second World War had not yet been re-established in the Territory, it was stated, but several students were studying abroad.

The Council urged the Administering Authority to take appropriate measures to increase educational facilities since political progress could not be achieved without education. With regard to secondary education in particular, it noted that while six Nauruan boys and one girl were receiving secondary education in Australian schools and two male students were being trained at the Central Medical School in Suva, Fiji, some parents were reluctant to send their children abroad for higher education. It accordingly urged the Administering Authority to re-establish the secondary schools as soon as possible and to report to its ninth session on the steps taken to this end.

e. GENERAL

The Council considered that the information submitted by the special representative during the Council's examination of the annual report on Nauru for the year ending 30 June 1949 indicated a sincere attempt on the part of the Administering Authority to implement its previous recommendations, which, it recognized, had been adopted after the close of the period covered in the annual report.

2. New Guinea, Administered by Australia¹³⁰

The Trust Territory of New Guinea consists of more than 600 islands, with an aggregate land area of about 93,000 square miles. Its total population is estimated at one million. According to a census taken in 1947, Europeans numbered 3,412, Chinese 2,043, and other non-indigenous inhabitants 745.

The national status of the indigenous inhabitants, according to the Administering Authority's report,¹³¹ has not been given statutory definition; for travel purposes they are issued a document of identity. Noting these facts, the Council urged the Administering Authority to consider adopting measures to grant the people a distinct national status and to facilitate the issue of passports.

To bring areas of the Territory under its control, it was stated, the Administration followed a method of "peaceful penetration" by patrols. By 1949, 56,682 square miles were under the Administration's control, as against 38,790 in 1941; 10,051 were under its influence, as against 11,070 in 1941, and 2,240 were under partial influence, as against 9,220 in 1941. The Administering Authority stated that a large number of patrol officers had been recruited and trained and that the task of extending the authority of the Administration throughout the Territory was scheduled for completion within five years. It also stated that there was no civil register in the Territory, a point noted by the Trusteeship Council in its report on the Territory. Although the Council recognized the difficulty of compiling a complete register under existing conditions, including the remoteness of large parts of the Territory, it recommended that preparations be made for introducing one.

a. POLITICAL DEVELOPMENT

The Papua and New Guinea Act, 1949, providing for the joint administration of the Trust Territory and the adjoining territory of Papua, came into force on 1 July 1949. This Act provided that the two territories would have joint Executive and Legislative Councils, Advisory Councils for Native Matters, Native Village Councils and the Australian School of Pacific Administration. The administration of both territories was entrusted under the Act to the Administrator, and the headquarters of the joint administration were established at Port Moresby, in Papua.

A number of departments, it was stated, functioned under the authority of the Administrator, in the executive branch of the government. Some gains had been made in securing the necessary administrative staff, the Administering Authority reported, but there were still difficulties in obtaining professional and skilled staff. Training schemes had been inaugurated, however, to provide for the future. In this connexion, the Council drew the Administering Authority's attention to the desirability of training an increasing number of indigenous inhabitants to assume increasingly responsible positions and thus to participate to a greater extent in the Territory's administration.

New Guinea has no suffrage laws or regulations and there is no elected legislative body. Under the Papua and New Guinea Act, however, provision had been made for the appointment by the territories of three non-official indigenous members to the proposed joint 29-member Legislative Council, but legislation to make this provision effective had not yet been drafted. The Act required the Administrator to ensure that at least five of the appointed non-official members are residents of New Guinea, but does not specify how many of these should be indigenous residents. At its fifth session, in 1948, the Trusteeship Council had recommended that the Administering Authority study the possibility of increasing the number of indigenous members in the joint legislature and of establishing a separate legislature for New Guinea; it had also suggested that an indigenous majority in the Council should eventually be established. At its seventh session, the Council was informed that the Administering Authority would further examine the composition of the joint Legislative Council, including the question of increasing the number of indigenous members, before bringing it into being, and that no decision had been reached concerning the establishment of a separate legislature for the Trust Territory. Representation of the indigenous inhabitants, the Administering Authority assured the Trusteeship Council, would be progressively increased when they became equal to the responsibility. The Council at its seventh session, in its report on the Territory, expressed the hope that the Administering Authority, in re-examining the composition of the joint legislature, would take into account the recommendations made at the fifth session of the Council and asked to be informed of the results of the examination.

Considering the absence of democratic elective processes in New Guinea, the Council recommended that the Administering Authority initiate the introduction of methods of suffrage designed ultimately to bring about the establishment of a modern electoral system based on universal suffrage.

The Administering Authority reported that the Native Village Councils Ordinance became effective on 30 December 1949, empowering the Administrator to establish village councils. The first of these councils began operating during the first half of 1950. Under the Ordinance, village councils are authorized, inter alia, to organize or engage in any business or enterprise, to carry out works for the benefit of the community, and to make rules for the peace, order and welfare of the people, with the approval of the Administration. The Council commended the Administering Authority for enacting the Ordinance and urged it to increase as far as possible the number of village councils during the coming year (1950-51), to establish them progressively throughout the Trust Territory and gradually to give them increasing responsibilities. It indicated that it would await with interest reports on the functioning of this system as well as on the establishment of the proposed Advisory Council for Native Matters.

Replying to a recommendation of the Council's fifth session, the Administering Authority stated that it placed emphasis on the tribal system, and made no effort to alter it except in the case of customs repugnant to humanity. At its seventh session, the Council, in its report on the Territory, again recommended that the Administering Authority consider modifying this system by taking practicable steps towards introducing modern democratic institutions.

As provided by the Papua and New Guinea Act, 1949, the Supreme Court is the highest judicial authority of the joint administration. Appeals from the decisions of the lower courts, which include district courts and Native village courts and other indigenous tribunals, lie to the Supreme Court and appeals from the decisions of the latter lie to the High Court of Australia. The Administering Authority indicated that the Native village courts had as yet no statutory authority, but only the authority of local Native law and custom. However, an ordinance had been prepared, which, when promulgated, would give existing indigenous tribunals the necessary statutory authority to enable them to become a part of the judicial system of the Territory. This was noted with satisfaction by the Trusteeship Council, which considered that confusion might result from the fact that official recognition had not yet been given to traditional indigenous jurisdictions.

b. ADMINISTRATIVE UNION

This question was the subject of a special study by the Council's Committee on Administrative Unions (T/L.96).

In reviewing the historical background of the union, the Committee noted the conclusions of a committee appointed by Australia in 1939 to survey the possibility of establishing a combined administration of Papua and New Guinea. Although this committee found that the two territories should, theoretically, be governed as one unit in view of the similarities in natural resources, population and physical characteristics, and geographical conditions, it pointed out that the two territories were acquired at different times and under different titles and that their later history as separate entities made a combined administration difficult under existing circumstances.

An entirely new set of circumstances, the Administering Authority maintained, was created by the Japanese invasion of New Guinea and part of Papua and the subsequent suspension of civil administration in February 1942. The Committee on Administrative Unions was informed by the Administering Authority that the consequences of the war and the resulting devastation created problems common to the whole area and, since it was imperative that the manpower and material resources of both territories be used in common for reconstruction and rehabilitation, it would have been unwise to have attempted to reconstitute two separate administrations.

Although it had not considered itself under any obligation to do so, the Administering Authority pointed out, it had submitted to the Trusteeship Council a copy of the proposed bill to provide for the joint administration of the two territories. The Council, during its third session in 1948, made many observations and recommendations concerning the bill and suggested that the Administering Authority review the matter on the basis of the points made during the Council's session. This the Administering Authority did, and amended the bill to meet some of the recommendations made. These amendments were incorporated in the Papua and New Guinea Act, 1949.

The representative of Australia informed the Committee that, while this Act did not provide for a fixed period for the duration of the administrative union, it was possible to amend the text. He also stated that the Australian Government had repeatedly pointed out that when the inhabitants of the two territories had attained a certain degree of development they would be free to choose the form of government they desired and to decide whether or not they wished the administrative union to continue.

The Committee, in its report (T/L.96), noted that the separate status and identity of the Trust Territory were recognized in the Papua and New Guinea Act, but was of the opinion that the Council must continue to examine the operation of the union in order to ensure its operation in the interests of the inhabitants.

It made a number of observations, summarized below, concerning General Assembly resolution 326(IV) on administrative unions.

The Committee noted that Australia, although not recognizing any obligation to consult the Council before establishing an administrative union, had in fact informed the Council of its intention to do so and had made certain changes in response to the Council's request. It further noted the statement that there was no substantial opposition to the existing administrative union and that no extension of the union was contemplated.

With respect to the supervisory functions of the United Nations, the Committee noted that the Administering Authority had undertaken to continue furnishing separate financial, statistical and other data on the Trust Territory, as well as on the unified administration in so far as it pertained to the Trust Territory; that the Visiting Mission had been invited to visit the headquarters of the central administration of Papua and New Guinea situated outside the Trust Territory; and that Australia had stated that it would continue to co-operate fully with the Council in the discharge of its responsibilities.

The Committee considered that the existing judicial system, in view of the present circumstances in New Guinea, sufficiently safeguarded the interests of its inhabitants, but was of the opinion that the Council should keep the matter under review.

The joint Legislative Council envisaged by the Papua-New Guinea Act, 1949, the Committee noted, had not yet been constituted. In this connexion, it also noted the statement that Australia had carefully studied the question raised in General Assembly resolution 326(IV) of the desirability of establishing a separate legislative body within each Trust Territory, but had come to no decision on the matter thus far. The Committee called attention to the recommendations made at the fifth and seventh sessions of the Council concerning the composition of the Legislative Council (see above).

The Council incorporated these observations in its resolution 293(VII) on the question of administrative unions.¹³²

c. ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

The economy of the Territory is mainly agricultural. General agriculture of the indigenous inhabitants is confined to the production of food-stuffs for local consumption. Copra is the main produce for export and its production is largely in the hands of Europeans, according to the Administering Authority's report. Copra production increased considerably during the year 1948/49 to a total of 36,925 tons.

As stated by the Administering Authority, the Administration's policy is to encourage indigenous production with the object of improving living standards and cultivating marketable and exportable crops. Experiments have been carried out to determine feasible ways to improve indigenous agricultural methods and new methods of cultivation have been introduced. The possibilities of developing rice, cocoa, jute and tea, of manufacturing paper from kunai grass, and of making wood pulp were being examined and experimental projects were being undertaken. Efforts were made to re-establish the dried-coconut industry, the only manufacturing industry in New Guinea before the war, and one factory resumed operations during 1948/49. Otherwise, indigenous industry was limited for the most part to small copra-drying units, the drying and smoking of fish, and Native handicrafts. A survey of the Territory's fisheries resources and a preliminary survey of animal husbandry were completed, and preparations were made for a survey of agriculture and for a full-scale resources survey.

The Council in its report on the Territory noted with satisfaction the Administering Authority's assurance that it fully realized the importance of economic development and its bearing on social and educational progress, and that it intended to apply skill and capital to the development of the Territory's natural resources and the establishment of new industries, and in so doing enable the indigenous inhabitants to participate increasingly in developing the Territory's wealth. Referring to the experimental work undertaken in agriculture, forestry and commercial fishing, the Council expressed the hope that such work would contribute to the sound diversification of the territorial economy. It stated that it awaited with interest the results of the survey of the Territory's economic resources. With respect to the lack of local manufacturing industries, the Council recommended that the Administering Authority encourage the utilization of New Guinea's many resources through local industries designed to raise the standard of living of the people and to make the Territory as far as possible self-sustaining.

Under the Native Administration Ordinance, 1921-38, the indigenous inhabitants can be compelled to plant foodstuffs for their own benefit. This, the Council considered, implied the possible limitation of individual freedom. Noting the Administering Authority's assurance that the provision had not been applied in recent years, however, the Council recommended that steps be taken to remove it formally from the legislation, provided the Administering Authority felt assured that the people are protected from any risk of famine.

Gold, which constitutes an important feature of the economic life of New Guinea, and silver in association with gold, are the only mineral resources commercially developed, the Administering Authority reported. Mining is principally in the hands of non-indigenous enterprises. A royalty of 5 per cent on all gold mined is payable to the Administration for the use and benefit of the Territory. During 1948/49, 91,295 fine ounces of gold, valued at £982,572,¹³³ were exported, as against 126,092 ounces valued at £851,570 the year before. Gold is exported only to Australia.

The Administration derives revenue from indirect taxation—import and export duties, licences, fees, royalty on gold, indenture fees, etc. During 1948/49, internal receipts, together with grants of £1,588,840 from the Australian Government, totalled £2,438,840. There was no direct taxation. Referring to a previous recommendation of the Trusteeship Council, the Administering Authority indicated that the introduction of business and income taxes was under consideration. It further stated that the question of increasing the royalty on gold, as earlier recommended by the Council, was dependent on its decision with respect to introducing an income tax.

After noting that gold accounted for more than one third of the value of all exports from the Territory, the Council again urged the Administering Authority seriously to consider increasing the territorial revenues from gold production either by increasing the present 5 per cent royalty, as previously recommended, or by introducing income, business enterprise or other taxes on the gold industry.

The Council commended the Administering Authority for its very considerable contribution to the territorial finances. It considered, however, that the wealth of the Territory in natural resources and raw materials should be reflected to a greater degree in the budgetary receipts. In this connexion, it welcomed the Administering Authority's stated intention of introducing new forms of taxation and asked to be informed of the steps taken.

Finding itself hampered in its attempt to evaluate over-all economic conditions in the Territory by the lack of information as to capital investment, the Council recommended that the Administering Authority compile and maintain statistical data on capital investment and include this information in its future reports.

d. SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT

According to the Administering Authority's report, 30,252 indigenous inhabitants were employed in New Guinea at the end of June 1949, ¹³³ Throughout this account of New Guinea under Australian administration, £ = Australian pounds.

including 8,344 employed by the Administration. The shortage of labour for all purposes was estimated at about 7,900. Difficulties in transporting workers to and from work, shortage of skilled labour and of building accommodations were listed as the main problems with respect to labour. There were 10,677 indentured labourers in private employment. Referring to an earlier recommendation of the Council for the abolition of the system of indentured labour, the Administering Authority stated that no new contracts under this system would be possible after the end of 1950.

A new wage scale for administration servants was introduced as from 1 January 1950, the Administering Authority reported. Noting this, the Council urged the Administering Authority to continue studying the possibility of increasing the minimum wage for indigenous workers, as recommended by the Council in 1949.

In response to another recommendation made by the Council in 1949, the Administering Authority stated that steps would be taken to provide some typical cost-of-living figures for urban areas and the Council asked, at its seventh session, that it be informed of the result of this survey in time for examination with the next annual report on the Territory.

There was no legislation relating to freedom of association, conciliation and arbitration. The Council, at its third and fifth sessions, in 1948 and 1949, had recommended that the establishment of trade unions be encouraged. At its seventh session, it was informed that nothing had been done either to encourage or discourage their establishment, but that the matter had been under constant consideration. The Council made no further recommendation on this subject at its seventh session. It did, however, in its report on the Territory, urge the Administering Authority to speed up the ratification and application to New Guinea of international conventions, particularly those affecting labour and other social questions.

Referring to a provision of the Immigration Ordinance, 1932-40, prohibiting entry into New Guinea of any person failing to pass a dictation test in any language, the Council recommended that the Administering Authority consider removing this provision from the legislation. It asked to be informed of the action taken in time for consideration at its June 1951 session.

Pursuant to recommendations of the Council's fifth session, the Administering Authority reported, a review of all territorial legislation was being made to determine whether there were any discriminatory provisions contrary to the Charter or the Trusteeship Agreement; laws and practices relating to the powers of arrest and curfew were also being reviewed. A review had already been completed of relevant legislation with a view to providing for the judicial declaration of an habitual criminal and for fixing a minimum and maximum period of further punishment, and action was to be taken.

The expansion of health services, the Administering Authority observed, had been hampered by the shortage of buildings, personnel and material. Nevertheless, considerable improvement had been made during the year 1948/49. Expenditure totalled £466,979, more than double that of the year before. The number of official hospitals increased from 41 to 44, and official aid posts from six to 42. Additional medical personnel, nurses and technicians had been appointed, including 38 fully qualified medical practitioners from among European displaced persons, of whom 24 had taken up duty in New Guinea by the end of May 1950, and indigenous inhabitants were being trained for medical work. Medical patrols were carried out in all areas, and a malaria survey of the Central Highlands had been continued. A long-term health programme under consideration by the Australian Government, it was stated, includes provision for 76 additional hospitals in the Territory.

The Council, in its report on the Territory, indicated its satisfaction at the increased expenditure on medical and health services and the accelerated recruitment of medical personnel. It considered that the medical services were still inadequate, however, and drew attention to the remaining needs in the medical field, recommending that the Administering Authority take further steps to extend the services. It also suggested that the Administering Authority study the possibility of extending the medical patrol facilities.

e. EDUCATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

The Administering Authority recognized the importance of expanding educational services in the Territory, and reported that particular attention had been paid to this during 1948/49. Expenditure on education was increased and a building programme was planned to expand schools and other educational facilities. Six new indigenous administration schools were opened during the year, bringing the total to 34. Among the new schools was a higher training institution, in which 85 students had been enrolled in a two-year teacher-training course. In addition to administration schools for indigenous inhabitants, there were five European and four Chinese primary schools and one part-Malayan primary school. Enrolment in administration schools increased from 2,561 to 2,869, including 155 Europeans, 350 Chinese, 55 part-Malay and 2,309 indigenous children; the number of teachers increased from 88 to 119, of whom 24 were Europeans, eight Chinese and 87 indigenous.

An incomplete survey of mission schools, the Administering Authority reported, showed a total of 1,746 village, intermediate and higher training schools, an increase of 283 over the previous year. Students were estimated to total 64,516 as against 60,000 in 1947/48 and the schools were estimated to have 71 European teachers and 2,350 indigenous teachers as against 60 and 1,500, respectively, the year before.

Education is free in both administration and mission schools. Pending the establishment of facilities for higher education, the Administering Authority stated, arrangements would be made for higher education to be available at institutions in Australia.

The Council noted the increase in expenditure on education with satisfaction. Nevertheless, it considered that the facilities provided were insufficient to meet the needs of the Territory. It recommended that the Administering Authority, in reviewing the educational programme for the indigenous inhabitants, place appropriate emphasis on their preparation for the responsibilities of representative government and eventual independence. It considered that sound educational programmes among large populations were necessarily dependent on the training of indigenous teachers and urged the Administering Authority to press forward with the development of the newly established higher training institution.

f. GENERAL

The Council, in its report on the Territory, stated its opinion that much remained to be accomplished in the general development of the Territory and recommended that the Administering Authority try to quicken the pace of political, economic, social and educational advancement. In arriving at this conclusion, the Council submitted that it had taken fully into account the difficulties confronted by the Administering Authority owing to the general backwardness of the Territory, the devastation caused by the war, and the climate and terrain, and, further that it had noted the progress made in all fields as reported by the Administering Authority and its special representative and the assurances that such progress would continue to be promoted as rapidly as possible.

Complaints concerning the treatment of indigenous inhabitants assigned to clear up explosives, the use of certain of their lands, the levying of the head tax, the prices paid them for their produce, and education were contained in a petition from Mrs. Jane T. Wallace (T/Pet.8/2).

After examining this petition, at its seventh session, the Council decided, by resolution 235(VII) of 29 June 1950, that no action was called for on the question of clearing the explosives. The general questions of taxation, prices and education, the Council informed the petitioner, would continue to be examined in connexion with the examination of annual reports on the Territory. It also drew the petitioner's attention to its recommendations on taxation and educational advancement (see above), which were included in its report on New Guinea.

3. Western Samoa, Administered by New Zealand¹³⁴

Western Samoa, which comprises two large islands (Upolu and Savai'i) and seven small islands and islets, has an area of 1,133 square miles. Its total population, according to the Administering Authority's annual report,¹³⁵ was estimated in 1949 at 75,381, of whom 69,426 were Samoans, 5,406 part-Samoan possessing "European" status, 297 full Europeans, 180 Chinese and 72 Melanesians.

The national status of Samoans is that of British protected persons; the Administering Authority stated its intention of changing this status to New Zealand protected persons, as desired by Samoan representatives.

According to the Administering Authority's report, the people of the Territory enjoy the same guarantees as New Zealand citizens with regard to the protection of their persons and property; differing legal rights, however, principally in the matter of trade debts, incorporation and partnership, elections, land rights and acquisition of Samoan titles, are conferred by municipal law upon "Samoans" and "Europeans". Referring to the possible undesirable tensions that might result from this differentiation in legal and social rights, the Trusteeship Council recommended, in its report, that the Administering Authority intensify its efforts to solve this problem.

a. POLITICAL DEVELOPMENT

The legal and political structure of the Territory is based on the Samoa Amendment Act, 1947, which embodies most of the recommendations made by a special visiting mission sent to the Territory in 1947 by the Trusteeship Council. The Act came into force on 10 March 1948 and both the Council of State and the Legislative Assembly provided for in the Act began functioning during that year. Executive authority in the Territory is entrusted to a High Commissioner. He, together with the Fautua (highest chiefs) form the Council of State, which acts as an advisory body to the High Commissioner on all proposed legislation and questions involving Samoan customs.

Legislative power, except on a few subjects, including defence, external affairs, Crown land and the Territory's Constitution, is conferred on the Legislative Assembly which is composed of fourteen Samoans (the Fautua and elected members), five elected Europeans and six unofficial members. Following the death of one of the three Fautua, the Samoans indicated that they did not wish the appointment of another Fautua. They asked instead that a fourteenth Samoan member of the Assembly be elected by the Fono of Faipule.¹³⁶ The Administering Authority complied with this request and the Fono of Faipule, in electing the new member, employed for the first time a secret ballot.

The Fono of Faipule are elected by the matai (heads of families), who constitute about 20 per cent of the males over fourteen years of age. Proposed ordinances affecting the Samoan people are submitted, among other matters, to the Fono for their views.

Referring to a recommendation made by the Trusteeship Council in 1949, that the introduction of universal suffrage be considered, the Administering Authority indicated that it had considered this question but was convinced that it would be wrong to force any radical change in the customs of the Samoan people, who still regarded the matai as their proper representatives in matters outside the family. It was felt, however, that the situation was gradually changing and that the franchise would inevitably become more general by choice of the Samoan people themselves.

The Trusteeship Council at its seventh session, while noting with satisfaction that an additional Samoan member of the Legislative Assembly had been elected by secret ballot, expressed the hope that further reforms would be introduced with a view to bringing about in due course a system of universal suffrage in the election of the Fono of Faipule.

The question of local government in villages and districts, the Administering Authority stated, was being studied by a Commission of Inquiry set up as a result of a recommendation of the Legislative Assembly. The Council expressed the hope that this Commission's work would contribute towards furthering opportunities for Samoans to acquire the political experience necessary for self-government.

The Council was informed by the Administering Authority that a review of the organization of the public service in Western Samoa was being conducted in 1950 by a newly appointed Public Service Commissioner, who would, as far as possible, implement the policy of providing Samoans with duties of increasing responsibility in the public service. This policy was considered commendable by the Council, which expressed the hope that the Administering Authority would progressively make use of Samoans in the higher posts of the administration.

The judicial organization in the Territory, as described in the annual report, comprises a chief judge, four commissioners of the High Court, three Samoan associate judges and fourteen Samoan judges in charge of district courts. In cases involving Samoan defendants, the Samoan associate judges take an active part in examining witnesses and helping to frame just verdicts. A first step has been made towards giving associate judges a fuller share in court work; in civil disputes, the whole case is being handed over to an associate judge, who conducts the hearing and reports his findings to the chief judge. The further development of increased responsibility for associate judges will be assisted, the Administering Authority pointed out, if the judges are given more precise legal standing in the court and if the Fono of Faipule is willing more often to permit a judge to hold office for more than one term at a time.

Offences against Samoan custom which are not offences against written law are handled in village councils presided over by village title holders.

The Trusteeship Council, in its report on the Territory, asked to be informed as to the results of the various inquiries into the status and jurisdiction of Samoan judges, particularly with respect to permanence of tenure.

b. ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

The economy of Western Samoa is almost entirely agricultural, involving mainly the production of foodstuffs for local consumption and of crops for export. The principal export crops are copra, cocoa and bananas.

The year ending 31 March 1949, the period covered by the annual report, was described as one of continued prosperity; at the end of that period, the Territory had an accumulated cash surplus of £642,973.¹³⁷

The Administering Authority outlined the measures taken, in accordance with a previous Trusteeship Council recommendation, to broaden the base of the economy and to diversify production as a cushion against the possible fall of world copra and cocoa prices. The Department of Agriculture was re-established, after a lapse of twenty years. A Copra Board was set up to replace the New Zealand Government in negotiating contracts for marketing Samoan copra and to establish a stabilization fund to provide some degree of protection for merchants and producers against price fluctuations. The New Zealand Reparation Estates, the most important plantation enterprise in the Territory, was, among other activities, expanding the new and successful dried-coconut industry, for which a new factory had been established, developing a dairy farm, and considering the possibility of meat canning.

The profits derived from these and other activities of the Reparation Estates are paid into the New Zealand Consolidated Fund, but the Administering Authority explained that, in practice, grants equivalent to these profits are made to the Samoan Government for social and economic development schemes.

Other efforts towards development and diversification had also been made, such as parasite control and the opening up of new land through road construction. Some measures, however, including the production of rubber and of dried bananas, had been found uneconomical. Plans were being made for a survey to determine the economic potential of the Territory and practical possibilities for further diversification; the work of the South Pacific Commission in its economic branches, it was indicated, might be regarded as the preliminary steps for over-all plans for the economic development of the Territory.

The Trusteeship Council, in its report on the Territory, noted with satisfaction the favourable economic and financial conditions in the Territory and congratulated the Administering Authority on the re-establishment of the Department of Agriculture, the attention given to the problem of the diversification of the economy, and the formation of the Copra Board. The co-operation between the Government of Western Samoa and the South Pacific Commission was also noted with satisfaction by the Council, as it felt this might beneficially affect the Territory's development.

With regard to the profits of the Reparation Estates, the Council recommended that the Administering Authority consider giving statutory form to the practice of using all its surpluses for the benefit of the people of the Territory.

The public revenue of the Territory is derived from direct and indirect taxes. The former include store, salary, building and amusement taxes, water rates and stamp duties. The Administration was studying the question of replacing the store tax by an income tax. Import and export duties constitute the indirect taxes. While there is no special tariff relationship between the Territory and New Zealand, a preferential treatment of 11 per cent has been given since 1920 to British goods imported into the Territory. A Select Committee was created by the Legislative Assembly to investigate this situation.

The Council expressed the wish to be informed of the outcome of the inquiry into the preferential duty rate on British imports and of any taxation reforms that may result from the study of the question of income tax.

c. SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT

The Samoan social structure is based on a broad family unit which includes persons in one or more villages who are related by blood or marriage and may even include some who are not related; all acknowledge as the chosen head of the family the matai, who directs the family's affairs and represents it in the village council.

¹³⁷ Throughout this account of Western Samoa, £ = Samoan or New Zealand pounds, which are equal.

In its annual report, the Administering Authority indicated that the population of Western Samoa was increasing at the rate of 2.5 per cent annually, one of the highest recorded rates in the world. This increase was being taken into account in all plans for economic and social advancement, as the necessity of expanding production and services to permit a steady rise in living standards was recognized by the Administration.

Only 3 per cent of the Samoans were regular wage earners. Following an inquiry into wage rates and hours of work of casual labour, the Government announced a new wage scale which it would pay and which it felt other employers throughout the Territory would therefore find it necessary to pay.

Although the Territory has no newspapers, the Administration issues daily news-sheets and operates a broadcasting service which carries reports of official bodies, addresses on health, cultural matters, general education and current affairs. The Council found this development in the use of radio commendable and expressed the hope that it would be kept informed of the Administering Authority's experience in this field.

It noted with satisfaction that the Administering Authority was alive to the problems resulting from the rapid population increase. The Council asked the Administering Authority, however, to make a study of the standard of living in the Territory as soon as possible and to include this information in its subsequent annual reports. It also recommended that elementary social and labour legislation be introduced, taking into account local conditions.

The Administering Authority's efforts towards eliminating any differentiation between the rights of men and women were commended by the Council, which recommended continued action to ensure that Samoan women would gain full opportunities to participate in political life.

The progress made in the reorganization and development of public health services was described in the annual report. The difficulty of recruiting health officers posed a serious problem, since the health plan for the Territory required a substantial increase in both European and Samoan personnel. Nevertheless, hospitals were being built, and the first of a fleet of mobile clinics had been put into operation. The activities of this team of Samoan medical and dental practitioners and their assistants, the Administering Authority stated, had had a marked effect on the health of the villages visited.

d. EDUCATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Education in Western Samoa is carried out by the Administration and by religious missions, whose schools are not subject to government control. The great majority of children receiving education attend either primary village schools, which numbered 101 of the 109 schools run by the Administration, or mission primary schools, numbering 357 out of a total of 391 mission schools. A total of 13,359 students were enrolled in Administration schools and 21,417 in mission schools; these figures included considerable duplication, it was explained, since many children attended both types of schools. Education is not compulsory, and the Administering Authority stated in its report that it did not consider it practicable to introduce compulsory education until there were enough trained teachers and Administration schools for the increasing population. In an effort toward meeting this need, the one teacher-training college, which prepares primary school teachers, was expanded during the year 1948/49.

Apart from a small post-primary school, four mission schools, a newly established night school for adult education and the teacher training college, Western Samoa depends for secondary and higher education on facilities outside the Territory, primarily in New Zealand.

The standard of work in village schools run by the Administration was improving, the Administering Authority stated, attendance was better and many villages had asked that government schools be opened.

After examining the educational conditions in the Territory, the Trusteeship Council recommended that steps be taken to bring about closer co-ordination between government and mission schools with regard to organization, staffing, and curricula. It also asked that more complete statistics regarding both Administration and other schools be included in future annual reports.

e. OTHER QUESTIONS

(1) General Conclusion of the Council

With regard to the general situation in the Territory, the Council commended the Administering Authority for the progress it had made and for fulfilling its obligations under the Trusteeship Agreement during the year under review.

(2) Petition Containing Personal Complaints

Only one petition concerning Western Samoa was examined by the Council during 1950. In this petition, Mr. Charles Pelman complained of alleged personal injustices which he had suffered (T/Pet.1/2). The Council considered that the local courts were competent to deal with the petitioner's complaints and, by resolution 124(VI) of 27 February, it advised him that if he wished to seek redress he should do so in the local courts.

4. Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands, Administered by the United States¹³⁸

This Territory consists of three island groups: the Marshalls, Carolines and Marianas (except Guam). It contains 96 distinct island units, with a combined land area of about 687 square miles, spread over some 3,000,000 square miles. According to the Administering Authority's annual report,¹³⁹ the people, numbering approximately 54,000 in 1949, differ widely as to physical characteristics and cultures and speak ten mutually unintelligible languages.

a. POLITICAL DEVELOPMENT

All powers of government and jurisdiction in the Territory are vested in a High Commissioner, who is subject to the direction of the United States Secretary of the Navy. The headquarters of the High Commissioner were transferred during 1949 from Guam to Hawaii, and a field headquarters was established on Truk Atoll in the Trust Territory. The Administering Authority stated that it did not believe it practicable as yet to transfer the seat of government to a site within the Trust Territory, as suggested in 1949 by the Trusteeship Council, explaining that suitable headquarters would cost at least $25,000,000 and would require four or five years for construction.

In its report on the Territory at its seventh session, the Council commended the establishment of a field headquarters on Truk, but asked the Administering Authority to continue considering the possibility of establishing the seat of government within the Territory itself. Informed that a revised draft of the organic legislation for the Territory, including a definition of the status of the inhabitants, was being reviewed, the Council expressed the hope that such legislation would soon be enacted. It noted that the Administering Authority was also studying the question of applying to the Territory international treaties, agreements and conventions, including International Labour Conventions and Recommendations, and expressed the hope that the results of this study would soon be made available to the Council.

The measures taken to further self-government in the Territory through education and civic guidance were described by the Administering Authority. Beginning on the local level, the Administering Authority planned to organize on each inhabited atoll at least one municipality; 116 had already been set up. Depending on local preference, municipal officers were either the traditional chief, persons appointed by the Administration, or, increasingly, persons elected by popular vote. On the regional level, legislative advisory organs of representatives of the indigenous inhabitants had been or were being established in each of the five administrative districts. Ultimately, according to the long-range plans of the Administration, a Territory-wide legislative body would be created.

The Trusteeship Council commended the Administering Authority for its progressive development of regional and local organs of self-government. At the same time, it recommended that the Administering Authority progressively democratize the municipalities and press forward with its long-range plans.

b. ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

As described in the annual report, the economic resources of the Territory are meagre; little more than a subsistence economy exists. During 1949, the principal commodities exported were phosphate ($1,202,000), copra ($757,000), handicraft ($88,000), trochus shell ($69,000) and other products ($33,000). Imports during the year were valued at $1,112,000.

The phosphate deposits on Angaur Island continued to be mined during 1949 by the Japanese Government for export to Japan. A royalty of 25 cents per ton of phosphate extracted was paid during the year into a trust fund. The Council had, inter alia, expressed concern at its fifth session in 1949 that the Territory derived no benefit from the phosphates other than this royalty. For some time before this, the Administering Authority indicated, the arrangements for mining phosphate had been under review and were being changed as a result of an agreement of 21 December 1949. Under this new agreement, the Territory is to receive a processing tax of 15 per cent of the value of the phosphate removed, and a severance fee of $2 a ton is to be paid into a trust fund set up to compensate the Angaurese for the removal of the phosphate. From this fund annual payments of $15,000 or over are to be made, two thirds to the clans owning the mined land and one third to the municipality of Angaur.

For its economic maintenance, the Territory has depended primarily on copra exports. The expanding production of copra resulting from the various efforts of the Administering Authority, it was stated, had been to a large extent responsible for the improved economic conditions existing in the Territory in 1949.

Copra is purchased by a Government agency, the Island Trading Company, which pays a 15-per-cent processing tax to the Territory on all copra exported. The Council was informed, in connexion with a recommendation made in 1949 for safeguarding the interests of the copra producers, that the Island Trading Company had set up a Copra Stabilization Fund for this purpose.

The Island Trading Company also provides essential commodities to the indigenous inhabitants and facilitates the export, in addition to copra, of their other products; it fosters the establishment of trading enterprises and the development of industries and new sources of income for the inhabitants. All its profits and its entire net worth, the Administering Authority assured the Council, are for the benefit of the people of the Territory.

A programme of small-boat building had been undertaken in order to assist the local fishing industry and improve local water transportation; although the territorial waters were opened early in 1949 to outside commercial fishing companies, none had applied for fishing permits. Other attempts to diversify the island economy included projects for manufacture of soap and production of cacao, papain (a pharmaceutical derivative of papaya) and ramie (a plant yielding a textile product).

After noting the steps taken to foster indigenous fishing and shipping, the Trusteeship Council recommended that the Administering Authority continue its efforts to diversify the Territory's economy.

Public expenditure in the Territory, including administration expenses, is financed by funds appropriated by the United States Congress and local revenues which the Congress approves for spending. The principal territorial taxes include internal revenue taxes on cosmetics and tobaccos and the copra processing tax; there is also a head tax of $2 payable annually by each adult male. The head tax is collected and expended by the municipalities, which also levy a variety of fees and luxury and property taxes.

The Administering Authority explained, with reference to a recommendation made in 1949 by the Trusteeship Council, that it was reviewing the existing taxation system, but did not believe that the time was ripe for the abolition of the head tax. It assured the Council, however, that it fully appreciated the desirability of introducing, as soon as practicable, taxes based on the ability to pay. The Council took note of these statements and reiterated its earlier recommendation that the Administering Authority consider the ultimate abolition of the head tax and its replacement by a more progressive system of taxation. It also expressed the hope that, to the extent possible, steps would be taken to ensure that there was no abuse of existing customs involving payments in cash or in kind to indigenous chiefs or headmen.

c. SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT

The Administering Authority stated that its policy in the social field has been to reduce interference with local customs to a minimum and to assist in the preservation and healthy development of prevailing cultures. In most of the Territory, according to the Administering Authority's report, the characteristic settlement is a close, hamlet-like cluster of homes or farmsteads, the inhabitants of which are linked by kinship and by neighbourhood relationships. A scattered group of such hamlets may have traditional ties approximating those of a village community; and larger, more diversified settlements may form organizations covering a whole atoll or a large part of one of the higher islands. Within this framework, there exists a complex pattern of individual and group relationships in which social distinctions based on age, seniority, family, clan or achieved positions are observed. The people, except for about 3,000 regular wage earners, are engaged in subsistence farming and fishing.

Discrimination on account of sex is prohibited in the Territory. Women enjoy equal voting and educational rights and have been encouraged, the Administering Authority reported, to take part in the processes of government. Two indigenous women were elected to the Palau Congress, a fact noted with satisfaction by the Trusteeship Council, which expressed the hope that the Administering Authority would encourage the women of the Territory to participate increasingly in the discussion and management of island affairs.

In describing public health in the Territory, the Administering Authority stated that substantial reductions had been made in the incidence of the more common diseases. Active yaws, for example, which, it was estimated, had been present in 90 per cent of the population, was now rarely seen. There were dispensaries at each civil administration centre, 90 sub-dispensaries at other locations, and health aides were located on outlying islands, which were visited by medical officers and dentists every few months. A ship, the U.S.S. Whidbey, specially fitted out as a floating clinic and laboratory, sailed from island to island to make physical examinations, from which individual health records were being set up for virtually the entire population; it was estimated that this health survey would be completed in another year. The Trusteeship Council considered that the resulting statistical information would be of great value; it commended the Administering Authority on the great progress achieved in the field of public health.

d. EDUCATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

A free public school system has been established in the Territory and almost universal elementary school attendance for children of school age has been attained except at a few outlying points, the Administering Authority stated. As of 31 March 1949, a total of 7,689 students, both boys and girls in approximately equal numbers, attended the 127 elementary public schools, and 1,123 attended the fifteen elementary mission schools.

Intermediate school education was offered at each civil administration centre and at Yap. To meet the need for a larger number of professionally and technically trained indigenous leaders, a school for medical assistants, a school for dental assistants, and a school for nursing had been established on Guam and the Pacific Island Teacher Training School on Truk. The Administering Authority stated that, after carefully considering the question of establishing secondary schools within the Territory, it began broadening the scope of the Teacher Training School to provide secondary education for those not interested in teaching. For higher education, a few promising students continued to be sent to Hawaii and the continental United States.

The Trusteeship Council found the progress in education commendable; it suggested that the Administering Authority consider the possibility of using radio to a greater extent for mass education.

e. GENERAL

With respect to the Territory's development in all fields, the Council congratulated the Administering Authority for the progress it had made during the year 1948/49. It considered this progress all the more notable because of the scattered nature of the islands comprising the Territory and the relatively short time they had been under United States administration.

D. QUESTIONS CONCERNING THE DEVELOPMENT OF TRUST TERRITORIES

1. Action in the Trusteeship Council

a. CONSIDERATION OF GENERAL ASSEMBLY RESOLUTIONS

At the 73rd meeting of its sixth session, on 28 March 1950, the Council considered five separate resolutions adopted by the General Assembly on 15 November 1949.¹⁴⁰

By resolution 320(IV), the Assembly supported the Council's earlier recommendations asking that the Administering Authorities take measures to hasten the development of the Trust Territories toward self-government or independence.

By resolution 322 (IV), the Assembly reaffirmed the principle that the interests of the indigenous inhabitants must be paramount in all economic plans or policies in the Trust Territories and, inter alia, expressed concern that the lack of budgetary autonomy in some cases and the scarcity of data in others did not allow the Council to make a thorough examination of the financial situation of certain Territories.

By resolution 323(IV), the Assembly recommended the adoption of strong and effective measures to abolish immediately the corporal punishment of whipping in Ruanda-Urundi and endorsed the Council's earlier recommendations for the immediate abolition of corporal punishment in the Cameroons and Togoland under British administration and its formal abolition in New Guinea. It asked the Council to adopt suitable measures for the solution of such important social problems as migrant labour and penal sanctions for breach of labour contracts by indigenous inhabitants. With a view to the abolition of discriminatory laws and practices the Assembly further asked the Council to examine all laws, statutes and ordinances and their application in the Trust Territories and to make positive recommendations to the Administering Authorities concerned.

By resolution 324(IV), the Assembly, inter alia, endorsed previous Council recommendations concerning education in Trust Territories; called the Council's attention to the necessity of asking the Administering Authorities to study the possibility of including in the school curricula of the Territories instruction on the United Nations, the Trusteeship System and the special status of Trust Territories; recommended that the Council call upon the Administering Authorities concerned to intensify or adopt measures for the establishment in Africa of educational institutions of university standard and systems of scholarships allowing indigenous students to complete their university training in other countries.

In each of these resolutions, the Assembly asked the Council to include in its annual reports to the Assembly special sections outlining the measures adopted by the Administering Authorities to carry out its recommendations, and, in particular, to report on the action taken with respect to the abolition of discriminatory practices.

By resolution 321(IV), the Assembly made recommendations to the Council concerning the examination of petitions and the terms of reference of Visiting Missions.¹⁴¹

The representatives of Iraq and the United States presented a draft resolution (T/L.7) suggesting that the Council take note of the recommendations contained in these Assembly resolutions, state that steps had been or were being taken by the Council to carry out their provisions and bring the resolutions to the attention of the Administering Authorities, urging the latter to take the necessary steps to implement them. In particular, the Administering Authorities would be asked to abolish corporal punishment, including whipping, in all Trust Territories and to ensure that no discriminatory laws or practices existed in these Territories. The problems of migrant labour and penal sanctions for breach of labour contracts by indigenous inhabitants would be referred to the International Labour Organisation (ILO) and the Council would defer further action on these problems until it had received the advice of ILO.

It was argued by the representatives of Argentina and the Philippines that such an omnibus resolution was inadequate to deal with the Assembly resolutions. Jointly, they introduced amendments (T/L.40) to the Iraqi-United States resolution proposing specific action to be taken with respect to each recommendation made by the Assembly. According to these amendments, which were supported by the representative of China, the Council would note that it had taken or was taking steps to carry out some of the Assembly recommendations, but would resolve to give effect to all of them. The Administering Authorities would be asked to assure the budgetary autonomy of the Trust Territories. With respect to discrimination, the amendments proposed, as a first step, the establishment of a Council committee to make a preliminary study of all laws, statutes and ordinances, as well as their application, in the Trust Territories. With respect to migrant labour and penal sanctions for breach of labour contracts, the sponsors of the amendments suggested that, to avoid any delay, the Council ask the Secretariat, with the co-operation of ILO, to submit available information to the Council's seventh session. With respect to the Assembly's recommendations concerning teaching about the United Nations, the Trusteeship System and the special status of Trust Territories, the establishment in Africa of educational institutions of university standard and systems of scholarships, the joint amendments proposed that the Council address specific requests to the Administering Authorities concerned.

These amendments were opposed by the representatives of France, Belgium, the United Kingdom and New Zealand.

Quoting from the amendments, the representative of France stated that "to assure to the Trust Territories budgetary autonomy", apart from not following the Assembly resolution in question

¹⁴¹ See pp. 112-13.

(322 (IV)), meant, literally, that the Trust Territories would have to meet all their expenditure out of their own resources without subsidies from the Administering Authority.

This interpretation was reiterated by the representatives of Belgium and the United Kingdom, who referred to previous Council recommendations that larger subsidies be granted to certain Territories.

Other objections to the amendments were also made. The ILO was considered as more competent than the Secretariat to examine the problem of penal sanctions and breach of labour contracts. The immensity of the task and the length of time required to study all laws, statutes, ordinances and decrees in force in the Trust Territories was also referred to.

In this connexion, the representative of Belgium stated that when the General Assembly called upon the Trusteeship Council to take specific action, its instructions sometimes lacked a sense of reality. He questioned whether the Assembly was not going beyond its normal functions in asking the Council to take such action.

A statement of principle concerning the relationship between the Council and the Assembly was made by the President of the Council. He contended that resolutions of the Assembly recommending the Council to take any particular action could in no case limit the Council's rights. The Council could not be regarded as an executive office for carrying out resolutions adopted by the Assembly. As the Council could only apply Assembly resolutions by a majority of its members, it was possible that a recommendation by the Assembly might not pass in the Council. Since this would cause a regrettable conflict between the two organs, he considered that the Assembly should exercise the greatest prudence in passing resolutions encroaching upon the sphere of activity allotted to the Council under the Charter. He also thought that the Council, in acting on Assembly resolutions, had the power to interpret them in such a way as to make the Assembly recommendations applicable in practice.

These statements were endorsed by the representatives of Belgium, France, the United Kingdom and New Zealand.

Disagreement with these views was expressed by the representatives of China and the Philippines. The former referred to Articles 85 and 87 of the Charter which, he said, expressly stated that the Council carried out its functions (with respect to non-strategic areas under Trusteeship) "under the authority of the General Assembly"

(Article 85). He adduced as the only possible interpretation of this statement that the Council was an executive organ of the Assembly. He therefore felt that it would be extremely remiss of the Council to fail to take action on the Assembly's instructions.

With reference to the Iraqi-United States draft resolution, the representatives of New Zealand and Australia suggested that the text should make it clear that corporal punishment did not exist in all Trust Territories. This suggestion was accepted by the sponsors.

The joint amendments proposed by Argentina and the Philippines were defeated by a paragraph-by-paragraph vote, ranging from 3 to 5 votes for and 5 to 6 votes against.

The joint draft resolution, as amended by the addition of the words "where they still exist" in paragraph 3 of the operative part, was then adopted on 28 March 1950 by 7 votes to none, with 4 abstentions, as follows (127 (VI)):

Whereas the General Assembly of the United Nations at its fourth regular session considered the report of the Trusteeship Council covering its fourth and fifth regular sessions,

Whereas the General Assembly as a result of such consideration adopted, on 15 November 1949, resolution 320 (IV) concerning political advancement in Trust Territories, resolution 321 (IV) concerning petitions and visiting missions, resolution 322 (IV) concerning economic advancement in Trust Territories, resolution 323 (IV) concerning social advancement in Trust Territories, and resolution 324 (IV) concerning educational advancement in Trust Territories,

Now, therefore, the Trusteeship Council

Takes note of the recommendations of the General Assembly contained in the aforesaid resolutions;

Notes that steps have already been taken or are being taken by the Council to carry out the provisions of these recommendations;

Recommends to the respective Administering Authorities concerned, with regard to paragraph 2 of resolution 323 (IV), the abolition of corporal punishment and whipping in all Trust Territories where they still exist and the initiation of a programme to this effect as soon as possible;

Requests- the Secretariat to bring to the attention of the International Labour Organisation the General Assembly's interest in the problems of migrant labour and penal sanctions for breach of labour contracts by indigenous inhabitants, as explained in paragraph 3 of resolution 323 (IV), and to request the expert advice of the International Labour Organisation on these problems, and decides to defer further action until such expert advice can be obtained from the International Labour Organisation or other sources;

Urges all Administering Authorities to take the necessary measures, with regard to paragraphs 4 and 5 of resolution 323 (IV), to ensure that no discriminatory laws or practices contrary to the principles of the Charter and the Trusteeship Agreements shall exist in any Trust Territory, and calls upon the Administering

Authorities who may be concerned to include in the next annual reports all data needed to enable the Council to make any further positive recommendations on this subject which it may deem necessary in order to give effect to the recommendation of the General Assembly;

Decides further to bring to the attention of each of the Administering Authorities the aforesaid resolutions as adopted by the General Assembly, together with a copy of this resolution, and urges the Administering Authorities to take such steps as may seem necessary to give them effect.

Following its request to ILO for expert advice on the problems of migrant labour and penal sanctions for breach of labour contracts by indigenous inhabitants of Trust Territories, the Council was informed (T/712) that in June 1950 the ILO Governing Body had noted the resolutions of the General Assembly and the Council, and also the arrangements made by the Director-General concerning ILO's activities in these matters.

In regard to penal sanctions the Director-General proposed to approach the ILO member States concerned to secure details of their current law and practice, together with indications of the difficulties preventing the ratification of the Penal Sanctions (Indigenous Workers) Convention, 1939. This Convention had been ratified by only two countries—New Zealand and the United Kingdom. As regards migrant labour, the Director-General proposed to carry further the organization's studies of the matter in the course of an ILO mission to various territories in Africa and to report on the subject during 1951 to the ILO Committee of Experts on Social Policy in Non-Metropolitan Territories. It was stated that the Council would be kept fully informed of future developments in these fields.

b. IMPROVEMENT OF NUTRITION IN TRUST TERRITORIES

At the 29th meeting of the Trusteeship Council's seventh session, on 20 July 1950, the representative of Argentina presented a draft resolution (T/L.III) relating to the improvement of nutrition in the Territories. He stressed the importance of this question, which had occasioned numerous comments by members of the Council during its examination of annual reports.

The draft resolution was considered by the Council at its 30th meeting on 21 July. The representatives of France, Belgium, the United Kingdom, New Zealand, the United States and Iraq spoke in favour of the proposed resolution and each suggested drafting amendments which were accepted by the representative of Argentina. The revised text was then adopted without objection as follows (300(VII)):

The Trusteeship Council,

Recognizing that dietary deficiencies constitute a serious obstacle to the social and economic development of the inhabitants of the Trust Territories,

Sharing the desire of the Administering Authorities to bring about improvement in existing nutritional standards,

Noting that scientific research concerning nutrition has recently undergone considerable changes, and

Noting in particular that studies have been undertaken regarding new and economical methods of ameliorating or eliminating such deficiencies in the dietary conditions in tropical areas, Invites the Administering Authorities to continue to explore, in co-operation with the specialized agencies of the United Nations, and also with competent scientific bodies, the possibility of utilizing and expanding the latest scientific methods in the improvement of nutritional standards among the inhabitants of Trust Territories.

2. Action in the Economic and Social Council

Following its consideration of General Assembly resolution 225(III) concerning higher education in Trust Territories in Africa, the Trusteeship Council, at its fifth session, on 19 July 1949, had adopted a resolution (110(V))¹⁴² which, inter alia, invited the Economic and Social Council to take into account the higher educational needs of the Trust Territories in its study of programmes of technical assistance to under-developed areas.

This request was considered by the Economic and Social Council at the 413th meeting of its eleventh session on 15 August 1950. The Secretary-General submitted a note on the problem (E/1707) containing a suggested draft resolution, to which the United States delegation proposed certain additions (E/L.84). Both drafts found approval among the members of the Council and were unanimously adopted as resolution 320(XI).

As had been proposed by the Secretary-General, this resolution drew the attention of the Administering Authorities of the Trust Territories in Africa, i.e. Belgium, France and the United Kingdom, to the expanded programme of technical assistance for the economic development of under-developed countries established under Council resolution 222 A (IX)¹⁴³ as well as to the regular United Nations and specialized agency programmes of technical assistance for economic development and social progress; it invited the Administering Authorities to submit their requests to the appropriate organizations if such assistance were needed. It also drew the attention of the Technical Assistance Board (TAB) and the Technical Assistance Committee (TAC), as had been recommended by the United States delegation, to the Trusteeship Council's resolution 110(V) as a guide in examining the annual programmes of the participating organizations and in the allocation of funds by TAB; finally, the Council requested its President to consult with the President of the Trusteeship Council with regard to any further action designed to advance higher education in the Trust Territories in Africa.

3. Action in the General Assembly

a. GENERAL DISCUSSION IN THE FOURTH COMMITTEE

A general discussion of the conditions in the Trust Territories and of their administration took place during the fifth session of the General Assembly from the 144th to 152nd meetings of the Fourth Committee, from 2 to 16 October 1950.

The representative of Poland stated that a careful study of the annual reports and petitions and of the reports of the Visiting Missions indicated that the Administering Authorities were attempting to prevent or retard the attainment of self-government. In general, he continued, universal suffrage did not exist; legislative power was never vested in the indigenous people; advisory bodies were composed mainly of nominated members. Progress was equally slow in other fields, and the Trust Territories were being exploited for the benefit of the Administering Authorities. He criticized particularly British and French administration. Similar views were expressed by the representatives of the Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, the Ukrainian SSR and the USSR. The USSR representative suggested that the General Assembly should require strict compliance by the Administering Authorities with the requirements of the Charter and should make it obligatory for the Administering Authorities to provide the Trusteeship Council with detailed plans for the political, economic, social and educational development of each Trust Territory. Reference was made by the representative of Czechoslovakia to a statement by the French Minister for Overseas Territories to the effect that autonomy or independence of the Trust Territories was unthinkable and that the overseas territories were to be integrated into the French Union.

The policies of their Governments with respect to Trust Territories were defended by the representatives of France and the United Kingdom. The latter stated that his Government was continuing to do everything in its power, within its financial and other limits, to improve conditions and hasten self-government in the Territories under its administration. The representative of France outlined the measures taken to improve the political, economic, social and educational conditions in Trust Territories under French administration. He explained that the people of these Territories cared more for specific freedoms than for freedom as a principle, and more for real and practical independence than for theoretical independence. Moreover, in the government bodies in metropolitan France, there were over eighty representatives from French overseas territories; if they were persistent in their efforts, he stated, they never failed to get what they wanted.

The statement by the representative of France was questioned by the representative of the Philippines, who stated that independence without qualification was envisaged by the Charter for the peoples of the Trust Territories.

Colonialism, now as before, it was contended by the representative of Guatemala, was not aimed at leading dependent peoples towards independence, and the Powers responsible would never freely admit that the people of the dependent territories had attained sufficient political maturity for independence.

The risks involved in granting independence before the people were economically and politically prepared for it were emphasized by the representative of the Netherlands, whose arguments were challenged by the representatives of Liberia, the Ukrainian SSR, Czechoslovakia and Israel. These, as well as other representatives, including those of Argentina, Egypt, India, Indonesia, Iraq, Mexico and Pakistan, held that independence should not be delayed until perfection was reached. They referred to the strong reaction against colonialism and the growing movement towards independence in Asia and Africa, as witnessed by the achievement of independence by Indonesia, India and Pakistan, among others.

No comparison was possible, it was maintained by the representative of Belgium, between the peoples of these independent States with ancient civilizations, and those of certain of the Trust Territories in central Africa. The Administering Authorities could not abandon these people at their present stage of development—a ward was not emancipated from his guardian before he had attained his majority. The Administering Authorities, he said, should be judged by their acts, by the progress they had achieved in the Territories under their administration, not on the basis of regrettable prejudices.

The representative of Norway, supported by the representative of Denmark, observed that it was necessary for the Administering Authorities to adopt a policy which, while leading the peoples of the Territories towards self-government, would respect the good in the traditional systems and institutions; they must be careful not to consider their own political systems as the only pattern to be applied in the Territories under their administration.

Reference was made by the representative of the Philippines to the view expressed by several Administering Authorities to the effect that they were not bound by the recommendations of the General Assembly and the Trusteeship Council. He called the Committee's attention in particular to such a statement contained in a pamphlet circulated by the United Kingdom in Togoland, as a summary of the annual report on the Territory to the United Nations.¹⁴⁴ He took exception to this statement, which he considered an incorrect interpretation of the role of the United Nations under the Trusteeship System, as undermining the prestige and authority of the Organization and as tending to discourage appeals to it from the peoples of the Territories. A number of other representatives also held that, as agents of the United Nations in the Territories, the Administering Authorities were bound by its decisions.

The relationship between the General Assembly and the Council was also the subject of some controversy. Several members expressed regret that the Council, at its sixth session, had rejected the Assembly's recommendation concerning the use of the United Nations flag¹⁴⁵ and had taken inadequate action with respect to other Assembly recommendations. They held that, since the Council operated under the authority of the Assembly with respect to non-strategic areas under Trusteeship, it was obliged to carry out the Assembly's recommendations. It was argued by the representative of Belgium, on the other hand, that if a Member voted against a resolution in the Assembly, it obviously could do the same in the Council.

Many observations were made in the Committee with respect to the economic and social conditions in the various Trust Territories.

The importance of building roads, of developing health services and of creating and expanding educational establishments was emphasized by the representative of Iraq.

The continued existence of racial discrimination, corporal punishment and forced labour was deplored by a number of representatives, including those of Brazil, China, Indonesia and Pakistan. The representative of Pakistan also regretted the existence of feudal and tribal institutions in most of the Trust Territories.

The representative of Denmark observed with pleasure the Trusteeship Council's interest in the status of women in the Trust Territories and suggested that it co-operate with the Commission on the Status of Women in this respect. The question of child marriage, the representative of the Netherlands remarked, also deserved full attention.

During the course of the Fourth Committee's discussions, draft resolutions dealing with corporal punishment, rural economic development, educational advancement and technical assistance were introduced (see below).

b. CORPORAL PUNISHMENT IN TRUST TERRITORIES

On 9 November 1950, at its 172nd meeting, the Fourth Committee considered a joint draft resolution submitted by Cuba and the Philippines (A/C4/L.87/Rev.1), endorsing the Council's recommendation that corporal punishment be immediately abolished in all Trust Territories where it still existed. Members of the Committee held that this form of punishment was inhumane and contrary to the modern conception of human dignity and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and deplored the continuation of this practice in spite of the previous recommendations of both the Assembly and the Council.

The Committee heard statements by the representatives of the three Administering Authorities concerned. The representative of the United Kingdom, after emphasizing that corporal punishment was not a widespread practice in the Territories under British administration and its award was subject to very strict conditions and limitations, assured the Committee of his Government's determination to press ahead with its policy of abolishing this form of punishment as a sanction of the courts as rapidly as was humanly possible. The representative of Belgium explained that his Government was doing its utmost to alter conditions in Ruanda-Urundi and would abolish corporal punishment as early as practicable. In New Guinea, the representative of Australia stated, corporal punishment had not been used since the war and the formalities for its legal abolition were being considered.

Oral amendments to the last paragraph of the draft resolution were proposed. The Netherlands representative, pointing out that the Administering Authorities must introduce legal reforms and establish probation services before corporal punishment could be abolished, suggested that the Assembly recommend "that measures be taken immediately to bring about" its complete abolition; and the representative of Cuba proposed that the Administering Authorities be asked to report on the measures taken.

These amendments, which were considered by the Committee as a single joint amendment, were opposed by Burma, Haiti, the USSR and the United States. The joint amendment was adopted, however, by 25 votes to 3, with 10 abstentions after separate votes of 22 to 11, with 5 abstentions, on the Netherlands proposal, and 34 to 2, with 5 abstentions, on the Cuban proposal.

The Committee approved the draft resolution as a whole, as thus modified, by a roll-call vote of 37 to none, with 3 abstentions.

It was adopted by the Assembly at the 316th plenary meeting on 2 December 1950, by a roll-call vote of 55 to none, with 2 abstentions, as resolution 440 (V), and read as follows:

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolution 323 (IV) endorsing the recommendation of the Trusteeship Council for the immediate abolition of corporal punishment in the Trust Territories,

Noting the several statements contained in the report of the Trusteeship Council to the present session of the General Assembly to the effect that such punishment is still being applied, Recommends that measures be taken immediately to bring about the complete abolition of corporal punishment in all Trust Territories where it still exists, and requests the Administering Authorities of those Territories to report on this matter to the General Assembly at its next regular session.

c. RURAL ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT IN TRUST TERRITORIES

A joint draft resolution designed to ensure the fair distribution and proper utilization of land in the Trust Territories was presented by Denmark, Mexico, the Philippines, Syria and the United States (A/C.4/L.78) and considered by the Fourth Committee at its 154th and 155th meetings on 19 and 20 October 1950. The representative of the United States stated his belief that real progress could be achieved in the Territories if the terms of the resolution were faithfully followed and led to recommendations which were implemented by the Administering Authorities.

The draft resolution, which, inter alia, recommended that the Council study the prevailing policies, laws and practices relating to land, land utilization and the alienation of land, was warmly supported, and it was recalled that the Council had considered at length land problems in individual Territories during its examination of annual reports and petitions.

Several amendments to the proposed text were suggested by representatives of the USSR (A/C.4/L.83) and India (A/C.4/L.84), who explained, however, that they supported the draft resolution. The USSR proposed that the study take into account "the need for prohibiting the alienation of land of the indigenous inhabitants". Many representatives agreed in principle with this amendment, but felt that it might prejudice the study to be undertaken by the Council. The USSR withdrew the amendment.

Various changes proposed by India were adopted by the Committee, among them the insertion of a reference in the first paragraph of the preamble (see below) to the advancement of "the inhabitants of Trust Territories" in place of "under-developed areas", adopted by 29 votes to 17, with 3 abstentions, and the insertion in the first paragraph of the operative text of a reference to the basic objectives of the Trusteeship System, adopted by 30 votes to none, with 20 abstentions.

After a paragraph-by-paragraph vote, the amended draft resolution was adopted by 48 votes to none, with 2 abstentions, by the Fourth Committee. The Assembly adopted the resolution (438(V)) at its 316th plenary meeting on 2 December 1950, by 54 votes to none, with 1 abstention, as follows:

The General Assembly,

Recognizing that the equitable distribution and the proper utilization of the land together constitute one of the essential conditions in ensuring, maintaining and promoting the economic and social advancement of inhabitants of Trust Territories,

Recognizing that all Trust Territories are among the under-developed areas of the world,

1. Recommends the Trusteeship Council:

(a) To study the prevailing policies, laws and practices which in the Trust Territories relate to land, land utilization and the alienation of land, taking into account the present and future needs of the indigenous inhabitants from the standpoint of the basic objectives of the International Trusteeship System, as set forth in Article 76 of the Charter, and the future economic requirements of the said Territories, as well as the social and economic consequences of the transfer of land to non-indigenous inhabitants;

(b) To make such recommendations to the Administering Authorities concerning the prevailing policies, laws and practices referred to above as may be conducive to the economic and social development of the indigenous inhabitants of the said Territories and as the Council may see fit to make in the light of the study undertaken in pursuance of sub-paragraph (a) above;

2. Requests the Trusteeship Council to report to the next regular session of the General Assembly on the work done in this connexion.

d. EDUCATIONAL ADVANCEMENT IN TRUST TERRITORIES

A joint draft resolution on this subject was proposed by Indonesia and Pakistan (A/C.4/L.75/Rev.2), and considered by the Fourth Committee at its 160th meeting on 30 October 1950.

In presenting their draft to the Committee, the sponsors stated that it was designed to provide a further incentive to educational development in the Trust Territories. The Trusteeship Council's report, they observed, revealed that budgetary appropriations for education were insufficient in relation to the size of the indigenous populations and educational conditions were unsatisfactory in several Territories, especially those under British administration and in Ruanda-Urundi and New Guinea; in Western Samoa, the situation was somewhat better, and in the Trust Territories under French administration educational problems were being attacked vigorously and wisely. They proposed in their resolution the establishment of long-range plans for educational advancement. They stated that they were not, however, suggesting a time-limit for such plans, which, in view of the different local conditions prevailing in individual Trust Territories, could be better worked out by the Administering Authorities, assisted by the specialized agencies.

An oral amendment by the USSR, proposing five to ten year plans was rejected by the Committee by 11 votes to 5, with 25 abstentions.

The draft resolution was supported by France, the United Kingdom and Australia, among others. The representatives of these countries, as well as the representative of Belgium, described the more recent progress made in the field of education in the respective Territories. They objected to an amendment proposed orally by India and accepted by the sponsors, to state that "considerably greater efforts are still required" in the educational field, since they felt that this implied a criticism of the efforts already made by the Administering Authorities. A subsequent proposal made orally by the representative of the USSR to state specifically that past efforts were insufficient, was defeated by 18 votes to 8, with 15 abstentions.

The wording of the original proposal, to the effect that considerable efforts were still required, was re-introduced by the representative of France, and adopted by the Committee by 16 votes to 12, with 13 abstentions.

The draft resolution as a whole was adopted, with a few minor modifications, by 37 votes to none, with 6 abstentions.

At the 316th plenary meeting of the Assembly, on 2 December 1950, it was approved without change as follows (resolution 437(V)):

The General Assembly,

Considering that the promotion of educational advancement of the inhabitants of Trust Territories is essential for their progressive development as early as possible towards self-government or independence,

Recognizing that, while notable progress has already been achieved in the educational development of the Trust Territories, considerable efforts are still required in this field,

Considering that the establishment, in so far as is practicable, of comprehensive and long-range plans to achieve such educational development is desirable,

1. Recommends that the Trusteeship Council continue to devote particular attention, in consultation with the Administering Authorities and the specialized agencies, to long-range programmes of educational development in the Trust Territories, with a view to enabling the inhabitants of those Territories to take over the responsibilities of complete self-government at the earliest possible date;

2. Requests that the Trusteeship Council include in its annual reports to the General Assembly its observations on the various long-range educational programmes undertaken in the Trust Territories, and the progress made in respect thereof.

e. TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE FOR TRUST TERRITORIES

The representatives of Denmark and Syria presented a joint draft resolution (A/C.4/L.80) calling the attention of the Administering Authorities to the facilities available under the United Nations Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance. They considered, as was pointed out by the representative of Denmark during the general discussion of the Trusteeship Council's report, that political progress in the Trust Territories was dependent upon their economic development. They accepted a proposal by the Representative of Saudi Arabia (A/C.4/L.81) to add to their draft a final paragraph, drawing the attention of the Economic and Social Council, the specialized agencies and the Secretary-General to the need to extend technical assistance to the Trust Territories.

The representatives of Saudi Arabia, Iraq, the United Kingdom, Haiti and India spoke in support of the draft resolution.

The representative of Brazil, however, although agreeing that the Trust Territories should receive more technical assistance, was of the opinion that the Administering Authorities held the chief responsibility for providing such assistance. He pointed out that $20,000,000 had been set aside under the Marshall Plan for the development of territories administered by certain European Powers; if they were provided in addition with assistance under the United Nations Programme, they would be receiving almost all of the international assistance available. Then little would remain to meet similar needs, affecting a far greater number of people, in the many under-developed independent countries.

In this view he was supported by the representatives of Belgium, France and Venezuela; the representatives of Belgium and France were agreed that it was questionable whether the Administering Authorities were entitled to draw on the already limited resources of international organizations which could be used for the development of areas unable to appeal to a protecting Power. They stated that Trust Territories were receiving more assistance than any independent country.

The representatives of the United Kingdom, Belgium and France described the technical assistance being provided by the Administering Authorities in the Non-Self-Governing and Trust Territories in Africa. Land utilization, soil erosion, plant and animal diseases, stock-breeding, fisheries, meteorology, water resources and the eradication of the tsetse fly and sleeping sickness were among the problems being dealt with in the Territories. Much of the work was undertaken through research institutions and other organizations, and through pan-African conferences. In an effort to fill the need for trained technicians in the Trust Territories, students from the Territories under British and French administration were being trained in Metropolitan and other institutions.

With reference to the provision of technical assistance under the terms of the draft resolution, the representative of India stated that the funds provided should be used effectively and that the specialized agencies should employ personnel familiar with the conditions in the under-developed areas. He also suggested that a single resolution might be prepared dealing with technical assistance in both Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories.

This last suggestion was opposed by the representative of France, who stated that the two cases were quite different: the premise that the Administering Authorities have responsibility for their economic and social development was even more true for Non-Self-Governing Territories than for Trust Territories.

Referring to the joint draft resolution before the Committee, he suggested the deletion of the second paragraph as inaccurate because it noted that economic under-development in Trust Territories was to a considerable extent due to the lack of adequate technical assistance. To meet this objection, the representative of Argentina proposed a rewording of that paragraph which was accepted by the sponsors. The draft resolution as a whole was then adopted by the Committee by 40 votes to none, with 7 abstentions.

It was also adopted by the Assembly at the 316th plenary meeting on 2 December, by 51 votes to none, with 2 abstentions, as follows (resolution 439(V)):

The General Assembly,

Considering that, in pursuance of the objectives of the Trusteeship System as set forth in the Charter, it is indispensable that Trust Territories be developed in the interests of the indigenous inhabitants,

Noting that the development of the Trust Territories might be improved by additional technical assistance,

Noting that, under the expanded programme of technical assistance for economic development of under-developed countries (resolution 222 (IX) of the Economic and Social Council), the Trust Territories are eligible to receive technical assistance upon the request of the Administering Authorities concerned.

1. Draws the attention of the Administering Authorities to the facilities available under the expanded programme of technical assistance, as well as to the regular programmes of technical assistance of the United Nations and the specialized agencies for economic development, social welfare services and training for public administration;

2. Draws the attention of the Economic and Social Council, the specialized agencies and the Secretary-General to the need to extend to the Trust Territories such technical assistance as they may be in a position to render, in order to establish a sound basis for the progressive development of the inhabitants towards self-government or independence;

3. Recommends that the Administering Authorities, on behalf of the Trust Territories, make full use of these sources of technical assistance and make appropriate applications to the agencies involved;

4. Recommends that the Administering Authorities submit to the Trusteeship Council information on all applications made in implementation of the present resolution, and on the manner in which technical assistance received from the United Nations or the specialized agencies has been integrated into the long-range programmes for the development of the Trust Territories.

E. SPECIAL QUESTIONS AFFECTING TRUST TERRITORIES

1. Administrative Unions Affecting Trust Territories

Several of the Trusteeship Agreements contain provisions authorizing the Administering Authority to administer the Trust Territory as an integral part of its own territory or to form customs, fiscal or administrative unions between the Trust Territory and adjacent territories under its control and to establish common services between these territories. At the time of the approval of these Agreements, the Administering Authorities concerned gave their assurances in each instance that they did not consider these provisions as giving them powers to establish any form of political association between the Trust Territories and adjacent territories which would involve annexation of the Trust Territories in any sense or would have the effect of extinguishing their status as Trust Territories.

On 15 November 1949, in resolution 326(IV), the Assembly asked the Trusteeship Council to complete its investigation of the question of administrative unions begun in response to Assembly resolution 224(III) of 18 November 1948.¹⁴⁶ The Council was asked to pay particular attention to the desirability of: obtaining from the Administering Authorities prior information of their intention to create new administrative unions or extend the scope of existing unions; the Administering Authority concerned accepting such supervision by the Council over any unified administration as the Council might consider necessary; establishing a separate judicial organization and legislature in each Trust Territory and eliminating any type of legislative action originating in any other legislative body with headquarters in a neighbouring territory; taking into account the freely expressed wishes of the inhabitants concerned before any administrative union is formed or extended.

a. ACTION TAKEN IN THE TRUSTEESHIP COUNCIL

At the 79th meeting of its sixth session, on 31 March 1950, the Council decided, by resolution 129(VI), that its Committee on Administrative Unions should continue its study of questions concerning customs, fiscal and administrative unions or federations and common services involving Trust Territories, so that the Council might complete its investigation in accordance with the terms of the two General Assembly resolutions.

Meanwhile, in formulating its conclusions and recommendations in connexion with its examination of annual reports on the Territories concerned, the Council in each case deferred its decision concerning the effects of the administrative arrangements on the Territories until it had received the report of the Committee on Administrative Unions.

The Committee was composed of the following members of the Council: Argentina (appointed to replace Mexico, which was no longer a member of the Council), China, France, New Zealand, the Philippines (appointed to serve during the absence of the USSR) and the United States. The Committee held fifteen meetings, from 5 June to 11 July, during the course of which it studied the various aspects of the administrative unions affecting the Trust Territories of Tanganyika, the Cameroons and Togoland under British administration, Ruanda-Urundi under Belgian administration and New Guinea under Australian administration.¹⁴⁷ At the invitation of the Committee, special representatives of the Administering Authorities concerned attended certain meetings to answer questions relating to the administrative arrangements involving the respective Territories. The Committee did not re-examine the question of the administrative relationship of the Cameroons and Togoland under French administration with the French Union, which it had examined during 1949.

All documents submitted by the Administering Authorities, including the relevant legal instruments,¹⁴⁸ and the provisions of the respective Trusteeship Agreements concerning administrative unions, were considered by the Committee, as well as the various aspects of the question raised during the discussions of the Trusteeship Council, the Fourth Committee and plenary meetings of the General Assembly and the Permanent Mandates Commission of the League of Nations.

The Committee unanimously adopted a draft resolution introduced by Argentina, the Philippines and the United States containing the princial observations and conclusions formulated by the Committee after a thorough study of the problem based on General Assembly resolution 326 (IV). This draft resolution and separate studies with respect to each Trust Territory concerned, were included in its report to the Council (T/L.96).

The Council considered this report at the 28th meeting of its seventh session on 17 July. During the discussions, both in the Committee and in the Council, the representatives of Argentina, China and the Philippines expressed their view that, for the United Nations to carry out its supervisory functions over the administration of the Trust Territories, Visiting Missions must of necessity have free access to the establishments, institutions, common organs and amalgamated services of administrative unions in so far as they related to the administration of Trust Territories.

The draft resolution recommended by the Committee was adopted by the Council, as resolution 293 (VII). By this resolution, the Council transmitted the Committee's report to the General Assembly and called the Assembly's attention to the Committee's principal observations and conclusions with respect to General Assembly resolution 326 (IV) as applied to the administrative unions affecting the Cameroons under British administration, New Guinea, Ruanda-Urundi and Tanganyika.

The following safeguards, considered necessary to assist the Council in discharging its functions and to avoid the possibility of any administrative union operating in such a manner as to prejudice the attainment of the objectives of the Trusteeship System, were included in the resolution and drawn to the attention of the Administering Authorities concerned:

- (a) That the Administering Authorities furnish clear and precise separate financial, statistical and other data relating to Trust Territories participating in administrative unions;
- (b) That the Administering Authority facilitate the access of visiting missions to such information on an administrative union as may be necessary to enable the mission to report fully on the Trust Territory concerned;
- (c) That the Administering Authorities continue to maintain the boundaries, separate status, and identity of Trust Territories participating in administrative unions;
- (d) That the Administering Authorities ensure, with regard to Trust Territories participating in administrative unions, that expenditures on the administration, welfare, and development of any such Trust Territory for a given year be not less than the total amount of public revenue derived from the Territory in that year.

Finally, the Council decided, on the Committee's recommendation, to establish a standing committee to examine regularly the operation of administrative unions and report to the Council at each session on any union involving a Trust Territory under review. On 21 July, the Council named Argentina, the Philippines, New Zealand and the United States as members of the Standing Committee on Administrative Unions.

This Committee met twice during 1950, on 18 and 23 August. At its second meeting, it requested the Administering Authorities concerned to provide it from time to time, when possible before each Council session, with such information as would, in their opinion, aid the Committee in carrying out its work.

b. ACTION TAKEN IN THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY

Although the Fourth Committee of the General Assembly did not take up the question of administrative unions affecting Trust Territories until its 198th meeting on 5 December, several related arguments were advanced during the Committee's general discussion in October of the report of the Trusteeship Council.

Administrative unions were opposed by the representative of Pakistan, who held that they resulted in the absorption of Trust Territories. The representative of Liberia, on the other hand, stated that he did not object to the amalgamation of a Trust Territory with a Non-Self-Governing Territory not under Trusteeship, since he felt that conditions in both types of territories were virtually the same and an administrative union would only strengthen the people's desire for political freedom. Three conditions which needed to be met to guard against any adverse effect upon a Trust Territory were put forward by the representative of Brazil, and supported by the representative of Argentina: the political identity of the Trust Territory must be respected and the seat of government should therefore remain within the Territory; no measures should be taken to retard the Territory's progress towards self-government; and the United Nations should not be hindered in exercising its supervisory functions.

At the Committee's 198th meeting, the representative of Denmark proposed that, since the fifth session of the Assembly was drawing to a close, discussion of the question of administrative unions should be postponed until the next regular Assembly session. He introduced a draft resolution to this effect (A/C.4/L.131), which also noted the interim report of the Council on administrative unions (A/1306, pp. 180-83, 185-215) and the fact that a special standing committee was continuing its work on the subject. The deletion of these references was suggested by the representative of Brazil, supported by the representatives of the Philippines, Cuba and Yugoslavia, who believed that to insert the references would convey the impression that the report had already been discussed and considered by the Fourth Committee. This amendment was accepted by Denmark. The representative of Yugoslavia stated that he had certain objections to the establishment and functions of the Standing Committee, but would support the draft resolution as amended.

Both in the Committee and again in plenary session, the representative of the USSR argued against postponing the discussion of the problem. He contended that by uniting the Trust Territories with adjacent colonies by means of so-called administrative unions, the Administering Authorities concerned were depriving the Trust Territories of their special status and, in fact, annexing them. Such a policy was contrary to the Charter and to the previous decisions of the Assembly on the subject of administrative unions. He referred to the unsuccessful efforts of his delegation during the Assembly's fourth session to secure the adoption of a recommendation to the Administering Authorities to establish in Trust Territories legislative and executive organs which would not be subordinate to any organs established as a result of unification with adjacent colonies, and to that end to take the necessary measures to secure the participation of the indigenous population in the legislative, executive and judicial organs of the Trust Territories. He urged that the Assembly adopt at its current session the decisions necessary to ensure strict compliance by the Administering Authorities with the Charter provisions concerning the Trusteeship System.

By 34 votes to 4, with 5 abstentions, the Fourth Committee adopted the Danish draft resolution as amended, including it in its report to the Assembly on the question of administrative unions (A/1642).

At the 320th plenary meeting on 12 December, the General Assembly also approved the resolution (443 (V)), by which it decided to carry over the item relating to administrative unions affecting Trust Territories for consideration at its next regular session.

2. Use of the United Nations Flag in Trust Territories

By resolution 325 (IV)¹⁴⁹ of 15 November 1949, the General Assembly had asked the Trusteeship Council to recommend to the Administering Authorities that the flag of the United Nations be flown over all Trust Territories, side by side with the flag of the Administering Authority concerned and with the territorial flag, if there were one.

A joint draft resolution to implement this recommendation was submitted by China and the Philippines (T/L.9) and considered by the Council at its 76th and 77th meetings on 30 March 1950.

Opposition to the proposal was voiced by Australia, Belgium, France, New Zealand and the United Kingdom, on the grounds that it was based on a misconception of the respective functions of the United Nations and the Administering Authorities. Ultimate authority in the Territories, they held, rested with the Administering Authorities; and they stated that they would not recognize any obligation on their part to implement the resolution should it be adopted. While they did not mind displaying the United Nations flag on certain special occasions, they felt that to fly it continually side by side with the flag of the Administering Authority might create confusion in the minds of the peoples of the Territories.

The draft resolution was not adopted. In two successive votes, it received a tie vote of 5 to 5, with 1 abstention (Argentina).

At the 30th meeting of the seventh session of the Council, on 21 July 1950, the matter was again considered. The representatives of China, Iraq and the Philippines presented a draft resolution (T/L.112) similar to the one previously rejected by the Council at its sixth session. A United States amendment was also introduced (T/L.113), to ensure to the Administering Authorities the latitude necessary to handle any practical administrative difficulties which might arise from the recommendation to fly the United Nations flag side by side with the flag of the Administering Authorities and the territorial flag, if any.

This resolution, together with the United States amendment, was adopted by the Council by 6 votes to 2, with 3 abstentions (301 (VII)). Following the vote, the representatives of New Zealand and Belgium explained their negative votes. The representative of New Zealand stated that the New Zealand flag and the territorial flag, which would one day be the only flag, were already being flown in Western Samoa, and although his Government wished to display the United Nations flag on occasion, it did not wish to increase the number of flags flying over the Territory. The representative of Belgium stated that his Government would accord due recognition to the official status of the United Nations in Trust Territories, even though it had opposed the resolution.

F. SOMALILAND UNDER ITALIAN ADMINISTRATION

By General Assembly resolution 289(IV) of 21 November 1949, it was provided" that the former Italian colony of Somaliland, temporarily placed under British military administration as a result of the Second World War, was to become an independent sovereign State ten years after the approval of a Trusteeship Agreement by the Assembly. During this ten-year period, the Territory was to be placed under the International Trusteeship System with Italy as the Administering Authority, assisted and advised by an Advisory Council composed of representatives of Colombia, Egypt and the Philippines. The Assembly requested the Trusteeship Council to negotiate with Italy a draft Trusteeship Agreement, after which Italy, by arrangement with the United Kingdom, was to take over the provisional administration of Somaliland provided that it first agree to administer the territory in accordance with the Charter and the draft Trusteeship Agreement, pending approval by the Assembly of the final Agreement.

1. Drafting of Trusteeship Agreement by the Trusteeship Council

The Trusteeship Council, meeting in special session from 8 to 20 December 1949 to consider its responsibilities under this Assembly resolution, appointed a drafting committee to seek assent to a text of a Trusteeship Agreement.

a. WORK OF THE COMMITTEE FOR ITALIAN SOMALILAND

The Committee for Italian Somaliland was composed of representatives of the Dominican Republic, France, Iraq, the Philippines, the United Kingdom and the United States. At its first meeting, held at Lake Success on 13 December 1949, the Committee elected Max Henriquez-Ureña (Dominican Republic) as Chairman and Teodoro Evangelista (Philippines), later replaced by Jose D. Ingles, as Rapporteur. The Committee subsequently met in Geneva, from 9 to 19 January and again on 26 January. Representatives of the following countries took part, without the right to vote, in its deliberations: Italy, the Administering Authority; Ethiopia, which had common boundaries with Somaliland; and Colombia and Egypt, which, with the Philippines, formed the Advisory Council. The International Labour Organisation was also represented at the meetings. Although the Committee had been authorized by the Council to permit representatives of political parties or organizations in Somaliland to express their views in the Committee, it received no requests for such permission.

Drafts of a Trusteeship Agreement and Declaration of Constitutional Principles for the Territory were proposed by Italy (T/429) and the Philippines (T/440 & Corr.1 & Corr.1/Add.1 & 2), and a paper containing basic proposals and suggestions for the Agreement was submitted by the Dominican Republic (T/AG18/L.3). After a detailed examination of these drafts, which contained almost identical provisions, the Committee agreed on the text of a draft Agreement. It also included in this text certain provisions of a suggested annex on education proposed by the Iraqi delegation (T/AC.18/L.6). In drawing up a Declaration of Constitutional Principles, to be annexed to the Trusteeship Agreement, the Committee was guided by a text proposed in 1949 by the delegation of India and annexed to General Assembly resolution 289(IV). Both the draft Agreement and the Declaration were unanimously adopted by the Committee at its 17th meeting on 19 January 1950 and included in its report to the Trusteeship Council (T/449).

b. CONSIDERATION IN THE COUNCIL

The report of the Committee was considered by the Trusteeship Council at the 3rd to 8th meetings of its sixth session, from 23 to 27 January 1950. General approval of the substance of the draft Agreement was expressed by members of the Council. Several representatives stressed, in particular, the advantages of certain features not included in Trusteeship Agreements previously adopted: the draft Agreement provided that the Territory should receive its independence at the end of a fixed period of time and that the Administering Authority should be assisted by an Advisory Council; the annexed draft Declaration, which was an integral part of the draft Agreement, expressly guaranteed the rights and liberties of the population and proclaimed that the sovereignty of the Territory was vested in its people, who must be given a status of citizenship of the Territory.

Certain reservations were, however, expressed both in the Committee and in the Council.

In the view of the Ethiopian Government, there existed no delimited frontiers defining Somaliland and the primary and essential basis for any Trusteeship Agreement for the area was therefore lacking. Moreover, it was maintained, Ethiopia was a "state directly concerned" within the meaning of Article 79 of the Charter¹⁵⁰ and its consent to the terms of any Trusteeship Agreement for the Territory was therefore required. In the absence of these prerequisites, the Ethiopian Government could not recognize the validity of any Agreement prepared or agreed to by the Council (T/430, T/445). The representatives of Italy and the United Kingdom held that, as indicated in article 1 of the draft Agreement, some boundaries had been delimited; both reserved their right to revert again to this matter if necessary.

Declaring that the economic and financial provisions of the Treaty of Peace with Italy did not apply to the former Italian colonies, the representative of France observed that such provisions should be included in the Agreement. On this question, the United Kingdom proposed that Italy should report, when it assumed provisional administration, on the war damage or confiscation of property of nationals of Members of the United Nations. Stating that no such cases existed in Somaliland, the representative of Italy agreed to include in its first annual report to the Council a statement on the position of property belonging to nationals of Members. These proposals had not been resolved in the Committee, and the Council decided to include this Italian undertaking as article 18 of the draft Agreement.

The Council considered and voted on the draft Agreement and the Declaration article by article making drafting changes in a number of articles. Following considerable debate as to whether the provisions of article 14—relating to legislation on land tenure and the alienation of land or other natural resources—applied to improved urban land, the Council, on 26 January, referred this article back to the Committee for clarification. The Committee drafted an additional paragraph indicating that the provisions of article 14 did not apply to building land within the metropolitan area of Mogadiscio (T/1449/Add.1). This was accepted by the Council.

At the 8th meeting of its sixth session on 27 January, the Council unanimously adopted the draft Agreement and the Declaration of Constitutional Principles.¹⁵¹ These it included in a special report (A/1294), which it later adopted, on 14 July 1950 during its seventh session, for transmission to the General Assembly. The draft Agreement had 25 articles. Article 1 defined the geographical boundaries of the Territory; articles 2 to 8 and 12 to 20 set forth the powers and obligations of the Administering Authority; articles 9 to 11 and part of articles 6 and 8 defined the functions of the Advisory Council; articles 21 to 24 dealt with amendments to the Agreement, the interpretation of its provisions, its entry into force and its expiration. The draft Declaration of Constitutional Principles consisted of a preamble and ten articles.

2. The Transfer of Provisional Administration to Italy

Meanwhile, arrangements for the transfer of provisional administration from the United Kingdom to Italy were being negotiated by these two Governments.

On 9 February, the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Italy notified the Council that the Italian Parliament had authorized the Government to undertake the provisional administration of the Territory (T/468). On 22 February, he informed the Secretary-General that, subject to ratification of the Trusteeship Agreement, his Government had undertaken to assume administration of the Territory in accordance with the General Assembly resolution of 21 November 1949 (289 (IV)) and article 23, paragraph 2, of the draft Trusteeship Agreement, on a date to be agreed upon with the United Kingdom (T/488).

The boundaries of the Territory which Italy was to administer had not yet been finally delimited. The Assembly, in resolution 289 (IV), had asked the Interim Committee to study the procedure to be adopted to delimit those boundaries not already fixed by international agreement.¹⁵² For immediate administrative purposes, however, the United Kingdom had agreed on 26 January to furnish the Council with a description of the provisional frontier line up to which Italy would occupy the Territory (T/PV.208). This line was to be determined by agreement between Ethiopia, Italy and the United Kingdom.

In a letter to the Council dated 1 March, the United Kingdom representative defined the proposed frontier line, indicating that this arrangement had of necessity been arrived at unilaterally by his Government and stressing that it was provisional and without prejudice to the final settlement of the question (T/484). The Italian Minister for Foreign Affairs informed the Council, on 15 March, that Italy had no intention of questioning the procedure adopted by the United Kingdom, but wished to point out that the provisional line was fixed without its being consulted. As protector of the rights of Somaliland, it reserved its position with regard not only to the legal aspects of the question, but also to certain practical difficulties, such as the separation of tribes and problems of pasturage and water holes, which might arise along this provisional frontier (T/527).

By letters dated 5 and 25 April, respectively, the Council was informed that Italy and the United Kingdom had agreed on 1 April 1950 as the date upon which British authority in Somaliland would terminate and Italy would assume responsibility for the administration of the Territory (T/704, T/705).

3. Consideration in the General Assembly

The special report of the Trusteeship Council was referred by the Assembly to its Fourth Committee, which considered it from 10 to 16 November at its 174th to 180th meetings. At its 174th meeting, the Fourth Committee invited the representatives of Italy and the Chairman of the United Nations Advisory Council for the Trust Territory of Somaliland to participate without the right to vote in the Committee's deliberations.

a. REPORT OF THE ADVISORY COUNCIL

An outline of the situation in the Territory and of the activities of the Advisory Council from its inception until the end of July was included in a progress report before the Fourth Committee (A/C.4/178), and supplemented by a statement by the Chairman of that Council. The report adduced that Somaliland, which is situated along the Indian Ocean between the Equator and the Gulf of Aden, had a population of about one million, the majority of whom were nomads organized on a tribal basis. The Advisory Council described the climate of the Territory as unhealthy and its economy rudimentary. A large part of the Territory was uncultivated and it had no mineral resources. The main occupations of the population were stock-raising and agriculture, which barely provided a livelihood. Through the efforts of European settlers, particularly the Italians, the production of cane sugar, bananas and cotton for export had been developed during the earlier Italian occupation. But the standard of living was still very low and educational facilities were limited.

The Advisory Council had held its first meeting in Cairo on 27 March 1950, its second in Alexandria on 29 March, and had proceeded to its headquarters in Mogadiscio (Mogadishu), where it witnessed the ceremony of transfer on 1 April. Members of the Council had had many official and unofficial interviews with members of the Italian administration and of the Government in Rome on the problems affecting the Territory. They had visited a large part of the interior of Somaliland, the report stated, to obtain personal impressions of prevailing conditions and had established cordial and friendly relations with the population during the course of these visits. Relations between the Advisory Council and the Administering Authority had been marked by a desire for mutual understanding, the Council indicated. It was convinced that the Administering Authority was resolved to fulfil its task in accordance with the letter and spirit of the draft Trusteeship Agreement. However, the Council stressed the need for the Administering Authority to consult it on all questions specified in the Agreement. Complaining that during the initial period it had not been kept adequately informed, the Council stated that the situation had rapidly improved and had already become entirely satisfactory. During the first six months of the Council's existence, its advice had been sought on two important questions: the composition of the territorial council provided for in the Declaration of Constitutional Principles, and the vernacular language of the Territory. Since it thought the first question particularly delicate and complex, the Council had decided, rather than give the Administering Authority precise instructions, to define the general principles to be followed in establishing the territorial council. It had considered that no more than three fourths of the members of the territorial council should represent the tribes, and that a large place should be given to representatives of political parties because they represented dynamic groups which gave the younger elements of the population an opportunity to share in managing the country's affairs. While the territorial council might usefully call upon officials of the Italian administration as advisers, they should not be members of the council. With regard to the vernacular language of the Territory, the Advisory Council recommended the adoption of Arabic, for technical and, more importantly, for political reasons; it was the language of economic relations, culture and religion in Somaliland.

A considerable improvement in public order, particularly at Mogadiscio, was noted by the Council during its stay in the Territory, and the tension prevailing at the time of the transfer of administration had decreased. This was largely due, the Council stated, to the efforts of the Italian Under-Secretary of State, who had travelled throughout the Territory explaining to the indigenous population, Italian officials and members of the Italian colony the nature of the task entrusted to the Italian Government and had appealed for their co-operation in carrying out this task.

b. COMMUNICATIONS FROM ORGANIZATIONS

In addition to the reports of the Trusteeship Council and the Advisory Council, the Fourth Committee had before it communications from two organizations, both of which claimed to represent the great majority of the Somali people: the Somali Youth League (A/C.4/179 & Add.1, A/C.4/182 & 183), and the Conferenza della Somalia (A/C.4/180). The Committee granted their requests for representation, without the right to vote, during the Committee's discussion of the draft Trusteeship Agreement.

The Somali Youth League complained of the oppressive rule imposed upon Somaliland by the Italian administration, which it alleged had been returned to the Territory against the wishes of the people. It charged that ruthless measures were used to suppress political opposition and complained that persons in high positions under the Fascist regime had been appointed to official posts in the Territory. With respect to the Trusteeship Agreement, the Somali Youth League asked that it provide for: the unification of all of Somaliland, including the portions under British, Ethiopian and French rule; protection against the large-scale immigration into the Territory planned by Italy as an outlet for its surplus and jobless population; better protection than that provided in article 14 of the draft Agreement against the alienation of land and other natural resources; and the use of Somali as the language of instruction.

The Conferenza della Somalia, on the other hand, testified that the people of Somaliland were satisfied with the draft Agreement, with the only exception that it did not provide for the return to Somaliland of the territory ceded by the United Kingdom administration to Ethiopia. It considered that the dominant theme of the Italian administration's policy was "Somaliland for the Somalis" and gave an account of the benefits which the people had already derived from this administration since the transfer of power.

C. DISCUSSIONS IN THE FOURTH COMMITTEE

In the course of the discussions in the Fourth Committee, several points of view emerged with respect to the draft Agreement.

The representative of Ethiopia restated the position of his Government, again maintaining that, as a State directly concerned, its approval of the terms of the Agreement was required under Article 79 of the Charter. He submitted a draft resolution proposing that the Assembly refuse to consider the Agreement since it had not been prepared in accordance with the terms of the Charter (A/C.4/L.102). Following the defeat of this draft resolution in the Committee, by a roll-call vote of 34 to 6, with 7 abstentions, he proposed a second resolution requesting the International Court of Justice for an interpretation of Article 79 of the Charter (A/C.4/L.105). At the request of the Chairman of the Fourth Committee, this draft resolution was later withdrawn by the representative of Ethiopia, who reserved the right to bring the matter up again in plenary session.

Strong opposition to both the naming of Italy as Administering Authority and to the draft Agreement was expressed by the representatives of the Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, Poland, Ukrainian SSR and the USSR. These members held that the Territory would deteriorate under Italian administration. They objected to General Assembly resolution 289 (IV), which, instead of ensuring the early independence of the Territory and its interim administration in the interests of the Somalis by placing it under direct administration by the United Nations, had named Italy the Administering Authority so that the Territory could be used as a base for strategic military preparations by the United Kingdom and the United States. An examination of the draft Agreement and the Declaration of Constitutional Principles, they stated, revealed that neither document assured participation of the Somalis in political, economic, social and educational administration. Nor did these documents contain provisions which would enable the United Nations effectively to supervise developments in the Territory or provide sufficient guarantees of its independence at the end of ten years. On the contrary, it was charged, they permitted the exploitation of the Territory's resources by Italy.

All other members of the Committee supported the draft Agreement, with the exception of Liberia, which indicated that it did not approve of all its provisions, particularly those concerning the sale of land and European immigration.

Few representatives, however, were completely satisfied with all the provisions of the draft Agreement. But a delay in its adoption, it was pointed out, would result in a consequent delay in the independence of Somaliland. Since much depended on the implementation of the Agreement, the Administering Authority was asked to state its intentions in this respect, particularly as regards its relations with the Advisory Council, the method of forming the territorial council, immigration, and other specific questions.

The representative of Italy assured members that his Government was fully conscious of its responsibilities. It was determined to prepare Somaliland for independence in a spirit of justice, peace, liberty and progress and to interpret the provisions of the Agreement in accordance with the principles, spirit and letter of the Charter. It would adopt the same attitude towards any relevant resolutions of the Assembly. To symbolize that attitude, United Nations Day had been declared a holiday in Somaliland and the United Nations flag was flying in the Territory alongside the Italian flag. During its six months of provisional administration, Italy had encouraged the indigenous inhabitants to share in the public life of their country. It had set up District Councils throughout the Territory and had consulted the people by referenda concerning the language to be used in teaching and the organization of the territorial council. Nearly 4,000 Somalis were employed in civil administration.

Continuing, the representative of Italy indicated that the improved situation in Somaliland had made possible reductions in the troops which Italy, under agreements with the United Kingdom, had had to send to the Territory to ensure order at the time of the transfer of administration. The first contingents had already been sent home and others would follow until, by 30 June 1951, only such troops as were necessary for the organization of the Somali defence forces would remain. The police would be composed exclusively of indigenous inhabitants and the army would soon have four indigenous battalions. In order to promote general understanding and reconciliation, Italy had at the end of July declared an amnesty. With reference to charges of political persecution, the representative of Italy stated that not a single Somali was now in prison for a political offence.

The creation of ample reserves to guarantee the national currency, the increase in the number of classes in schools, the establishment of special courses for adults, a craft school, a teachers' training school and a school of administration, and the substantial increase in allocations for teaching and for medical and hospital treatment were described as further evidence of Italy's policy in Somaliland. Italy had already sought the assistance of the International Labour Organisation and UNESCO in studying social problems in the Territory and had contacted the United Nations Technical Assistance Administration for aid in economic development. Further, it planned to facilitate the recruitment of technicians and the investment of capital to promote the economic development of the Territory. But it did not intend to encourage immigration into the Territory, which, principally for climatic reasons, was in any case unsuitable for Europeans.

Members of the Fourth Committee supporting the draft Agreement expressed great confidence in its implementation by Italy. The representatives of Argentina, Colombia, Denmark, Iraq, Norway, Pakistan, the Philippines and the United States submitted a joint draft resolution (A/C.4/L.104) recommending that the Assembly approve the draft Agreement and calling its attention to the declarations made by the representative of the Administering Authority. Subsequently, the representative of India joined the sponsors of the proposal after it was revised to call the Assembly's attention in particular to the Administering Authority's undertaking "to prepare Somaliland for independence in a spirit of justice, peace, liberty and progress, and to implement the terms of the Agreement in the spirit and the letter of the provisions of the Charter of the United Nations" (A/C.4/L. 104/Rev.1).

The Fourth Committee adopted this proposal at its 180th meeting on 16 November by a roll-call vote of 44 to 5, with 1 abstention, and included it in its report to the Assembly, which it approved by 39 votes to 5 at its 186th meeting on 24 November (A/1550).

d. TRUSTEESHIP AGREEMENT APPROVED BY THE ASSEMBLY

The General Assembly considered this report at its 316th plenary meeting on 2 December 1950. It also had before it a report of the Fifth Committee indicating that the adoption of the Fourth Committee's proposal would require a budgetary provision of $175,000 during 1951 to cover the expenses of the Advisory Council (A/1573). Proceeding immediately to a vote, the Assembly, by 44 votes to 6, adopted a resolution (442 (V)) approving the Trusteeship Agreement and the annexed Declaration of Constitutional Principles as contained in the special report of the Trusteeship Council (A/1294).

The text read:

TRUSTEESHIP AGREEMENT FOR THE TERRITORY OF SOMALILAND UNDER ITALIAN ADMINISTRATION

Preamble

Whereas Chapters XII and XIII of the Charter of the United Nations provide for an International Trusteeship System,

Whereas, by article 23 of the Treaty of Peace between the Allied and Associated Powers and Italy, signed in Paris on 10 February 1947, Italy renounced all right and title to the Italian territorial possessions in Africa,

Whereas, under paragraph 3 of Annex XI of this Treaty, the General Assembly of the United Nations was requested to make recommendations regarding the future status of the territories referred to in article 23 thereof,

Whereas, under paragraph 3 of Annex XI of this Treaty, the Governments of France, of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, and of the United States of America agreed to accept the recommendation made by the General Assembly of the United Nations in this matter,

Whereas the General Assembly, after having examined the question at its third and fourth sessions, adopted, at its 250th plenary meeting on 21 November 1949, a resolution recommending, with respect to the territory formerly known as Italian Somaliland, that the Territory shall be an independent and sovereign State; that its independence shall become effective at the end of ten years from the date of approval of the Trusteeship Agreement by the General Assembly and that, during this period of ten years, the Territory shall be placed under the International Trusteeship System with Italy as the Administering Authority, aided and advised by an Advisory Council composed of representatives of Colombia, Egypt and the Philippines,

Whereas the Trusteeship Council, as requested by the General Assembly, has negotiated the draft of a Trusteeship Agreement with Italy and approved it at the eighth meeting of its sixth session on 27 January 1950,

Whereas the Government of Italy has accepted responsibility as the Administering Authority of this Territory,

Whereas the Governments of Colombia, Egypt and the Philippines have accepted the responsibility of aiding and advising the Administering Authority in their capacity as members of the Advisory Council,

Now, therefore, the General Assembly of the United Nations approves the following terms of trusteeship for the territory formerly known as Italian Somaliland:

Article 1

The territory to which this Agreement applies is the territory formerly known as Italian Somaliland, hereinafter called the Territory, bounded by the Somaliland Protectorate, Ethiopia, Kenya, the Gulf of Aden and the Indian Ocean. Its boundaries shall be those fixed by international agreement and, in so far as they are not already delimited, shall be delimited in accordance with a procedure approved by the General Assembly.

Article 2

Italy shall be entrusted with the administration of the Territory, and the Government of Italy (designated in this Agreement as the Administering Authority) shall be represented therein by an Administrator. The Administering Authority shall be responsible to the United Nations for the peace, order and good government of the Territory in accordance with the terms of this Agreement.

The Administering Authority shall be aided and advised by an Advisory Council composed of representatives, of Colombia, Egypt and the Philippines.

The headquarters of the Administrator and of the Advisory Council shall be in Mogadishu.

Article 3

The Administering Authority undertakes to administer the Territory in accordance with the provisions of the Charter of the United Nations relating to the International Trusteeship System as set out in Chapters XII and XIII thereof, the relevant parts of the resolution 289 (IV) of 21 November 1949 of the General Assembly, and this Agreement (which includes an annex containing a Declaration of Constitutional Principles), with a view to making the independence of the Territory effective at the end of ten years from the date of the approval of this Agreement by the General Assembly.

The Administering Authority shall:

1. Foster the development of free political institutions and promote the development of the inhabitants of the Territory towards independence; and to this end shall give to the inhabitants of the Territory a progressively increasing participation in the various organs of Government;

2. Promote the economic advancement and self-sufficiency of the inhabitants, and to this end shall regulate the use of natural resources; encourage the development of fisheries, agriculture, trade and industries; protect the inhabitants against the loss of their lands and resources; and improve the means of transportation and communication;

3. Promote the social advancement of the inhabitants, and to this end shall protect the rights and fundamental freedoms of all elements of the population without discrimination; protect and improve the health of the inhabitants by the development of adequate health and hospital services for all sections of the population; control the traffic in arms and ammunition, opium and other dangerous drugs, alcohol and other spirituous liquors; prohibit all forms of slavery, slave trade and child marriage; apply existing international conventions concerning prostitution; prohibit all forms of forced or compulsory labour, except for essential public works and services, and then only in time of public emergency with adequate remuneration and adequate protection of the welfare of the workers; and institute such other regulations as may be necessary to protect the inhabitants against any social abuses.

Article 4

The Administering Authority, recognizing the fact that education in its broadest sense is the only sure foundation on which any moral, social, political and economic advancement of the inhabitants of the Territory can be based, and believing that national independence with due respect for freedom and democracy can be established only on this basis, undertakes to establish a sound and effective system of education, with due regard for Islamic culture and religion.

The Administering Authority therefore undertakes to promote the educational advancement of the inhabitants, and to this end undertakes to establish as rapidly as possible a system of public education which shall include elementary, secondary, vocational (including institutions for the training of teachers) and technical schools, to provide free of charge at least elementary education, and to facilitate higher and professional education and cultural advancement in every possible way.

In particular, the Administering Authority shall take all appropriate steps:

- (a) To provide that an adequate number of qualified students from among the indigenous population receive university or professional education outside the Territory, so as to ensure that sufficient qualified personnel will be available when the Territory becomes a sovereign independent State;
- (b) To combat illiteracy by all possible means; and
- (c) To ensure that instruction is given in schools and other educational institutions regarding the activities of the United Nations and its organs, the basic objectives of the International Trusteeship System and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

Article 5

The Administering Authority shall collaborate fully with the General Assembly of the United Nations and with the Trusteeship Council in the discharge of all their functions as defined in Articles 87 and 88 of the Charter of the United Nations.

Accordingly, the Administering Authority undertakes:

1. To make to the General Assembly of the United Nations an annual report on the basis of the questionnaire drawn up by the Trusteeship Council in accordance with Article 88 of the Charter of the United Nations, and to include in this report information relating to the measures taken to give effect to the suggestions and recommendations of the General Assembly and of the Trusteeship Council;
2. To designate an accredited representative to be present at the sessions of the Trusteeship Council at which the reports of the Administering Authority and petitions relating to conditions in the Territory are considered;

3. To facilitate periodic visits to the Territory as provided for in Article 87 of the Charter of the United Nations at times and in accordance with arrangements to be agreed upon with the Administering Authority;

4. To render assistance to the General Assembly or the Trusteeship Council in the application of these arrangements and of such other arrangements as those organs of the United Nations may make in accordance with the terms of this Agreement.

Article 6

The Administering Authority may maintain police forces and raise volunteer contingents for the maintenance of peace and good order in the Territory.

The Administering Authority, after consultation with the Advisory Council, may establish installations and take all measures in the Territory, including the progressive development of Somali defence forces, which may be necessary, within the limits laid down in the Charter of the United Nations, for the defence of the Territory and for the maintenance of international peace and security.

Article 7

The Administering Authority shall have full powers of legislation, administration and jurisdiction in the Territory, subject to the provisions of the Charter of the United Nations, of this Agreement and of the annex attached hereto, and shall have power to apply to the Territory, temporarily and with such modifications as are considered necessary, such Italian laws as are appropriate to the conditions and needs of the Territory and as are not incompatible with the attainment of its independence.

Article 8

The Advisory Council shall be fully informed by the Administering Authority on all matters relating to the political, economic, social and educational advancement of the inhabitants of the Territory, including legislation appertaining thereto, and may make to the Administering Authority such observations and recommendations as it may consider will be conducive to the attainment of the objectives of this Agreement.

The Administering Authority shall seek the advice of the Advisory Council on all measures envisaged for the inauguration, development and subsequent establishment of full self-government for the Territory; in particular, it shall consult the Advisory Council regarding plans for:

- (a) The establishment and development of organs of self-government;
- (b) Economic and financial development;
- (c) Educational advancement;
- (d) Labour and social advancement; and
- (e) The transfer of the functions of government to a duly constituted independent government of the Territory.

The Administering Authority shall seek the advice of the Advisory Council on ordinances which, in accordance with article 5 of the annex to this Agreement, the Administrator of the Territory may make and promulgate in exceptional circumstances.

Article 9

The Advisory Council shall be accorded such facilities and shall have free access to such sources of information as it may require for the performance of its functions.

Article 10

In the Territory, members of the Advisory Council shall enjoy full diplomatic privileges and immunities, and their staff shall enjoy the privileges and immunities which they would enjoy if the Convention on the Privileges and Immunities of the United Nations were applicable to the Territory.

Article 11

States members of the Advisory Council, if they are not members of the Trusteeship Council, shall be entitled to participate without vote in the debates of the Trusteeship Council on any question specifically relating to the Territory.

In the course of such debates, members of the Advisory Council or the majority of the members, acting in the name of the Advisory Council, or each of the members acting separately, may make to the Trusteeship Council such oral statements or may submit such written reports or memoranda as they may deem necessary for the Council's proper consideration of any question specifically relating to the Territory.

Article 12

The Administering Authority undertakes to maintain the application of the international agreements and conventions which are at present in force in the Territory, and to apply therein any conventions and recommendations made by the United Nations or by the specialized agencies referred to in Article 57 of the Charter of the United Nations, the application of which would be in the interests of the population and consistent with the basic objectives of the Trusteeship System, the provisions of resolution 289 (IV) of 21 November 1949 of the General Assembly, and the terms of this Agreement.

Article 13

The Administering Authority shall take all the necessary steps to enable the Territory to co-operate with the specialized agencies referred to in Article 57 of the Charter of the United Nations and with other international agencies and regional organizations, and to participate in their activities.

Article 14

In order to promote the economic and social advancement of the indigenous population, the Administering Authority shall, in framing laws relating to the holding or alienation of land or other natural resources, take into consideration the laws and customs of the indigenous population and respect their rights and safeguard their interests, both present and future.

The Administering Authority shall not, without the consent in each case of a two-thirds majority of the members of the Territorial Council (provided for in article 4 of the annex to this Agreement), permit the acquisition by non-indigenous persons or by companies or associations controlled by such persons of any rights over land in the Territory save on lease for a period to be determined by law. In cases involving the alienation to non-indigenous persons or to companies or associations controlled by such persons of areas of agricultural lands in excess of one thousand acres, the Administering Authority shall also request in advance the advice of the Advisory Council. The Administering Authority shall include in its annual report to the Trusteeship Council a detailed account of such alienations.

• The Administering Authority shall prohibit the acquisition by non-indigenous persons or by companies or associations controlled by such persons of any rights over any other natural resources in the Territory, save on lease or grant of concession for a period to be determined by law.

Nothing in this article shall apply to building land within the municipal area of Mogadishu which may be disposed of in accordance with regulations prescribed by law.

Article 15

Subject to the provisions of articles 14, 16 and 17 of this Agreement, the Administering Authority shall take all necessary steps to ensure equal treatment in social, economic, industrial and commercial matters for all States Members of the United Nations and their nationals and for its own nationals, and to this end:

(a) Shall grant to all nationals of Members of the United Nations and to its own nationals freedom of transit and navigation, including freedom of transit and navigation by air, and the protection of person and property, subject to the requirements of public order and on condition of compliance with the local law;

(b) Shall ensure the same rights to all nationals of Members of the United Nations as to its own nationals in respect of entry into and residence in the Territory, acquisition of property, both movable and immovable, and the exercise of professions and trades;

(c) Shall not discriminate on grounds of nationality against nationals of any Member of the United Nations or its own nationals in matters relating to the grant of concessions for the development of the natural resources of the Territory and shall not grant concessions having the character of a general monopoly; and

(d) Shall ensure equal treatment in the administration of justice to the nationals of all Members of the United Nations and to its own nationals.

The rights conferred by this article on nationals of Members of the United Nations or on the Administering Authority's own nationals apply equally to companies and associations controlled by such nationals and organized in accordance with the law of any Member of the United Nations or with the law of the Administering Authority.

Article 16

Measures taken to give effect to article 15 of this Agreement shall be subject always to the overriding duty of the Administering Authority, in accordance with Article 76 of the Charter of the United Nations, to promote the political, economic, social and educational advancement of the inhabitants of the Territory, to carry out the other basic objectives of the International Trusteeship System and the provisions of resolution 289 (IV) of the General Assembly of 21 November 1949, and to maintain peace, order and good government. In particular, the Administering Authority, shall be free:

(a) To organize essential public services and works on such terms and conditions as it thinks just;

(b) To create monopolies of a purely fiscal character in order to provide the Territory with the fiscal resources which seem best suited to local requirements, or otherwise to serve the interests of the inhabitants;

(c) Where the interests of the economic advancement of the inhabitants may require it, to establish, or permit to be established, for specific purposes, other monopolies or undertakings having in them an element of monopoly, under conditions of proper public control; provided that, in the selection of agencies to carry out the purposes of this paragraph, other than agencies controlled by the Government of the Territory or those in which that Government participates, the Administering Authority shall not discriminate on grounds of nationality against Members of the United Nations or their nationals.

Article 17

Nothing in this Agreement shall entitle any Member of the United Nations to claim for itself or for its nationals, companies and associations the benefits of article 15 of this Agreement in any respect in which it does not give to the inhabitants, companies and associations of the Territory equality of treatment with the nationals, companies and associations of the State which it treats most favourably.

Article 18

The Administering Authority shall include in its first annual report to the Trusteeship Council a report on the position in the Territory of property belonging to nationals, associations and companies of Members of the United Nations.

Article 19

The Administering Authority shall, in a spirit of religious tolerance, ensure in the Territory complete freedom of conscience and religion and shall guarantee freedom of religious teaching and the free exercise of all forms of worship.

Missionaries of any faith shall be free to enter, travel and reside in the Territory; to acquire and possess property therein, subject to the conditions laid down in article 14 of this Agreement; to erect religious buildings and hospitals therein; and to open schools subject to such regulations as may be prescribed by law for the educational advancement of the inhabitants of the Territory.

The provisions of this article shall be subject only to such limitations as may be necessary for the maintenance of public order and morality.

Article 20

The Administering Authority shall guarantee to the inhabitants of the Territory complete freedom of speech, of the Press, of assembly and of petition, without distinction as to race, sex, language, political opinion or religion, subject only to the requirements of public order.

Article 21

Nothing in this Agreement shall affect the right of the Administering Authority or the Trusteeship Council to propose, at any future date, the alteration or amendment of this Agreement in the interests of the Territory or for reasons not inconsistent with the basic objectives of the International Trusteeship System.

The provisions of this Agreement shall not be altered or amended except as provided in Articles 79 and 85 of the Charter of the United Nations.

Article 22

If any dispute whatever should arise between the Administering Authority and a State Member of the United Nations relating to the interpretation or the application of the provisions of this Agreement, such dispute, if it cannot be settled by direct negotiation or other means, shall be submitted to the International Court of Justice.

Article 23

The present Agreement, of which the Declaration of Constitutional Principles attached hereto as an annex is an integral part, shall enter into force as soon as it is approved by the General Assembly of the United Nations and ratified by Italy.

Nevertheless, after the Trusteeship Council and Italy have agreed upon the terms of trusteeship and pending approval of this Agreement by the General Assembly, the Administering Authority shall provisionally administer the Territory in accordance with the provisions of the Charter of the United Nations and of this Agreement and shall assume this provisional administration, at a time and pursuant to arrangements for the orderly transfer of administration agreed upon between Italy and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland.

Article 24

The present Agreement shall cease to be in force ten years after the date of the approval of the Trusteeship Agreement by the General Assembly, at the conclusion of which the Territory shall become an independent sovereign State.

Article 25

The Administering Authority shall submit to the Trusteeship Council, at least eighteen months before the expiration of the present Agreement, a plan for the orderly transfer of all the functions of government to a duly constituted independent Government of the Territory.

ANNEX

DECLARATION OF CONSTITUTIONAL PRINCIPLES

Preamble

In view of the recommendation made by the General Assembly of the United Nations at its fourth regular session with respect to placing the territory formerly-known as Italian Somaliland under the International Trusteeship System with Italy as the Administering Authority,

Considering the provisions of the Charter of the United Nations which establish an International Trusteeship System, the terms of this Trusteeship Agreement, of which this Declaration is an integral part, and in accordance with the provision of resolution 289 (IV) of the General Assembly,

For the purpose of solemnly guaranteeing the rights of the inhabitants of the Territory and of providing, in accordance with democratic principles, for the gradual development of institutions designed to ensure the establishment of full self-government and independence, and the attainment of the basic objectives of the International Trusteeship System in conformity with the Charter of the United Nations,

It is hereby declared:

Article 1

The sovereignty of the Territory is vested in its people and shall be exercised by the Administering Authority on their behalf and in the manner prescribed herein by decision of the United Nations.

Article 2

The Administering Authority shall take the necessary steps to provide for the population of the Territory a status of citizenship of the Territory and to ensure their diplomatic and consular protection when outside the limits of the Territory and of the territory of the Administering Authority.

Article 3

The Administrator shall be the chief executive officer of the Territory.

Article 4

The Administrator shall appoint a Territorial Council, composed of inhabitants of the Territory and representative of its people.

In all matters other than defence and foreign affairs, the Administrator shall consult the Territorial Council.

The legislative authority shall normally be exercised by the Administrator, after consultation with the Territorial Council, until such time as an elective legislature has been established.

Article 5

In exceptional circumstances the Administrator may, after consultation with the Advisory Council, make and promulgate such ordinances as in his opinion the circumstances demand.

These ordinances shall be laid before the Territorial Council as soon as may be practicable and the Administering Authority shall include an account of all such ordinances in its annual report to the Trusteeship Council.

Article 6

In matters relating to defence and foreign affairs as in other matters, the Administering Authority shall be accountable to the Trusteeship Council, and shall take into account any recommendations which the Council may see fit to make.

Article 7

The Administering Authority shall establish a judicial system and shall ensure the absolute independence of the judiciary. The Administering Authority shall also ensure that representatives of the indigenous population be progressively entrusted with judicial functions and that the jurisdiction of courts of first instance be progressively increased.

As may be appropriate in each case, the Administering Authority shall apply territorial legislation, Islamic law and customary law.

Article 8

The Administering Authority, in accordance with the principles laid down in its own Constitution and legislation, shall guarantee to all inhabitants of the Territory human rights and fundamental freedoms and full equality before, the law without distinction as to race, sex, language, political opinion or religion.

Article 9

The Administering Authority shall guarantee to all the inhabitants of the Territory full civic rights, and also such political rights as are consistent with the progressive political, social, economic and educational development of the inhabitants and with the development of a democratic representative system, due regard being paid to traditional institutions.

In particular, it shall guarantee:

1. The preservation of their personal and successional status with due regard to its evolutionary development;

2. The inviolability of personal liberty, which may not be restricted except by warrant of judicial authority and only in cases and in accordance with regulations prescribed by law;

3. The inviolability of domicile, to which the competent authority may have access only by due legal process and in a manner prescribed in accordance with local customs and subject to the guarantees for the protection of personal liberty;

4. The inviolability of freedom and secrecy of communication and correspondence, which may be limited only by means of a warrant of judicial authority stating the reasons and subject to the guarantees prescribed by law;

5. The rights of property, subject to expropriation carried out for a public purpose, after payment of fair compensation, and in accordance with regulations prescribed by law;

6. The free exercise of professions and occupations in accordance with local customs and with regulations prescribed by law;

7. The right to compete for public employment in accordance with regulations prescribed by law; and

8. The right to emigrate and to travel, subject to such regulations as may be prescribed by law for health and security reasons.

Article 10

The Administering Authority accepts as a standard of achievement for the Territory the Universal Declaration of Human Rights adopted by the General Assembly of the United Nations on 10 December 1948.

G. QUESTION OF SOUTH WEST AFRICA

At its first session, the General Assembly of the United Nations invited all States administering territories then held under Mandate to undertake the steps necessary for the implementation of Article 79 of the Charter, which provides for the conclusion of agreements placing such territories under the United Nations International Trusteeship System. In the interval between the first and second parts of the Assembly's first session, the Union of South Africa requested the General Assembly to approve the incorporation of the Mandated Territory of South West Africa into the Union of South Africa. In resolution 65(I)¹⁵³ of 14 December 1946, the General Assembly expressed its inability to accede to this proposal. It recommended instead that South West Africa be placed under the International Trusteeship System, and invited the South African Government to propose for its consideration a Trusteeship Agreement for the territory.

In 1947 and again in 1948 (resolutions 141 (II)¹⁵⁴ and 227 (III)),¹⁵⁵ the General Assembly reaffirmed its recommendation that South West Africa be placed under the Trusteeship System and that a Trusteeship Agreement be submitted.

In resolution 111 (V) adopted on 21 July 1949 the Trusteeship Council called the General Assembly's attention to the fact that the Government of the Union of South Africa had, according to its letter of 11 July 1949, given effect to its intention to bring about a form of closer association between South West Africa and the Union and that it had decided not to transmit any further reports on the territory to the Council.

1. Advisory Opinion of the Court

a. REQUEST FOR AN OPINION

On 6 December 1949, the General Assembly bly after considering the matter in resolution 338 (IV)¹⁵⁶ requested the International Court of Justice to give an advisory opinion, if possible, before the Assembly's Fifth Session on the following questions:

What is the international status of the Territory of South West Africa and what are the international obligations of the Union of South Africa arising therefrom, in particular:

(a) Does the Union of South Africa continue to have international obligations under the Mandate for South West Africa and, if so, what are those obligations?

(b) Are the provisions of Chapter XII of the Charter applicable and, if so, in what manner, to the Territory of South West Africa?

(c) Has the Union of South Africa the competence to modify the international status of the Territory of South West Africa, or, in the event of a negative reply, where does competence rest to determine and modify the international status of the Territory?

This resolution was transmitted to the Registry of the Court on 19 December 1949.

b. PROCEEDINGS BEFORE THE COURT

On 30 December 1949 the Registrar of the Court gave notice of the request to all States entitled to appear before the Court. He also informed all Members of the United Nations that the Court was prepared to receive from them written statements on the question. By an order of the same date the President, the Court not being in session, designated 20 March 1950 as the date of expiry of the time-limit for the submission of written statements.

Written statements were received within the prescribed time-limit from Egypt, India, Poland, the Union of South Africa and the United States.¹⁵⁷

By telegrams dated 15 March and 29 April, the Government of the Philippines announced its intention to present an oral statement. The Government of the Union of South Africa announced the same intention by letter of 28 March.

At public sittings held from 16 to 23 May 1950, the Court heard oral statements submitted on behalf of: (1) the Secretary-General of the United Nations by Dr. Ivan Kerno, Assistant Secretary-General in charge of the Legal Department; (2) the Government of the Philippines by Judge Jose D. Ingles, member of the Philippine Permanent Delegation to the United Nations; and (3) the Government of the Union of South Africa by Dr. Lucas Steyn, Senior Legal Adviser of the Ministry of Justice of the South-African Government.

c. THE COURT'S OPINION

(1) Statement of the Facts of the Case

The Court, on 11 July 1950, gave its advisory opinion¹⁵⁸ on the questions before it.

The Court recalled that after the First World War, in virtue of Article 119 of the Treaty of Versailles, Germany renounced all her rights over all her overseas possessions, including the territory of South West Africa. Two principles were then considered of paramount importance: the principle of non-annexation and the principle that the well-being and development of such peoples form "a sacred trust of civilization". In virtue of these principles, South West Africa was then placed under a mandate conferred upon His Britannic Majesty, to be exercised on his behalf by the Government of the Union of South Africa. His Majesty, speaking for the Union Government, undertook to exercise it on behalf of the League of Nations. On 17 December 1920, the Council of the League of Nations confirmed the Mandate and defined its terms. In accordance with these terms, the Union of South Africa (the "Mandatory") was to have full power of administration

¹⁵⁵ Ibid., 1948-49, pp. 866-67.

¹⁵⁷ The International League for the Rights of Man was given permission by the Court to present a written statement but did not file a statement within the prescribed time-limit, i.e. by 10 Apr. 1950.

¹⁵⁸ International Court of Justice, Reports of Judgments, Advisory Opinions and Orders. International Status of South West Africa. Advisory Opinion of July 11th, 1950.

and legislation over the Territory as an integral portion of the Union and could apply the laws of the Union to the Territory subject to such local modifications as circumstances might require. On the other hand, the Mandatory had to observe a number of obligations, and the Council of the League supervised the administration and saw that these obligations were fulfilled. The terms of this Mandate, the Court explained, did not involve any cession of territory or transfer of sovereignty to the Union of South Africa. The Union Government was to exercise an international function of administration on behalf of the League.

The Union, in statements submitted on its behalf, contended that the Mandate had lapsed because the League had ceased to exist. This contention, the Court held, was based on a misconception of the legal situation created by Article 22 of the Covenant¹⁵⁹ and by the Mandate itself.

Stating that the Mandate had only the name in common with the several conceptions of mandate in national law, the Court pointed out that no conclusion by analogy could therefore be drawn from such conceptions. The functions of the Union had an essentially international character, and were subject to the supervision of the Council of the League. The authority exercised by the Union Government over the Territory was based on the Mandate, and if the Mandate had lapsed, the Union Government's authority would equally have lapsed. To retain the rights derived from the Mandate and to repudiate the obligations thereunder could not be justified.

(2) International Status of South West Africa

With respect to the general question put to it, the Court, in its opinion, unanimously stated that South Africa was still to be considered a territory held under the Mandate of 17 December 1920. The degree of supervision by the General Assembly, the Court held, should therefore not exceed that which applied before and should conform as far as possible to the procedure followed by the Council of the League. These obligations applied especially to annual reports and petitions.

According to Article 7 of the Mandate, disputes between the Mandatory and another Member of the League of Nations relating to the interpretation or the application of the provisions of the Mandate, if not settled by negotiation, should be submitted to the Permanent Court of International Justice. By virtue of Article 37 of the Statute of the International Court of Justice¹⁶⁰ and of Article 80, paragraph 1, of the Charter,¹⁶¹ the Court held ¹⁵⁹ Which reads as follows:

"1. To those colonies and territories which as a consequence of the late war have ceased to be under the sovereignty of the States which formerly governed them and which are inhabited by peoples not yet able to stand by themselves under the strenuous conditions of the modern world, there should be applied the principle that the well-being and development of such peoples form a sacred trust of civilisation and that securities for the performance of this trust should be embodied in this Covenant.

"2. The best method of giving practical effect to this principle is that the tutelage of such peoples should be entrusted to advanced nations who, by reasons of their resources, their experience or their geographical position, can best undertake this responsibility, and who are willing to accept it, and that this tutelage should be exercised by them as Mandatories on behalf of the League.

"3. The character of the mandate must differ according to the stage of the development of the people, the geographical situation of the territory, its economic conditions and other similar circumstances.

"4. Certain communities formerly belonging to the Turkish Empire have reached a stage of development where their existence as independent nations can be provisionally recognized subject to the rendering of administrative advice and assistance by a Mandatory until such time as they are able to stand alone. The wishes of these communities must be a principal consideration in the selection of the Mandatory.

"5. Other peoples, especially those of Central Africa, are at such a stage that the Mandatory must be responsible for the administration of the territory under conditions which will guarantee freedom of conscience and religion, subject only to the maintenance of public order and morals, the prohibition of abuses such as the slave trade, the arms traffic and the liquor traffic, and the prevention of the establishment of fortifications or military and naval bases and of military training of the natives for other than police purposes and the defence of territory, and will also secure equal opportunities for the trade and commerce of other Members of the League.

"6. There are territories, such as South West Africa and certain of the South Pacific Islands, which, owing to the sparseness of their population, or their small size, or their remoteness from the centres of civilisation, or their geographical contiguity to the territory of the Mandatory, and other circumstances, can be best administered under the laws of the Mandatory as integral portions of its territory, subject to the safeguards above mentioned in the interests of the indigenous population.

"7. In every case of mandate, the Mandatory shall render to the Council an annual report in reference to the territory committed to its charge.

"8. The degree of authority, control or administration to be exercised by the Mandatory shall, if not previously agreed upon by the Members of the League, be explicitly defined in each case by the Council.

"9. A permanent Commission shall be constituted to receive and examine the annual reports of the Mandatories and to advise the Council on all matters relating to the observance of the mandates."

¹⁶⁰ This Article states that whenever a treaty or convention in force provides for reference of a matter to the Permanent Court of International Justice, the matter is to be referred to the International Court of Justice.

¹⁶¹ This Article states, inter alia, that until Trusteeship Agreements have been concluded, nothing in Ch. XII of the Charter is to be construed in or of itself to alter the rights of any States or any peoples or the terms of existing international instruments to which Members of the United Nations may be parties that this clause in the Mandate was still in force and that, therefore, the Union of South Africa was under an obligation to accept the compulsory jurisdiction of the Court.

(a) INTERNATIONAL OBLIGATIONS OF THE UNION OF SOUTH AFRICA

With respect to question (a), the Court stated that the international obligations assumed by the Union of South Africa under Article 22 of the Covenant of the League of Nations were of two kinds. One was directly related to the administration of the Territory and corresponded to "a sacred trust of civilization". The other related to the machinery for implementation and was closely linked to the supervision and control of the League. It corresponded to the "securities for the performance of this trust" referred to in the same Article.

Under the first group of obligations the Union undertook the general obligation to promote to the utmost the material and moral well-being and the social progress of the inhabitants. It assumed particular obligations relating to slave trade, forced labour, traffic in arms and ammunition, intoxicating spirits and beverages, military training and establishments, as well as obligations relating to freedom of conscience and free exercise of worship, including special obligations with regard to missionaries. The Court regarded these obligations as representing the very essence of "the sacred trust of civilization". Their raison d'être and original object remained. Since their fulfilment did not depend on the existence of the League of Nations, they could not be brought to an end merely because this supervisory organ ceased to exist. Nor could the right of the population to have the Territory administered in accordance with these rules depend on the existence of the League.

This view, the Court submitted, was confirmed by Article 80, paragraph 1, of the Charter of the United Nations (see above). It presupposed that the rights of States and peoples should not lapse automatically on the dissolution of the League of Nations, and its intention was to safeguard these rights, until each Territory should be placed under the Trusteeship System. Moreover, the resolution of the League of Nations of 18 April 1946, by which the League was dissolved, said that the League's functions with respect to mandated territories would come to an end; it did not say that the Mandates themselves would come to an end, and it manifested its understanding that the Mandates were to continue in existence until "other arrangements" were established. A similar view, the Court stated, had on various occasions been expressed by the Union of South Africa in declarations made to the League of Nations as well as to the United Nations.

The Court considered these declarations as constituting recognition by the Union Government of the continuance of its obligations under the Mandate and not a mere indication of the future conduct of that Government.

The second group of obligations contained particularly the obligation of the Union of South Africa to submit to the supervision and control of the Council of the League and to render to it annual reports. The Court said that some doubts might arise from the fact that the supervisory functions of the League with regard to mandated territories not placed under the new Trusteeship System were neither expressly transferred to nor assumed by the United Nations. The necessity for supervision, however, the Court said, continued to exist. The authors of the Covenant considered that the effective performance of the sacred trust of civilization by the Mandatory Powers required such an international supervision, and it could not be admitted that the obligation to submit to supervision disappeared merely because the supervisory organ under the Mandate System had ceased to exist, when the United Nations has another international organ performing similar, though not identical, supervisory functions.

These general considerations, the Court observed, were confirmed by Article 80, paragraph 1, of the Charter, which purported to safeguard not only the rights of States, but also the rights of the peoples of mandated territories until Trusteeship Agreements were concluded; but that no such rights of peoples could be effectively safeguarded without international supervision and a duty to render reports to a supervisory organ. The competence of the General Assembly of the United Nations to exercise such supervision and to receive and examine reports was derived from the provisions of Article 10 of the Charter, which authorizes the General Assembly to discuss any questions or any matters within the scope of the Charter, and make recommendations to the Members of the United Nations. The resolution of 18 April 1946 of the Assembly of the League of Nations presupposed that the supervisory functions exercised by the League would be taken over by the United Nations. For these reasons, the Court, by a vote of 12 to 2, arrived at the conclusion that the General Assembly of the United Nations was legally qualified to exercise the supervisory functions previously exercised by the League with regard to the administration of the Territory, and that the Union was under an obligation to submit to supervision and control of the General Assembly, and render annual reports to it.

The right of petition, the Court pointed out, was not mentioned in the Covenant or the Mandate, but was established by a decision of the Council of the League on 31 January 1923. The Court was of the opinion that this right, which the inhabitants of South West Africa had acquired by the decision of the League's Council, was maintained by Article 80, paragraph 1, of the Charter. As it had interpreted this clause, the dispatch and examination of petitions formed a part of the supervision exercised over the Mandatory Powers, and, therefore, the Court, by a vote of 12 to 2, stated that petitions were to be transmitted by the Government of the Union to the General Assembly of the United Nations, which was legally qualified to deal with them.

(b) APPLICATION OF CHAPTER XII OF THE CHARTER

With regard to question (b), the Court was of the unanimous opinion that the provisions of Chapter XII of the Charter applied to the Territory of South West Africa in the sense that they provided a means by which the Territory might be brought under the Trusteeship System.

With regard to the manner in which those provisions were applicable, the Court said that the permissive language of Articles 75, 77 and 79 of the Charter did not impose upon the Union of South Africa an obligation to place the Territory under the Trusteeship System by means of a Trusteeship Agreement. An "agreement", the Court explained, implies consent of the parties concerned, including the Mandatory Power in the case of territories held under Mandate. The parties must be free to accept or reject the terms of a contemplated agreement.

It was contended that the word "voluntarily" used in Article 77 with respect to territories in category (c)—territories voluntarily placed under the International Trusteeship System by States responsible for their administration—only showed that the placing of other territories under Trusteeship was compulsory. This word alone, however, could not override the principle derived from Articles 75, 77 and 79 considered as a whole. The word "voluntarily" incorporated in category (c), the Court contended, could be explained as having been used out of an abundance of caution and as an added assurance of freedom of initiative to States having territories falling within that category.

It was contended also that paragraph 2 of Article 80 imposes on the Mandatory State a duty to negotiate and conclude Trusteeship Agreements. For this the Court found no justification. There was nothing to suggest that the provision was intended as an exception to the permissive character of Articles 75, 77 and 79. Had the parties to the Charter intended to create an obligation for a Mandatory State to negotiate and conclude an agreement, such intention would have been expressed in positive terms. The Charter contemplated and regulated only one single system, namely, the International Trusteeship System; it did not contemplate or regulate a co-existing Mandate System. It had been expected that Mandatory Powers would enter into negotiations with a view to concluding Trusteeship Agreements with regard to the territories under their Mandate. The Court could not deduce from these general considerations, any legal obligation for Mandatory States to negotiate and conclude such agreements. It was remarked that it was not for the Court to pronounce on the political or moral duties which these considerations might involve. For those reasons, the Court by a vote of 8 to 6 held that the Charter does not impose upon the Union of South Africa the legal obligation to place South West Africa under the International Trusteeship System.

(c) COMPETENCE OF THE UNION OF SOUTH AFRICA TO MODIFY THE STATUS OF SOUTH WEST AFRICA

With regard to question (c), the Court decided that it was clear that the international status of the Territory resulted from the international rules regulating the rights, powers and obligations relating to the administration of the Territory, as embodied in Article 22 of the Covenant and in the Mandate. It was also clear that the Union had no competence to modify unilaterally the international status of the Territory or any of these international rules. This was shown by Article 7 of the Mandate, which expressly provided that the consent of the Council of the League of Nations was required for any modification of the terms of the Mandate.

The Court said that the normal way of modifying the international status of the Territory would be to place it under the Trusteeship System by means of a Trusteeship Agreement in accordance with the provisions of Chapter XII of the Charter. However, the competence to modify in other ways the international status of the Territory would depend on the rules governing the amendment of Article 22 of the Covenant and the modification of the terms of the Mandate. Because the rules thus laid down had become inapplicable following the dissolution of the League, one could not conclude that no proper procedure existed for modifying the international status of South West Africa.

Article 7 of the Mandate, in requiring the consent of the Council of the League of Nations for any modification of its terms, brought into operation for this purpose the same organ which was invested with powers of supervision in respect of the administration of the Mandates. In accordance with the reply given to question (a), the Court said that those powers of supervision now belonged to the General Assembly of the United Nations. Articles 79 and 85 of the Charter, the Court pointed out, require that a Trusteeship Agreement be concluded by the Mandatory Power and approved by the General Assembly before the International Trusteeship System may be substituted for the Mandates System. These articles also give the General Assembly authority to approve alterations or amendments of Trusteeship Agreements. By analogy, it could be inferred that the same procedure was applicable to any modification of the international status of a territory under Mandate which would not have for its purpose the placing of the territory under the International Trusteeship System. Moreover, when the Union of South Africa decided to submit the question of the future international status of the Territory to the "judgment" of the General Assembly as the "competent international organ", the Union Government recognized the competence of the General Assembly in the matter.

The General Assembly had, on the other hand, affirmed its competence by its resolution of 14 December 1946, in which it stated, among other things, that it was unable to accede to the incorporation of the Territory of South West Africa in the Union of South Africa. Following the adoption of this resolution, the Union Government decided not to proceed with the incorporation of the Territory, but to maintain the status quo. The Assembly in 1947 had taken note of this decision.

On the basis of the above considerations, the Court was of the unanimous opinion that the Union of South Africa acting alone was not competent to modify the international status of the Territory of South West Africa. Such competence to determine and modify the international status of South West Africa rested with the Union acting with the consent of the United Nations.

d. DISSENTING OPINIONS

There were dissenting opinions on two questions put to the Court. On question (a) concerning the continued international obligations of the Union of South Africa arising under the Mandate, Judge McNair (United Kingdom) and Judge Read (Canada) filed separate opinions. On question (b) concerning the obligation of the Union of South Africa to negotiate and conclude an agreement with the United Nations to place South West Africa under Trusteeship, Judges Alvarez (Chile), de Visscher (Belgium), and Krylov (USSR) filed dissenting opinions.

Vice President Guerrero (El Salvador) stated that he was unable to concur in the opinion of the Court on the answer to the question under letter (b) and declared that in his opinion the Charter imposed on the Union of South Africa an obligation to place the Territory of South West Africa under the International Trusteeship System, and that, therefore, the Union Government was bound under paragraph 2 of Article 80 of the Charter not to delay or postpone the negotiation and conclusion of an agreement to place the Territory under the Trusteeship System. Judges Zoricic (Yugoslavia) and Badawi Pasha (Egypt) also declared that they were unable to concur in the answer given by the Court to the second part of the question under letter (b). These three Judges stated that they shared in general the views expressed on this point in the dissenting opinion of Judge De Visscher.

(1) Opinion of Judge McNair

In his separate opinion, Judge McNair declared that he concurred in the replies given by the majority of the Court to the general question and to questions (b) and (c). As to question (a), he differed as to the obligation to make reports and as to the transfer of the administrative supervision of the Council of the League of Nations to the United Nations. As his approach to the main problems differed somewhat from that of the majority, he gave his own reasons for answering the various questions.

With respect to the general question and to question (a), Judge McNair explained that the Mandates System (and the "corresponding principles" of the International Trusteeship System) was a new institution. It was a new relationship between the territory and its inhabitants on the one hand and the Government which represented them internationally on the other. The doctrine of sovereignty had no application to this new system. Sovereignty over a Mandated Territory was in abeyance; if and when the inhabitants of the Territory obtained recognition as an independent State, as had already happened in the case of some of the Mandates, sovereignty would revive and be vested in the new State. The Mandatory acquired only a limited title to the territory entrusted to it.

Article 22 of the Covenant proclaimed "the principle that the well-being and development of such peoples form a sacred trust of civilization and the securities for the performance of this trust should be embodied in the Covenant". In Judge McNair's opinion, the new regime established in pursuance of this "principle" had more than a purely contractual basis, and the territories subjected to it were impressed with a special legal status. The dissolution of the League of Nations produced certain mechanical difficulties, but the policy and principles of the new institution survived and have indeed been reincarnated by the Charter of the United Nations under the name of the "International Trusteeship System", with a new lease of life.

The dissolution of the League, he went on to state, did not automatically terminate the Mandates. Although there was no longer any League to supervise the exercise of the Mandate, it would be an error, he pointed out, to think there was no control over the Mandatory. The Mandate provided two kinds of machinery for its supervision: (1) judicial, by means of the right of any Member of the League to bring the Mandatory compulsorily before the Permanent Court; and (2) administrative, by means of annual reports and their examination by the Permanent Mandates Commission of the League.

He argued that the judicial supervision had been expressly preserved by means of Article 37 of the Statute of the International Court of Justice which effected a succession by the International Court to the compulsory jurisdiction conferred upon the Permanent Court by the Mandate.

On the other hand, the administrative supervision by the Council of the League as advised by the Permanent Mandates Commission, he maintained, had lapsed because the League and its Council and Permanent Mandates Commission no longer existed, so that it had become impossible to perform the obligation of receiving and examining reports.

Judge McNair remarked that he could not find any legal ground on which the Court would be justified in replacing the Council of the League by the United Nations for the purposes of exercising the administrative supervision of the Mandate and the receipt and examination of reports. It would amount to imposing a new obligation upon the Union Government. He was convinced that the continuing international obligations of the Union of South Africa under the Mandate for South West Africa did not include the obligation to accept the administrative supervision of the United Nations and to render annual reports to that Organization.

Judge McNair concurred in the opinion of the majority of the Court with respect to question (b). With respect to question (c), he stated that the disappearance of the League in no way altered the quality or amount of the Mandatory's title or enlarged its power to modify the terms of the Mandate, because the international obligations affecting the Territory—except those he stated had already lapsed—and the international status of the Territory continued to exist. Competence to determine and modify the international status of the Territory rested with the Union of South Africa acting with the consent of the United Nations.

(2) Opinion of Judge Read

In his separate opinion, Judge Read declared that he concurred in the Court's opinion and was in general agreement with the reasons by which the answers were justified, except for that part of the Court's answer which was concerned with accountability to, and supervision by, the United Nations and with the reasons by which it was justified.

Judge Read submitted that the Mandate for South West Africa survived, together with all of the essential and substantive obligations of the Union. The legal rights and interests of the Members of the League of Nations, in respect of the Mandate, also survived with one important exception—in the case of Members that did not become parties to the Statute of the International Court of Justice, their right to implead the Union before the Permanent Court lapsed. The obligations in respect of report and accountability to, and supervision by, the League and its organs, and in respect of modification, were affected by impossibility of performance, due to the disappearance of the Council and Permanent Mandates Commission. The position, as regards report, accountability and supervision, he argued, was subject to modification by arrangement agreed between the United Nations and the Union of South Africa.

Judge Read stated that it was doubtful whether the General Assembly was willing, at any stage, to agree to any arrangement that did not involve a Trusteeship Agreement for South West Africa. He was convinced that the Assembly was not prepared to agree to any arrangement that did not involve the following: reports of the same nature and scope as those which had been due to the Council of the League of Nations; substitution of the United Nations for the Council and Permanent Mandates Commission, as regards report, accountability and supervision; and review of reports by the Trusteeship Council. It was equally certain, he said, that the Union was not ready to agree to an arrangement involving these elements. He therefore concluded that there was no arrangement agreed between the Union and the United Nations in the matter of report, accountability and supervision.

Accordingly, in the absence of an arrangement agreed between the United Nations and the Union, and in the absence of succession by the United Nations to the political functions of the League, in respect of the Mandates, Judge Read concluded that the Union of South Africa was not under an obligation to render annual reports to the United Nations. For the same reasons, he contended, the Union was not under any obligation, arising under the Mandate, as regards accountability to, and supervision by, the United Nations.

(3) Opinion of Judge Alvarez

In his dissenting opinion, Judge Alvarez examined the questions presented in the light of the "new international law". He viewed the Mandate created by the League of Nations as "a sacred trust of civilization", a social function which could not terminate with the League of Nations, even if no other organ took its place. If the League of Nations had created an institution, such as the Mandate, having for its purpose the same "sacred trust of civilization" as the Trusteeship created by the United Nations, then the latter, he argued, must be considered as succeeding the former ipso facto. There could be no interruption in the continuous performance of this trust.

The Charter of the United Nations, Judge Alvarez noted, declared that mandated territories would come under Trusteeship by virtue of agreements between the United Nations and the former Mandatory Power. In his opinion, the Union of South Africa was under the legal obligation not only to enter into negotiations regarding an agreement with the United Nations to transform its Mandate into Trusteeship, but also to conclude such an agreement. This obligation, he explained, derived from the spirit of the Charter, which left no place for the future co-existence of the Mandates System and the Trusteeship System.

In the event that no agreement could be reached, Judge Alvarez indicated that it would then become necessary to refer to arbitration. It would not be possible, he maintained, to admit that, in an organized society under the regime of interdependence, an agreement which was intended to fix an important international status could not be established solely because of the opposition, the negligence or the bad faith of one of the parties.

(4) Opinion of Judge De Visscher

Judge De Visscher, in his dissenting opinion, conceded that the provisions of Chapter XII of the Charter did not impose on the Union of South Africa a legal obligation to conclude a Trusteeship Agreement, in the sense that the Union was free to accept or to refuse the particular terms of a draft agreement. On the other hand, he considered that these provisions imposed on the Union of South Africa an obligation to take part in negotiations with a view to concluding an agreement.

He declared that the Mandates System was maintained by Article 80 of the Charter only as a transitional measure. The same Article, he said, excluded the possibility of prolonged co-existence of the Mandates System and the International Trusteeship System. He felt that the negotiation and conclusion of Trusteeship Agreements by Mandatory Powers could not be delayed or postponed.

The wording of Articles 75, 77 and 79, he noted, was permissive in the sense that the placing under Trusteeship was contingent upon the conclusion of subsequent agreements, the Mandatory Power being free to accept or to reject the terms of a proposed agreement. It was impossible, however, to reconcile these permissive provisions with Article 80, Paragraph 2, and with the clear intent of the authors of the Charter to substitute the Trusteeship System for the Mandates System, without admitting that the Mandatory Power, while remaining free to reject the particular terms of a proposed agreement, had the legal obligation to be ready to take part in negotiations and to conduct them in good faith with a view to concluding an agreement.

The Charter, he indicated, created an international system which would never have had more than theoretical existence if the Mandatory Powers had considered themselves under no obligation to negotiate agreements to convert their Mandates into Trusteeship Agreements. The obligation to be ready to negotiate with a view to concluding an agreement represented the minimum of international co-operation without which the entire regime contemplated and regulated by the Charter would have been frustrated.

(5) Opinion of Judge Krylov

In his dissenting opinion, Judge Krylov declared that a Territory under Mandate need not necessarily be placed under the Trusteeship System, because it might be proclaimed independent—and this, he argued, was the only other possibility. He stated that the letter and the spirit of the Charter alike led to only one interpretation, namely: that the Union of South Africa was under the legal obligation to negotiate with a view to concluding a Trusteeship Agreement for placing the Mandated Territory under the Trusteeship System.

The obligation of the Mandatory Power to negotiate with a view to concluding a Trusteeship Agreement, he indicated, was also clearly demonstrated in Article 77, paragraph 1c, of the Charter, which declares that colonial territories may be placed under the Trusteeship System by States responsible for their administration by voluntary procedure only.

Judge Krylov observed that the Court's answer to the second part of question (b) might prolong the co-existence of the Mandate System and the Trusteeship System. This, he considered, would be contrary to the intentions of the authors of the Charter, who expected Mandatory States to follow without delay the normal course indicated by the Charter and conclude Trusteeship Agreements.

2. Consideration in the General Assembly

The Court's advisory opinion was communicated to the Secretary-General by the Registrar on 11 July 1950 and considered at the fifth General Assembly by the Fourth Committee at its 190th-199th meetings held on 29 and 30 November and 1, 2, 4, 5 and 8 December 1950.

a. DISCUSSION IN THE FOURTH COMMITTEE

(1) Statement of the Representative of the Union of South Africa

In the course of general debate the representative of the Union of South Africa said that, although the greatest respect should be shown to the advisory opinion of the Court, it did not constitute a judgment binding on the parties concerned.

Since the delivery of the advisory opinion, he stated, certain important new facts bearing directly on the reasoning and conclusions of the Court on certain points had come to light.

He declared that the Court had decided that, in view of the necessity of continuing supervision, the obligation to submit reports persisted, and that, because the United Nations had succeeded to the rights and functions of the League in that respect, the reports were to be submitted to the United Nations. He was convinced that if the additional information which had now been discovered had been available to the Court, it would have accepted the minority view that there had been no transfer of the functions of the League to the United Nations.

The South African representative explained that when the League considered the future of the Mandates System, private discussions had first taken place between the delegations of the Governments directly concerned, with a view to reaching amicable agreement on the question and producing a resolution which could be unanimously adopted by the Council of the League. Agreement had finally been reached on a text introduced by the Chinese delegation on 12 April 1946, which omitted any reference to the transfer of the League's supervisory functions to the United Nations, or to inspection of mandated territories or submission of reports. Neither the South African delegation nor any of the delegations with whom the matter had been discussed understood the proposal to contemplate any transfer of supervisory functions; indeed, he submitted, it had been introduced and adopted with the very object of avoiding any such transfer. Otherwise South Africa would have opposed the resolution, since that Government had stated its intention of formulating, at the following sessions of the United Nations, its case for according a new status to South West Africa by which it would become an integral part of the Union. In that case, he added, the resolution would have been rejected, since it would not have secured the unanimous vote of the League Assembly as required.

Although there had been a considerable lapse of time between dissolution of the League of Nations and the conclusion of the first Trusteeship Agreement, he pointed out, no reports on mandated territories had been submitted to the United Nations during that time by the Mandatory Powers, nor had such reports been requested. That situation further confirmed the general assumption that there was to be no transfer of supervisory functions.

Furthermore, the United Nations in resolution 24(1) adopted on 12 February 1946, had decided that in respect to function and powers under treaties, international conventions, agreements and other instruments having a political character, the General Assembly would itself examine, or submit to an appropriate organ of the United Nations, any request from the parties concerned that the United Nations should assume the exercise of functions or powers entrusted to the League of Nations by treaties or other instruments having a political character. It was therefore not likely, he argued, that the League, faced with that resolution of the United Nations, would have adopted a resolution two months later whereby the supervisory functions of the League in respect of mandates should be transferred to the United Nations.

His Government would later have to define its position in the light of these new facts and of any resolutions which might be adopted. He said that he would convey to his Government what was said in the Committee and the spirit in which it was said. His Government, he stated, would give the most careful consideration to any resolution which might eventually emanate from the General Assembly.

Some representatives including those of the Philippines and China, questioned whether any new facts had emerged which might have influenced the Court's Judgment. The representative of the Philippines stated that the facts referred to by the representative of South Africa had existed all the time in the files of the League of Nations and could on no account be regarded as newly discovered evidence. This view was shared by the representative of China, who stated that the final resolution of the League did not prevent transfer of the supervisory functions and that under Article 61 of the Statute of the Court an application for revision of a judgment might be made only when it was based upon the discovery of some fact of such a nature as to be a decisive factor, which fact was, when the judgment was given, unknown to the Court and also to the party claiming revision, always provided that such ignorance was not due to negligence. The representative of China added that the representative of the Union of South Africa should have mentioned those facts in his oral statement before the Court since his Government attached such great importance to them.

(2) Implementation of the Court's Advisory Opinion

The Fourth Committee had before it three draft resolutions all of which accepted the Court's opinion, but differed as to the procedure to be followed in connection with its implementation.

The first draft resolution was submitted jointly by Brazil, Cuba, Mexico, Syria and Uruguay (A/C.4/L.116/Rev.1). After referring to the Court's decision, the resolution called upon the Union of South Africa to: (1) continue to administer South West Africa in accordance with the Mandate conferred upon it; (2) submit to the United Nations, before 1 June 1951, a report on the administration of the territory for 1947-1950, and also, in due course, reports relating to subsequent years; and (3) transmit to the Secretary-General all petitions relating to South West Africa. The resolution also called for the establishment of a Commission for South West Africa, consisting of ten experts, to assist the General Assembly in the consideration of the annual reports, petitions and all other matters relating to the Territory. This Commission was to submit annual reports to the Assembly.

A second draft resolution was submitted jointly by India, Indonesia and the Philippines (A/C.4/L.121). This resolution was similar to that first draft resolution, but provided that, instead of a Commission for South West Africa consisting of ten experts, an ad hoc committee consisting of ten specially qualified persons selected by States should be established to examine the annual report and petitions relating to the Territory and advise the General Assembly on all matters relating to it.

This draft resolution was subsequently withdrawn when India, Indonesia and the Philippines accepted the amendments to their joint draft resolution proposed by the sponsors of the second draft resolution. These amendments (A/C.4/L.129) provided that the Assembly:

- (1) call for fulfilment by the Union of South Africa of its obligations to promote to the utmost in the administration of South West Africa "the material and moral well-being and social progress of its inhabitants as a sacred trust of civilization";
- (2) allow the Secretary-General to set the time and place of the first meeting of the proposed Commission for South West Africa;
- (3) itself invite the Union of South Africa to designate a representative to offer the proposed Commission supplementary information;
- (4) call upon the proposed Commission to advise the General Assembly on all matters relating to South West Africa and to perform such other functions as may be entrusted to it by the Assembly.

The third draft resolution was submitted jointly by Denmark, El Salvador, Iraq, Norway, Peru, Thailand, the United States and Venezuela (A/C.4/L.124/Rev.1). This resolution called upon the General Assembly to:

- (1) accept and endorse the advisory opinion of the Court;

(2) urge the Union of South Africa to take the necessary steps to give effect to the Court's opinion;

(3) establish a committee, composed of the President of the Trusteeship Council, the Chairman of the Fourth Committee and the Chairman of the Interim Committee, to confer with the Union of South Africa on the implementation of the advisory opinion.

The representatives of Brazil, China, Cuba, Ecuador, India, Indonesia, Lebanon, Mexico, the Philippines, Syria, Uruguay and Yugoslavia, among others, supported the draft resolution sponsored by Brazil, Cuba, Mexico, Syria and Uruguay, as amended by provisions originally submitted by India, Indonesia and the Philippines.

The representatives of Argentina, Belgium, Canada, Denmark, El Salvador, France, Iraq, the Netherlands, Norway, Peru, Sweden, Thailand, the United Kingdom, the United States and Venezuela, among others, supported the draft resolution submitted jointly by Denmark, El Salvador, Iraq, Norway, Peru, Thailand, the United States and Venezuela.

The principal difference between these groups of delegations was on whether further negotiations with the Union were necessary or desirable, or whether the Assembly should itself decide on a procedure to give effect to the Court's Judgment.

The representatives supporting the first draft resolution, who held that no further negotiations were necessary, put forward, among others, the following reasons:

(1) The Court's Opinion showed that the Union of South Africa continued to have international obligations with respect to the Territory of South West Africa, and that international supervision over the administration of the Territory should be exercised by the United Nations, to which annual reports and petitions should be submitted. The United Nations had therefore the obligation to consider carefully these reports and petitions, and this could be done through the proposed Commission for South West Africa.

(2) No negotiations were necessary for the submission of reports and the transmission of petitions concerning South West Africa, since the procedure for this had been laid down by the Council of the League of Nations and the Permanent Mandates Commission, a procedure with which the Union had complied for twenty years. The proposed ad hoc body to examine reports and petitions was modelled on the Permanent Mandates Commission, which should meet any fear on the part of the Union of South Africa that the supervision exercised would exceed that of the Mandates System or that the examination of its annual reports would be an indirect way of placing South West Africa under Trusteeship.

(3) The establishment of a negotiating committee would mean deferring a decision for another year. The machinery to implement the Court's Opinion should be set up at once, since the inhabitants of South West Africa were suffering from the delay in finding a solution to the question. If the machinery proved imperfect it could be progressively improved. If negotiations were necessary regarding the procedure for submitting reports or petitions, the views of the Union Government could be presented either to the Fourth Committee of the Assembly or to the proposed Commission. It would in any case be unrealistic to appoint a special negotiating body in the absence of any indication that the Union was prepared to accept the Court's Opinion.

Those favouring the second of the two draft resolutions before the Committee advanced, among others, the following views:

(1) According to the Court's Advisory Opinion, the degree of supervision to be exercised by the United Nations over the administration of South West Africa should not exceed that formerly exercised by the League of Nations and should as far as possible conform to the procedure followed by the League. No machinery for supervision under the Mandates System remained and it was therefore necessary to create new machinery. Moreover, the League machinery of supervision differed considerably from that of the United Nations; it consisted of the Permanent Mandates Commission, an independent non-political body of experts appointed for life, and the Council of the League, acting in accordance with its unanimity rule. It was only fair that the Mandatory Power should be consulted on the new machinery to be established; the United Nations had no right to set it up unilaterally.

(2) The only course open was, therefore, that of negotiation. It was in any case one of the functions of the United Nations to settle problems in the international field by negotiation rather than to impose unilateral decisions. Even if negotiations involved a year's delay, that would be better than to adopt hastily measures which might make a solution more complicated. Negotiations would be more likely to succeed if undertaken by a small group, and the composition of the group proposed in the resolution was such as to inspire general confidence.

(3) There was no question of negotiating on the substance of the Court's Advisory Opinion. That should be endorsed fully and without qualification by the Assembly. Although it was an opinion, not a decision, it was, none the less a legal text handed down by the highest international judicial authority. It was, therefore, for the Committee to consider methods of implementing the Opinion and representatives should accept it as a whole, not only those parts with which they agreed. Negotiations would be confined to the methods of implementing the Court's Opinion, and would not prevent the Union of South Africa from carrying out its obligations in accordance with that Opinion regarding the submission of reports and petitions.

At the 195th meeting of the Fourth Committee on 4 December, the representative of Denmark orally proposed that the Committee should consider first the joint draft resolution of Denmark, El Salvador, Iraq, Norway, Peru, Thailand, the United States and Venezuela (A/C.4/L.124/Rev.1). This proposal was not adopted, the vote being 21 to 21, with 4 abstentions. (If a vote is equally divided on matters other than elections, a second vote is taken within 48 hours of the first vote. If this vote also results in equality, the proposal is regarded as rejected.)

The Fourth Committee at its 196th meeting on 4 December then adopted by a roll-call vote of 26 to 21, with 4 abstentions, the draft resolution sponsored by Brazil, Cuba, Mexico, Syria and Uruguay (A/C.4/L.116/Rev.1) and amended by India, Indonesia and the Philippines (A/C.4/L.129). Nine roll-call votes altogether were taken on the preamble and operative parts of the resolution and on the resolution as a whole. The Chairman of the Committee ruled that in view of the adoption of the draft resolution, no vote should be taken on the draft resolution set forth in document A/C.4/L.124/Rev.1. The text of the draft resolution adopted is as follows:

The General Assembly,

Considering that the General Assembly, by its resolutions 65(I) of 14 December 1946, 141(II) of 1 November 1947, 227(III) of 26 November 1948 and 337(IV) of 6 December 1949 recommended that the Mandated Territory of South West Africa be placed under the International Trusteeship System and urged the Government of the Union of South Africa to submit a trusteeship agreement for the Territory,

Considering that the International Court of Justice, duly consulted by the General Assembly pursuant to resolution 338(IV) of 6 December 1949, reached the conclusion that the Territory of South West Africa is still a Territory under the international Mandate assumed by the Union of South Africa, on 17 December 1920,

Considering that the International Court of Justice is of the opinion that the Union of South Africa acting alone is not competent to modify the international status of the Territory of South West Africa, and that the competence to determine and modify the international status of the Territory rests with the Union of South Africa acting with the consent of the United Nations,

Considering that the International Court of Justice is of the opinion that the Union of South Africa continues to be subject to the international obligations laid down in Article 22 of the Covenant of the League of Nations and in the Mandate for South West Africa,

Considering that the International Court of Justice is of the opinion that the functions of supervision over the administration of the Territory of South West Africa by the Union of South Africa should be exercised by the United Nations, to which the annual reports and the petitions should be submitted,

Considering that the International Court of Justice is of the opinion that the Union of South Africa continues to be subject to the obligation to transmit petitions from the inhabitants of the Territory of South West Africa,

Considering that, in accordance with the opinion of the International Court of Justice, the Union of South Africa is under an obligation to accept the compulsory jurisdiction of the Court as provided by Article 37 of the Statute of the International Court of Justice, by Article 80, paragraph 1, of the Charter of the United Nations and by Article 7 of the Mandate for South West Africa,

1. Declares that it is incumbent upon the Government of the Union of South Africa, pending the determination of the future status of South West Africa by agreement between the Union of South Africa and the United Nations, to promote to the utmost in the administration of the Territory the material and moral well-being and social progress of its inhabitants as a sacred trust of civilization, subject to the existing Mandate, and to give effect to the obligations which it assumed under the Mandate;

2. Requests the Government of the Union of South Africa to submit to the United Nations, before 1 June 1951, a report on the administration of the Territory of South West Africa during the years 1947, 1948, 1949 and 1950 in accordance with the questionnaire adopted by the Permanent Mandates Commission of the League of Nations and also, in due course, reports relating to the subsequent years;

3. Requests the Government of the Union of South Africa to transmit to the Secretary-General, with such additional observations as it may deem necessary, all petitions relating to the Territory of South West Africa;

4. Establishes a Commission for South West Africa to assist the General Assembly in the consideration of the annual reports, petitions and all other matters relating to the Mandated Territory of South West Africa in accordance with the following instructions and procedures which the General Assembly laid down in the exercise of its functions of control over the administration of South West Africa:

(a) The Commission for South West Africa shall be composed of ten experts appointed on the basis of their qualifications and expert knowledge by . . . ^{161a}

(b) The Commission for South West Africa shall hold the meetings necessary for the accomplishment of its task; it shall meet at such time and place as may be determined by the Secretary-General;

(c) The Commission for South West Africa shall decide upon its own rules of procedure and for that purpose shall, as far as possible, follow the procedure adopted in that matter by the Permanent Mandates Commission of the League of Nations for the consideration of reports and petitions;

5. Invites the Government of the Union of South Africa to designate a duly authorized representative who should be prepared to offer to the Commission for South West Africa any supplementary explanations or supplementary information as the Commission may request;

6. Recommends that the Commission for South West Africa should submit annual reports to the General Assembly for consideration. Such reports shall contain an analysis of conditions in the Mandated Territory and observations, conclusions and recommendations regarding the fulfilment, by the Mandatory Power, of the obligations set forth in the Mandate. The Commission shall advise the Assembly on all matters relating to South West Africa, and perform such other functions as may be entrusted to it by the General Assembly.

After the adoption of the resolution, several representatives, including those of Denmark, Ethiopia, France, Iraq and Venezuela, declared that the resolution had been approved by a very narrow margin and that it would in all likelihood be rejected by the General Assembly. They appealed to all members of the Fourth Committee to try to find some compromise text on which more agreement could be reached, preferably on the basis of draft resolution A/C.4/L.124/Rev.1.

(3) Proposals to Place South West Africa under Trusteeship

The Fourth Committee at its 197th meeting on 5 December then began consideration of the proposal to invite the Union of South Africa to place the mandated Territory of South West Africa under Trusteeship. It had before it two draft resolutions and one amendment on the question.

The first draft resolution (A/C.4/L.122) was submitted jointly by the representatives of India, Indonesia and the Philippines. This called upon the General Assembly to endorse the conclusion of the International Court of Justice that the normal way of modifying the international status of South West Africa would be to place it under the Trusteeship System by means of a Trusteeship Agreement in accordance with the provisions of Chapter XII of the Charter. The Assembly also was to request a proposed ad hoc Committee on South West Africa to submit to the following session of the Assembly a report on the provisions and working of the South West Africa Affairs Amendment Act of 1949 (a law referring to the alleged incorporation of South West Africa in the Union of South Africa).

The second draft resolution (A/C.4/L.128) was submitted jointly by the representatives of Cuba, Ecuador, Guatemala, Mexico and Uruguay. This called upon the General Assembly to reiterate the resolutions adopted by it at its four previous sessions and to repeat that the Union of South Africa should submit a draft Trusteeship Agreement for South West Africa.

After the acceptance by the sponsors of this draft resolution of an amendment to state in effect that the normal way of modifying the international status of the Territory would be to place it under the Trusteeship System by means of a Trusteeship Agreement in accordance with the provisions of Chapter XII of the Charter, the representatives of India, Indonesia and the Philippines withdrew their draft resolution (A/C.4/L.122).

The representative of the USSR submitted an amendment (A/C.4/L.126), first to the draft resolution proposed by India, Indonesia and the Philippines; after its withdrawal he introduced the same amendment (A/C.4/L.130) to the draft resolution proposed by Cuba, Ecuador, Guatemala, Mexico and Uruguay. This amendment was to insert a new paragraph which would have the General Assembly note that the action of the Union of South Africa in adopting a law on the incorporation of South West Africa in the Union constituted a violation of the Charter of the United Nations.

The representative of the Union of South Africa declared that his Government had always refused categorically to place South West Africa under the Trusteeship System. There had been no change in the circumstances since it had first expressed that refusal. On the contrary, his Government had even stronger reasons for continuing to maintain that it had no obligation, either moral or legal, to conclude a Trusteeship Agreement with the United Nations. There was therefore no point in adopting draft resolutions previously adopted by the General Assembly, resolutions containing invitations which were still open for acceptance by the South African Government if it so desired.

The representatives of Poland and the USSR considered that the only two courses open to a Mandatory Power were, first, to grant independence and freedom to the people of the mandated territory; or secondly, to place the territory under the International Trusteeship System. With respect to South West Africa, the first of these two solutions must be discarded temporarily since the Territory was not yet sufficiently advanced politically and economically; South West Africa should therefore be placed under the International Trusteeship System. The Union of South Africa had refused to conform to the recommendations of the General Assembly on South West Africa or to fulfil its obligations under the Mandate. Still more, it had taken measures which would lead to the incorporation of South West Africa in its territory. The Union of South Africa, by refusing to place the Territory of South West Africa under the Trusteeship System and to supply information on the administration of that Territory, became guilty of a violation of the Charter, which the General Assembly should note in the resolution it adopted on the question.

The representatives of, among others, Brazil, Cuba, Ecuador, Guatemala, Haiti, Iraq, Pakistan and the Philippines, spoke in favour of the joint draft resolution (A/C.4/L.128). They maintained that precisely because the South African Government had not yet complied with the Assembly's request, the request should be renewed, in the hope that the Union of South Africa would alter its attitude. Failure by the General Assembly to maintain and reiterate the attitude it had taken on the question for the preceding five years, they felt, would be interpreted by the inhabitants of South West Africa as a betrayal of their paramount interests.

They interpreted the Court's opinion as stating that, although the Union of South Africa was not bound by any legal obligation to conclude a Trusteeship Agreement for South West Africa, nevertheless the provisions of Chapter XII of the Charter imposed on the Union a moral obligation to place the Territory under the Trusteeship System. The draft resolution, they argued, merely endorsed the view of the Court that the normal way of changing the status of a mandated territory was to place it under the Trusteeship System.

These representatives opposed the idea of any negotiation in connexion with the enforcement of what they called the clear legal obligations of the Union of South Africa under the international mandate, since in their view those obligations did not admit of compromise, but considered that there was room for negotiation on the terms of a Trusteeship Agreement for South West Africa.

The representatives of, among others, Australia, Belgium, Canada, France, Peru, Thailand and the United Kingdom spoke against the joint draft resolution. They declared that since the Court's advisory opinion stated that the Union of South Africa was under no legal obligation to place South West Africa under the Trusteeship System, it would seem better to avoid any express reference to a Trusteeship Agreement. The Assembly could not, they argued, by a unilateral decision, force the Union of South Africa to conclude a Trusteeship Agreement for the Territory. To do that would not, they contended, be in the interests of the population of the Territory.

These representatives did not think it was enough simply to adopt texts which might well prove ineffective; it was essential to try to take steps to ensure the solution of the problem in the very near future. The General Assembly had already adopted several resolutions to the same effect without result. The best solution would be to negotiate with the Union of South Africa.

It was felt that the Fourth Committee should attempt to reach a compromise solution which would obtain the necessary two-thirds majority in the General Assembly.

The representatives of Argentina, Iraq and Venezuela stated that they would abstain in a vote on the joint draft resolution. In their opinion the proposal was unsatisfactory and impractical and could not command the necessary two-thirds majority.

The representative of Argentina stated that he would vote against the USSR amendment as he felt that the amendment might be in conflict with Article 2, paragraph 7, of the Charter (which states that the United Nations shall not intervene in matters which are essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of any State), which, he stated, was the safeguard of the small nations of the Organization.

The representatives of China, India and Iraq declared their intention of abstaining from voting on the USSR amendment. The Chinese representative considered the amendment as not likely to facilitate the implementation of the advisory opinion. The representative of India thought that adoption of the amendment would create the impression that the Fourth Committee was prejudging the issue. The representative of Iraq felt the phrase "constitutes a violation of the Charter of the United Nations" in the USSR amendment could not be endorsed by the Fourth Committee without further discussion and possibly an opinion by the International Court of Justice.

The Fourth Committee at its 198th meeting on 5 December voted on the proposals before it. It rejected by a roll-call vote of 9 in favour, to 16 against, with 22 abstentions, the USSR amendment. The joint draft resolution (A/C.4/L.128) as amended, was then voted on by roll-call, first paragraph by paragraph and then as a whole. The draft resolution as a whole, as amended, was approved by 27 votes to 12, with 8 abstentions.¹⁶²

b. RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED BY THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY

The General Assembly at its 321st and 322nd plenary meetings on 12 and 13 December considered the report of the Fourth Committee (A/1643) containing the texts of the two resolutions proposed for adoption. The Assembly also had before it a report from the Fifth Committee (A/1622) on the financial implications of these resolutions. The Fifth Committee, after considering the question at its 278th meeting on 11 December and taking into account reports of the Secretary-General (A/C.5/439) and the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions (A/1651), reported to the Assembly that the adoption of draft resolution I proposed by the Fourth Committee would involve an additional appropriation of $14,000 in the 1951 budget.

In addition, a draft resolution was proposed by Brazil, Denmark, Peru, Syria, Thailand and the United States (A/1681) to replace resolution I recommended by the Fourth Committee, in the event that that resolution was not adopted. Cuba submitted amendments (A/1688) to this joint draft resolution.

An amendment was submitted by the USSR (A/1661) to draft resolution II, recommended by the Fourth Committee.

The sponsors of the joint draft resolution stated that it was an attempt to reach a compromise. It proposed that the General Assembly:

- (1) accept the advisory opinion of the Court with respect to South West Africa;
- (2) urge South Africa to take the necessary steps to give effect to the Court's opinion;
- (3) establish a committee of five to confer with South Africa concerning the procedural measures necessary for implementing the Court's opinion;
- (4) authorize the proposed committee, as an interim measure, to examine the report on the administration of South West Africa and petitions relating to the Territory and to submit a report to the Assembly.

The amendments submitted by Cuba (A/1688) were accepted by the sponsors of the joint draft resolution.

The first amendment provided that petitions could be received "from communities or sections of the population of the Territory" to replace "from the inhabitants of the Territory" since under the Mandate petitions could be received from institutions and various organizations as well as from the inhabitants. The second Cuban amendment provided that the Committee would report to the Assembly's next regular session.

The representative of the United Kingdom explained that it was the policy of his Government not to take part in international committees dealing with disputes in which fellow Commonwealth Governments were involved, and that, therefore, it could not form part of the proposed Committee of five. On the suggestion of the United States representative Denmark was substituted for the United Kingdom as a member of the committee.

The General Assembly at its 322nd plenary meeting on 13 December voted on the various proposals before it.

Draft resolution I of the Fourth Committee¹⁶³ was rejected in a paragraph-by-paragraph vote. As only the first paragraph of the preamble was approved (by 15 votes to 5, with 15 abstentions), the President did not put the resolution as a whole to the vote.

Before a vote was taken on the joint draft resolution (A/1681), as amended by Cuba, the representative of the Union of South Africa, speaking on a point of order, declared that the term "compromise resolution" applied to the draft before the Assembly might be susceptible to some misunderstanding. He stated that South Africa did not take part in the discussions leading up to the new draft resolution and was not in any sense a party to the "compromise".

The draft resolution was then voted on, first by a paragraph-by-paragraph vote, and then by a roll-call vote on the draft as a whole. The preamble was adopted by 43 votes to 6, with 5 abstentions. Paragraph 1 was adopted by 43 votes to 6, with 7 abstentions. Paragraph 2 was adopted by 38 votes to 6, with 8 abstentions. Paragraph 3 was adopted by 43 votes to 6, with 8 abstentions. Paragraph 4 was adopted by 39 votes to 6, with 7 abstentions. The resolution as a whole was adopted by 45 votes to 6, with 5 abstentions.

The representative of South Africa in explaining his vote against the resolution said that instead of creating the machinery to ensure the calm and objective consideration of the problem of the international position of South West Africa in the light of the Court's advisory opinion and other relevant factors, the adopted resolution practically closed the door to this method of approach. He considered the preamble a one-sided, partial and incomplete recapitulation of the Court's advisory opinion. Its operative part provided for the establishment unilaterally of machinery for the examination of reports and petitions before the next session of the General Assembly by a body established for a different purpose and entrusted with this task without consultation with South Africa. He could not reconcile this provision with the recognition, in the immediately preceding paragraph, of the principle of conferring with the Union of South Africa concerning measures necessary to implement the advisory opinion of the Court. The principle of representation by personalities on the Special Committee, he pointed out, had been discarded in favour of representation of countries.

He went on to state that the Assembly had failed to consider:

- (1) the new facts discovered since the delivery of the advisory opinion of the Court on 11 July 1950, of which the Court had no knowledge;

¹⁶³ For text, see p. 817.

(2) the admitted danger to South Africa as the administrator of South West Africa, of having her own internal policies criticized under the cloak of criticizing the administration of the Territory in violation of Article 2, paragraph 7, of the Charter;

(3) the genuine desire of South Africa to have this long-standing matter settled by way of unfettered consultation and in a spirit of realism.

The representative of Belgium said he abstained from the vote for two reasons. The first was that no mention was made in the preamble of the most important question asked of the Court, that is, whether or not South Africa was compelled to place South West Africa under a Trusteeship regime. The second was that before the negotiations, which were referred to in the resolution, the General Assembly unilaterally decided that a commission set up by the Assembly and without consultations with the Union of South Africa would consider the reports and petitions submitted to it.

The representative of India explained that although his delegation preferred the original resolution of the Fourth Committee, it had supported the Assembly's decision in a spirit of compromise and for two main reasons. In the first place there was no real difference of opinion in the United Nations on the desirability of accepting the Court's advisory opinion, nor any difference on the desirability of South Africa implementing that opinion without further delay. Secondly, India recalled the assurances given by the representative of South Africa in the Fourth Committee that his Government would give the most careful consideration to any resolution adopted by the Assembly. He therefore hoped that the widely-held view of the Fourth Committee in favour of implementing the Court's advisory opinion should not be obscured by any differences over the most practical method of putting it into effect.

In the view of the representative of the United Kingdom, the resolution adopted provided the best available basis for the implementation of the Court's opinion. He nevertheless placed on record the fact that his Government considered the original resolution introduced in the Fourth Committee by Denmark and the seven co-sponsors (which had not been voted on) as preferable to the resolution adopted. He hoped that the negotiating committee would be able to work out a solution of the problem, acceptable to both the General Assembly and to the South African Government.

The USSR amendment to draft resolution II of the Fourth Committee (A/1661) was then voted on. This amendment recommended the addition of a paragraph noting that "the action of the Union of South Africa in adopting a law on the incorporation of South West Africa in the Union of South Africa constitutes a violation of the Charter of the United Nations". It was rejected by a roll-call vote of 24 to 8, with 22 abstentions.

Draft resolution II of the Fourth Committee was adopted by a roll-call vote of 30 to 10, with 16 abstentions.

The representative of the Union of South Africa repeated the reasons given by his delegation before the Fourth Committee for voting against the proposal.

The texts of the resolutions adopted (449 A and B (V)) are as follows:

A

The General Assembly,

Considering that the International Court of Justice, duly consulted by the General Assembly pursuant to resolution 338(IV) of 6 December 1949, reached the conclusion that the Territory of South West Africa is a Territory under the international Mandate assumed by the Union of South Africa on 17 December 1920,

Considering that the International Court of Justice is of the opinion that the Union of South Africa continues to have the international obligations laid down in Article 22 of the Covenant of the League of Nations and in the Mandate for South West Africa,

Considering that the International Court of Justice is of the opinion that the functions of supervision over the administration of the Territory of South West Africa by the Union of South Africa should be exercised by the United Nations, to which the annual reports as well as the petitions from the inhabitants of the Territory are to be submitted,

Considering that, in accordance with the opinion of the International Court of Justice, the Union of South Africa is under an obligation to accept the compulsory jurisdiction of the Court as provided by Article 37 of the Statute of the International Court of Justice, by Article 80, paragraph 1, of the Charter of the United Nations and by Article 7 of the Mandate for South West Africa,

Considering that the International Court of Justice is of the opinion that the Union of South Africa acting alone is not competent to modify the international status of the Territory of South West Africa, and that the competence to determine and modify the international status of the Territory rests with the Union of South Africa acting with the consent of the United Nations,

Considering that the Government of the Union of South Africa should continue to administer the Territory of South West Africa in accordance with the Mandate conferred by the Principal Allied and Associated Powers upon His Britannic Majesty to be exercised on his behalf by the Government of the Union of South Africa,

Considering that it is incumbent upon the Government of the Union of South Africa to promote to the utmost in the administration of the Territory the material and moral well-being and social progress of its inhabitants as a sacred trust of civilization, subject to the existing Mandate, and to give effect to the obligations which it assumed under the Mandate,

1. Accepts the advisory opinion of the International Court of Justice with respect to South West Africa;

2. Urges the Government of the Union of South Africa to take the necessary steps to give effect to the opinion of the International Court of Justice, including the transmission of reports on the administration of the Territory of South West Africa and of petitions from communities or sections of the population of the Territory;

3. Establishes a Committee of five consisting of the representatives of Denmark, Syria, Thailand, the United States of America and Uruguay, to confer with the Union of South Africa concerning the procedural measures necessary for implementing the advisory opinion of the International Court of Justice and to submit a report thereon to the next regular session of the General Assembly;

4. Authorizes the Committee, as an interim measure, pending the completion of its task referred to in paragraph 3, and as far as possible in accordance with the procedure of the former Mandates System, to examine the report on the administration of the Territory of South West Africa covering the period since the last report, as well as petitions and any other matters relating to the Territory that may be transmitted to the Secretary-General, and to submit a report thereon to the next regular session of the General Assembly.

B

The General Assembly,

Considering that the General Assembly, by its resolutions 65(I) of 14 December 1946, 141(II) of 1 November 1947, 227(III) of 26 November 1948 and

337(IV) of 6 December 1949, recommended that the Mandated Territory of South West Africa be placed under the International Trusteeship System and invited the Government of the Union of South Africa to propose, for the consideration of the General Assembly, a Trusteeship Agreement for the aforesaid Territory,

Considering that the International Court of Justice, duly consulted by the General Assembly in pursuance of resolution 338(IV) of 6 December 1949, delivered the opinion that the Territory of South West Africa is under the international Mandate assumed by the Union of South Africa on 17 December 1920,

Considering that in accordance with Articles 75, 77, paragraph 1a, 79 and 80, paragraph 2, of the Charter of the United Nations the Trusteeship System has been applied to all mandated territories which have not achieved independence, with the sole exception of the Territory of South West Africa,

Considering that, under the terms of the Charter of the United Nations, it is clear that the International Trusteeship System takes the place of the former Mandates System instituted by the League of Nations and, further, that there is no specific provision indicating the permanent co-existence of the Mandates System with the International Trusteeship System,

1. Reiterates its resolutions 65(I) of 14 December 1946, 141(II) of 1 November 1947, 227(III) of 26 November 1948, and 337(IV) of 6 December 1949 to the effect that the Territory of South West Africa be placed under the International Trusteeship System;

2. Reiterates that the normal way of modifying the international status of the Territory would be to place it under the Trusteeship System by means of a Trusteeship Agreement in accordance with the provisions of Chapter XII of the Charter.

ANNEX. PETITIONS EXAMINED BY THE TRUSTEESHIP COUNCIL DURING 1950

During 1950 the Trusteeship Council examined a record number of 361 petitions, of which 254 were received by the Visiting Mission to West Africa. The Council's ad hoc Committee on Petitions undertook a preliminary examination of all these petitions, with the exception of those relating to the Bugufi area, concerning Tanganyika and Ruanda-Urundi, and the petitions or parts of petitions relating to the unification of "Eweland" or of Togoland, which were examined in the full Council.

The ad hoc Committee appointed by the Council at its sixth session was composed of Australia (Chairman), China, the Dominican Republic, New Zealand, Philippines and the United States; it held 30 meetings. The ad hoc Committee established at the seventh session was composed of the Philippines (Chairman), Belgium, China, Dominican Republic, New Zealand and the United States; it held fourteen meetings.

The ad hoc Committee submitted eight reports to the Council at each session. These reports contained (a) summaries of the questions raised in the petitions, (b) summaries of the observations of the Administering Authorities concerned, (c) document references to these observations and to the ad hoc Committee meetings during which the relevant petitions were discussed and (d) draft resolutions recommended for adoption by the Council. With one exception, as shown in connexion with the first petition listed below, the Council approved, in most cases unanimously, the resolutions as submitted by the ad hoc Committee, as follows:

During its sixth session, the Council adopted resolutions 119-122(VI) on 20 February, 124(VI) and 125(VI) on 27 February and 130-230(VI) on 3 April.

During its seventh session, the Council adopted resolutions 235-243(VII) on 29 June, 244-249(VII) on 10 July, 251-292(VII) on 17 July and 294-297(VII) on 20 July.

(In the following tabulation, the roman numeral indicating session number is omitted from the reference for simplification.)

A list of all petitions examined by the Council during 1950, with relevant document references, is given below. The listed petitions concerning both Tanganyika and Ruanda-Urundi relate to the question of the Bugufi area, which was not referred to the ad hoc Committee but was dealt with by the full Council in resolution 116(VI), adopted on 9 February. Similarly, resolution 250(VII), adopted by the Council on 14 July, relates to the Ewe question and the unification of both Togolands, raised in 140 petitions; other resolutions on additional questions raised in many of these petitions were adopted on the recommendation of the ad hoc Committee on Petitions.

Unless otherwise stated, any omission in the sequence of petition document numbers indicates that the omitted petition was examined by the Council prior to 1950.

VII. Legal Questions

A. CASES BEFORE THE INTERNATIONAL COURT OF JUSTICE

1. Colombian-Peruvian Asylum Case

a. COLOMBIAN APPLICATION

On 15 October 1949, Colombia filed an Application¹ with the International Court of Justice against Peru, concerning a dispute which had arisen between the two countries in connexion with the asylum granted to Victor Raul Haya de la Torre in the Colombian Embassy at Lima. The Application declared that the dispute arose from the fact that on 3 January 1949, Mr. Haya de la Torre, a Peruvian citizen and chief of the American People's Revolutionary Alliance (a political party in Peru) came to the Colombian Embassy, presented himself as a political refugee, and begged the Ambassador to grant him asylum in the Embassy. Asylum having been granted, the Colombian Ambassador notified the fact in writing to the Ministry for Foreign Affairs and Religion of Peru according to the provisions of the 1928 Convention on Asylum (signed at Havana on 20 February 1928 during the Sixth International Conference of American States), and requested from the Peruvian Government the guaranty of safe conduct necessary for the departure of Mr. Haya de la Torre from Peru.

The Application went on to state that the Peruvian Government refused to deliver the safe-conduct, asserting that Peru was not under any legal obligation to accept the unilateral qualification of asylum given by the Colombian Ambassador. Direct negotiations having proved useless, the two Governments agreed to submit the dispute to the International Court of Justice. Having attempted in vain to draw up a special agreement to submit their dispute to the Court, they finally agreed by an Act (Acta) signed at Lima on 31 August 1949 that each Party would have the right to submit its application unilaterally to the Court without this measure being considered as unfriendly towards the other Party.

The Application then explained that it was based:

A. On the general and special obligations arising for Peru and Colombia from the following instruments: (a) the Bolivarian Agreement on Extradition (signed at Caracas on 18 July 1911, by Ecuador, Bolivia, Colombia, Peru and Venezuela during the Congress known as the Bolivarian Congress (Congreso Bolivariano) and in force between the signatory States, which, in its Article 18, recognizes the institution of asylum in conformity with the principles of international law) and (b) the Convention on Asylum adopted and signed at the Sixth International Conference of American States in 1928 and in force in Colombia, Peru, Brazil, Costa Rica, Cuba, Ecuador, El Salvador, Guatemala, Mexico, Nicaragua, Panama, the Dominican Republic and Uruguay.

B. On the special juridical nature of the American institution of asylum, as recognized by the law applied in American States and the practice followed by them since the last century.

C. Generally, on the rules of American positive and customary international law.

In virtue of the agreement signed at Lima on 31 August 1949, Colombia filed the aforesaid Application, together with a certified true copy of the agreement. On the same day, the Agent of the Peruvian Government also deposited with the Registry of the Court a certified true translation of the agreement of Lima.

In its Application, Colombia asked the Court to decide on the following questions:

First question: Within the limits of "the obligations resulting in particular from the Bolivarian Agreement on Extradition of 18 July 1911, and the Convention on Asylum of 20 February 1948, both in force between Colombia and Peru and in general from American international law, was Colombia competent, as the country granting asylum, to qualify the offence for the purposes of said asylum?"

Second question: In the specific case under consideration, was Peru as the territorial State, bound to give the guarantees necessary for the departure of the refugee from the country, with due regard to the inviolability of his person?

By an Order of 20 October 1949, the Acting President of the Court, as the Court was not sitting, fixed the time-limits for the presentation by the Parties of the written proceedings as follows: 30 December 1949 for the Colombian Memorial; 10 March 1950 for the Peruvian Counter-Memorial; 20 April 1950 for the Colombian Reply; 30 May 1950 for the Peruvian Rejoinder.

At the request of the Colombian Government, the time-limit for the presentation of the Colombian Memorial was later extended to 10 January 1950. The time-limit for submission of the Peruvian Counter-Memorial was extended to 21 March 1950 and, at the request of the Peruvian Government, the time-limit for the presentation of the Peruvian Rejoinder was extended to 15 June 1950.

The necessary documents were deposited within the time-limits as extended, and the case was ready for hearing on 15 June 1950. As the Court did not include upon the Bench any judge of the nationality of the Parties, the latter availed themselves of the right to choose judges ad hoc. The judges ad hoc designated were Jose Joaquin Caicedo Castilla, Doctor of Law, Professor, former Deputy and former President of the Senate, Ambassador, for Colombia, and Luis Alayza y Paz Soldan, Doctor of Law, Professor, former Minister, Ambassador, for Peru.

The opening of the oral proceedings was fixed for 26 September 1950. Public sittings were held by the Court on 26-29 September and on 2, 3, 6 and 9 October 1950. In the course of the sittings, the Court heard statements by J. M. Yepes, Agent, and Alfredo Vasquez, Advocate, on behalf of Colombia, and by Carlos Sayan Alvarez, Agent, and Georges Scelle, Counsel, on behalf of Peru.

Colombia presented two submissions to the Court. These asked the Court to adjudge and declare:

I. That the Republic of Colombia, as the country granting asylum, is competent to qualify the offence for the purpose of the said asylum, within the limits of the obligations resulting in particular from the Bolivarian Agreement on Extradition of 18 July 1911, and the Havana Convention on Asylum of 20 February 1948, and of American international law in general;

II. That the Republic of Peru, as the territorial State, is bound in the case now before the Court to give the guarantees necessary for the departure of M. Victor Raul Haya de la Torre from the country, with due regard to the inviolability of his person.² Colombia further called upon the Court to declare Peru's counter-claim inadmissible.

The counter-claim of Peru was stated in its final form during the oral statement of 3 October 1950 in the following terms:

May it please the Court:

To adjudge and declare as a counter-claim under Article 63 of the Rules of Court, and in the same decision, that the grant of asylum by the Colombian Ambassador at Lima to Victor Raul Haya de la Torre was made in violation of Article I, paragraph I, and Article 2, paragraph 2, item 1 (inciso primero), of the Convention on Asylum signed in 1928, and that in any case the maintenance of the asylum constitutes at the present time a violation of that treaty.³

Peru also asked the Court to set aside the submissions of Colombia.

b. COURT'S DECISION

(1) facts of the Case

In reaching its decision, which was given on 20 November 1950,⁴ the Court first gave a summary of the facts of the case. It stated that on 3 October 1948 a military rebellion broke out in Peru. It was put down the same day and, on the following day, a decree was published charging a political party, the American People's Revolutionary Party, with having prepared and directed the rebellion. A denunciation was then made against Victor Raul Haya de la Torre, leader of the party, and other members of the party, as being responsible for the rebellion. On 11 October 1948 judicial proceedings were begun against Mr. Haya de la Torre and others on a charge of military rebellion, and on 25 October the arrest of persons who had not yet been detained was ordered. As he was still at liberty on 16 November, summonses were published in the official gazette El Peruano ordering Mr. Haya de la Torre and others to appear before the Examining Magistrate. On the night of 3 January 1949, however, Mr. Haya de la Torre presented himself at the Colombian Embassy in Lima and was granted asylum.

Meanwhile, on 27 October 1948, a Military Junta had assumed power in Peru and had published a decree providing for courts-martial for summary procedure in cases of rebellion, sedition and rioting. But this decree was not applied to the legal proceedings against Mr. Haya de la Torre and others and it was declared before the Court that the decree was not applicable.

On 4 October, the day after the military rebellion, a state of siege was declared, suspending certain constitutional rights; it was renewed on 2 November and 2 December 1948, and on 2 January 1949.

Having granted asylum to Mr. Haya de la Torre the night before, the Colombian Ambassador informed the Peruvian Government the next day, 4 January 1949. At the same time he asked for a safe-conduct from the Peruvian Government to enable the refugee to leave the country. On 14 January 1949, the Ambassador stated further that Mr. Haya de la Torre had been qualified as a political refugee. The Peruvian Government disputed this qualification and refused to grant a safe-conduct. Subsequent diplomatic correspondence ended with the signature in Lima on 31 August 1949, of the Act by which the two Governments agreed to submit the case to the International Court of Justice.

(2) Colombians First Submission

The Court declared that if Colombia by its first submission (see above) intended to allege that Colombia, as the State granting asylum, was competent to qualify the offence only provisionally and without binding effect for Peru, the solution would not remain a matter of doubt. It was evident, the Court went on, that the diplomatic representative who has to determine whether a refugee is to be granted asylum or not must have the competence to make such a provisional qualification. After examining whether the conditions required for granting asylum are fulfilled, the diplomatic representative would pronounce his opinion, and the territorial State would not be deprived of its right to contest the qualification. If that opinion were contested, the controversy might then be settled by the methods provided by the Parties. That was not, however, the meaning which Colombia had put on its submission. The written and oral arguments submitted on behalf of Colombia showed that its claim must be understood in the sense that Colombia, as the State granting asylum, was competent to qualify the nature of the offence by a unilateral and definitive decision binding on Peru.

The first of the treaties Colombia invoked—the Bolivarian Agreement of 1911—confined itself in one article to recognizing the institution of asylum in conformity with the principles of international law. The Court declared that these principles do not recognize any rule of unilateral and definitive qualification by the State granting diplomatic asylum. Another article in that Agreement relied upon by Colombia concerned extradition of a criminal refugee from the territory of the State in which he sought refuge. The arguments submitted in this respect, the Court argued, revealed a confusion between territorial asylum (extradition), on the one hand, and diplomatic asylum, on the other. In the case of extradition, the refugee was on the territory of the State of refuge; if asylum were granted to him, such decision would not derogate from the sovereignty of the State in which the offence was committed. In the case of diplomatic asylum, on the other hand, the refugee was on the territory of the State in which he had committed the offence; the decision to grant asylum derogated from the sovereignty of the territorial State and removed the offender from the jurisdiction of that State.

The second treaty invoked by Colombia—the Havana Convention on Asylum of 1928—in the judgment of the Court, does not contain any provision conferring on the State granting asylum a unilateral competence to qualify the offence with definitive and binding force for the territorial State either explicitly or implicitly. The third treaty—the Montevideo Convention on Political Asylum of 1933—had not been ratified by Peru and could not be invoked against that State.

The Court then referred to "American international law in general" which Colombia had invoked. The Party which relies on a regional or local custom peculiar to Latin-American States, the Court declared, must prove that this custom is established in such a manner that it has become binding on the other Party. The Court argued, however, that the facts brought to its knowledge disclosed "so much uncertainty and contradiction, so much fluctuation and discrepancy in the exercise of diplomatic asylum and in the official views expressed on various occasions, there has been so much inconsistency in the rapid succession of conventions on asylum, ratified by some States and rejected by others, and the practice has been so much influenced by considerations of political expediency in the various cases, that it is not possible to discern in all this any constant and uniform usage, accepted as law, with regard to the alleged rule of unilateral and definitive qualification of the offence."⁵

The Court could not therefore find that Colombia had proved the existence of such a custom. The Court went on to state that even if it could be supposed that such a custom existed between Latin-American States only, it could not be invoked against Peru which, "far from having by its attitude adhered to it, has, on the contrary, repudiated it by refraining from ratifying the Montevideo Conventions of 1933 and 1939, which were the first to include a rule concerning the qualification of the offence in matters of diplomatic asylum."⁶

For these reasons, the Court arrived at the conclusion that Colombia, as the State granting asylum, was not competent to qualify the offence by a unilateral and definitive decision, binding on Peru. The Court reached this decision by 14 votes to 2.

The Judges in favour were Judges Jules Basdevant (France), Alejandro Alvarez (Chile), Jose Gustavo Guerrero (El Salvador), Green H. Hackworth (United States), Helge Klaestad (Norway), Sergei Borisovitch Krylov (USSR), Sir Arnold Duncan McNair (United Kingdom), Hsu Mo (China), Abdel Hamid Badawi Pasha (Egypt), John E. Read (Canada), Charles De Visscher (Belgium), Bohdan Winiarski (Poland), Milovan Zoricic (Yugoslavia) and Luis Alayza y Paz Soldan (ad hoc Judge for Peru); Judges Jose Philadelpho de Barros e Azevedo (Brazil) and Jose Joaquin Caicedo Castilla (ad hoc Judge for Colombia) dissented.

(3) Colombia's Second Submission

Colombia's second submission was that Peru was under the obligation to issue a safe-conduct to enable the refugee to leave the country in safety. The Court, setting aside for the time being the question of whether asylum was regularly granted and maintained, noted that the clause in the Havana Convention which provided guarantees for a refugee was applicable solely to a case where the territorial State demanded the departure of the refugee from its territory; it was only after such a demand that the diplomatic agent who granted asylum could, in turn, require a safe-conduct.

The Court remarked that there undoubtedly existed a practice whereby the diplomatic representative who grants asylum immediately requests a safe-conduct without awaiting a request from the territorial State for the departure of a refugee. "This procedure meets certain requirements: the diplomatic agent is naturally desirous that the presence of the refugee on his premises should not be prolonged; and the government of the country, for its part, desires in a great number of cases that its political opponent who has obtained asylum should depart. This concordance of views suffices to explain the practice which has been noted in this connexion, but this practice does not and cannot mean that the State, to whom such a request for a safe-conduct has been addressed, is legally bound to accede to it."⁷

"In the present case", the Court decided, "the Peruvian Government has not requested that Haya de la Torre should leave Peru. It has contested the legality of the asylum granted to him and has refused to deliver a safe-conduct. In such circumstances the Colombian Government is not entitled to claim that the Peruvian Government should give the guarantees necessary for the departure of Haya de la Torre from the country, with due regard to the inviolability of his person."

The Court reached the decision to reject the second Colombian submission by 15 votes to 1.

The Judges in favour were Judges Basdevant, Alvarez, Guerrero, Hackworth, Klaestad, Krylov, McNair, Hsu Mo, Badawi Pasha, Read, De Visscher, Winiarski, Zoricic, Alayza y Paz Soldan (Judge ad hoc) and Azevedo. Judge ad hoc Caicedo dissented.

(4) Peru's Counter Claim

In a counter-claim, Peru had asked the Court to declare that asylum had been granted to Mr. Haya de la Torre in violation of the Havana Convention, first, because Mr. Haya de la Torre was accused, not of a political offence, but of a common crime and, secondly, because the urgency which was required under the Havana Convention in order to justify asylum, was absent in that case.

Having observed that Peru had at no time asked for the surrender of the refugee, the Court examined the first point. In this connexion, the Court noted that the "sole accusation contained in all the documents emanating from the Peruvian legal authorities is that of military rebellion, and the Government of Peru has not established that military rebellion in itself constitutes a common crime. Article 248 of the Peruvian Code of Military Justice of 1939 even tends to prove the contrary, for it makes a distinction between military rebellion and common crimes by providing that: 'Common crimes committed during the course of, and in connexion with, a rebellion, shall be punishable in conformity with the laws, irrespective of the rebellion.'"

These considerations led the Court to conclude that "the first objection made by the Government of Peru against the asylum is not justified and that on this point the counter-claim is not well founded and must be dismissed".⁸

On the question of urgency, the Court, having observed that the essential justification of asylum lay in the imminence or persistence of a danger to the person of the refugee, analysed the facts of the case.

Three months had elapsed between the military rebellion and the grant of asylum, the Court pointed out. There was no question of protecting Mr. Haya de la Torre for humanitarian considerations against the violent and uncontrolled action of irresponsible elements of the population; the danger which confronted Mr. Haya de la Torre was that of having to face legal proceedings. The Havana Convention was not intended to protect from regular legal proceedings a citizen who had plotted against the institutions of his country. It was not sufficient to be accused of a political offence in order to be entitled to receive asylum; asylum could only be justified in cases where arbitrary action was substituted for the rule of law. It had not been proved that the situation in Peru at the time implied the subordination of justice to the executive or the abolition of judicial guarantees.

⁷ Colombian-Peruvian asylum case, Judgment of November 20th, 1950: I.C.J., Reports 1950, p. 279.

The Court held that the Havana Convention was not intended to establish a legal system which would guarantee to persons accused of political offences the privilege of evading their national jurisdiction. Such a conception would come into conflict with one of the oldest traditions of Latin America, that of non-intervention. The Court rejected the argument that the Havana Convention was intended to afford a general protection of asylum to any person prosecuted for political offences, either in the course of revolutionary events, or in the more or less troubled times that follow, for the sole reason that it must be assumed that such events interfere with the administration of justice. The adoption of such a criterion, the Court held, would lead to foreign interference of a particularly offensive nature in the domestic affairs of States.

As for the numerous cases of asylum cited by Colombia, the Court was of the opinion that considerations of convenience or political expediency rather than any feeling of legal obligation seemed to have prompted the territorial State to recognize asylum.

While declaring that at the time at which asylum was granted, on 3 January 1949, there was no case of urgency within the meaning of the Havana Convention, the Court declared that this in no way constituted a criticism of the Colombian Ambassador. His appreciation of the case was not a relevant factor to the question of the validity of the asylum; only the objective reality of the facts was of importance.

The Court therefore came to the conclusion that the grant of asylum was not in conformity with Article 2, paragraph 2, of the Havana Convention. On the first point, that is, that asylum shall not be granted to persons accused of common crimes, the Court by 15 votes to 1, rejected the Peruvian contention that Mr. Haya de la Torre was accused of common crimes. It noted that military rebellion, the only count against him, was not in itself a common crime. But on the second point, that is, that the urgency which is required under the Havana Convention in order to justify asylum, was absent in the present case, the Peruvian counter-claim was allowed by 10 votes to 6 (Judges Alvarez, Zoricic, Badawi Pasha, Read, and Azevedo and Judge ad hoc Caicedo).

c. DISSENTING OPINIONS

Judges Alvarez, Badawi Pasha, Read and Azevedo and Judge ad hoc Caicedo appended to the Court's judgment statements of their dissenting opinions.

(1) Colombians First Submission

Judge Azevedo and Judge ad hoc Caicedo took the view that Colombia, as the State granting asylum, was entitled to qualify the nature of the offence by a unilateral and definitive decision binding on Peru. Judge Azevedo held that unilateral qualification of asylum was a "necessary consequence of the normal functioning of asylum as understood in Latin-American practice".⁹

Judge ad hoc Caicedo stated that the "right to qualify the nature of an offence must necessarily lie with the State granting asylum, otherwise the very institution of asylum could no longer exist". He said that to "recognize the right of the local State to qualify the nature of the offence would be equivalent to allowing this qualification to depend upon the opinion of the government, whose interests would urge it to act against the refugee".¹⁰ He added that unilateral qualification was in fact inherent in the very nature of the asylum itself and that it was essential for the continued existence of the institution of asylum as it is understood in Latin America.

Judge Alvarez, who concurred with the judgment of the Court with respect to the question of unilateral qualifications of offence, held that "it should not be assumed that the State which makes that qualification has the last word in this respect, and that its appreciation is definitive and irrevocable. This qualification may be questioned by the territorial State, and if agreement cannot be reached in this respect, the case must be submitted to arbitration or to another means of peaceful settlement. Thus, in the last resort, it is a third party, or international justice, which decides on the nature of the offence."¹¹

(2) Colombia's Second Submission

With regard to the second submission of Colombia, that is, the question of safe-conduct, only Judge ad hoc Caicedo maintained that Peru was bound to deliver a safe conduct to Mr. Haya de la Torre. Similarly, only Judge ad hoc Alayza y Paz Soldan, who did not deliver a written opinion, was unable to agree with the judgment of the Court rejecting the contention that Mr. Haya de la Torre was accused of a common crime.

⁹ Ibid., p. 347. ¹⁰ Ibid., p. 364. ¹¹ Ibid., p. 297.

(3) Peru's Counter-Claim

On the question of urgency, Judges Alvarez, Azevedo, Badawi Pasha, Read and Zoricic and Judge ad hoc Caicedo dissented from the judgment of the Court and held that the granting of asylum by the Colombian Ambassador at Lima to Mr. Haya de la Torre was made in conformity with the first provision of Article 2 of the Convention on Asylum signed at Havana in 1928, in that it was granted in an "urgent" case. On this point five of the Judges delivered written opinions and Judge Zoricic concurred with Judge Read.

Judge Alvarez maintained that the meaning of the term "urgency" should be interpreted in accordance with the nature of asylum in Latin America, that is, the need to act with the utmost speed in a given situation. He observed that there is "no urgency in a case which involves only the possibility of an individual being persecuted, but there is urgency if he is already being persecuted and consequently faces an immediate danger". He added that it is for the "State of refuge to appreciate whether or not there is urgency to grant asylum at the time it is requested. If the territorial State considers that there was no urgency at the time, it must immediately present a claim: any delay in the presentation of such a claim is a ground for its rejection, for in such a case the territorial State may be presumed to have admitted that urgency existed."¹²

Judge Azevedo felt that the facts fulfilled the requirements of "urgency", and was unable to accept "that the onus of proving urgency should, at the eleventh hour, be placed upon the Applicant who, in respect of the counter-claim, became the Respondent, when, in the absence of any objection regularly presented on the point of urgency, the procedural rule should be applied according to which facts not disputed by the other party should be assumed to be true".¹³

Judge Badawi Pasha referred to the distinction between a common criminal and a political offender and stated that "the notion of urgency is not the same for the two categories of offenders and that the consequences of asylum also differ according to whether the refugee is a common criminal or a political offender. In the former case, as soon as urgency in its strict sense has ceased, or if it has never even existed, the territorial State may demand his surrender, whereas in the latter case it is the nature of the situation (revolution or rebellion) which determines the urgency and justifies the request and immediate grant of a safe-conduct."¹⁴

Judge Read stated that he rejected both the Colombian and Peruvian extreme views on the question of urgency. The Colombian argument, he said, was based upon an attempt to discredit the administration of justice in Peru, coupled with charges of administrative interference in judicial process. In this matter, he submitted, it was sufficient to say that Colombia had not proved its case, and that there was no justification for discrediting the administration of justice or for any lack of confidence in that administration, whether in Peru or in any other State. Peru, he pointed out, had contended that the use of the expression "urgent cases" limited the grant of asylum to "incidents in which the fugitive is being pursued by an angry mob or perhaps by a partially organized force meting out a form of crude and popular pseudo-justice in a period intervening between a successful revolution and the formation of a new organized judicial system. The basis of this view is that it is inconceivable that the Governments represented at the Panamerican Conference at Havana in 1928 could possibly have had in mind a system which would protect political offenders from police measures and prosecution and punishment under the laws of the country in which their offences had been committed."¹⁵

In the opinion of Judge Read, any attempt to interpret the expression "urgent cases" as limiting diplomatic asylum to protection from mob violence was unacceptable. He argued "that the expression was to be construed as restricting the grant of diplomatic asylum, as regards political offenders, to cases in which the grant was made 'in times of political disturbance' of a revolutionary character, and as preventing the grant of asylum during periods of tranquility. In the present case, Judge Read concluded that 'it has been established that the asylum was granted by the Colombian Ambassador to a political offender 'in times of political disturbance' between a successful revolution and the restoration of settled conditions in Peru. It follows that this was an urgent case and that the grant of asylum by the Ambassador was not made in violation of the provisions of Article 2 of the Havana Convention."¹⁶

Other points of general interest were discussed in the various opinions. Thus, the great importance of the institution of asylum in Latin-American countries was repeatedly emphasized and Judge ad hoc Caicedo, in particular, stated that it was not contrary to the principle of non-intervention. Judge Alvarez considered that it was part of "American international law" or rather "Latin-American international law" which was a subdivision of the former and not binding upon the United States. In his view such a system of law was not subordinate to universal international law but correlated to it. Judge Read used the word "American" in a special sense—as relating to a regional group of States, the twenty Latin-American Republics. With regard to "American international law", he indicated that it was "unnecessary to do more than confirm its existence—a body of conventional and customary law, complementary to universal international law, and governing inter-State relations in the Pan American world".¹⁷

d. REQUEST FOR INTERPRETATION OF THE COURT'S JUDGMENT

On 20 November 1950, the Colombian Government deposited with the International Court of Justice a request for the interpretation of the judgment rendered the same day by the Court.¹⁸ This request stated that Colombia intended to comply with the decision of the Court in the Colombian-Peruvian asylum case. It went on to declare, however, that the Court's judgment contained "gaps of such a nature as to render its execution impossible."

This conclusion, the request explained, was based on, inter alia, the following grounds:

In stating that the Government of Peru has not proved that the offence with which the refugee was charged was a common crime, the Court has admitted that the qualification made by Colombia was well founded. In the circumstances a question arises: must this qualification, which has been declared correct and approved by the Court, be considered nevertheless as null and void because a dispute has arisen on the preliminary and theoretical question of the right to qualification in matters of asylum?

... it does not seem possible to suppose that the Court, in deciding that the grant of asylum was not made in conformity with Article 2, paragraph 2, of the Havana Convention, intended to order, even in an indirect manner, that the refugee should be surrendered, or even less that it intended to declare that Colombia would violate an international undertaking if she abstained from making the surrender which has not been ordered by the Court.

Colombia then asked the Court to reply to three questions. Was the judgment to be construed as meaning:

(1) that the qualification made by the Colombian Ambassador of the offence attributed to Mr. Haya de la Torre was correct and that legal effect should be given to it?

(2) that Peru was not entitled to demand surrender of the refugee, and that Colombia was not bound to surrender him?

(3) or, on the contrary, that Colombia was bound to surrender the refugee?

Peru in a letter of 22 November 1950 took the position that the judgment was perfectly clear; also, it was argued, the Colombian request was inadmissible because it sought to obtain, not an interpretation, but a new decision supplementing the first, and because the conditions prescribed in Article 60 of the Statute of the Court for interpretation of a judgment were not fulfilled.

On 27 November 1950, the Court delivered its judgment on Colombia's request for an interpretation of the Court's judgment of 20 November. By 12 votes to 1 the Court held that the request was inadmissible.

In its judgment, the Court recalled the conditions on which it might, according to its Statute, give an interpretation. These were, first, that the sole object of the request was to obtain clarification as to the meaning and scope of the judgment; and, second, that there was a dispute between the parties as to the meaning and scope.

On the first question put to it by Colombia (see above), the Court found that the point had not been submitted to it by the parties; the Court had been asked to decide only on a submission presented by Colombia in abstract and general terms.

The other two questions, the Court said, amounted in reality to an alternative, dealing with the surrender of the refugee. This point also had not been included in the submissions of the parties, and the Court could not therefore decide on it. It was for the Parties to present their respective claims on this point, which they abstained from doing. Colombia claimed to detect "gaps" in the judgment, but these gaps in reality concerned new points on which decision could not be obtained by means of an interpretation. Interpretation might in no way go beyond the limits of the judgment, as fixed in advance by the submissions of the parties.

The Court went on to state that the condition required by the Statute that there should be a dispute as to the meaning and scope of the judgment was not satisfied. No dispute between the Parties had been brought to the attention of the Court, and it was shown by the very date of the request for an interpretation that such a dispute could not possibly have arisen.

Jose Joaquin Caicedo Castilla, Judge ad hoc designated by Colombia, declared that he was unable to join in the judgment.

e, APPLICATION INSTITUTING FRESH PROCEEDINGS

On 13 December 1950 Colombia filed an Application with the Registry of the International Court of Justice instituting proceedings against Peru.¹⁹ The Application stated that on 28 November 1950, the Government of Peru approached the Government of Colombia and requested, for the first time since the beginning of the Colombian-Peruvian asylum case, the immediate delivery of the refugee Victor Raul Haya de la Torre, invoking as a basis for its claim the judgment of the Court of 20 November 1950 (see above). The Application went on to declare that Colombia, after a careful study of the Court's judgments of 20 and 27 November, not only could not find there any reason obliging it to accede to the Peruvian demand concerning the delivery of the refugee, but, on the contrary, it found in those judgments "formal and repeated declarations to the effect that the question of the delivery of the refugee 'was completely left outside the submissions of the Parties', and that the Court 'in no way decided it, nor could it do so'".

By a note dated 6 December 1950, Colombia informed Peru that it did not consider itself bound to deliver Mr. Haya de la Torre to it. The Application declared that this point must be the object of a settlement binding on the parties. Colombia therefore considered that there existed a dispute between it and Peru.

The Court was asked, in the Application, to determine the manner in which effect should be given to the Court's judgment of 20 November 1950. In particular it was asked whether Colombia "is, or is not, bound to deliver to the Government of Peru M. Victor Raul Haya de la Torre, a refugee in the Colombian Embassy at Lima". In the event of that claim being dismissed by the Court, Colombia, in an alternative claim, called upon the Court to "adjudge and declare whether, in accordance with the law in force between the Parties and particularly American international law, the Government of Colombia is, or is not, bound to deliver M. Victor Raul Haya de la Torre to the Government of Peru".²⁰

2. Anglo-Norwegian Fisheries Case

By application dated 24 September 1949, filed with the Registry of the International Court of Justice on 28 September 1949, the United Kingdom recalled the differences which occurred from time to time between that Government and the Government of Norway with regard to the limits at sea within which the Norwegian Government has the right to reserve fishing exclusively to Norwegian fishermen.²¹

By order made on 9 November 1949, the Acting President of the Court, as the Court was not sitting, fixed the time-limits for the presentation by the Parties of the written proceedings. On 7 March 1950, the Norwegian Agent asked that the time-limit for the presentation of the Norwegian Government's Counter-Memorial be extended. By order made on 29 March, the Court decided to extend as follows the time-limits previously fixed: to 31 July 1950 for the presentation of the Norwegian Counter-Memorial; to 31 October 1950 for the presentation of the Reply of the United Kingdom; and to 31 December 1950 for the presentation of the Norwegian Rejoinder.

By an Order of 4 October 1950 the Court in accordance with a request by the Agent of the United Kingdom further extended the time limits for the United Kingdom Reply to 30 November 1950 and that for the Norwegian Rejoinder to 31 January 1951.

3. Franco-Egyptian Case concerning the Protection of French Nationals and Protected Persons in Egypt

On 13 October 1949, France requested the International Court of Justice to judge that certain measures taken by the Egyptian Government since 15 May 1948 against the persons and the property, rights and interests of certain French nationals and protected persons in Egypt were contrary to the principles of international law and to the Montreux Convention of 1937 regarding the Abrogation of Capitulations in Egypt. France asked the Court to find that Egypt should be required to pay compensation for the damage suffered by France in the persons of the victims of these measures.

The French application was communicated by the Court to the Members of the United Nations and to other States entitled to appear before the Court. The application was also notified to States parties to the Convention of Montreux other than those concerned in the case. The French and Egyptian Governments both designated Agents to represent them before the Court.

By letter dated 21 February 1950, the Agent of the French Government stated that the measures taken by the Egyptian Government against the persons, property, rights and interests of French nationals and protected persons having been withdrawn by the Egyptian Government, the dispute was virtually settled and, consequently, declared that France was not going on with the proceedings and requested that the case be removed from the general list of the Court.

Having regard to the fact that Egypt had already taken a step in the proceedings by the designation of its Agent, the Court fixed a time-limit within which this Government should state whether it opposed the discontinuance of the proceedings by France, and the Registrar of the Court notified the Agent of Egypt that, if no objections were raised by that Government within the time-limit expiring on 22 March 1950, acquiescence would be presumed.

No reply having reached the Court within this time-limit, the Court, by Order made on 29 March 1950, placed on record the discontinuance by France of the proceedings instituted by its application, and ordered the case removed from the Court's list.

4. Rights of United States Nationals in Morocco

On 28 October 1950, the French Charge d'Affaires at The Hague filed with the Registry of the International Court of Justice on behalf of the French Government an application instituting proceedings against the United States Government concerning the rights of United States nationals in Morocco. The application stated that the United States had protested to the French Government against measures taken in December 1948 by the Shereefian Government subjecting to licence imports to Morocco which did not involve official allocation of non-French currency and limiting these imports to certain products indispensable to the Moroccan economic system. The United States Government had pointed out in that protest that these measures, which had been taken under the system of exchange control set up in 1939, affected in an essential point the rights which the United States regarded as pertaining to it under its treaties with Morocco. Relying upon the treaty of 1836 the United States had contended that no Moroccan laws or regulations could be applied to United States nationals without its previous consent.

The French Government, in its application to the Court, asked the Court to declare that the United States was not within its right in making such a claim. American nationals, France stated, were not entitled to enjoy preferential treatment and should be subject to laws and regulations in force within the Shereefian empire, in particular, as regarded imports not involving the allocation of non-French currency.

In an order dated 22 November 1950, the Court fixed the following time-limits for deposit at The Hague of documents of the written procedure:

For the Memorial of France, 1 March 1951;

For the Counter-Memorial of the United States, 1 July 1951;

For the Reply of France, 1 September 1951; and

For the Rejoinder of the United States, 1 November 1951.

B. DEVELOPMENT AND CODIFICATION OF INTERNATIONAL LAW (WORK OF THE INTERNATIONAL LAW COMMISSION)

The International Law Commission, established in pursuance of General Assembly resolution 174(II)²² of 21 November 1947, held its second session at Geneva, Switzerland, from 5 June to 29 July 1950. With the exception of Sir Benegal Narsing Rau and Jaroslav Zourek, who were unable to attend, all the members²³ of the Commission were present at the second session.

Vladimir M. Koretsky, the member from the USSR, at the opening meeting, declared that all the members of the Commission had been nominated by their Governments and should represent a particular legal system, so that all of the main legal systems in the world would be "represented in the Commission. He argued that Shuhsi Hsu, the member from China, had been elected following nomination by the "former Kuomintang Government" which he thus represented, and hence he had clearly "ceased to represent the Chinese legal system". Mr. Koretsky called upon the Commission to prevent Shuhsi Hsu from taking part in its work, and to elect a representative of the "legal system of the Chinese People's Republic". He also declared that if his proposal were not accepted, he would take no further part in the work of the Commission; moreover, any decisions taken by the Commission with the participation of Mr. Hsu "could not be regarded as valid".

²³ For members and officers of the Commission, see p. 43.

The Chairman ruled the proposal of Mr. Koretsky out of order, declaring that the members of the Commission were elected to serve for three years. The Chairman said that members of the Commission do not represent States or Governments; instead, they serve in a personal capacity as persons of "recognized competence in international law". He declared that the Commission was not competent to challenge the General Assembly's application of the requirements for membership, and could not declare a casual vacancy in these circumstances. Several members spoke in support of the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. Koretsky appealed against the ruling of the Chair. By a vote of 10 to 1, the Commission upheld the ruling. Mr. Koretsky thereupon withdrew from the meeting. At a subsequent meeting, J. P. A. Francois, who had been absent at the opening meeting, declared that, had he been present, he would have supported the ruling of the Chair.

The Secretariat placed before the Commission, inter alia, the following documents and memoranda relating to the several subjects under consideration:

Article 24 of the Statute of the International Law Commission: Comments on the Working Paper of Mr. Hudson (A/CN.4/27)

Regime of the High Seas: Questions under Study by other Organs of the United Nations or by Specialized Agencies (A/CN.4/30)

Bibliography on the Regime of the High Seas (A/CN.4/26)

Bibliography on International Criminal Law and International Criminal Courts (A/CN.4/28)

Bibliography on Arbitral Procedure (A/CN.4/29)

Bibliography on the Law of Treaties (A/CN.4/31)

International and National Organizations concerned with Questions of International Law (A/CN.4/24)

Memorandum on the Soviet Doctrine and Practice with respect to Arbitral Procedure (A/CN.4/36)

Memorandum on the Soviet Doctrine and Practice with respect to the Law of Treaties (A/CN.4/37)

Memorandum on the Soviet Doctrine and Practice with respect to the Regime of the High Seas (A/CN.4/38)

Memorandum on Arbitral Procedure (A/CN.4/35)

Memorandum on the Regime of the High Seas (A/CN.4/32)

Memorandum on the Draft Code of Offences against the Peace and Security of Mankind (A/CN.4/39).

In the course of its second session the Commission held 43 meetings. It completed its study on the following items:

(1) Ways and means for making the evidence of customary international law more readily available;

(2) Formulation of the principles of international law recognized in the Charter of the Nürnberg Tribunal and in the judgment of the Tribunal;

(3) Desirability and possibility of establishing an international judicial organ for the trial of persons charged with genocide or other crimes over which jurisdiction will be conferred upon that organ by international conventions.

The reports on these three items were contained in the report of the Commission to the General Assembly (A/1316).

The Commission at its second session also undertook a preliminary discussion on the reports presented by the special rapporteurs on the following items:

(1) Preparation of a draft code of offences against the peace and security of mankind (A/CN.4/25);

(2) Law of treaties (A/CN.4/23);

(3) Regime of the high seas (A/CN.4/17);

(4) Arbitral procedure (A/CN.4/18).

Information on the progress in the work done by the Commission on the foregoing four items was submitted to the General Assembly.

The report of the International Law Commission was considered by the Sixth Committee of the General Assembly at its 225th-246th meetings inclusive, from 20 October to 29 November. The report of the Sixth Committee (A/1639) was considered by the General Assembly at its 320th plenary meeting on 12 December. The action taken by the Commission, the Sixth Committee and the General Assembly on the questions before them, is summarized below.

The Sixth Committee discussed the first part of the report of the Law Commission at its 226th to 229th meetings inclusive, from 23 to 28 October. Three principal questions were dealt with during these debates, namely, the desirability of inviting the Commission to review its Statute with the object of recommending revisions of it to the General Assembly, the emoluments of the members of the Commission, and the extension of their term of office.

1. Review by the International Law Commission of Its Statute

The question of a review of the Commission's Statute was raised in connexion with doubts expressed by some representatives, in particular, the representative of the United Kingdom, as to whether the existing working conditions of the International Law Commission were such as to enable it to achieve rapid and positive results. It was pointed out that the Commission had been overloaded with special tasks entrusted to it by the General Assembly and lately also by the Economic and Social Council, and that the Commission had consequently made little progress in its essential work, the codification of international law. It was felt that if this situation were not improved the prestige and utility of the Commission might suffer. The representative of the United Kingdom introduced a draft resolution (A/C.6/L.130) requesting the Commission to review its Statute with the object of making recommendations to the sixth session of the General Assembly concerning such revisions of the Statute as might appear desirable in the light of experience for the promotion of the Commission's work.

Some representatives, including those of France, Poland and the USSR, considered the terms used in the United Kingdom draft resolution too broad, and suggested that the scope of the proposed review of the Statute should be more precisely defined. The representative of France submitted an amendment (A/C.6/L.133) to the United Kingdom draft, specifying that the purpose of the review would be to submit recommendations to the General Assembly concerning the organization of the Commission and especially concerning the methods most likely to ensure the continuity of its work. The representative of France later withdrew his amendment, explaining that it had been intended simply to clarify the text of the United Kingdom draft. It had appeared, however, he said, that a substantial majority of the Committee was prepared to accept the United Kingdom resolution in its existing form; he did not in any way object to the substance of the resolution.

The representative of the USSR also submitted an amendment (A/C.6/L.135) to the United Kingdom draft which would limit further the scope of the review of the Commission's Statute to one article only. The USSR amendment was directed toward a revision of a provision in the Statute in order to make it impossible for any task to be assigned to the Commission without a special decision of the General Assembly in each specific case.

The Sixth Committee voted on the United Kingdom draft and the USSR amendment at its 299th meeting on 28 October. The USSR amendment was rejected by 6 votes in favour, 26 against, with 10 abstentions. The United Kingdom draft was then adopted by 36 votes to 7, with 2 abstentions. This draft was adopted by the General Assembly at its 320th plenary meeting on 12 December, by 45 votes to none, with 6 abstentions as resolution 484(V), the text of which was as follows:

The General Assembly,

Considering that it is of the greatest importance that the work of the International Law Commission should be carried on in the conditions most likely to enable the Commission to achieve rapid and positive results,

Having regard to certain doubts which have been expressed whether such conditions exist at the present time,

Requests the International Law Commission to review its Statute with the object of making recommendations to the General Assembly at its sixth session concerning revisions of the Statute which may appear desirable, in the light of experience, for the promotion of the Commission's work.

2. Emoluments of the Members of the International Law Commission

Article 13 of the Statute of the International Law Commission, as adopted by the General Assembly in resolution 174(11), states that members of the Commission should be paid travel expenses and a per diem allowance at the same rate as the allowance paid to members of commissions of the Economic and Social Council. The daily allowance of the Commission members had been twenty dollars. The Commission at its second session suggested that the General Assembly reconsider the terms of article 13 of the Commission's Statute in order to make service in the Commission less onerous financially for its members.

A great majority of the representatives were of the opinion that the present emoluments paid to the members of the Commission were inadequate, and favoured a revision of article 13 in order to allow the General Assembly to exercise wider discretion in determining the allowance to be accorded to them.

Cuba, Egypt, France, Iran, the United Kingdom and the United States introduced a joint draft resolution (A/C.6/L.128) whereby the General Assembly, taking into consideration:

(1) that part of the Commission's report dealing with this question, (2) the inadequacy of the emoluments paid to the members of the Commission, (3) the importance of the Commission's work, (4) the eminence of its members, and (5) the method of their election, would modify article 13 to provide for the payment to the Commission members of travel expenses and also a special allowance, the amount of which should be determined by the Assembly.

The representative of Panama presented an amendment (A/C.6/L.134) to the joint draft which, after having been slightly modified following an oral suggestion by the representative of France, proposed to add to the preamble of the joint draft a further consideration, namely, that the nature and scope of the work of the Commission were such as to require its members to devote considerable time in attendance at the necessarily long sessions of the Commission. This amendment, as modified, was accepted by the sponsors of the joint draft resolution.

The representative of the USSR, among others, opposed the proposal to revise article 13 on the ground that the members of the Law Commission should not, with respect to subsistence allowance, be treated differently from equally eminent experts working for the United Nations in other fields. The representative of Australia, inter alia, pointed out that the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions had recommended that the subsistence allowance for members of subsidiary bodies of the General Assembly should be raised from $20 to $25 a day when they were meeting in New York.

Other representatives, including those of Norway and the Philippines, while concurring with the majority view that article 13 should be revised, also thought it inadvisable to pay to the members of the Law Commission a higher subsistence allowance than to other experts. It was argued that it would be preferable to accord to the members of the Commission an honorarium or a special yearly allowance as a remuneration for the considerable amount of work required of them not only during but between the sessions of the Commission. Amendments to that effect were introduced by the Philippines (A/C.6/L.129) and Norway (A/C.6/L.136). These, however, when put to the vote were both rejected, the Norwegian amendment by 13 votes in favour to 16 against, with 16 abstentions; and the Philippine amendment by 1 vote in favour to 13 against, with 31 abstentions.

The joint draft resolution was voted upon at the Committee's 229th meeting on 28 October.

The Panamanian amendment was first voted on and adopted by 31 votes to 2, with 10 abstentions, and then the joint draft resolution, as amended, was adopted as a whole by 37 votes to 1, with 6 abstentions.

The Sixth Committee also considered a joint draft resolution (A/C.6/L.131) presented by Cuba and Egypt, whereby the General Assembly would fix at $35 per day the amount of the special allowance to be paid to the members of the Commission according to the proposed new wording of article 13. Opinion was divided as to whether the Sixth Committee was competent to entertain such a proposal. Some representatives, including those of Colombia, Ecuador, Greece, Iran and Mexico, held that there was nothing in the rules of procedure of the General Assembly to prevent the Sixth Committee from adopting the draft resolution. Other representatives, including those of Canada, Chile, France, the Union of South Africa, the USSR and the United Kingdom, argued the contrary view that, as the draft resolution dealt with a purely financial question, it was outside the competence of the Sixth Committee and was a matter to be decided by the Fifth Committee. After consultation among representatives, a compromise solution was reached. The joint draft resolution of Cuba and Egypt was replaced by an oral proposal introduced by the representative of Iran that the Sixth Committee adopt a vœu that the special allowance to be paid members of the International Law Commission be $35 a day.

At the request of the representative of Egypt a roll-call vote on the vœu of the Sixth Committee was taken at its 229th meeting on 28 October; it was adopted by 31 votes to 8, with 5 abstentions. After the voting, the representatives of Afghanistan, Greece and India, who were absent during the roll-call vote, asked to be counted as voting in favour of the view.

In accordance with the Assembly's rules of procedure and with a request of the President, the Fifth Committee, at its 258th and 259th meetings held on 31 October and 4 November 1950, considered the administrative and budgetary implications of the above joint draft resolution and of the vœu adopted by the Sixth Committee.

The Fifth Committee, in a report to the General Assembly (A/1648), stated inter alia, that it was the view of the majority of the representatives of the Committee that in the matter of subsistence allowance it would be difficult in practice and, in any event, undesirable in principle, to discriminate between expert bodies with respect to the amount of subsistence per diem. It advised the Assembly: (a) that adoption of the draft resolution of the Sixth Committee, under which provision would be made in the Statute of the International Law Commission for the payment of a special allowance to members of that Commission, would involve (on the assumption that such an allowance would be at the rate of $35 per day) expenditure in 1951 amounting to $20,025; and (b) that the Fifth Committee, on administrative grounds, was unable to recommend special treatment for the International Law Commission with respect to daily subsistence allowance (the proposal that a special allowance of $35 per day should be fixed for members of that body was rejected by 15 votes in favour to 19 votes against, with 7 abstentions).

The draft resolution of the Sixth Committee and the report of the Fifth Committee were considered by the General Assembly at its 320th meeting on 12 December. The Assembly, in addition, had before it an amendment (A/1640) submitted jointly by the following States: Argentina, Chile, Colombia, Cuba, the Dominican Republic, Egypt, India, Iran, Lebanon, Mexico, Panama, Syria, Turkey, Uruguay and Venezuela. This amendment proposed the addition of another paragraph to the joint draft resolution adopted by the Sixth Committee, which would, in effect, fix the special allowance for members of the Law Commission at $35 per day.

A roll-call vote on the joint amendment was first taken by the Assembly, with the result that it was adopted by 41 votes to 4, with 12 abstentions. The joint draft resolution, as amended, was then adopted by 43 votes to 2, with 10 abstentions, as resolution 485 (V). Its text is as follows:

The General Assembly,

Having regard to paragraph 21 of the report of the International Law Commission on the work of its second session,

Noting the inadequacy of the emoluments paid to the members of the International Law Commission,

Bearing in mind the importance of the Commission's work, the eminence of its members and the method of their election,

Considering that the nature and scope of the work of the Commission are such as to require its members to devote considerable time in attendance at the necessarily long sessions of the Commission,

1. Decides to amend as follows article 13 of the Statute of the International Law Commission:

"Members of the Commission shall be paid travel expenses, and shall also receive a special allowance, the amount of which shall be determined by the General Assembly";

2. Fixes the special allowance for members of the International Law Commission at $35 per day.

3. Extension of the Term of Office of Members of the Law Commission

A majority of the representatives of the Sixth Committee were in favour of extending the term of office of the present members of the Law Commission from three to five years. In support of this view, it was pointed out that the Commission would not be able to finish some of its most important tasks during the current period of office and that the work in progress on these tasks should not be interrupted by a change in membership. In particular, it would be highly detrimental to the efficiency of the Commission if new rapporteurs had to take over subjects on which a considerable volume of work had already been done.

Against this view, it was argued by some representatives, including those of Belgium and France, that, even if the term of office of the present members were prolonged to five years, the same problem might arise at the end of the extended period. The representatives of Czechoslovakia, Ecuador, Poland and the USSR, among others, also drew attention to the fact that, according to article 10 of the Statute of the Commission, the members were eligible for re-election and that there was no reason to doubt that the General Assembly would re-elect those members whose work it felt had been most useful.

The representatives of Cuba, Chile, Egypt, Iran and Turkey introduced a joint draft resolution (A/C6/L.132) which, in its operative part, set forth a decision to amend article 10 of the Statute of the Commission in order to extend the term of office of the members from three to five years, this extension to be applicable to the term of the members of the Commission elected in 1948. The representative of Belgium submitted an amendment (A/C.6/L.137) to the joint draft by which the scope of its operative part would be limited to an extension of the term of the present members of the Commission, and the preamble of the draft resolution would be reworded accordingly. This amendment was accepted by the sponsors of the joint draft resolution after the Belgian representative had consented to delete from his text a phrase stating that the extension was made "by way of exception".

When put to the vote at the Committee's 229th meeting on 28 October, the joint draft resolution, as amended, was adopted by 37 votes to 8, with 2 abstentions.

The General Assembly at its 320th plenary meeting on 12 December adopted by 45 votes to 2, with 5 abstentions, the draft recommended by the Sixth Committee. Its text (resolution 486(V)) is as follows:

The General Assembly,

Having noted, that the present three-year term of office of members of the International Law Commission is not sufficient to enable the Commission to achieve the tasks on which it is engaged before the current period of office expires,

Considering that, in order to enable positive results to be achieved, the term of office of the present members should be extended,

Resolves that, subject to any modifications which the General Assembly may make in the Statute of the International Law Commission, and without prejudice to such modifications, the term of office of the present members of the Commission shall be extended by two years, making a total period of five years from their election in 1948.

4. Making the Evidence of Customary International Law More Readily Available

In dealing with this item the Commission at its second session had before it a working paper (A/CN.4/16 & Add.1) on the subject prepared by Manley O. Hudson (United States). The Commission reached the following conclusions which were based on the contents of the working paper as "harmonized with the views expressed by the majority of the Commission".

Arguing that, under article 24 of the Commission's Statute, customary and conventional international law need not be treated as rigidly excluding each other (since the latter may, sometimes, embody rules of the former), the Commission decided to take some account of the availability of the materials of conventional international law in its consideration of the question. On this basis the Commission compiled a list of rubrics and surveyed the more important official and non-official collections with reference to each of them under the general heading "Evidence of Customary International Law". The list and the survey dealt with the following types of evidence of customary international law:

- (i) Texts of international instruments
- (ii) Decisions of international courts
- (iii) Decisions of national courts
- (iv) National legislation
- (v) Diplomatic correspondence
- (vi) Opinions of national legal advisers
- (vii) Practice of international organizations

In regard to the availability of this evidence, the Commission, while noting important publications under each heading, expressed the view that article 24 of the Commission's Statute, in its reference to "collection and publication of documents", seemed to envisage the extent to which materials not yet published might be made available throughout the world. The Commission was of the opinion that though not in a position to undertake any new series of publications, it could suggest that the Secretariat of the United Nations should undertake certain types of publications.

The Commission in paragraph 90 of Part II of its report to the General Assembly (A/1316) suggested the following specific ways and means:

Widest possible distribution of publications relating to international law issued by the organs of the United Nations, particularly the reports and other publications of the International Court of Justice, the United Nations Treaty Series, and the Reports of International Arbitral Awards.

The Commission recommended that the prices of such publications should be kept as low as possible and considerations of economy should not preclude maintenance of stocks necessary to meet future demands. The Commission attached special importance to the continuance of the present language system of the United Nations Treaty Series. Further, it expressed a vœu that the texts of international instruments registered with or filed and recorded by the Secretariat should be published with the greatest possible promptness.

The Commission in paragraph 91 of its report to the Assembly further recommended that the General Assembly should authorize the Secretariat to prepare and issue, with as wide a distribution as possible, the following publications:

- (i) A Juridical Yearbook
- (ii) A Legislative Series containing the texts of current national legislation on matters of international interest
- (iii) A collection of constitutions of all States
- (iv) A list of the publications issued by the Governments of all States containing the texts of treaties concluded by them, supplemented by a list of the principal collections of treaty texts published under private auspices
- (v) A consolidated index of the League of Nations Treaty Series
- (vi) Occasional index volumes of the United Nations Treaty Series
- (vii) A repertoire of the practice of the organization of the United Nations with regard to questions of international law
- (viii) Additional series of the Reports of International Arbitral Awards, of which a first series has already been published in three volumes

Other recommendations of the Commission contained in paragraphs 92, 93 and 94, respectively, of its report, were:

(1) that the Registry of the International Court of Justice should publish occasional digests of the Court's reports;

(2) that the General Assembly should recommend to Governments the publishing of digests of their diplomatic correspondence and other materials relating to international law; and

(3) that the Assembly should consider the desirability of an international convention for the exchange of official publications relating to international law and international relations.

The Sixth Committee at its 230th and 231st meetings on 30 October and 2 November considered the recommendations of the International Law Commission on the ways and means for making the evidence of customary international law more readily available (part II of the report of the Commission). The majority of representatives on the Committee expressed the view that finding ways and means for making such evidence more readily available was essentially a practical task which could be accomplished without a previous agreement on a precise definition of customary international law.

Some of the representatives criticized certain of the recommendations made by the Commission. In particular, the representatives of India, France and the Union of South Africa, among others, levelled criticisms against the statement of the Commission that article 24 of its Statute seemed to depart from the classification of sources of international law followed in article 38 of the Statute of the International Court of Justice, by including judicial decisions on questions of international law among the evidence of customary international law. They argued that if such a statement implied that article 38 of the Court's Statute did not accept judicial decisions on questions of international law as evidence of customary international law, it was wrong, and they would have to dissent from such an interpretation of article 38. It was pointed out that article 38 of the Court's Statute enumerated the different sources of international law, listing first the three categories of sources which really created law—conventions, custom and generally recognized principles of law—and then the subsidiary sources, such as judicial decisions and teachings of the most outstanding publicists of the nations. There was no inconsistency between that classification and article 24 of the Commission's Statute, they said. Judicial decisions, they submitted, should therefore be regarded as evidence of customary international law.

Several representatives, including those of Australia, the Union of South Africa, the USSR and the United Kingdom, declared that part of the vast programme of work suggested by the International Law Commission for making the evidence of customary international law more readily available was already being carried out by the Secretariat and that other parts of the programme entailed financial and administrative implications which needed further study. With respect to the recommendation that the Registry of the Court should publish occasional digests of the Court's reports, the representatives of, among others, Israel, the Union of South Africa and the USSR, pointed out that such digests were already published in the Court's Yearbook, the annual reports of the Secretary-General, the United Nations Bulletin, the Yearbook of the United Nations and several publications on international law.

Representatives of France, Israel and Yugoslavia, among others, supported the recommendation of the Commission that the General Assembly should consider the desirability of an international convention concerning the general exchange of official publications relating to international law and international relations. The majority view, however, was that the question was not yet ripe for a decision.

A joint draft resolution (A/C.6/L.139) was submitted by Israel, the United Kingdom and the United States. After having been amended slightly by its sponsors in accordance with oral suggestions made by other representatives, it was adopted by 41 votes to none, with 2 abstentions.

The draft took note of part II of the Commission's report, expressed appreciation of the work of the Commission on the subject and invited the Secretary-General, in preparing his future programme of work in this field, to consider and report to the General Assembly upon the recommendations contained in paragraphs 90, 91 and 93 of the Commission's report (see above) in the light of the discussion held and the suggestions made by representatives in the Sixth Committee.

An oral amendment submitted by the representative of India, to the effect that the Secretary-General should be requested to take account of the possibility of co-ordination with similar activities undertaken by him, was withdrawn on the understanding that the suggestion would be recorded in the Committee's report to the Assembly.

The report of the Sixth Committee (A/1639) was considered by the General Assembly at its 320th plenary meeting on 12 December. The draft recommended for adoption by the Committee was adopted by the Assembly by 50 votes to none as resolution 487(V).

5. Formulation of the Nürnberg Principles

Under General Assembly resolution 177(II), paragraph (a), the Law Commission was directed to "formulate the principles of international law recognized in the Charter of the Nürnberg Tribunal and in the judgment of the Tribunal".

In pursuance of this resolution, the Commission at its first session undertook a preliminary consideration of the subject. In the course of this consideration the question arose as to whether or not the Commission should ascertain to what extent the principles contained in the Charter and Judgment constituted principles of international law. The conclusion was that since the Nürnberg principles had been affirmed by the General Assembly, the task entrusted to the Commission by paragraph (a) of resolution 177(II) was not to express any appreciation of these principles as principles of international law but merely to formulate them. This conclusion was set forth in the report of the Commission at its first session, and the report was approved by the General Assembly in 1949. Jean Spiropoulos was appointed special rapporteur to continue the work of the Commission on the subject.

On the basis of the report (A/CN.4/22) presented by Mr. Spiropoulos, the Commission at its second session adopted a formulation of the principles of international law recognized by the Charter and Judgment of the Nürnberg Tribunal. The text of the principles formulated follows:

PRINCIPLE I: Any person who commits an act which constitutes a crime under international law is responsible therefor and liable to punishment.

PRINCIPLE II: The fact that internal law does not impose a penalty for an act which constitutes a crime under international law does not relieve the person who committed the act from responsibility under international law.

PRINCIPLE III: The fact that a person who committed an act which constitutes a crime under international law acted as Head of State or responsible Government official does not relieve him from responsibility under international law.

PRINCIPLE IV: The fact that a person acted pursuant to order of his Government or of a superior does not relieve him from responsibility under international law, provided a moral choice was in fact possible to him.

PRINCIPLE V: Any person charged with a crime under international law has the right to a fair trial on the facts and law.

PRINCIPLE VI: The crimes hereinafter set out are punishable as crimes under international law:

a. Crimes against peace: (i) Planning, preparation, initiation or waging of a war of aggression or a war in violation of international treaties, agreements or assurances; (ii) Participation in a common plan or conspiracy for the accomplishment of any of the acts mentioned under (i).

b. War crimes: Violations of the law or customs of war which include, but are not limited to, murder, ill-treatment or deportation to slave-labour or for any other purpose of civilian population of or in occupied territory, murder or ill-treatment of prisoners of war or persons on the seas, killing of hostages, plunder of public or private property, wanton destruction of cities, towns, or villages, or devastation not justified by military necessity.

c. Crimes against humanity: Murder, extermination, enslavement, deportation and other inhuman acts done against any civilian population, or persecutions on political, racial or religious grounds, when such acts are done or such persecutions are carried on in execution of or in connexion with any crime against peace or any war crime.

PRINCIPLE VII: Complicity in the commission of a crime against peace, a war crime, or a crime against humanity as set forth in Principle VI is a crime under international law.

Ricardo J. Alfaro (Panama), Manley O. Hudson (United States) and Georges Scelle (France) made statements expressing certain reservations with regard to this question.

Mr. Alfaro stated that he believed that the reference contained in that part of the Commission's second report to the Assembly regarding the task of formulating the Nürnberg principles should have included a quotation of the passage in the Judgment of the Nürnberg Tribunal in which the Tribunal asserted that the Charter "is the expression of international law existing at the time of its creation, and to that extent is itself a contribution to international law".

Mr. Hudson stated that some uncertainty had existed as to the precise nature of the task entrusted to the Commission. In the report of the Commission covering its first session, which had been approved by the General Assembly, the view was put forward, he explained, that "the task of the Commission was not to express any appreciation of these principles [the Nürnberg principles] as principles of international law but merely to formulate them." In his opinion, however, the Commission had not altogether adhered to that view in its later work, with the result that doubt subsisted as to the juridical character of the formulation adopted. Moreover, he submitted, the formulation had not sufficiently taken into account the special character of the Charter and Judgment of the International Military Tribunal and the ad hoc purpose which they served.

Mr. Scelle regretted that he could not accept the view taken by the Commission of its task with respect to this matter. The Commission's report, he stated, did not enunciate the general principles of law on which the provisions of the Charter and the decisions of the Tribunal were based, but merely summarized some of them, whereas the Tribunal itself had stated that the principles it had adopted were already a part of positive international law at the time when it was established. Moreover, he considered that the final text of the Commission's second report did not seem to reflect accurately the conclusions reached by the Commission during its preliminary discussions, and restricted their scope.

That part of the Commission's report dealing with the formulation of the Nürnberg principles was considered by the Sixth Committee at its 231st to 239th meetings inclusive, from 2 to 14 November 1950. The representatives of the Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, Poland, Syria and the USSR, among others, held the view that the formulation of the Nürnberg principles submitted by the Law Commission in its report should not be discussed in substance by the Sixth Committee at the present session of the Assembly. Most of these representatives argued that the Commission had failed to consult the Governments of Member States in the course of its work on the subject, as was required by articles 16 and 21 of its Statute and that, in consequence of this omission, the Sixth Committee did not have at its disposal the necessary data for a thorough examination of the formulation submitted.

The majority of the representatives, on the other hand, were in favour of discussing the formulation in substance. A number of these representatives, including those of Cuba, Iran, the Netherlands, the United Kingdom and Uruguay, took the position that, in directing it to formulate the Nürnberg principles, the General Assembly had assigned to the Law Commission a special task which did not come under the procedural rules contained in articles 16 and 21 and that, consequently, the Commission had not violated its Statute by reporting directly to the General Assembly without consulting the Governments. Other representatives, including those of Belgium, France and Iraq, adhering to the majority view, based their opinion on the practical consideration that a substantive debate was most likely to promote a solution of the problems facing the Committee in connexion with the Nürnberg principles and their formulation. The Sixth Committee accordingly entered upon a discussion in substance of that part of the Commission's report and the formulation of the Nürnberg principles included in the report.

In the course of the Committee's debate, careful attention was given to the terms of reference of the Commission contained in General Assembly resolution 177(11), as well as to the interpretation placed upon them by the Commission. The Sixth Committee further examined in detail the principles formulated in the report. The Committee also discussed the question of the action which should be recommended to the General Assembly regarding the formulation submitted by the Commission.

With regard to its terms of reference, the Commission had reached the conclusion that its task was not to express any appreciation of these principles as principles of international law but merely to formulate them. In general, this interpretation of the Commission's terms of reference met with approval within the Sixth Committee. A number of representatives, however, felt that the work done by the International Law Commission was not satisfactory. The representative of the Netherlands, for example, was opposed to formulating some of the principles in too great detail. He said that the principles to be formulated must not be appropriate for a general criminal code. Because the Nürnberg Charter envisaged only the trial of major war criminals, the details of its provisions could not always be applied to other war criminals. He argued that if the Sixth Committee adopted the formulation of the principles contained in the International Law Commission's report, it would be sanctioning some principles which would not find a place in the general criminal code which was to be drafted later by the Commission.

Some representatives, including those of Argentina, Belgium, Pakistan and Yugoslavia, stated that the Commission had failed to formulate all of the principles of international law acknowledged in the Charter and Judgment of Nürnberg. The representative of Yugoslavia stated that the Commission had failed to formulate two essential principles with which the Nürnberg Tribunal had been concerned, namely, the principle "nulla poena sine lege"²⁴ and the principle according to which membership in a criminal organization constituted a crime under international law. The first principle, he explained, had been cited by the defence at the Nürnberg trials and had been rejected by the Tribunal. That principle, he submitted, should be formulated and included in the principles adopted by the Commission. The representative of Argentina concurred in this opinion referring, in particular, to the Commission's failure to formulate the principle of the non-retroactivity of penal laws. The representative of Yugoslavia also stated that the second principle, according to which mere membership in criminal organizations which had as their purpose the commission of crimes against peace, war crimes and crimes against humanity constituted a crime under international law, was incontestably among the principles recognized at Nürnberg. The representative of Pakistan expressed a similar viewpoint. The representative of Belgium regretted that the members of the International Law Commission had concluded that they were not expected to deal with the provisions concerning procedure, which were in the Charter and which the Tribunal had applied.

In the view of some representatives, including the representatives of France and Israel, the Commission should have gone further and have set forth the general principles of international law on which the Charter and Judgment had been based. According to this opinion, the Commission had not pursued its task exhaustively; it had only classified the juridical provisions and rulings of the Charter and Judgment while it ought to have stated the underlying principles with a view to promoting the future development of international penal law.

The representative of Israel, for example, said that the General Assembly had adopted the view expressed by the International Military Tribunal that its Charter was the expression of international law existing at the time of its creation, and he regretted that the International Law Commission had not gone more deeply into the question. He drew attention to the fact that the Tribunal had more than once given its Charter a restrictive interpretation, for instance in connexion with the conspiracy count and the count of criminality of organizations, and stated that the Commission had merely accentuated that tendency.

Several representatives, on the other hand, including those of Australia, Brazil, Czechoslovakia, Greece, Iran, Mexico, Syria, the United Kingdom, the USSR and Uruguay, spoke in defence of the Commission on these points, and maintained that the Commission had correctly interpreted its mandate. The task of the Commission was, in their view, not to formulate a few principles in very general terms or to set forth the underlying principles of international law, but to abstract both from the Charter and from the proceedings of the Nürnberg Tribunal, a basic set of rules and principles which could form a species of small code on the subject to serve as a point of departure for further efforts in this field.

In this connexion, consideration was also given to the relation between the formulation of the Nürnberg principles and the task entrusted to the International Law Commission of preparing a draft code of offences against the peace and security of mankind. The majority of the representatives of the Sixth Committee agreed with the view expressed by the International Law Commission that it was not bound to insert the Nürnberg principles in their entirety in the draft code and that it was not precluded from suggesting modification or development of the principles for the purpose of their incorporation in the draft code.

Several representatives commented on the text of the seven principles formulated by the Commission. Principles I and II gave rise to an exchange of opinions regarding the position of the individual in international law. Some representatives, including those of France, Greece, the Netherlands, Uruguay and Yugoslavia, affirmed that the individual as well as the State could now be held directly responsible under international law. Others, including those of Argentina, Czechoslovakia and the United Kingdom, considered this opinion exaggerated and contended that there was no need to abandon the classic concept that international law is essentially concerned with relations between States. They agreed that individuals who committed crimes under international law should be subject to trial and punishment, but asserted that this aim could be achieved by imposing upon States the obligation to punish the authors of such crimes or to allow them to be punished by other States or by a legally constituted international tribunal. In this connexion, several representatives, among them, those of Argentina, Belgium, Brazil, Czechoslovakia and Egypt, also took exception to the statement made by the Commission to the effect that principles I and II implied the supremacy of international law over national law. It was argued by them that the supremacy of international law was a theoretical concept which was far from being universally accepted. It was also affirmed by some representatives, in particular those of Argentina and Egypt, that this concept was contrary to the constitutions of their countries.

Opinion was also divided on the question whether the Commission had been justified in departing from the provisions of articles 7 and 8 of the Nürnberg Charter when formulating principle III on the responsibility of Heads of States and responsible Government officials, and principle IV on the effect of superior orders. While a number of representatives, including those of Greece and Iran, were in favour of these changes as bringing the two principles in closer conformity with general principles of criminal law, others, in particular the representative of Belgium, thought that the Commission should have retained the provisions of the Nürnberg Charter in this respect. Doubts were expressed as to principle IV that superior orders are not a defence provided a moral choice was possible to the offender. It was contended by, among others, the representatives of the Netherlands, United Kingdom and Yugoslavia that the term "moral choice", taken from the judgment, was ambiguous and should not have been included, at least not without clarification by definition or exemplification.

The right of a defendant to a fair trial on the facts and law, as provided in principle V, was, in substance, favoured by most representatives. Some representatives, including those of Belgium and the Netherlands, however, regretted that the words "on the facts and law" had been included in the text of the principle, as this specification seemed to exclude questions of procedure from the principle of a fair trial. Against this opinion it was affirmed that the word "law" referred not only to substantive law but also to procedural law.

Among the questions raised in relation to principle VI defining categories of international crimes, particular attention was given to the definition of crimes against humanity. Some representatives, in particular the representative of France, criticized the Commission for having retained the provision in article 6(c) of the Nürnberg Charter that crimes against humanity could be committed only in connexion with crimes against peace or war crimes. It was asserted that this limitation did not apply to the concept of crimes against humanity as such, but only to the competence of the Nürnberg Tribunal to take cognizance of these crimes. In the opinion of these representatives, crimes against humanity constituted a separate and independent category of international crimes distinguished from similar crimes under national law by the characteristic that they were, in general, committed by Governments, or with the complicity or tolerance of Governments, and, therefore, could be punished only on the international level. The concept of crimes against humanity had, furthermore, been incorporated in the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide.²⁵ It would, therefore, be contrary to international law to lay down as a principle that crimes against humanity could be committed only in connexion with crimes against peace or war crimes. On the other hand, other representatives, including those of Brazil, Greece and Iran, maintained that no crimes against humanity existed under international law outside those defined by the Nürnberg Charter. It was therefore considered that the definition of crimes against humanity given in principle VI was correct in substance. Some representatives, including those of Israel and the Netherlands, regretted that the Commission had not laid down, in the principle itself, that crimes against humanity could be committed both before and after a war. It was not sufficient, in their view, to state this fact only in the commentary to principle VI, as the Commission had done.

The representative of the Netherlands, among others, felt that principle VII was too broadly drafted, as it applied ordinary rules of complicity not only to war crimes and crimes against humanity, but also to crimes against peace. It was argued that the Nürnberg Tribunal had taken great care to limit the scope of crimes against peace and had convicted only persons in very high positions of this crime. In contradiction to the stand thus taken by the Tribunal, principle VII made every person who, according to the general rules of complicity, was an accomplice to a crime against peace guilty of an international crime. On the other hand, the representative of Yugoslavia, among others, expressed his agreement with principle VII as formulated, since in his view the courts would in each instance have wide discretion as to the application of the principle.

With respect to the question of what action should be taken by the General Assembly on the Commission's report regarding this matter, various procedures were suggested in the course of the deliberations. The representative of the Byelorussian SSR presented a proposal (A/C.6/L.140) according to which the formulation of the Nürnberg principles submitted by the International Law Commission would be referred back to the Commission for presentation to the Member States for their comments. The representative of France submitted a draft resolution (A/C.6/L.141/Rev.1) requesting the International Law Commission to continue its study of the Nürnberg principles and calling attention to the need for giving, within the framework of this study, a permanent validity to the principles, especially with regard to crimes against humanity as crimes independent of crimes against peace and war crimes. This latter draft resolution was subsequently replaced by a joint draft resolution (A/C.6/L.146), presented by Argentina, Denmark, the Dominican Republic, Egypt, France, the Netherlands, Norway, Pakistan, Peru, Sweden and Syria. This draft would have invited the International Law Commission to reconsider its formulation of the Nürnberg principles in the light of the observations made on them by representatives during the present session of the Assembly. The United Kingdom, on the other hand, proposed a draft resolution (A/C.6/L.142) whereby the General Assembly would take note of the formulation of the Nürnberg principles contained in the Commission's report. An amendment to the United Kingdom draft was presented by Cuba (A/C.6/L.144) drawing attention to the close relation between the formulation of the Nürnberg principles and the task of preparing a draft code of offences against the peace and security of mankind. This amendment was accepted by the representative of the United Kingdom. Similar amendments to the United Kingdom draft were submitted by Iran (A/C.6/L.143) and Uruguay (A/C.6/L.148), while Venezuela introduced an amendment (A/C.6/L.147) suggesting a drafting change in the preamble of the United Kingdom draft.

After deliberation among the sponsors and other interested representatives, all the above draft resolutions and amendments, with the exception of the Byelorussian SSR draft resolution (A/C.6/L.140), were superseded by a new joint draft resolution (A/C.6/L.149) submitted by Argentina, Cuba, Denmark, the Dominican Republic, Egypt, France, Iran, the Netherlands, Norway, Pakistan, Peru, Sweden, Syria, the United Kingdom, the United States and Venezuela. The first three paragraphs of this draft resolution referred to the consideration of part III of the report of the Commission by the General Assembly and cited previous Assembly resolutions on the subject. The fourth paragraph recalled that the International Law Commission had formulated certain principles recognized in the Charter and the Judgment of the Nürnberg Tribunal and that many representatives had made observations during the current session on this formulation. As some representatives, in particular, the representative of the Netherlands, had maintained, in the course of the debates, that to take note of the Commission's formulation would, in view of the history of the question, virtually imply approval of the principles as formulated by the Commission, this paragraph was worded to make it clear beyond doubt that no such approval was intended. After a drafting change, suggested orally by the representative of Belgium, had been accepted by the sponsors, the fifth paragraph stated that it was appropriate to give the Governments of Member States full opportunity to furnish their observations on the formulation. The report of the Sixth Committee (A/1639) to the General Assembly explained that this paragraph was meant to give satisfaction to those which had advocated such consultation, without implying that the Commission had violated its Statute in omitting to consult the Governments in connexion with its work on the Nürnberg principles. The sixth paragraph invited the Governments of Member States to furnish their observations on the formulation submitted by the Commission; and the seventh paragraph requested the Commission, in preparing the draft code of offences against the peace and security of mankind, to take account of the observations made on this formulation by delegations during the present session as well as of any observations which might be made by Governments.

An amendment (A/C.6/L.150) to the seventh paragraph of the joint draft resolution was proposed by Poland, which would have invited the International Law Commission to take the observations made in the Sixth Committee and by Governments into consideration in the final formulation of the principles of the Nürnberg Charter and Judgment, thus implying that the formulation under discussion was not a final formulation of the Nürnberg principles.

The Sixth Committee at its 239th meeting on 14 November voted on the proposals before it. The Byelorussian draft resolution (A/C.6/L.140) was defeated by 5 votes in favour to 21 against, with 15 abstentions. The first, second and third paragraphs of the joint draft resolution (A/C.6/L.149) were adopted unanimously. The fourth paragraph was adopted by 36 votes to 2, with 2 abstentions. The fifth paragraph, as modified, and the sixth paragraph were put to the vote together and adopted by 36 votes to none, with 6 abstentions. The Committee then rejected the Polish amendment (A/C.6/L.150) to the seventh paragraph by 7 votes in favour to 21 against, with 11 abstentions. The seventh paragraph was adopted by 32 votes to 5, with 3 abstentions. The joint draft resolution, as modified, was adopted as a whole by 32 votes to 1, with 8 abstentions.

The report of the Sixth Committee (A/1639) containing the text of the above resolution, was considered by the General Assembly at its 320th plenary meeting on 12 December. The Assembly, by a vote of 42 to none, with 6 abstentions, adopted the resolution. Its text (488(V)) was as follows:

The General Assembly,

Having considered, part III (Formulation of the Nürnberg principles) of the report of the International Law Commission on the work of its second session,

Recollecting that the General Assembly, by its resolution 95(1) of 11 December 1946, unanimously affirmed the principles of international law recognized by the charter and judgment of the Nürnberg Tribunal,

Considering that, by its resolution 177(II) of 21 November 1947, the General Assembly directed the International Law Commission to formulate those principles, and also to prepare a draft code of offences against the peace and security of mankind,

Considering that the International Law Commission has formulated certain principles recognized, according to the Commission, in the charter and judgment of the Nürnberg Tribunal, and that many delegations have made observations during the fifth session of the General Assembly on this formulation,

Considering that it is appropriate to give the governments of Member States full opportunity to furnish their observations on this formulation,

1. Invites the governments of Member States to furnish their observations accordingly;

2. Requests the International Law Commission, in preparing the draft code of offences against the peace and security of mankind, to take account of the observations made on this formulation by delegations during the fifth session of the General Assembly and of any observations which may be made by governments.

6. International Criminal Jurisdiction

In pursuance of resolution 260 B (III), adopted by the General Assembly in December 1948, the International Law Commission at its first session began a preliminary study of the desirability and possibility of establishing an international judicial organ for the trial of persons charged with genocide or other crimes over which jurisdiction would be conferred upon that organ by international convention. After the discussion, the Commission appointed Ricardo J. Alfaro (Panama) and A. E. F. Sandstrom (Sweden) rapporteurs on this subject. The rapporteurs were requested to make a study of the question, and to submit to the Commission at its second session one or more working papers on it. The reports prepared by them were considered by the Commission at its second session.

Mr. Sandstrom in his report (A/CN.4/20) expressed the view that, whether established within or without the United Nations, such an international judicial organ would be ineffective, especially in respect of grave international crimes. Moreover, he thought, such an organ would be desirable only if effective. He therefore concluded that its establishment was not desirable.

Mr. Alfaro in his report (A/CN.4/15 & Corr.1) stated that the establishment of such an organ would be "an effective contribution to the peace and the security of the world". He also concluded that there was no legal or political reason which made the establishment of such a court impossible. In support of his thesis he cited, among other precedents, the fact that it proved possible to create the International Military Tribunals of Nürnberg and Tokyo, and that these tribunals had actually functioned. Moreover, Mr. Alfaro stated, seven draft statutes for international criminal organs had been formulated by, presented to, or adopted by, official and non-official entities, and a convention for such a court had been signed at Geneva in 1937.

After considering the question, the Commission decided, by 8 votes to 1, with 2 abstentions, that the establishment of an international judicial organ for the trial of persons charged with genocide or other crimes over which jurisdiction would be conferred on that organ by international conventions was desirable.

By 7 votes to 3, with 1 abstention, the Commission decided that the establishment of the above-mentioned judicial organ was possible.

After an exchange of views on different aspects of the question of the possibility of establishing a criminal chamber of the International Court of Justice, the Commission decided to state that in its opinion, though it was possible to do so by amending the Court's Statute, the Commission did not recommend such a course.

The Sixth Committee at its 240th to 246th meetings inclusive, from 16 to 29 November 1950, considered that part of the report of the International Law Commission dealing with the question of international criminal jurisdiction. The problems dealt with by the representatives of the Committee in the course of their debates were related both to the substantive question of the desirability and possibility of establishing an international penal court, and to the procedural question as to what action should be recommended to the General Assembly on this matter at its current session.

With respect to the substantive question, the representatives of the Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, Poland and the USSR were of the opinion that the establishment of an international criminal court would be contrary to the sovereign rights of States. It was pointed out that the punishment of crimes committed in a State's territory was a matter within the jurisdiction of that State, and that the right to administer justice was inseparably bound up with the sovereignty of the State. For the proposed international criminal court to be able to function properly, it was argued, States would have to relinquish to it certain sovereign powers such as their powers with regard to the accused and to witnesses, and the power of executing punishment.

The representative of Poland drew attention to the fact that the principal organs of the United Nations were listed in article 7 of the Charter. He argued that according to that article it was impossible to establish new organs of the United Nations without amending the Charter. He thought that the establishment of an international tribunal would necessitate an amendment to the Charter. He also declared that any modification of the principle according to which only States could be parties in cases before an international tribunal would be prejudicial to the principle of the sovereign equality of States.

Other representatives, including those of Australia, Brazil, Sweden, the Union of South Africa and the United Kingdom, held that the creation of such a court was not a practical project. Before an international penal tribunal could function, they explained, there would have to be an international executive authority, and no such authority yet existed. The important question, they argued, was whether the institution of an international criminal court would lead to practical results. Such a court would have to operate under two different situations: in times of peace and in times of war. A third world war would mean that the United Nations had failed. Therefore the question of an international criminal court should be considered in the first place with regard to times of peace as an instrument to prevent war, and with regard to crimes committed during small-scale hostilities. The situation in time of war would be easier to handle as it would be similar to the situation which had existed at Nürnberg and at Tokyo; the vanquished would be available for trial and a permanent international criminal court could guarantee objectivity and fairness, could avoid the pitfalls with which any ad hoc tribunal would be faced and could establish customs and traditions.

The situation in time of peace was, however, more important and more difficult. The crime of genocide and the planning and preparation of a war of aggression were rarely committed by individuals or groups of individuals without the consent or approval or complicity of their Government. The crucial point was whether in such a case the sovereign States concerned would be prepared to submit their national or international policy to the judgment of an international body which would apply to those policies the rules of international law which were so often vague. Considering further the existing world situation and the fact that States were accusing each other of warmongering, it was questionable whether they would agree to subject their leaders to the jurisdiction of an international criminal court. It was therefore probable that such a court would, in practice, be unable to function in time of peace, and its collapse during such a period would have a disastrous effect on the observance of international law.

With respect to the situation after a war, it was pointed out that the sole possibility was that only those who had lost the war would be brought to trial. Obviously those who began a war did not expect to lose it, and the establishment of an international penal tribunal would therefore have no preventive effect.

It was also argued by these representatives that without an international police force to bring the accused before it and to execute its sentences, such a court would be unable to function effectively. Furthermore, it was held that the question of desirability was dependent on that of possibility. However desirable anything might be in theory, if it was not a practical possibility the attempt to create it could only result in failure and therefore, in the realistic as opposed to the idealistic sense, the project was not in the circumstances desirable.

Other representatives, including those of China, Cuba, France, Iran, Mexico and Syria, favoured the setting up of an international criminal court. They argued that since the existence of international crimes had been recognized, the logical consequence was to establish an international tribunal empowered to punish them. Public opinion, they said, had been in favour of an international criminal jurisdiction since the end of the First World War. The creation of an international penal court vested with power to try and punish persons who disturbed international public order was desirable as an effective contribution to the peace and security of the world. It was denied that the establishment of such a court would constitute an infringement of national sovereignty, as the court could be created by an international convention adhered to voluntarily by States. By using this procedure there would, furthermore, be no need to amend the Charter of the United Nations. The establishment of an international criminal tribunal, by means of an international convention concluded under the auspices of the United Nations, would actually serve to illustrate how the United Nations could act as a centre for harmonizing the actions of nations, and its establishment would be in complete conformity with the principle of international co-operation laid down in the Charter.

The majority of the representatives, however, felt that the examination of the matter in the abstract would be very difficult. They pointed out that before Governments could make any constructive comments, they would have to be given specific details on the way in which the proposed international tribunal would function. They would have to know the extent to which they would be called upon to relinquish their jurisdiction; how the tribunal was to be constituted; on what principles of criminal law it would establish its procedure; what process it would use in order to compel the appearance of persons accused and the production of documents and other evidence; what type of punishment it would inflict; and how its sentences were to be executed. It was also highly important that Governments should know over what crimes an international penal tribunal would exercise its jurisdiction. Would its competence extend over all the criminal acts which would eventually be included in the draft code of offences against the peace and security of mankind, and would the acts generally known as "crimes against the law of nations", such as piracy, be automatically excluded? They declared that they preferred not to take a position on the question as to whether an international criminal court was possible or desirable until they had before them a draft statute of the said court and, if possible, a draft code of the law which the court would apply.

The representatives of, among others, Argentina, Canada, the Dominican Republic and the Union of South Africa, held the view that further consideration of that part of the report of the International Law Commission dealing with this question should be postponed until after the Commission had submitted its draft code of offences against the peace and security of mankind. It was premature to take any further steps toward establishing an international criminal court, they argued, until the International Law Commission had drafted a code. At the moment, they explained, there was a dearth of positive law which the proposed court could apply.

Some representatives, including those of Cuba, France, Iran and Uruguay, on the other hand, were of the opinion that at this stage it would be preferable to set up an inter-governmental committee which could prepare a draft statute of an international criminal court, taking into account also the political aspects of the matter. It was emphasized that the setting up of such a committee would be without prejudice to the question of the desirability or possibility of establishing such a tribunal.

The representative of Canada submitted a draft resolution (A/C.6/L.155) which was replaced by a draft resolution (A/C.6/L.157), presented jointly by Canada and the Union of South Africa and subsequently revised by its authors (A/C.6/L.157/Rev.I). The revised joint draft resolution proposed to postpone the consideration of that part of the report of the International Law Commission dealing with this question until after the Commission had submitted its codification of offences against the peace and security of mankind.

The representative of Cuba, on the other hand, placed before the Committee a draft resolution (A/C.6/L.126) which suggested that the International Law Commission should be instructed to prepare a draft statute governing the establishment and functions of an international penal tribunal for the trial of persons charged with genocide or other crimes over which jurisdiction might be conferred upon that organ by international conventions. In the course of the deliberations the representative of Cuba withdrew this draft resolution in favour of a draft resolution presented jointly by Cuba, France and Iran (A/C.6/L.151). In its operative part, the joint draft resolution proposed that a committee composed of representatives of fifteen Member States should meet in Geneva on 1 August 1951 for the purpose of preparing a preliminary draft convention relating to the establishment and the statute of an international penal court, for submission to the next regular session of the General Assembly. It also suggested that the Governments of Member States should be invited to address to the Secretary-General their comments on the organization and functioning of such a court, and that the Secretary-General should be instructed to transmit such comments to the inter-governmental committee.

Amendments to this joint draft resolution (A/C.6/L.151) were submitted by Israel (A/C.6/L.152), the United Kingdom (A/C.6/L.153) and the United States (A/C.6/L.158).

The Israeli amendment would have had the General Assembly request the Secretary-General to prepare a preliminary draft or alternative drafts of a convention and statute of an International Penal Court. It would have also, inter alia, deferred the placing of the question before the General Assembly from the sixth regular session to the seventh.

The United Kingdom amendment would, among other things, have provided for the addition of a new paragraph to read as follows: "Bearing in mind also that no useful purpose will be served by setting up such an International Penal Tribunal unless it can function effectively".

The United States amendment would have provided for the substitution of the words "preliminary draft conventions or proposals" in lieu of the words "a preliminary draft convention".

In the light of these amendments, Cuba, France and Iran submitted a revised draft resolution (A/C.6/L.151/Rev.1), which incorporated, in substance, all the amendments except one of those suggested by the United Kingdom. This latter amendment was however re-drafted by its author, submitted as an amendment (A/C.6/L.159) to the revised draft resolution and, in this new form was accepted by the sponsors of that draft resolution. In its new form, it stated that a final decision regarding the setting up of an international penal court could not be taken except on the basis of concrete proposals. The joint draft resolution, as amended, recalled, in its first paragraph, resolution 260 B (III) inviting the International Law Commission to study the desirability and possibility of establishing an international penal court, and in its second paragraph it took account of the conclusion reached by the Commission that the creation of such a court was desirable and possible. In the third paragraph it referred to article VI of the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide, and in the fourth paragraph it included the new United Kingdom amendment. Consequently, in the operative part, it recommended the establishment of a committee composed of representatives of seventeen Member States which should meet in Geneva on 1 August 1951 for the purpose of preparing one or more preliminary draft conventions and proposals relating to the establishment and the statute of an international criminal court. It further requested the Secretary-General to prepare and submit to this inter-governmental committee one or more preliminary draft conventions and proposals regarding such a court, to make all necessary arrangements for the convening of the committee and for its meetings, to communicate to the Governments of Member States the report of the Committee so that their observations could be submitted not later than 1 June 1952, and to place this question on the agenda of the seventh session of the General Assembly.

Prior to the voting, the representatives of Canada and the Union of South Africa moved that their joint draft resolution (A/C.6/L.157/Rev.1) should be voted upon first. They felt that it dealt with a previous question, that is whether measures for establishing an international penal tribunal should be undertaken immediately or be postponed until the International Law Commission had prepared a draft code of offences against the peace and security of mankind. Moreover, they wished to reserve the right to make further amendments to the joint draft resolution submitted by Cuba, France and Iran if their own draft resolution should not be adopted. This motion was rejected by 18 votes in favour, 18 against, with 11 abstentions. (If a vote is equally divided on matters other than elections, the proposal, according to the rules of procedure of the General Assembly is regarded as rejected).

At this point, the representative of Canada submitted an amendment to replace the second paragraph of draft resolution A/C.6/L.151/Rev.1 by the second paragraph of draft resolution A/C.6/L.157/Rev.1 which merely stated that the General Assembly had given "preliminary consideration to part IV of the report of the second session of the International Law Commission". This amendment was adopted by 20 votes to 16, with 12 abstentions.

The Sixth Committee at its 244th meeting on 27 November voted upon the draft resolution of Cuba, France and Iran, as amended, first in parts then as a whole. It was adopted as a whole by 35 votes to 6, with 8 abstentions. The Sixth Committee in its report to the Assembly (A/1639) stated that in adopting this draft resolution, it was clearly the sense of the Committee that the establishment of the inter-governmental committee, for the purpose of preparing one or more preliminary draft conventions and proposals relating to the establishment and the statute of an international criminal court, would in no way commit the Governments as to the ultimate desirability and possibility of establishing such a court.

The Committee then considered the question of the composition of the inter-governmental committee. The representative of Turkey, rapporteur of the Sixth Committee, introduced a proposal (A/C.6/L.160 & Corrs.1-3) to the effect that the inter-governmental committee should be composed of representatives of the following Member States: Brazil, China, Cuba, Egypt, France, Iran, Israel, the Netherlands, Pakistan, Peru, Poland, Sweden, Syria, the USSR, the United Kingdom, the United States and Uruguay. He then suggested that the membership of the Committee should be increased to nineteen and that Australia and India should be added to the list. However, as the representatives of Poland and the USSR stated that their countries were unable to accept membership on the Committee, Australia and India were included on the list without changing the number of members. The representative of Sweden thereupon orally requested that Denmark should be substituted for his country. The proposal of Turkey, as thus modified, was adopted by the Sixth Committee at its 246th meeting on 29 November by 36 votes to none, with 6 abstentions.

The report of the Sixth Committee (A/1639) was considered by the General Assembly at its 320th plenary meeting on 12 December. The draft resolution recommended for adoption was adopted by 42 votes to 7, with 5 abstentions, as resolution 489(V), the text of which was as follows:

The General Assembly,

Recalling that, in its resolution 260 B (III) of 9 December 1948, it considered "that, in the course of development of the international community, there will be an increasing need of an international judicial organ for the trial of certain crimes under international law", and that, in the same resolution, it invited the International Law Commission "to study the desirability and possibility of establishing an international judicial organ for the trial of persons charged with genocide or other crimes over which jurisdiction will be conferred upon that organ by international conventions",

Having given preliminary consideration to part IV of the report of the International Law Commission on the work of its second session,

Bearing in mind article VI of the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide,

Bearing in mind, further, that a final decision regarding the setting up of such an international penal tribunal cannot be taken except on the basis of concrete proposals,

1. Decides that a committee composed of the representatives of the following seventeen Member States, namely, Australia, Brazil, China, Cuba, Denmark, Egypt, France, India, Iran, Israel, the Netherlands, Pakistan, Peru, Syria, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, the United States of America and Uruguay, shall meet in Geneva on 1 August 1951 for the purpose of preparing one or more preliminary draft conventions and proposals relating to the establishment and the statute of an international criminal court;

2. Requests the Secretary-General to prepare and submit to the committee referred to above one or more preliminary draft conventions and proposals regarding such a court;

3. Requests the Secretary-General to make all necessary arrangements for the convening of the committee and for its meetings;

4. Requests the Secretary-General to communicate the report of the committee to the governments of Member States so that their observations may be submitted not later than 1 June 1952, and to place the question on the agenda of the seventh session of the General Assembly.

7. Preparation of a Draft Code of Offences Against the Peace and Security of Mankind

The General Assembly in November 1947 by resolution 177(II) directed the International Law Commission to prepare a draft code of offences against the peace and security of mankind. After considering the question at its first session, the Commission appointed a rapporteur to prepare a working paper on the subject to be submitted to the Commission at its second session. The Commission also decided that a questionnaire should be circulated to Governments inquiring what offences, apart from those (defined in the Charter and Judgment of the Nürnberg Tribunal, should, in their view, be comprehended in the draft code.

Mr. Jean Spiropoulos, who had been appointed rapporteur for this subject at the first session, presented his report (A/CN.4/25) which the Commission took as the basis of its discussion at its second session. The Commission also took into consideration the replies of Governments to its questionnaire (A/CN.4/19, part II, A/CN.4/-19/Add.1; A/CN.4/19/Add.2).

The view of the Commission was that the meaning of the term "offences against the peace and security of mankind" should be limited to offences which contain political elements and which endanger or disturb international peace and security. The draft code should not therefore deal with questions concerning the conflicts of legislation and jurisdiction in international criminal matters. The Commission also felt that such matters as piracy, traffic in dangerous drugs, traffic in women and children, slavery, counterfeiting currency and damage to submarine cables, should not be considered as falling within the scope of the draft code. As regards the instruction given by the General Assembly in its resolution 177(II) that the Commission should clearly indicate "the place to be accorded to the Nürnberg principles" in the draft code the Commission felt that the phrase ought not to be taken as meaning that the principles of the Charter and Judgment of the Tribunal should be inserted in their entirety or without change in the draft code. The Commission further decided that the draft code should deal only with the criminal responsibility of individuals.

The Commission took note of a communication from UNESCO, and agreed that destruction of historical monuments and documents and works of art in case of armed conflict comes within the general concept of war crimes.

As regards the responsibility of a person acting as Head of State or as a responsible government official, or under superior orders, the Commission decided, tentatively, to follow the relevant principles of the Nürnberg Charter and Judgment as it had formulated them. As regards the implementation of the draft code, the Commission concluded that, pending the establishment of a competent international criminal court, such implementation would have to be achieved through the enactment of necessary legislation by States adopting the code.

In the light of these deliberations, a drafting sub-committee, composed of Mr. Alfaro, Mr. Hudson and Mr. Spiropoulos, prepared a provisional draft of a code (A/CN.4/R.6). This draft was referred by the Commission to the special rapporteur, Mr. Spiropoulos, with the request to continue work on the subject and to submit a further report to the Commission at its third session.

8. Progress of Work on Topics Selected for Codification

The International Law Commission after having surveyed at its first session the whole field of international law with a view to selecting topics for codification, decided to give priority to three topics from fourteen provisionally selected for codification. These three topics were: law of treaties, arbitral procedure, and regime of the high seas.

a. LAW OF TREATIES

Mr. James L. Brierly, who had been appointed special rapporteur for this subject at the Commission's first session presented a report (A/CN.4/23) on the topic to the second session. The Commission also had before it replies of Governments to a questionnaire addressed to them under article 19, paragraph 2, of the Commission's Statute (A/CN.4/19, part I, A).

The Commission, in five meetings, discussed at its second session in a preliminary way the report of the special rapporteur with a view to assisting him in the continuance of his work. It made a provisional decision that exchanges of notes were within the scope of the subject, and that the explanation of the term "treaty" should be "a formal instrument" rather than an "agreement recorded in writing". There was general agreement among members of the Commission that, while treaty-making powers of certain international organizations were clear, the determination of the other organizations which possess capacity for making treaties would need further consideration.

On the part of the report dealing with reservations, there was general agreement that a reservation requires at least the consent of all parties in order to become effective.

b. ARBITRAL PROCEDURE

Mr. Georges Scelle, who had been appointed special rapporteur on this subject at the Commission's first session submitted to the second session his report (A/CN.4/18), in which he proposed a preliminary draft code of arbitral procedure. The Commission also had before it the replies of Governments (A/CN.4/19, part I, B) to a questionnaire circulated by it. The report of the special rapporteur, which served as the basis of discussion, was confined to arbitration between States, or inter-governmental arbitration.

The special rapporteur emphasized that arbitral procedure as it stands today contained loopholes through which States were enabled to evade their obligations, either by making it impossible for the arbitral tribunal to be constituted, or by hampering its functioning. The object of the code of arbitral procedure should be to close these loopholes. The elements of codification, the rapporteur stated, existed in the arbitration procedure drawn up by the Hague Conferences of 1899 and 1907 and by the League of Nations (General Act of 26 September 1928, revised by the General Assembly of the United Nations in 1949), but these needed to be consolidated and developed.

The report stated that provision should be made for intervention, in the absence of agreement between the parties, by an international authority whose decisions would be binding. In some cases that authority might be the arbitral tribunal itself, and, in other cases the International Court of Justice. The special rapporteur accordingly suggested that the arbitral tribunal should be constituted, if necessary, prior to the conclusion of the compromis, to enable it to draw up the compromis itself and adopt the procedure for reaching the award.

In the view of Mr. Scelle, in the event of a dispute as to whether an issue existed or as to whether it fell within the terms of the obligation to arbitrate, the issue should be referred to the International Court of Justice for judgment to be pronounced in a chamber of summary procedure.

In the light of the above thesis, the Commission discussed three paragraphs of the draft text prepared by Mr. Scelle dealing with: disputes as to existence of the obligation to arbitrate; appointment of arbitrators or arbitral tribunal; and replacement, resignation, withdrawal or challenge of arbitrators. The Commission agreed to request the special rapporteur to submit, at its next session, a revised draft, taking into account the views expressed during the discussion.

c. REGIME OF THE HIGH SEAS

Mr. J. P. A. Francois, who had been appointed special rapporteur on this subject at the Commission's first session, submitted his report (A/CN.4/17) on the topic to the second session. The Commission also had before it the replies of Governments (A/CN.4/19, part I, C) to a questionnaire circulated by it.

The Commission decided to eliminate from the scope of its study a number of subjects related to this topic which were either being studied by other United Nations organs and specialized agencies or were otherwise not suitable. The following subjects were retained by the Commission for codification:

(i) Nationality of Ships; (ii) Collision; (iii) Safety of Life at Sea; (iv) The Right of Approach; (v) Slave Trade; (vi) Submarine Telegraph Cables; (vii) Resources of the Sea; (viii) Right of Pursuit; (ix) Contiguous Zones; (x) Sedentary Fisheries; (xi) The Continental Shelf.

9. Miscellaneous Decisions Taken by the Commission at Its Second Session

The Commission took note of General Assembly resolutions 373 (IV) and 375 (IV), both adopted at the Assembly's fourth session, on the report of the Commission's first session. In response to the request contained in Assembly resolution 374 (IV), the Commission decided to include in its list of priorities the topic of territorial waters.

The Commission decided to consider the drafting of a convention on the nationality of married women, as requested by the Economic and Social Council (resolution 304 D (XI)) in connexion with the Commission's study of "nationality, including statelessness", one of the subjects chosen for codification.²⁶

C. REPARATION FOR INJURIES INCURRED IN THE SERVICE OF THE UNITED NATIONS

The General Assembly, on 1 December 1949, adopted resolution 365 (IV),²⁷ concerning reparation for injuries incurred in the service of the United Nations, under which the Secretary-General was authorized to present an international claim against the Government of a State, Member or non-member of the United Nations, alleged to be responsible, with a view to obtaining the reparation due in respect of the damage caused to the United Nations and to the victim or to persons entitled through him. The Secretary-General was authorized to submit to arbitration such claims as could not be settled by negotiation. The resolution further authorized the Secretary-General to negotiate in each particular case the agreements necessary to reconcile action by the United Nations with such rights as might be possessed by the State of which the victim was a national. The Secretary-General was requested to submit an annual report to subsequent sessions of the Assembly on the status of such claims.

The Secretary-General, accordingly, submitted to the fifth session of the General Assembly a report (A/1347) concerning the procedure adopted and the steps taken with respect to cases of injuries or deaths of United Nations agents in Palestine.

The Secretary-General adopted the following procedure:

(1) to determine which of the cases appeared likely to involve the responsibility of a State;

(2) to consult with the Government of the State of which the victim was a national in order to determine whether (a) that Government had any objection to the presentation of a claim or (b) whether it desired to join in the submission of a claim; and

²⁶ See p. 559.

²⁷ See Y.U.N., 1948-49, p. 945.

(3) to present, in each such case, an appropriate request to the State involved for the initiation of negotiations to determine the facts, and the amount of reparations, if any, involved.

With respect to damages, the Secretary-General declared that he would be guided by the following principles:

(1) the reparations requested should be reasonably adequate to compensate the Organization and the victim or the persons entitled through him;

(2) the State involved should be given appropriate assurances that it would not be subjected to multiple claims by the United Nations, the victim and the State of the victim's nationality for the same damage; and

(3) the Secretary-General would not advance any claim for exemplary damages.

With respect to the death of Count Folke Bernadotte, United Nations Mediator in Palestine, who was killed by irregular forces in territory under Israeli control in Jerusalem on 17 September 1948, the Secretary-General, on 21 April 1950, addressed a letter to the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Israel. This letter requested:

(1) a formal apology to the United Nations for the murder of the Mediator in territory under the control of the Israeli Government;

(2) the continuation and intensification of the Government's efforts to apprehend and bring to justice the perpetrators of the crime;

(3) the payment to the United Nations of the sum of $54,628 as reparation for the monetary damage borne by the United Nations (the widow of Count Bernadotte had informed the Secretary-General that she did not wish to present a claim for pecuniary redress with regard to the damage suffered by her on account of her husband's death).

The Israeli Government replied to the Secretary-General on 14 June 1950. Israel remitted $54,628 as reparation for the damage suffered by the United Nations, and expressed its most sincere regret that the dastardly assassination took place on Israeli territory, and that despite all its efforts the criminals had gone undetected. It added that it did not regard the case as closed.

On 22 June 1950, the Secretary-General replied to the Government of Israel. After expressing his regret that the efforts so far made by that Government had not resulted in the apprehension and trial of the perpetrators of the crime, the Secretary-General stated that the payment of indemnity, the expression of regret and the report on the steps taken to date, which were included in the Israeli Government's letter, constituted substantial compliance with the claim submitted in the Secretary-General's letter of 21 April 1950.

The Secretary-General also considered the following cases of death and injury to French military observers in Palestine: Commandant Rene de Labarriere, who died of an explosion on 6 July 1948 in the Nazareth region; Lt.-Colonel Joseph Queru and Captain Pierre Jeannel, who were killed at the Gaza airfield on 28 August 1948 by troops under Egyptian command; Colonel Andre Serot, who was killed, at the same time as Count Bernadotte, by irregular forces in territory under Israeli control in Jerusalem on 17 September 1948; and Commandant Etienne de Canchy, who was injured by an explosion on 6 July 1948 in the Nazareth region. After receiving assurance from the French Government that it had no objection to the presentation of claims by the United Nations for damage caused to the victims or persons entitled through them, the Secretary-General, on 31 July 1950, addressed a letter to the French Government. The letter stated that the United Nations would include in its claims a demand for reparation for damage to the victims if a request to this effect were made by the claimants through the French Government. The Secretary-General indicated the elements of information to be submitted by the claimants, on the basis of which he would determine the amount of reparation to be demanded for damage to the victims or persons entitled through them. It was also stated that the United Nations had already paid the sum of $25,000 as compensation in each case of death, and would therefore withhold that amount from any recoveries obtained from the responsible Governments as compensation for damage to the victim's dependents. In order to avoid the possibility of multiple claims against the responsible Governments, the Secretary-General requested assurance from the French Government that it had no intention of presenting claims with respect to the injuries or death of the French military observers in Palestine. On receipt of a request from the claimants, the Secretary-General would initiate negotiations with the Governments held responsible. If, on the other hand, any or all of the victims' dependents decided not to request the United Nations to present claims on their behalf, the Secretary-General intended to limit the claim to the damage caused to the United Nations.

On the basis of the information available to the United Nations, the Secretary-General considered that the death of Ole Helge Bakke, a Norwegian national and a member of the United Nations Secretariat, who was killed by a soldier of the Arab Legion near Jerusalem on 13 July 1948, involved the responsibility of the Government of the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan. The Secretary-General was informed by Mr. Bakke's widow, a national of the United States, that she did not wish to bring a claim against the Jordan Government. On the other hand, the Norwegian Government informed the Secretary-General that Mr. Bakke's mother, a Norwegian national, would be grateful if the United Nations brought a claim against the responsible Government for the pecuniary damage suffered by her in connexion with Mr. Bakke's death. Accordingly, the United Nations in its claim against the Jordan Government will include a demand for reparation for the damage suffered by the Organization and by Mr. Bakke's mother.

With respect to the death of Thomas C. Wason, American Consul-General in Jerusalem and a member of the United Nations Truce Commission, who was killed by a sniper on 23 May 1948 in Jerusalem, the Secretary-General was advised by the United States on 23 February 1950 that it was not possible, in the light of information available to that Government, to fix responsibility for his death. The Secretary-General accordingly reported that, unless new evidence was obtained, there were not sufficient elements to enable him to bring an international claim against a Government.

The General Assembly, at its 285th plenary meeting held on 26 September 1950, referred the Secretary-General's report to the Sixth Committee which considered it at its 214th meeting held on 27 September 1950, and decided (A/1420) by 48 votes to none, with 3 abstentions, to recommend to the General Assembly that it take note of the Secretary-General's report.

This recommendation was adopted by the Assembly at its 299th plenary meeting on 1 November by 48 votes to none in resolution 476(V).

D. PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES OF THE UNITED NATIONS

The General Assembly on 13 February 1946 approved a Convention on the Privileges and Immunities of the United Nations²⁸ and proposed it for accession by each Member of the Organization. On 8 December 1948, the Assembly urged all Member States to accede as soon as possible to the Convention.²⁹

The Secretary-General, on 8 November 1950, submitted a report (A/C.5/398, Annex A) to the fifth session of the General Assembly showing the status of the action taken by Members with respect to the Convention. He reported that as of 22 September 1950, the following 38 Members, on the dates indicated, had deposited their instruments of accession to the Convention:

United Kingdom-17 September 1946
Dominican Republic-7 March 1947
Liberia-14 March 1947
Iran-8 May 1947
Honduras-16 May 1947
Panama-27 May 1947
Guatemala-7 July 1947
El Salvador-9 July 1947
Ethiopia-6 August 1947
Haiti-6 August 1947
France-18 August 1947
Norway-18 August 1947
Sweden-28 August 1947
Afghanistan-5 September 1947
Philippines-28 October 1947
Nicaragua-29 November 1947
New Zealand-10 December 1947
Greece-29 December 1947
Poland-8 January 1948
Canada-22 January 1948

Iceland-10 March 1948
Netherlands-19 April 1948
India-13 May 1948
Denmark-10 June 1948
Egypt-17 September 1948
Pakistan-22 September 1948
Belgium-25 September 1948
Chile-15 October 1948
Luxembourg-14 February 1949
Australia-2 March 1949
Lebanon-10 March 1949
Iraq-15 September 1949
Israel-21 September 1949
Costa Rica-26 October 1949
Brazil-15 December 1949
Bolivia-23 December 1949
Yugoslavia-30 June 1950
Turkey-22 August 1950

Three Members, namely, Canada, New Zealand and Turkey,³⁰ had made reservations to section 18 (b) of the Convention (which states that officials of the United Nations should be exempt from taxation on the salaries and emoluments paid to them by the Organization). Canada, while making this reservation, the Secretary-General reported, had taken the necessary action to grant relief from double taxation.

As of 31 December 1950, the following 22 Members had not acceded to the Convention:

Argentina	Byelorussian SSR
Burma	China

²⁸ See Y.U.N., 1946-47, pp. 99-103.

²⁹ See ibid., 1948-49, p. 966.

³⁰ Turkey also made reservations beside that to Sec. 18 (b) of the Convention.

Colombia
Cuba Czechoslovakia
Ecuador
Indonesia
Mexico
Paraguay

Peru
Saudi Arabia
Syria
Thailand
Ukrainian SSR
Union of South Africa
USSR

United States
Uruguay
Venezuela
Yemen

Of this latter group, Argentina had notified the Secretary-General that persons considered to have diplomatic status would be exempted from national income taxation.

E. REGISTRATION AND PUBLICATION OF TREATIES AND INTERNATIONAL AGREEMENTS

1. Report of the Secretary-General

In accordance with the precedent set in previous years, the Secretary-General submitted a report (A/1408) to the fifth session of the General Assembly informing it of the progress made in the registration and publication of treaties and giving a review of the economies which might be effected in this field.

The report stated that during the period from 1 July 1949 to 30 June 1950 there had been a notable increase in the number of treaties and international agreements registered or filed and recorded with the Secretary-General. During the period, 479 treaties were registered or filed and recorded with the Secretariat. Of this number, 295 were registered or filed and recorded by 22 Governments, 120 by four specialized agencies, and 64 ex officio by the Secretariat. In comparison with the figures for the corresponding period of last year, there had been an increase of 133 treaties registered or filed and recorded. This increase, the report pointed out, was due partly to: (1) the inclusion of a considerable number of agreements which were concluded between the United Nations International Children's Emergency Fund and various Member and non-member States; and (2) the registration of a substantially greater number of agreements by specialized agencies, particularly by the International Civil Aviation Organization and the International Labour Organisation.

Up to 30 August 1950, 1,024 treaties and agreements were registered—106 ex officio, 771 by 28 Governments, and 147 by four specialized agencies; and 259 were filed and recorded—219 by 12 Governments, 32 by the Secretariat, and eight by three specialized agencies. This represented a total of 1,283 treaties and agreements registered or filed.

Since his report of 24 August 1949 to the General Assembly at its fourth session (A/958), 913 certificates of registration had been issued by the Secretary-General, bringing the total number of certificates issued to 2,229.

The report drew attention to the fact that a special effort had been made to have registered treaties published with the least possible delay. The 37th volume of the United Nations Treaty Series appeared on 12 August 1950. Of the 37 volumes, nineteen had been published in the course of the last twelve months. Fifteen further volumes had been sent to the press, and it was expected that the interval between registration and publication would soon be reduced to about six months. An index volume covering the treaties contained in the first fifteen volumes of the Treaty Series had been published, and the second volume, covering a further fifteen volumes, was in an advanced stage of preparation.

The report then reviewed possible economies in the expenditure involved in the registration and publication of treaties. The Secretary-General recalled that during the fourth session of the General Assembly the Fifth and Sixth Committees had considered this question which had been brought to the Assembly's attention by the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions in its second report of 1949 (A/934). Both Committees had been informed that a report on the subject would be presented by the Secretary-General to the Assembly's fifth session and would include, if necessary, proposals to amend the regulations to give effect to Article 102 of the Charter.³¹

³¹ This Article states:

"1. Every treaty and every international agreement entered into by any Member of the United Nations after the present Charter comes into force shall as soon as possible be registered with the Secretariat and published by it.

"2. No party to any such treaty or international agreement which has not been registered in accordance with the provisions of paragraph 1 of this Article may invoke that treaty or agreement before any organ of the United Nations."

A memorandum on this question (A/CN.I/R.24) was submitted by the Secretary-General on 9 June 1950 to the Advisory Committee, which gave its observations on it in its second report of 1950 to the General Assembly (A/1312).

In his memorandum the Secretary-General set out a concrete list of possible economies under two headings:

- (1) those requiring amendments to the regulations adopted by the General Assembly to give effect to Article 102 of the Charter;
- (2) those not requiring amendments to the regulations.

In the former group, he indicated that economies might be made by:

- (1) publishing the Treaty Series in English and French only;
- (2) issuing certificates of registration only to the registering party or agency;
- (3) keeping the Register of treaties and international agreements in English and French.

Under the first point, the Secretary-General explained that the existing regulations required the Secretariat to publish every treaty or international agreement which was registered, or filed and recorded, in the original language or languages, followed by a translation in English and in French. This, he indicated, involved considerable extra editorial, translation and typesetting work, and some inevitable delay in publication. A comparison of the actual cost of publishing the first fourteen volumes of the Treaty Series and the cost had the French and English languages only been used indicated that a saving of about 25 per cent on the total cost of publication would have been effected.

With reference to this point, the Advisory Committee stated that one of the main purposes of Article 102 of the Charter was to ensure that the contents of every international instrument to which a Member of the United Nations is a party should be made known without delay. This purpose would be adequately fulfilled by publication in English and French, particularly since those are the official languages of the International Court of Justice, the organ before which registered treaties and agreements are most frequently invoked. Publication on this basis would produce an appreciable economy in the budget.

The Advisory Committee went on to state that however competently performed, a translation could not represent the exact equivalent of an original text. Even if certified by the contracting parties, it must necessarily have a validity inferior to that of the original. The Committee therefore suggested that instead of amending the regulations, Members of the United Nations should be invited to submit, wherever possible, a translation in either English or French.

The second possible amendment to the regulations concerned article 7, to the effect that certificates of registration, instead of being issued to the registering party or agency and also to all signatories and parties to the international agreement being registered, might be issued only to the registering party or agency. In his report to the Assembly, the Secretary-General explained that the issuance of certificates to all other signatories and parties was of little practical value since, under articles 13 and 14 of the regulations, the Secretariat was required in any case to publish and send to all Members every month a statement of all treaties and international agreements registered or filed and recorded during each month.

The Advisory Committee had stated in its second report of 1950 that it was in agreement with these considerations and that it understood that savings would ensue if article 7 of the regulations were so amended.

The third and last instance involving an amendment to the regulations, in this case article 8, would permit the Register to be kept only in English and French. Article 8 stipulated that the Register should be kept in the five official languages of the United Nations. This necessitates the maintenance of five separate registers, each containing all the particulars of each treaty or international agreement required by the other provisions of article 8. On this possible amendment the Advisory Committee reached the conclusion that economy would result if the Register were kept in English and French.

Under the second group of possible economies—those not involving amendments to the regulations to give effect to Article 102 of the Charter—the Secretary-General suggested that the following points might be considered:

- (1) dispensing with the publishing of certain annexes to treaties and agreements;
- (2) dispensing with the publishing of model texts;
- (3) arranging for the printing of the Treaty Series in Europe;
- (4) restricting the free mailing list;
- (5) using paper of less quality and a smaller type face for the printing of the Treaty Series.

With respect to the first point, the Secretary-General noted that there were types of annexes to treaties or international agreements which, being in no way essential to an understanding of the main documents, might well be excluded from publication without any departure from the legal requirements of the regulations themselves. He explained that this, of course, would be done only after consultation between the Secretariat and the registering parties.

Commenting on this, the Advisory Committee declared that it had formed the opinion that, as regards the publication of annexes to treaties, economy in printing costs could best be achieved by means of consultations between the registering parties and the Secretary-General, a method which had already produced satisfactory results. In this connexion, the Committee observed that since a condition precedent to registration was that the complete text of the instrument should be submitted, the omission from the Treaty Series of a part or the whole of an annex to a treaty or agreement could not be construed as affecting the validity of the registration.

The second suggestion involved dispensing with the publication in full of virtually identical texts all based on a standard model. The Secretary-General submitted that much duplication of material in the Treaty Series might be avoided by omitting the repetitive portions of such treaties or agreements, at least when all were published together. The Advisory Committee upheld this view, stating in its report that it believed that appreciable savings were possible by dispensing with the publication of model texts.

The Secretary-General observed that a saving of about 30 per cent could be made if the Treaty Series were printed in Europe. The Advisory Committee thought that such a saving was a consideration of first importance. The Committee concurred in the Secretary-General's suggestion to reduce to a minimum the free issue of the Series, and in its report drew attention to the economies that would be effected by the use of paper of less quality and of smaller type in printing the Treaty Series.

2. Resolution Adopted by the Assembly at Its Fifth Session

The General Assembly, at its 285th plenary meeting on 26 September 1950, referred the question of the registration and publication of treaties to the Sixth Committee which considered it at its 246th meeting on 29 November. In addition to this report of the Secretary-General (A/1408), the Sixth Committee had before it a draft resolution submitted by the United States (A/C.6/L.154) and amendments to it proposed by the United Kingdom (A/C.6/L.156).

The United States draft resolution called upon the Assembly to:

(1) note with satisfaction the progress achieved in registering and publishing treaties;

(2) invite Members and non-members parties to treaties or international agreements subject to publication to provide the Secretary-General with translations in English or French or both as might be needed;

(3) amend the Assembly regulations in this matter so that the Register would be kept in only English and French;

(4) request the Secretary-General to continue publishing all treaties and international agreements in their full and unabridged form, including all annexes, "provided however, that in the reproduction of annexes, he may in his discretion employ less expensive methods of reproduction";

(5) request the Secretary-General to reduce the free mailing list. (For full text, see below.)

The first part of the United Kingdom amendment to the United States draft recommended that the Assembly's regulations be amended so that instead of issuing a certificate of registration to the registering party or agency and also to all signatories and parties to the treaty or international agreement registered, such a certificate would be issued only to the party or agency which registered the treaty or agreement.

With reference to this particular amendment, the representative of Canada explained that a certificate of registration was of little practical importance and was needed only in such rare cases as when a party to a treaty wished to prove that the treaty had been registered with the United Nations. That party need not necessarily be the one which had registered the instrument, and he therefore orally proposed that the United Kingdom amendment be amended in order to provide that a certificate of registration be issued to the, registering party or agency or upon request to any party to a treaty or international agreement registered. The representative of the United Kingdom accepted this amendment.

The second substantive part of the United Kingdom amendment called for the deletion of that part of paragraph 4 of the United States draft providing for less expensive methods of reproducing annexes (see quoted phrase in point 4 above) and the substitution for it, of the following:

provided that,

(a) in the reproduction of annexes, he may in his discretion employ less expensive methods of reproduction, (b) he may, with the consent of the party or parties or the agency registering a treaty or international agreement, refrain from publishing any annex to that treaty or agreement, and

(c) if the text of any treaty or international agreement is almost identical with the text of one which has already been published in the United Nations Treaty Series, he may publish only such part of the treaty or agreement, together with any necessary explanatory note, as may be required to show clearly how the later treaty or agreement differs from the earlier one.

The discussion in the Sixth Committee centred mainly around paragraph 4 of the United States draft resolution concerning the publication of annexes, and the amendments to this paragraph proposed by the United Kingdom. The representative of the USSR supported the United Kingdom amendments. The representatives of, inter alia, India, the United States, Uruguay and Yugoslavia, on the other hand, expressed certain doubts concerning the effect of the amendments.

It was pointed out in this connexion that an annex was normally an integral part of a treaty or agreement and often constituted the most important part of the whole text; that the omission from publication of annexes would defeat the underlying purpose of Article 102 of the Charter; that such procedure, if adopted, might provide a loophole which would enable States to withhold vital details of a treaty from publication; and that it was clear from the provisions both of Article 102 of the Charter and article 5 of the Assembly regulations, that what should be published was a "true and complete" copy of the agreement. Attention was also drawn to certain difficulties which might face the Secretary-General should a procedure be adopted whereby, with the consent of a registering party, he could refrain from publishing an annex to a treaty. Similar fears were also expressed in connexion with the amendment which would authorize the Secretary-General to refrain from publishing in its entirety a treaty or agreement, the text of which was almost identical with the text of one which had already been published, especially in view of the imprecise meaning of the words "almost identical".

It was argued on the other hand that the United Kingdom amendment would not in any way enable States to evade the obligation to register the complete text of an agreement including annexes; that its only purpose was to refrain from publishing detailed and unessential annexes in the Treaty Series. The references to such annexes would remain in the text of the treaty and the annexes themselves would be available for inspection by any Government wishing to consult them.

The representatives of the Union of South Africa and Iran declared their support of the United States draft resolution and the first part of the United Kingdom amendment. The representative of Australia said that he would vote in favour of both the United States draft resolution and the United Kingdom amendments to the draft.

At the end of the discussion, the Sixth Committee voted on the proposals before it, voting first on the United Kingdom amendments. The only amendment to be adopted was the first United Kingdom amendment, as modified at the suggestion of the representative of Canada. This was adopted by 38 votes to 2, with no abstentions.

At the request of the representative of Peru, the Committee took a separate vote on paragraph -4 (formerly paragraph 3) of the United States draft resolution and adopted it by 23 votes to 8, with 9 abstentions. The amended draft resolution as a whole was then adopted by 39 votes to none, with 2 abstentions.

The report of the Sixth Committee (A/1626) containing the text of the resolution it recommended for adoption by the General Assembly was considered by the Assembly at its 320th plenary meeting on 12 December. The Assembly also had before it a report of the Fifth Committee (A/1663) on the matter. The Fifth Committee informed the Assembly in its report that adoption of the draft resolution recommended by the Sixth Committee would require an additional $50,000 for the 1951 budget.

The resolution was then voted upon and adopted by 50 votes to none as resolution 482 (V). Its text was as follows:

The General Assembly,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General on the registration and publication of treaties and international agreements and the observations in this regard of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions,

1. Notes with satisfaction the progress achieved in regard to the registration and publication of treaties;

2. Invites Member and non-member States parties to treaties or international agreements subject to publication under article 12 of the regulations to give effect to Article 102 of the Charter of the United Nations, to provide the Secretary-General, where feasible, with translations in English or French or both as may be needed for the purposes of such publication;

3. Amends article 7 of the regulations to give effect to Article 102 of the Charter of the United Nations to read:

"A certificate of registration signed by the Secretary-General or his representative shall be issued to the registering party or agency and also, upon request, to any party to the treaty or international agreement registered";

4. Amends the first sentence of paragraph 1 of article 8 of the regulations to give effect to Article 102 of the Charter of the United Nations to read:

"1. The register shall be kept in the English and French languages";

5. Requests the Secretary-General, when acting under article 12 of the regulations to give effect to Article 102 of the Charter of the United Nations, to continue, as economically as practicable, without undue delay and without sacrifice of uniformity in style and record permanence, to publish all treaties and international agreements in their full and unabridged form, including all annexes, provided however that, in the reproduction of annexes, he may in his discretion employ less expensive methods of reproduction;

6. Requests the Secretary-General regularly to review the free mailing list with a view to its possible reduction.

F. PERMANENT MISSIONS TO THE UNITED NATIONS

The General Assembly on 3 December 1948 adopted resolution 257 A (III)³² instructing the Secretary-General to submit, at each regular session of the Assembly, a report on the credentials of the permanent representatives accredited to the United Nations.

In his report to the Assembly's fifth session (A/1472), the Secretary-General stated that as of 2 November 1950, the following 53 Member States had set up Permanent Missions at the seat of the United Nations:

Afghanistan	Greece	Panama
Argentina	Guatemala	Paraguay
Australia	Haiti	Peru
Belgium	Honduras	Philippines
Bolivia	Iceland	Poland
Brazil	India	Saudi Arabia
Canada	Indonesia	Sweden
Chile	Iran	Syria
China	Iraq	Thailand
Colombia	Israel	Turkey
Costa Rica	Lebanon	Union of
Cuba	Liberia	South Africa
Czechoslovakia	Mexico	USSR
Denmark	Netherlands	United Kingdom
Dominican Republic	New Zealand	United States
Ecuador	Nicaragua	Uruguay
Egypt	Norway	Venezuela
France	Pakistan	Yugoslavia

Fifty of these, it was stated, fully satisfied the stipulations made in paragraph 1 of the Assembly's resolution.³³

The following Member States had empowered their Permanent Representatives to represent them in specified organs of the United Nations:

Afghanistan	France	New Zealand
Australia	Haiti	Panama
Brazil	India	Philippines -
Chile	Lebanon	Saudi Arabia
China	Liberia	United Kingdom
Cuba	Mexico

The following Member States had authorized their Permanent Representatives to represent them in all organs of the United Nations:

Belgium	Indonesia	Union of
Czechoslovakia	Iran	South Africa
Dominican Republic	Netherlands	United States
Ecuador	Norway	Uruguay
Egypt	Peru	Venezuela
Greece	Thailand	Yugoslavia
	Turkey

The following Member States had maintained Permanent Missions to the European Office of the United Nations at Geneva:

Australia	France	Poland
Belgium	Greece	Turkey
Brazil	Israel	United Kingdom
Canada	Mexico	Uruguay
Chile	Netherlands	Yugoslavia
Denmark	Panama

The Secretary-General further reported that Norway, the United States and Sweden had appointed representatives solely to the Economic Commission for Europe.

G. PERMANENT INVITATION TO THE ARAB LEAGUE TO ATTEND SESSIONS OF THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY

On 12 July 1950 Syria requested (A/1290) the Secretary-General to place the following item on the agenda of the fifth regular session of the General Assembly: "Permanent invitation to the Arab League to attend sessions of the General Assembly".

The General Assembly, at its 285th plenary meeting on 26 September 1950, referred this item to the Sixth Committee which considered it at its 215-217th meetings inclusive, held on 2, 4 and 5

October. The Sixth Committee had before it three documents bearing on the question:

(1) a note by the Secretary-General, transmitting, at the Committee's request, the text of the Pact of the League of Arab States (A/C.6/L.111);

³² See Y.U.N., 1948-49, p. 973.

³³ Paragraph 1 of the operative part of the resolution stated: "that credentials of the permanent representatives shall be issued either by the Head of the State or by the Head of the Government or by the Minister of Foreign Affairs, and shall be transmitted to the Secretary-General".

- (2) a memorandum by Israel (A/C.6/336);
- (3) a draft resolution submitted by Syria (A/C.6/L.113).

The Secretary-General stated that the Pact, submitted in Arabic, together with English and French translations, had been filed and recorded by Egypt on 29 August 1950. Egypt, Iraq, Jordan, Lebanon, Saudi Arabia, Syria and Yemen were members of the League of Arab States.

The purpose of the League, according to its Pact, is "to draw closer the relations between member States and co-ordinate their political activities with the aim of realizing a close collaboration between them, to safeguard their independence and sovereignty, and to consider in a general way the affairs and interests of the Arab countries". It also has among its purposes a close co-operation of the member States in the following matters: economic and financial matters; communications; cultural matters; matters connected with nationality, passports, visas, execution of judgments and extradition; social welfare matters; and health matters. Article 5 of the Pact prohibits the use of force in the settlement of disputes between two or more member States.

There were three annexes to the Pact. Annex 1 dealt with Palestine and stated that that country was entitled de jure to independence like all other Arab States, and should be represented in the Council of the League by a delegate designated by the Council. The second annex stated that Arab countries not members of the League should be allowed to participate in its activities. The third annex referred to the appointment of a Secretary-General of the League.

The memorandum by Israel raised seven arguments against the Syrian request that a permanent invitation be issued to the Arab League:

- (1) The Arab League was not a regional agency or arrangement within the meaning of Chapter VIII of the Charter as the area covered did not constitute a region and a regional arrangement would have to be accessible to all countries in the area.
- (2) The Pact of the Arab League had been drawn up before the Charter of the United Nations had been signed, and contained no reference to the acceptance of the Charter obligations by the League. Further, no arrangement for regional security was in force between the members of the League. Consequently, the Arab League did not conform to the criterion of a regional arrangement.
- (3) The only joint activities carried out by the League, namely, military intervention in Palestine, had been directed against the United Nations and not in support of it.
- (4) The Arab League was bent on subverting the existing political status in countries outside the League itself.
- (5) The League had refused to co-operate with the Security Council for the restoration of international peace.

(6) The League's procedure, such as holding closed meetings, was contrary to that of the United Nations.

(7) The Arab League should not be granted a permanent invitation to attend sessions of the General Assembly as, unlike the Organization of American States (the Secretary-General of which had received such an invitation),³⁴ it had not extended the same courtesy to the United Nations.

In the course of the general discussion, several representatives of member States of the Arab League, in particular, the representative of Saudi Arabia, answered the seven points in the Israeli memorandum. The following were among his arguments:

(1) The Charter did not define the various regions of the world for the purpose of Chapter VIII, nor were there any rules in international law to determine regions. There was no valid reason either under the Charter or in international law why the region covered by the Arab League should be extended or reduced. Even if agreement could be reached on the identity of the States constituting the Middle East, that did not necessarily mean that a regional arrangement had to be accessible to all the States in the area.

(2) Chapter VIII of the Charter did not require that the Charter obligations be formally accepted by a regional organization, but only that the activities of the organization should be consistent with the purposes and principles of the United Nations—which was the case with the League of Arab States.

(3) It was fallacious to declare that the Arab League had no other activities besides the intervention in Palestine. This intervention was political and had no bearings on the legal aspects of the case; it had in any case mainly been brought on by "the refusal of a small majority of Member States to have the partition issue adjudicated, as the Arab States had proposed, by the International Court of Justice".

(4) The aims of annex II of the Pact "were not at variance with the aims of Chapter XI of the Charter" (which deals with the declaration regarding Non-Self-Governing Territories).

(5) The fifth assertion was irrelevant; nothing in Chapter VIII required regional organizations to take a stand on issues of foreign policy. Moreover, the Arab League had received no request for co-operation.

(6) Many United Nations bodies as well as such a regional arrangement as the North Atlantic Treaty Organization held closed meetings.

(7) When the proposal to extend an invitation to the Organization of American States had been discussed at the third session of the General Assembly, some delegations had objected to the parallel which was being drawn between the invitation by the United Nations and the invitation by the Organization of American States to the Secretary-General, and to establishing such an exchange of courtesy as a precedent. As a result, the part of the proposal referring to reciprocity had been deleted; consequently, the objection raised in the memorandum did not apply. It was also pointed out that in 1947 the Secretary-General of the Arab League had suggested to the Secretary-General of the United Nations the establishment of a relationship similar to that maintained by the United Nations with the Organization of ³⁴ Resol. 253(III). See Y.U.N., 1948-49, p. 976.

American States, including the maintenance of similar liaison between the two organizations.

The draft resolution submitted by Syria (A/C.6/L.113) called upon the General Assembly to request the Secretary-General of the United Nations to invite the Secretary-General of the League of Arab States to attend sessions of the Assembly as an observer.

The representatives of, among others, Argentina, Brazil, Burma, Canada, Chile, China, Colombia, Cuba, the Dominican Republic, Egypt, Greece, Iraq, Lebanon, Liberia, Mexico, Pakistan, Peru, the Philippines, Saudi Arabia, Syria, Turkey, the United Kingdom, the United States and Yugoslavia spoke in support of the Syrian draft resolution. These representatives advanced the following reasons for their support:

(1) The question of the invitation to the Arab League had been discussed at the third session of the General Assembly in connexion with the question of the invitation to the Organization of American States. At that session the representative of Egypt had proposed an amendment to the effect that the same privilege as that extended to the Secretary-General of the Organization of American States should be extended to other regional organizations. This amendment was withdrawn by its sponsor on the formal assurance, given by a number of representatives and confirmed by the Chairman of the Sixth Committee, that the Arab League, as a regional agency would be entitled to the same courtesy at the appropriate time.

(2) The aims and activities of the Arab League were in harmony with the aims and purposes of the United Nations. In view of the identity of interests of the Arab League and of the United Nations, it was not only desirable, but necessary, that the two should co-operate. If the Secretary-General of the Arab League were invited to the sessions of the General Assembly it would be a step forward, and would promote the development of friendly relations among nations and their co-operation towards the attainment of common goals.

(3) The Arab League was a regional organization which had come into being to defend the interests of its members. The General Assembly in adopting resolution 120(II) (concerning an invitation to the Economic and Social Council to study the factors bearing upon the establishment of an economic commission for the Middle East) had implicitly recognized the Arab League as a regional organization in the phrase "as well as with regional organizations in the Middle East such as the Arab League." The Arab League was both politically and legally qualified to fulfil the duties of a regional agency as laid down in the Charter.

(4) When the General Assembly had decided to invite the Organization of American States to send an observer to its sessions, it had established a precedent which affected not only the regional agencies but all political organizations, regional or otherwise. A formal invitation to the Arab League would be considered a gesture of courtesy and good will and would therefore serve a useful purpose.

The representative of Israel spoke against the adoption of the Syrian draft resolution. He first enlarged upon the memorandum submitted by his delegation, and then summarized his arguments as follows:

(1) Resolution 253(III) (concerning the invitation to the Secretary-General of the Organization of American States) did not automatically apply to the item under consideration and the General Assembly and the Sixth Committee retained full freedom of action in respect of that item.

(2) The delegations which might have committed themselves at the third session to support the request of the Arab League had been led to do so on the basis of insufficient and inaccurate information supplied by representatives of the Arab countries.

(3) The attitude and activities of the Arab League since 1948 had been such as to dictate reconsideration of any commitment which might have been made at that time.

(4) Resolution 253(III) of the General Assembly could serve as a precedent only if the existence of two conditions could be proved: (a) courtesy by reciprocity, which was clearly absent in the case of the Arab League; and (b) that the claimant was a regional organization whose activities were in accordance with the principles and purposes of the Charter. The absence of an Arab region as such made the League's claim to be a regional arrangement a contradiction in terms; the Pact of the League was not a regional arrangement because of its racial basis and the weakness of its machinery; the League had completely failed to solve inter-Arab conflicts; the League had acted contrary to the principles and purposes of the Charter in the conflict between the Arab States and Israel and its policy in the so-called "Arab countries"; lastly, the United Nations bodies which had intervened to settle the Palestine conflict had completely ignored the Arab League.

He went on to state that four more points should be borne in mind: first, the League, far from being an agency of peace, was an instrument of aggression and subversion in neighbouring countries; secondly, the League had demonstrated in the Korean crisis that it was completely indifferent to world affairs; thirdly, public opinion in the Arab countries, and still more outside them, was aware of the complete failure of the League; and lastly, under those conditions any United Nations action to bolster the prestige of an Organization which systematically ignored and defied it would be an act of abject appeasement.

Replying to the representative of Israel, the representatives of Egypt, Iraq, Lebanon and Syria, among others, declared that his statements bore no relation to the truth. They said, among other things, that the Arab League was a growing organization; that the League was not a racial organization, but represented an amalgamation of many races and faiths which lived together in peace and harmony; that the purpose of the Pact was to guarantee peace and security in the Middle East, and the League had already done much to promote that end; that the Arab League was working for the freedom and independence of Arab peoples throughout the world, in accordance with the United Nations Charter; that the League had been in duty bound to intervene in Palestine to save the Arabs in that country from total extermination; and that the records of the League were published and could be inspected and criticized by anyone, and there was, therefore, no secrecy whatsoever regarding the League's intentions or decisions.

At the 217th meeting of the Sixth Committee, held on 5 October, the text of the Syrian draft resolution was adopted by roll-call vote of 42 to 1, with 7 abstentions.

Immediately after the vote, the representatives of Czechoslovakia and the USSR gave as the reason for their abstentions the fact that, as on the occasion of the vote on the invitation addressed to the Organization of American States at the 70th meeting of the Sixth Committee on 9 October 1948, their delegations considered that the Charter of the United Nations contained no provision envisaging such an invitation.

The representative of Poland said that he had abstained on the principle of equality of sovereignty among States and because he was opposed to the establishment of double representation in the Assembly. He explained that since the Charter did not contain any provision authorizing such an invitation, the gesture might risk favouring the members of regional organizations.

In its report to the General Assembly (A/1442) the Sixth Committee stated that it was understood, by the proponent of the draft resolution (Syria), as well as by other delegations supporting the motion (among others, Canada, Egypt, the Philippines, the United Kingdom and the United States), that the invitation it was proposed should be addressed to the Secretary-General of the Arab League did not in any way imply that the Arab League was or was not a regional agency within the meaning of Chapter VIII of the Charter. It was also the sense of the Sixth Committee that such an invitation, being an act of courtesy, could not be construed as establishing a precedent which might bind the General Assembly in the future.

The General Assembly at its 299th plenary meeting on 1 November adopted by 49 votes to 1, with 5 abstentions, the draft resolution recommended by the Committee as its resolution 477-(V). In the resolution it requested "the Secretary-General to invite the Secretary-General of the League of Arab States to attend sessions of the General Assembly as an observer".

H. RESERVATIONS TO MULTILATERAL CONVENTIONS

On the proposal of the Secretary-General the question of reservations to multilateral conventions was placed on the agenda of the fifth session of the General Assembly.

1. Report of the Secretary-General

In a report to the Assembly on the question (A/1372), the Secretary-General stated that, while exercising his functions as the depositary of the conventions which had been adopted or approved by the General Assembly and of the many other multilateral instruments which had been concluded under the auspices of the United Nations, he had from time to time been concerned with the procedure to be followed with respect to reservations as to the terms of such conventions which might be made by States as a condition to their accession.

While it had been universally recognized that the consent of the other Governments concerned must be sought before they could be bound by the terms of a reservation, there had not been unanimity either as to the procedure to be followed by a depositary in obtaining the necessary consent or as to the legal effect of a State's objecting to a reservation.

The question, the Secretary-General stated, had acquired a current importance in connexion with the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide. According to article XIII of that Convention, it would come into force on the ninetieth day after the date of deposit of the twentieth instrument of ratification or accession. On the day of receiving the twentieth instrument the Secretary-General was to draw up a proces-verbal to that effect, and the receipt of the twentieth instrument was to be expected at any time. A number of States, however, had made reservations as to various articles of the Convention, to the substance of which some States had objected. It had consequently appeared to the Secretary-General that the legal effect of objections to reservations would require an early determination in order to establish whether States making reservations to which objection had been raised were to be counted among those necessary to permit the entry into force of the Convention.

The Secretary-General then gave an account of the practice which the Secretariat of the United Nations had followed up to the time of the report. On receipt of a signature or instrument of ratification or accession, subject to a reservation, to a convention not yet in force, the Secretary-General had formally notified the reservation to all States which might become parties to the convention. He had also asked those States which had ratified or acceded to the convention to inform him of their attitude towards the reservation, at the same time advising them, that unless they notified him of objections to it prior to a certain date it would be understood that they had accepted the reservation. States ratifying or acceding without express objection were advised that it was assumed that they had agreed to the reservation. If the convention were already in force a reasonable time for the receipt of objections would be allowed before tacit consent could properly be assumed. He showed how this compared with the practice of the League of Nations from which it had been adapted, and reviewed the opinions of numerous international jurists and Governments as well as the practice of the Pan American Union in this respect.

The rule adhered to by the Secretary-General in the absence of specific provisions in a convention governing reservation procedures was summarized as follows:

A State may make a reservation when signing, ratifying or acceding to a convention, prior to its entry into force, only with the consent of all States which have ratified or acceded thereto up to the date of entry into force; and may do so after the date of entry into force only with the consent of all States which have theretofore ratified or acceded.

This rule, the Secretary-General pointed out, was based on the following considerations:

(1) It conformed with the majority practice that the assent of all the States most directly concerned was required to alter, by individual reservation, the terms of an agreed text of a convention, and was more in harmony with the nature and purposes of United Nations conventions;

(2) It was in the interests of efficiency to keep to a minimum the number of States required to give unanimous consent to a reservation; and this could best be done by confining the power to reject a convention to the actual parties to it;

(3) Since no rule could cover all cases, specific needs could best be met by including an article in a convention, for example, expressly approving specified reservations.

Further, should it be desired to permit a maximum of States to adhere to a convention, even with reservations, the rule that reservations must be accepted by all the parties to the convention could be waived.

At the same time the report of the Secretary-General drew attention to the system followed by the Pan American Union as to multilateral conventions concluded among the American States for which it serves as depositary. The essence of this rule had been established as follows:

The treaty shall be in force, in the form in which it was signed, as between those countries which ratify it without reservations, in the terms in which it was originally drafted and signed. It shall be in force as between the Governments which ratify it with reservations and the signatory States which accept the reservations in the form in which the treaty may be modified by said reservations. It shall not be in force between a Government which may have ratified with reservations and another which may have already ratified, and which does not accept such reservations.

2. Consideration in the Sixth Committee

The question was considered by the Sixth Committee at its 217th to 225th meetings inclusive, from 6 to 20 October 1950.

The essential problems dealt with in the course of the debate in the Committee were, broadly: whether the Committee was competent to make any determination governing the larger aspects, of the question; to what organ of the United Nations would it be appropriate to refer the question; should interim guidance be given to the Secretary-General by the General Assembly pending the results of any such referral; what rule would it be preferable for the Secretary-General to follow in the event of such a provisional instruction; and, finally, what general recommendations to States might serve to eliminate the occurrence of the difficulties previously encountered in connexion with reservations.

a. COMPETENCE OF THE COMMITTEE

On the question of competence a number of representatives, including those of the United States and Yugoslavia, were of the opinion that, since the question before the Sixth Committee concerned only the procedure to be followed by the Secretary-General as depositary of multilateral conventions, the General Assembly was competent to give him instructions on the manner in which he should administer that function. A large majority of the Sixth Committee, however, believed that it was not appropriate, in the time then available, for the General Assembly to establish, without further examination, rules which would have the effect of determining legal relations among States under United Nations conventions.

b. QUESTION OF REFERRAL TO THE INTERNATIONAL COURT OR THE INTERNATIONAL LAW COMMISSION

The Sixth Committee considered in detail the problem of referring the question to a qualified organ. Opinion was divided as to whether the International Law Commission or the International Court of Justice was more suitable in the circumstances. Many representatives, including those of Chile, China, Colombia, Cuba, the Dominican Republic, Mexico, Peru, Turkey, the United States, Venezuela and Yugoslavia, favoured referral to the International Law Commission because it already had under preparation a report on the law of treaties, and had in fact, at its second session, briefly discussed the subject of reservations. Moreover, it was considered that the International Law Commission, unlike the Court, would not be restricted to existing principles of international law in a field in which there had been insufficient development of general principles and in which the main legal systems of the world in fact differed. It was felt by many representatives that on the present problem the Court would be confined to an interpretation of the law, whereas what was involved, in part at least, was not strictly a question of law but the development of appropriate procedures for which the Commission was well suited. It was especially felt that, in so far as concerned a general solution broadly applicable to a variety of cases, what the General Assembly required was a study to serve as a basis for future discussion.

The contrary position, favouring a request by the General Assembly for an advisory opinion of the International Court of Justice, was supported by the representatives of Australia, Belgium, Canada, France, Greece, India, Iran, Sweden and the United Kingdom, among others. They based their position on the view that it was not the function of the International Law Commission to solve controversial questions; its function was to codify existing law, whereas it was the duty of the International Court of Justice to settle just such conflicts in matters of law, and to state the law when it was doubtful. As regards immediate practical considerations, it was felt that the Court would be in a position to render an earlier decision, particularly in view of the already heavy programme of the International Law Commission.

The representative of France suggested (A/C.6/L.118) that a prompt submission to the Court of a precisely formulated question might permit the Secretary-General to give effect to the opinion before the end of the ninety-day period which would bring the Convention on Genocide into force. Moreover, it was pointed out, if a difference were to arise between States on any of "the matters then under debate, these questions would eventually be referred to the Court in accordance with article IX of the Convention on Genocide—from which it seemed logical to make the submission immediately.

In either case, the majority of the representatives considered that the General Assembly would wish to discuss the content of an advisory opinion of the Court, or of the study made by the International Law Commission, before the recommendation of either body could be put into practice by the Secretary-General, in so far as depositary procedures were affected.

c. QUESTION OF INTERIM INSTRUCTIONS

Because the Convention on Genocide, which had caused the Secretary-General to submit the problem to the General Assembly, was in prospect of entering into force, a substantial number of representatives felt that some instructions to the Secretary-General were warranted pending the outcome of the reference of the matter to the International Law Commission or the International Court of Justice. A few representatives, among them the representative of Greece, considered that the depositary was competent to proceed without interim instructions. The main debate in the Committee, however, centred in three proposals concerning instructions to be given to the Secretary-General.

The representative of the United States submitted a draft resolution (A/C.6/L.114/Rev.1) designed to avoid delay in the entry into force of a convention by permitting the Secretary-General to follow his previous procedure, for the purposes of entry into force, in any case where reservations were submitted. But this was to be without prejudice to the legal status of the parties, of ratifications or accessions, or of acceptance or rejections of reservations.

The representative of the United Kingdom, proposed an amendment (A/C.6/L.115) to the United States draft designed to continue the League of Nations rule as applied by the Secretary-General of the United Nations (see above), pending the formulation of a final policy.

At the same time, the representative of Uruguay proposed an amendment (A/C.6/L.116) to the United States draft, instructing the Secretary-General to follow a rule modelled after that of the Pan American Union (see above), pending the final decision.

In support of the United States proposal it was argued that it facilitated the entry into force of conventions but protected the legal position of States as parties. Against the proposal it was argued that it would be preferable to adopt one or other of the traditional rules.

In favour of the United Kingdom amendment, it was stated that it maintained a convention in the form of one integral text applicable to the legal relations among all parties, and prevented its alteration by means of a reservation against the will of the States concerned. On the other hand, it was argued that it would enable one State arbitrarily to exclude the participation of another even if the reasons for the reservation arose from the internal legal system of the reserving State; this, it was felt, would derogate from the sovereignty of the reserving State.

The Uruguayan proposal was supported on the ground that by facilitating reservations, the practice of the Pan American Union enabled the maximum number of States to accede to conventions, thus speeding their entry into force, and so favouring the progressive development of international law while at the same time respecting the national sovereignty of each State. While the applicability of the system to a regional organization was acknowledged, its adoption as a provisional measure was objected to on the ground that it would upset the procedures and relations prevailing among States for what might be only an interim period. As regards long-term legal considerations, it was objected that this system, although it facilitated adherences to conventions did so only, in effect, by breaking down a uniform multilateral text into a composite of bilateral agreements between some pairs of adhering States, but not between other pairs.

To meet this point, the representative of Chile offered an amendment (A/C.6/L.120) to the Uruguayan proposal so that it might not apply where the text of the Convention had been approved by the General Assembly. He explained that in the General Assembly, majority decisions were binding upon the minority and the latter could not make its views prevail by means of reservations. No State, he argued, was compelled to ratify the conventions adopted by resolution of the General Assembly; if a State did accept such a convention it should accept the text adopted by the Assembly.

A number of subsidiary questions were raised in connexion with the problem of interim instructions. If the League of Nations rule requiring consent to reservations were to be followed, it would be necessary to decide what groups of States should have the power to exclude, by objecting to a reservation, the participation of a State ready to take part subject to the conditions presented. One element of the United Kingdom proposal (A/C.6/L.115) was that signatory States, having an interest to protect in the text of a convention in the form in which it was signed, should, up to the date of entry into force, be able to prevent reservations from altering the text against their will. Carrying this view one step further, the representative of Sweden entered an amendment (A/C.6/L.121) to the United Kingdom proposal, permitting such an objection, by a signatory to a convention which prescribes a time-limit for signature, up to the date of the expiry of the time-limit. The report of the Secretary-General, on the other hand, had presumed that only ratifying or acceding States would be in a position to exercise this power to exclude. The representative of the Netherlands raised the possibility of a compromise system whereby signatories might be permitted to make so important an objection only on declaring their intention to ratify within a specified period of time.

The representative of Iran submitted an amendment (A/C.6/L.119) to the United States draft which would have recommended to States Members of the United Nations the insertion, in all conventions to be concluded by them in the future, of a clause defining the procedure to be adopted by the depositary when a reservation is entered by a State and the legal effect of an objection to such a reservation put forward by another State.

The French proposal referred to above (A/C.6/L.118), while making the same point, included a recommendation that Member States dispense as far as possible with the use of reservations to conventions adopted under the auspices of the United Nations.

A number of representatives, however, stressed the importance of permitting reservations. The representative of Poland traced the origin of the use of reservations to the development of the majority vote in the drafting of conventions, as opposed to the earlier use of unanimity even in the preparation of the text. Since the drafting conference itself no longer required the full agreement of all prospective parties before the final text could be adopted, he noted that reservations were the counterpart device which permitted the minority nevertheless to continue as parties. He therefore urged the Committee not to adopt a rule which would permit the majority not only to impose its will in the choice of the text but also as to the conditions under which the minority might adhere—a possibility which he could not justify by considerations either of theory or of practice.

The representatives of the USSR and the Byelorussian SSR stated that the theory of the inability of the Secretary-General to receive an instrument of ratification in definitive deposit if even one of the State parties to a convention objected to a reservation was incompatible with the principle of State sovereignty and contrary to the fundamental principles of international law. In fact, in their view, the recommendations of the Secretary-General would have the effect of prohibiting the submission of reservations, since a State in the minority when the text of a convention was drafted could not hope that there would be no State objecting to a reservation; for a reservation was usually made because corresponding provisions had been rejected during the drafting of the text of the convention. The attitude of the Secretary-General, they contended, was contrary both to the principles of international law and to its practice in the conclusion of multilateral treaties; the indisputable right of a State to make reservations had been recognized during the signing of many treaties. As to the Convention on Genocide, the representative of the USSR was of the opinion that the Secretary-General should be strictly guided by its text, which did not contain any special procedure for the deposit of ratifications with reservations; neither did it contain any limitations of the right to submit reservations. The legal implications of a reservation at the signing of a convention, in the opinion of the USSR representative, would be that those provisions of a convention which were the subject of the reservation would not apply to relations between the State which made the reservation and all other parties to the convention. He believed that the General Assembly was not competent to give instructions to the Secretary-General, which would in effect be complementary to the text of the Convention on Genocide, since it would lead to the creation of new legal relations, not contemplated by the Convention, between States parties to the Convention. Reinforcing this stand, the representative of Czechoslovakia observed that the rule of unanimity would convert the State disagreeing with a reservation into a judge of the State which put it forward.

d. FORMULATION OF QUESTIONS TO THE INTERNATIONAL COURT AND THE INTERNATIONAL LAW COMMISSION

As the debates carried forward the analysis of these various positions on the whole subject of reservations, a general feeling developed that any questions to be referred to another organ would require very exact formulation. With this in mind, the representatives of Egypt, France, Greece, Iran and the United Kingdom presented a joint draft resolution (A/C.6/L.123) requesting an advisory opinion from the International Court of Justice on precise questions affecting the validity of any adherence subject to a contested reservation, as well as the classes of States having the power to make an effective objection.

A joint amendment (A/C.6/L.124) to this draft, offered by the representatives of Belgium, Denmark, the Netherlands, Norway and Sweden, proposed that these questions be determined solely in respect of those multilateral conventions which had been listed by the Secretary-General as yet to come into force.

In the view of most delegations the character of the problem before the Sixth Committee altered when, on 16 October 1950 at the Committee's 222nd meeting, the Assistant Secretary-General in charge of the Legal Department announced that the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide had received a number of ratifications and accessions on 14 October, so that the twenty instruments necessary for its entry into force were then at hand, irrespective of the theory used in determining the validity of those containing reservations. The majority of the representatives felt that this fact removed much of the urgency of any answer from the International Law Commission or the International Court of Justice, and significantly affected the formulation of the questions which had thus far been proposed for submission to either body. It also appeared that there was no urgency, in so far as the other conventions of which the Secretary-General is the depositary were concerned, for the Secretary-General to receive particular directives.

At this point the thirteen representatives who had previously submitted drafts bearing on any aspect of the problem (the representatives of Belgium, Chile, Denmark, Egypt, France, Greece, Iran, the Netherlands, Norway, Sweden, the United Kingdom, the United States and Uruguay) withdrew all prior drafts and in their place submitted a joint proposal (A/C.6/L.125) to the Sixth Committee at its 224th meeting on 18 October. This draft formulated specific questions arising under the Convention on Genocide, to be referred to the Court with a request for an advisory opinion. At the same time, it invited the International Law Commission, in the course of its work on the codification of the Law of treaties, to study the question of reservations to multilateral conventions, giving priority to the subject in order to report to the General Assembly at its sixth session.

As a result of the entry into force of the Convention, it no longer seemed necessary, since it was unlikely that a similar situation would arise in the near future, for the Sixth Committee to attempt to elaborate any interim procedure for the Secretary-General to follow pending settlement of the substantive question. It was felt that it would be sufficient for him to continue to handle the deposit of instruments in the same manner as before, so long as he avoided any legal interpretation of the effect of contested reservations upon the status of the parties, pending the adoption of a final solution. This would also prevent any possible prejudgment of the eventual outcome.

Further, since the joint draft resolution called not only for an advisory opinion in relation to a specific convention but also for a study which might propose the adoption of one of the different types of systems concerning the effect of reservations, it was generally concluded that it would be better for the General Assembly to await the taking of a more definitive position at its sixth session before making any recommendations on the over-all subject of reservations and related procedures, since the nature of any recommendation might vary according to the type of system adopted.

A number of representatives, including those of Costa Rica, Ecuador, Guatemala and Turkey, although approving the request to be submitted to the International Law Commission under the joint proposal could not agree to the request for an advisory opinion from the International Court of Justice on a subject of this nature. The representatives of Cuba, Peru, Poland, Syria and the USSR, among others, also believed that it was contradictory to submit the problem to two different bodies at once. The representative of the USSR proposed an amendment (A/C.6/L.127) to the joint proposal which would delete the request to the Court for an advisory opinion. When, however, it was later asked that the parts of the joint draft resolution concerning the two submissions should be voted upon separately, it was agreed that it would be unnecessary to vote upon the USSR amendment.

The representative of the Philippines felt that it should be left to the contracting parties themselves to submit to the International Court of Justice any dispute as to the interpretation or application of the Convention on Genocide, as provided in its article IX; and that it was not for the General Assembly but for the parties directly involved to formulate the issues to be submitted to the Court.

At the request of the representative of the Philippines, a roll-call vote was taken on that part of the joint draft resolution which requested an advisory opinion from the Court. It was adopted by 28 votes to 13, with 10 abstentions. The request for a priority study by the International Law Commission on the question of reservations was then adopted by 46 votes to none, with 7 abstentions. The preamble being adopted by 40 votes to 1, with 11 abstentions, the joint draft resolution was voted on as a whole and adopted by 36 votes to 7, with 9 abstentions.

3. Resolution Adopted by the General Assembly

The report of the Sixth Committee (A/1494 & Corr.1) containing its recommended draft resolution was considered by the Assembly at its 305th plenary meeting on 16 November. The Assembly also had before it an amendment (A/1495) to this draft resolution, submitted by the representatives of Belgium, Chile, Denmark, Egypt, France, Greece, Iran, the Netherlands, Norway, Sweden, the United Kingdom, the United States and Uruguay. The amendment called for the addition of a paragraph to instruct the Secretary-General, pending further action by the Assembly, to follow his previous practice with respect to the receipt of reservations to conventions.

The amendment was adopted by 36 votes to 6, with 9 abstentions. The preamble was adopted by 49 votes to 1, with 5 abstentions; paragraph 1 of the operative part, by 40 votes to 10, with 7 abstentions; and paragraph 2 of the operative part, by 48 votes to 2, with 8 abstentions. The draft resolution as a whole, as amended, was then adopted by 47 votes to 5, with 5 abstentions.

Following the voting, the representative of the USSR explained his reasons for voting against the resolution as a whole, as amended. He declared that the Convention on Genocide did not establish any limitations or any special procedure for the receipt of ratifications by the depositary; consequently, in his opinion, there were no grounds for requesting the Court to give an advisory opinion on this matter. Submission of reservations when signing or ratifying international conventions, he submitted, was the inalienable right of every State, a sovereign right which could not be disputed by other States.

He considered the proposal that reservations by a party to a convention should be made conditional upon the consent of all the other parties was wrong. The United Nations, he said, was interested in seeing that as many States as possible take measures for the prevention and punishment of genocide. Therefore, the adoption of a proposal designed to restrict the number of parties to the Convention on Genocide would weaken international co-operation.

The representative of Peru said that he had abstained from voting on paragraph 1 of the operative part of the resolution because he considered that the function of the Court was not to legislate or to create new rules but merely to apply the existing law. The request for an advisory opinion, he contended, might be regarded as creating a precedent in the matter of reservations.

The representative of Poland, in explaining his vote, maintained that every State was free to write into a treaty reservations compatible with its national interests. The principle of the freedom of reservations, he argued, was a rule of law and could not be altered by any decision of the General Assembly. The request to the Court, in his opinion, amounted to an attempt to revise a document drafted and approved by the United Nations, because the procedure provided for in the resolution was not laid down in the text of the convention itself.

The representative of the Philippines reiterated the stand his delegation had taken in the Sixth Committee, that is, that it should be left to the contracting parties themselves to submit any disputes concerning the interpretation or application of the Convention on Genocide to the Court. He favoured the resolution adopted by the Assembly only in so far as it invited the International Law Commission to give priority to the study of the general problem. To submit the problem to the Court for an advisory opinion, he argued, not only confused the real issue before the Assembly, but invited conflicting or contradictory opinions from two different organs.

The resolution which was adopted by the Assembly (478(V)) read as follows:

The General Assembly,

Having examined the report of the Secretary-General regarding reservations to multilateral conventions,

Considering that certain reservations to the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide have been objected to by some States,

Considering that the International Law Commission is studying the whole subject of the law of treaties, including the question of reservations,

Considering that different views regarding reservations have been expressed during the fifth session of the General Assembly, and particularly in the Sixth Committee,

1. Requests the International Court of Justice to give an advisory opinion on the following questions:

"In so far as concerns the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide in the event of a State ratifying or acceding to the Convention subject to a reservation made either on ratification or on accession, or on signature followed by ratification:

"I. Can the reserving State be regarded as being a party to the Convention while still maintaining its reservation if the reservation is objected to by one or more of the parties to the Convention but not by others?

"II. If the answer to question I is in the affirmative, what is the effect of the reservation as between the reserving State and:

"(a) The parties which object to the reservation?

"(b) Those which accept it?

"III. What would be the legal effect as regards the answer to question I if an objection to a reservation is made:

"(a) By a signatory which has not yet ratified?

"(b) By a State entitled to sign or accede but which has not yet done so?";

2. Invites the International Law Commission:

(a) In the course of its work on the codification of the law of treaties, to study the question of reservations to multilateral conventions both from the point of view of codification and from that of the progressive development of international law; to give priority to this study and to report thereon, especially as regards multilateral conventions of which the Secretary-General is the depositary, this report to be considered by the General Assembly at its sixth session;

(b) In connexion with this study, to take account of all the views expressed during the fifth session of the General Assembly, and particularly in the Sixth Committee;

3. Instructs the Secretary-General, pending the rendering of the advisory opinion by the International Court of Justice, the receipt of a report from the International Law Commission and further action by the General Assembly, to follow his prior practice with respect to the receipt of reservations to conventions and with respect to the notification and solicitation of approvals thereof, all without prejudice to the legal effect of objections to reservations to conventions as it may be recommended by the General Assembly at its sixth session.

I. DESIGNATION OF NON-MEMBER STATES TO WHICH A CERTIFIED COPY OF THE REVISED GENERAL ACT FOR THE PACIFIC SETTLEMENT OF INTERNATIONAL DISPUTES SHALL BE COMMUNICATED BY THE SECRETARY-GENERAL FOR THE PURPOSE OF ACCESSION TO THIS ACT

Article 43, paragraph 1, of the Revised General Act for the Pacific Settlement of International Disputes as approved by Assembly resolution 268(III) of 28 April 1949³⁵ provides that the Act is to be open to accession by the Members of the United Nations and by the non-member States which have become parties to the Statute of the International Court of Justice or to which the General Assembly of the United Nations communicates a copy for this purpose. Under article 46 the Secretary-General is instructed to transmit a copy of the Revised General Act to each of the non-member States designated by the General Assembly.

The Secretary-General reported to the fifth session of the General Assembly (A/1287) that as a result of two countries having deposited their instruments of accession to this Act (Belgium on 23 December 1949 and Sweden on 22 June 1950), it would come into force on 20 September 1950. In a special report on the matter (A/1337) the Secretary-General stated that, in view of the entry into force of the Revised General Act, the Assembly might wish to designate the non-member States to which a certified copy of the Act should be communicated.

The question was considered by the Sixth Committee at its 250th meeting on 4 December 1950. The representative of Belgium submitted a draft resolution (A/C.6/L.164) requesting the Secretary-General to transmit a certified true copy of the Revised General Act to each non-member State which is or hereafter becomes an active member of one or more of the specialized agencies of the United Nations.

The representative of the Union of South Africa orally proposed that the question should be deferred until the next (sixth) regular session of the General Assembly. He stated that as only two States had acceded to the Revised General Act, the question was not urgent, that it would be certain to give rise to long and difficult discussions and that various delegations wished to study it again.

The Sixth Committee adopted the South African proposal by 14 votes to 10, with 9 abstentions. The Committee's recommendation (A/1633) was adopted by the Assembly at its 320th plenary meeting held on 12 December, by 45 votes to none, with 3 abstentions, as its resolution 480(V).

J. CONVENTION ON THE DECLARATION OF DEATH OF MISSING PERSONS

By resolution 209(VIII), adopted at its eighth session, the Economic and Social Council established an ad hoc committee to prepare, if practicable, a draft convention on the declaration of death of missing persons, with the aim of solving some of the legal difficulties arising from the disappearance of persons during the Second World War. Such a draft convention was prepared by the Ad Hoc Committee, which met in Geneva in June 1949. The draft was considered at the ninth session of the Council, which decided on 9 August 1949 (resolution 249(IX)) to refer it to the General Assembly for consideration. The matter came before the General Assembly at its fourth session; the General Assembly did not consider the substance of the draft convention but decided (resolution 369(IV)), on 3 December 1949, to call an international conference of representatives of Governments of Member States to conclude a multilateral convention on the declaration of death of missing persons.³⁶

1. Conference on the Declaration of Death of Missing Persons laration of Death of Missing Persons met at Lake Success from 15 March to 6 April 1950. It was attended by the delegations of 25 States and six States were represented by observers. Those Governments represented by delegations were Belgium, Bolivia, Brazil, Burma, China, Cuba, Denmark, Ecuador, France, Greece, India, Israel the Netherlands Nicaragua, Pakistan, Peru, Philippines, Sweden, Syria, Turkey, the United Kingdom, the United States, Uruguay, Venezuela and Yugoslavia. Governments represented by observers were Canada, Egypt, Ethiopia, Iran, Mexico and Thailand. The International Refugee Organization was also represented by an observer.

The Conference had before it and used as a basis for discussion the draft convention (E/1368) prepared by the Ad Hoc Committee on Declaration of Death of Missing Persons which met at Geneva in June 1949.

The Conference established and opened for accession by States the Convention on Declaration of Death of Missing Persons. By a vote of 20 to none, with one abstention (Yugoslavia), the text³⁷ was adopted for transmission to Governments of Member and certain non-member States of the United Nations, for their accession.

2. Convention on the Declaration of Death of Missing Persons

The preamble to the Convention declares that the contracting States consider:

(1) that military events and racial, political and national persecutions have caused, in the course of the Second World War, the disappearance of persons whose death cannot be established with certainty;

(2) that this situation has produced difficulties of a legal nature which have placed a great number of human beings in a precarious position;

(3) that the solution of these difficulties calls for measures of international co-operation.

The Convention provides, in the first place, for declarations of death of persons whose last residence was in Europe, Asia or Africa, who have disappeared in the years 1939-45, under circumstances affording reasonable ground to infer that they have died in consequence of events of war or of racial, religious, political or national persecution. A further provision declares that contracting States may, by notification to the Secretary-General of the United Nations, extend application of the Convention to persons who have disappeared after 1945 under similar circumstances, such extension to apply only as between those States which have made such notification.

The Convention defines the tribunals competent to receive applications, the requirements for an application (e.g. that a lapse of five years must have taken place since the person was last known to be alive) and the persons competent to make applications, including near relatives and those wishing to adopt minor children of the missing person.

Declarations of death in one contracting State, it provides, are to constitute in other contracting States prima facie evidence of death until contrary evidence is submitted. Declarations of death issued in a contracting State before the entry into force of the Convention are to have, in the territory of the other contracting States, the validity of a declaration issued under the Convention if they satisfy the conditions and requirements of the Convention; however, property or other rights acquired in such territory before such a declaration is presented are not to be impaired.

Article 8 of the Convention provides for the establishment, within the framework of the United Nations, of an International Bureau for Declarations of Death, the Secretary-General to determine its seat, composition, organization and method of operation. A central registry, it is provided, is to be established in the Bureau and a tribunal to which an application for declaration of death is made shall, within fifteen days, communicate to the International Bureau certain information concerning the missing person. A tribunal issuing a decision under the Convention is required to communicate its decision to the International Bureau within fifteen days and the International Bureau is to publish lists of applications and final decisions as well as certifications issued. It is simultaneously to send notice of the applications to the close relatives whose names are communicated to it. A declaration of death is not to be issued until the expiration of three months from the publication of the application by the International Bureau.

Members of the United Nations, non-member States which are parties to the Statute of the International Court of Justice and any other non-member State to which an invitation has been addressed by the Economic and Social Council may accede to the Convention. Unless a contracting State stipulates to the contrary, its accession covers all the territories for which it bears international responsibility. Contracting States may, at the time of accession, formulate reservation. The other contracting States have 90 days in which to notify the Secretary-General that they do not accept the reservations; if a State makes such a notification, the Convention is not in force between that State and the reserving State. Disputes regarding the interpretation of the Convention are to be referred to the International Court of Justice. The Convention is to come into force after accession to it by two States, and is to be valid for five years.

3. Consideration by the General Assembly at Its Fifth Session

Under article 15 of the Convention, the establishment of the International Bureau for Declarations of Death required the approval of the General Assembly, and this approval was sought at the fifth session.

The General Assembly, at its 285th plenary meeting on 26 September 1950, decided without discussion, on the recommendation of the General Committee, to place the item on the agenda without reference to a committee. The financial implications of the establishment of the International Bureau, however, were considered by the Fifth Committee at its 263rd meeting on 9 November 1950. The Committee had before it a report by the Secretary-General (A/C5/390), in which it was estimated that the establishment of such a bureau would involve an expenditure of $50,000 for one full year of operation. The Committee also had before it the report of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions (A/1489) which stated that the estimate should be reduced to $40,000 for one year, and which suggested that non-member States which accede to the Convention should be assessed in accordance with the principle adopted in connexion with the International Court of Justice.

In the discussion in the Fifth Committee, the representative of the USSR said that he considered that the expenses involved in the establishment of the Bureau should be borne by the acceding States. The representative of Venezuela wondered whether the Committee was competent to decide on the manner in which the funds for the establishment of the Bureau were to be collected. The representative of Brazil, who supported the recommendation of the Advisory Committee, said that the Committee was competent not only to pass judgment on the size of the Bureau but also to suggest that the United Nations should not pay its expenses.

The Committee adopted, by 32 votes to none, with 10 abstentions, a recommendation by the Advisory Committee in which it decided to inform the General Assembly that the establishment of the proposed Bureau would involve an estimated expenditure of $40,000 and that the expenses of the International Bureau should be assessed upon non-member States "in accordance with the principle adopted in connexion with the expenses of the International Court of Justice".

The matter was considered further by the General Assembly at its 305th plenary session on 16 November 1950. The General Assembly had before it the report of the Secretary-General (A/1329) dated 22 August 1950, which stated, inter alia, that although the Convention had not yet come into force as no accessions had been received, a decision in respect to the establishment of the International Bureau would assist interested States in determining whether to accede to the Convention. The Assembly also had before it the report of the Fifth Committee (A/1506) making the estimate and recommendation outlined above, and a joint draft resolution submitted by Belgium, Denmark, Sweden and Uruguay (A/1510), which invited the Assembly to approve the establishment of the Bureau.

The representative of the USSR opposed the joint draft resolution, stating that the problem connected with the declaration of death should and could be solved by providing the Governments of countries which had suffered enemy occupation during the first part of the war with full information as to the whereabouts of those of their nationals who fell within the category of displaced persons. These problems could also be solved by means of internal legislative measures by each of the States concerned. Doubts as to the expediency of concluding the Convention had been expressed not only by the representative of the USSR but by a number of other Member States, he said, and were reflected in the fact that when the draft convention was discussed at the fourth session of the General Assembly, at its 266th plenary meeting, fifteen delegates abstained from voting and one delegate voted against it. Furthermore, the Conference, which was convened to draft the Convention in March 1950, was attended by only 25 States, or less than half the Members of the United Nations. Although the Convention had been opened for accession on 6 April 1950, seven months earlier, no State had yet acceded to it. The report (A/1489) of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions, moreover, showed that the establishment of the Bureau would involve considerable expense.

The representative of Sweden pointed out that as the Convention provided for several tribunals to deal with declarations of death there was need for a co-ordinating body to prevent duplication, and this function would be performed by the proposed bureau. It could also be said, he added, that the Convention was part of the general humanitarian activities of the United Nations.

The joint draft resolution was adopted by the General Assembly by 38 votes to 6, with 13 abstentions, as resolution 493 (V). It stated:

The General Assembly,

Having regard to article 15 of the Convention on the Declaration of Death of Missing Persons established by the United Nations Conference on Declaration of Death of Missing Persons,

1. Decides to approve the establishment of the International Bureau for Declarations of Death provided for in article 8 of the aforementioned Convention;

2. Decides that the expenses of the International Bureau should be assessed upon such non-member States as may become parties to the Convention, in accordance with the principle adopted in this respect in connexion with the expenses of the International Court of Justice.

4. Accessions to the Convention

On 20 December 1950, China became the first State to accede to the Convention; by 31 December 1950 no other State had acceded.

I. The International Labour Organisation (ILO)¹

The International Labour Organisation was established on 11 April 1919 as an autonomous institution associated with the League of Nations. Its original Constitution was adopted as part XIII of the Treaty of Versailles and formed part of other treaties of peace.

Throughout the years between its establishment and the outbreak of the Second World War, ILO, with headquarters in Geneva, played a leading role in promoting the improvement of labour conditions throughout the world.

In 1940, in order to ensure that the International Labour Office should be able to continue to function freely, a working centre was established at Montreal. The transfer back to Geneva of the services temporarily located in Canada was completed in 1948.

During the war years, ILO devoted its energies to assisting the cause of the Allies. A special Conference of ILO, which marked the first large-scale meeting of Allied representatives since the outbreak of war, was held in New York in 1941, and a series of seven meetings of United States and Canadian representatives concerned with manpower mobilization problems was organized during 1941 and 1942. Regular sessions of the General Conference were resumed in 1944, after a five-year interval, with the twenty-sixth session, held in Philadelphia. At this session, ILO considered its post-war status, policy and programme and adopted the Declaration of Philadelphia, which redefined the aims and purposes of ILO.

An Agreement bringing ILO into relationship with the United Nations, approved by the twenty-ninth session of the General Conference on 2 October 1946, came into force on 14 December 1946² upon its approval by the General Assembly of the United Nations.

ILO gradually brought its activities back to their pre-war level; it again began working towards the improvement of the working conditions of seafarers, agricultural and industrial workers, salaried employees and professional workers and towards the improvement of conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories. ILO also found it necessary to extend its activities to meet regional needs. It began to hold regional conferences to deal with the special problems of the American continent, and especially of Latin America, as early as 1936, and in 1947 began to develop its regional activities in Asia and the Far East and in the Near and Middle East.

ILO further recognized the need for new machinery to deal with the specific labour and social problems of individual industries of great international importance. It therefore decided in 1945 to set up industrial committees for the world's leading industries. The Committees bring together representatives of Governments, management and labour to discuss the specific problems of these industries.

Since 1948, considerably greater emphasis has been placed on the operational activities of ILO, especially in the fields of migration and in the development of manpower resources through vocational training and the organization of employment resources.

Many of these activities had been in operation almost from the beginning of the ILO, but the Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance for the Economic Development of Under-Developed Countries undertaken by the United Nations and the specialized agencies and other special programmes have multiplied the importance of these activities many times over.

A. PURPOSES AND FUNCTIONS

The Preamble of the ILO's Constitution states that universal peace "can be established only if it is based upon social justice"; that unjust conditions of labour imperil "the peace and harmony of the world"; and that an improvement in such conditions "is urgently required: as, for example, by the regulation of the hours of work, including the establishment of a maximum working day and week, the regulation of the labour supply, the prevention of unemployment, the provision of an adequate living wage, the protection of the worker against sickness, disease and injury arising out of his employment, the protection of children, young persons and women, provision for old age and injury, protection of the interests of workers when employed in countries other than their own, recognition of the principle of equal remuneration for work of equal value, recognition of the principle of freedom of association, the organization of vocational and technical education and other measures".

The twenty-sixth session of the General Conference (also called the International Labour Conference), held at Philadelphia in April and May 1944, adopted a "Declaration concerning the Aims and Purposes of the International Labour Organisation", generally known as the Declaration of Philadelphia. Under an amendment to the Constitution adopted by the twenty-ninth session of the Conference in October 1946, the objects set forth in this Declaration are included among those to be promoted by ILO, and the text of the Declaration is annexed to the Constitution.

The Declaration redefines the functions and responsibilities of ILO. It reaffirms the fundamental principles upon which ILO is based; in particular, it affirms that

- (a) labour is not a commodity;
- (b) freedom of expression and of association are essential to sustained progress;
- (c) poverty anywhere constitutes a danger to prosperity everywhere;
- (d) the war against want requires to be carried on with unrelenting vigour within each nation, and by continuous and concerted international effort in which the representatives of workers and employers, enjoying equal status with those of Governments, join with them in free discussion and democratic decision with a view to the promotion of the common welfare.

The Declaration affirms that "all human beings, irrespective of race, creed or sex, have the right to pursue both their material well-being and their spiritual development in conditions of freedom and dignity, of economic security and equal opportunity", and adds that the "attainment of the conditions in which this shall be possible must constitute the central aim of national and international policy". The Declaration maintains that "it is a responsibility of the International Labour Organisation to examine and consider all international economic and financial policies and measures in the light of this fundamental objective", and that, in discharging the tasks entrusted to it, ILO, "having considered all relevant economic and financial factors, may include in its decisions and recommendations any provisions which it considers appropriate".

The Declaration recognizes the solemn obligation of ILO to promote programmes to achieve: full employment and the raising of standards of living, recognition of the right of collective bargaining, extension of social security, etc. It embodies a pledge that ILO will co-operate with other international bodies in the achievement of the objectives it sets forth and in the promotion of the health, education and well-being of all peoples.

B. ORGANIZATION

The organs of ILO are the General Conference of representatives of the members, the Governing Body and the International Labour Office, which is controlled by the Governing Body.

The General Conference meets at least once a year. It is composed of four representatives of each member State, of whom two are Government delegates and the other two are delegates representing, respectively, the employers and the workers of each member. The non-Government delegates are appointed in agreement with the organizations which are most representative of employers and workers. Each delegate may be accompanied by not more than two advisers for each item on the agenda of the session.

New members are admitted into ILO, if they are Members of the United Nations, by communicating to the Director-General of ILO their formal acceptance of the obligations of the ILO Constitution. Other States, to become members of ILO, require, in addition, a two-thirds vote of the delegates to the Conference, including two thirds of the votes cast by Government delegates to the Conference.

Each delegate has one vote in the Conference. Except as otherwise provided by the ILO Constitution, the Conference makes decisions by a simple majority of the votes cast. Decisions of the Conference mainly take the form of conventions and recommendations, which require a two-thirds majority of the Conference for adoption. Under the ILO Constitution, a member is required to bring a convention adopted by the Conference to the attention of its competent national authority for ratification. If a country ratifies a convention it assumes an obligation to apply the provisions of that convention to all the territories under its administration, including Non-Self-Governing Territories; it also assumes an obligation to report annually on the measures it has taken to bring its legislation into line with these provisions. Supervisory machinery available within ILO provides not only for measures to promote the ratification of conventions, but also for a complaint procedure in the event of violations of a convention. With regard to recommendations, members of ILO are under the obligation to consider them with a view to giving effect to their provisions by legislation or other action. Member States are further required to report periodically on the position of their law and practice in relation to unratified conventions and recommendations. Collectively, the conventions and recommendations form an international labour code,³ which embodies international standards of policy.

The Governing Body is composed of 32 members. Sixteen of these represent Governments, eight the employers and eight the workers. Eight of the sixteen Government representatives are appointed by the eight member States of chief industrial importance, and eight are appointed by member States chosen by the other Government delegates to the Conference in an election held every three years. The employer and worker members are elected, respectively, by the employer and worker delegates to the Conference. The Governing Body's responsibilities include the selection of items for the agenda of the Conference, the appointment of the Director-General of the International Labour Office, the general supervision of the Office and of the various committees and commissions of ILO, and the consideration of proposals for ILO's budget.

The International Labour Office provides the secretariat of the Conference and of the Governing Body, prepares documents on the items of the agenda of the Conference and of the Governing Body, and collects and distributes information on all subjects within ILO's competence. It assists Governments in the drafting of legislation and regulations, provides technical assistance to Governments in fields within the ILO's competence, conducts such special investigations as may be ordered by the Conference or by the Governing Body, and provides machinery to assist in ensuring the effective application of Conventions. It issues a variety of periodical and other publications dealing with problems of industry and employment.

The Office also acts as the secretariat for the Inter-American Social Security Conference, organized in 1940 to promote social security in the Americas, and for the International Social Security Association, a private international association of social security institutions founded in 1927 with the support of the International Labour Office.

A number of commissions and committees exist to further the work of ILO in specific fields. In addition to the Governing Body committees, these include the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions, the Joint Maritime Commission, the Advisory Committee on Salaried Employees and Professional Workers, the Advisory Committee on Co-operation, the Permanent Agricultural Committee, the Committee of Social Security Experts and its Sub-Committee of Experts on Actuarial Questions, the Correspondence Committee on Accident Prevention, the Correspondence Committee on Industrial Hygiene and its Sub-Committee on Silicosis, the Correspondence Committee on Women's Work, the Advisory Committee on Juvenile Work, the Correspondence Committee on Recreation, the Committee on Social Policy in Non-Metropolitan Territories, the Permanent Migration Committee, the International Development Works Committee, the Committee of Statistical Experts, the Committee on Indigenous Labour and the Committee on Work in Plantations. There are industrial committees for the following eight industries: coal mines; textiles; building, civil engineering and public works; metal trades; iron and steel production; inland transport; petroleum production and refining; chemicals.

In addition to the principal working centre of the International Labour Office at Geneva, ILO maintains a liaison office with the United Nations in New York, branch offices in Canada, China, France, India, Italy, the United Kingdom and the United States, and field offices in Bangalore, India, Sao Paulo, Brazil, and Rome.

Correspondents or agents for the sale of publications are maintained in Argentina, Austria, Belgium-Luxembourg, Bolivia, Brazil, Bulgaria, Chile, Colombia, Costa Rica, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Ecuador, Egypt, Finland, Greece, Guatemala, Iran, Ireland, Japan, Mexico, Pakistan, Peru, Philippines, Poland, Sweden, Syria, Union of South Africa, Uruguay and Venezuela. The correspondents' offices serve as information centres, and they distribute and sell publications.

C. ACTIVITIES DURING 1950

During 1950 membership of ILO reached its highest point in the Organisation's 31-year history with the admission by the General Conference in June 1950 of Indonesia and Vietnam. This brought the total membership to 62 countries.

The member Governments continued to ratify—and to register their ratifications—of ILO's conventions.⁴ Eighty ratifications were registered during 1950, bringing the total to 1,188. Sixty-five of the conventions were in force and six more had received, by the end of 1950, a sufficient number of ratifications to bring them into force in 1951 or 1952.

The 33rd session of the General Conference was held in Geneva from 7 June to 1 July 1950; the Governing Body held its 110th session from 3 to 7 January in Mysore, its 111th session from 8 to 11 March in Geneva, its 112th session from 2 to 30 June in Geneva and its 113th session from 21 to 25 November in Brussels.

Activities of the Organisation during the year covered almost every segment of the area of economic and social policy for which ILO is responsible. Only a few of the principal programmes, many of which are inter-related, can be mentioned here.

1. Technical Assistance to Under-Developed Areas

A major development during the year was the coming into operation of the Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance for the Economic Development of Under-Developed Countries.⁵ The ILO's share of the special technical assistance fund is roughly $2,000,000.⁶ ILO began its activities under the Expanded Programme late in 1950, and made plans for large-scale operations in 1951. By the end of 1950, technical assistance had already been initiated in Bolivia, Burma, Colombia, Ecuador, Indonesia, Mexico, Pakistan, and the Trust Territory of Somaliland, and plans were being made for providing assistance to Ceylon, Egypt, El Salvador, Greece, Guatemala, Honduras, Iran, Iraq, Israel, Liberia, Panama, Peru, the Philippines, Syria, Thailand and Turkey.

Assistance was being given in the fields of manpower, migration, vocational training, social security, labour administration and inspection, industrial relations, hours and conditions of work, industrial safety, occupational health, co-operation and handicrafts, agricultural labour conditions, labour statistics and wage policy, minimum wage fixing machinery, and systems of wage payment.

Side by side with its part in this expanded programme, ILO continued to provide technical assistance, as in the past thirty years, to Governments, and to workers' and employers' organizations.

The year marked the successful operation of the ILO's first fellowship and internship programmes. Eighteen fellowships for study in various fields of social policy were granted, and twelve grants for study of the ILO itself were awarded.

2. Freedom of Association and Industrial Relations

Another major aspect of ILO's 1950 programme was its work to ensure, enjoyment throughout the world of the right of freedom of association. At the beginning of the year, the Governing Body agreed on the terms of reference and the procedure for a fact-finding and conciliation commission, the establishment of which had been authorized in 1949. In June, the General Conference approved the Governing Body's action, and the commission came into being.

The commission's purpose is to investigate allegations of the infringement of trade union rights, and it is empowered to seek the adjustment of disputes through conciliation. It is composed of nine members chosen from as many countries.

3. Employment and Unemployment

Emphasis was put during the year on the development of policies and programmes designed to maintain full employment throughout the world. After considering a special report prepared by the ILO on "Action Against Unemployment", the General Conference adopted a comprehensive resolution setting forth lines of national and international policy to maintain jobs at a high level.

⁴ For list, see pp. 896-99.

⁵ For details of the Programme, see Y.U.N., 1948-49, pp. 443-46; present volume, pp. 448 ff.

Measures suggested included maintenance of government economic, information and statistical services adequate to enable Governments to implement full employment policies; adoption of fiscal policies to maintain mass purchasing power and anti-depression measures such as public works programmes; international co-operation to increase foreign trade and prevent the spread of depression from one country to another; increased productivity through the flow of technical assistance and capital to under-developed countries and through a reduction in restrictions on immigration. Countries which had not already done so were urged to set up systems of unemployment benefits sufficient to enable the involuntarily unemployed to maintain at least a socially acceptable minimum standard of living.

The General Conference approved a formal recommendation laying down standards governing the vocational training of adults, including the disabled.

4. Manpower and Migration

Assistance was given in the field of manpower as part of the special programme of action in this area launched by ILO in 1948. ILO's work in this field included a number of "operational" activities in which the Organisation played a direct role in attacking certain problems; for example, ILO officials conducted a series of institutes to help provide the countries of Asia with the trained personnel required by their industries.

The year was also marked by the inauguration of a special programme in the field of migration. This programme, which is being financed by a $1,000,000 fund provided by a number of European governments, is designed to facilitate the migration of workers from European countries with labour surpluses to countries elsewhere which need manpower for the development of their resources.

The first major step in the intensification of the migration programme was the convening at Geneva from 25 April to 9 May 1950 of a conference of representatives of emigration and immigration countries, and of the interested international organizations.

The numbers of persons available for emigration, as well as immigration possibilities were considered at the Conference. It was estimated that 1,300,000 persons in the German Federal Republic were currently available for permanent migration; that 1,500,000 workers and their families would be available for emigration from Italy in the next few years; and that 50,000 workers were currently available from the Netherlands, with an estimated net increase of 25,000 per year for the next 20 years.

This Conference disclosed the obstacles that were impeding the development of migration, and laid the basis for the development of a series of projects aimed at overcoming them.

Among its recommendations were simplification of passport formalities for emigrant workers, avoidance of long delays at ports of embarkation, lifting of customs fees on tools and personal effects and better distribution of information.

A migration field office was opened at Bonn in November 1950 to assist the German Federal Republic in solving its migration problems, in stimulating migration opportunities, and in working out bilateral agreements and arrangements with immigration countries.

5. Problems of Particular Industries

Three of ILO's industrial committees held meetings during 1950: for chemicals and for petroleum, in Geneva, April and October-November; for textiles, at Lyons, France, in November-December.

Among the proposals which emerged from the chemicals committee meeting was a recommendation that the ILO study the establishment of an international warning mark for dangerous chemicals similar to the "poison" label on dangerous drugs. The petroleum committee decided to pursue its consideration of the question of working hours in the industry, and adopted recommendations designed to improve the housing, health and educational facilities for oil workers. The textiles committee advanced a series of recommendations to raise wage levels and improve working conditions in the industry in both under-developed and industrialized countries.

A notable precedent in the ILO's work was set in July when a conference of the representatives of Governments with an interest in the Rhine navigation system—Belgium, France, the German Federal Republic, the Netherlands, Switzerland, the United Kingdom and the United States—approved agreements regulating the employment conditions and the social security protection of Rhine boatmen.

The social security agreement covers sickness, maternity, death, invalidity, old age, employment injury, unemployment and family allowance.

Under it, each contracting party is to treat Rhine boatmen from other countries as its own nationals. An administrative centre for the social security of Rhine boatmen is to be set up, with representatives of workers, employers and Governments.

The agreement on working conditions covers manning of boats, rest periods, overtime, holidays, and special allowances.

These agreements marked the first time the ILO has been instrumental in determining precise working conditions for an international group of workers engaged in a particular occupation.

The agreements had been drafted late in 1949 at a tripartite conference of the workers, employers and Governments of the Rhine countries. They will come into force when they have been ratified by Belgium, France, the German Federal Republic, the Netherlands and Switzerland.

6. Conditions of Work

The ILO continued its studies on hours of work in coal mines and road transport with a view to ascertaining whether there was a need for revising the 1935 convention limiting hours of work in coal mines and the convention concerning the regulation of hours of work and rest periods in road transport.

7. Maritime Conditions

A significant report issued during the year was a volume which contained the recommendations of a three-member committee appointed by the Governing Body to investigate conditions in ships flying the flag of Panama. The committee was set up at the invitation of the Government of Panama after the International Transport Workers' Federation had threatened to boycott certain Panamanian ships.

The report found justification for some of the charges that had been made concerning Panamanian ships, and it made a number of recommendations aimed at improving the conditions about which the Federation complained. Before the report was published, it was discussed with representatives of Panama. As a result of these discussions it was decided to publish with the report observations on it which had been made by the Government of Panama. The discussions also led to the publication of a Governing Body statement which noted the "earnest endeavour" Panama had made to improve conditions. Following the committee's inquiry, collective agreements covering Panamanian ships began to be signed, and the threatened boycott was not put into effect.

8. Social Security

Preparations were made during the year for the consideration by the General Conference of a new international labour convention covering all branches of social security. The general lines of the proposed convention were considered at a meeting of the ILO's Committee of Social Security Experts at Wellington, New Zealand, from 8 to 17 February. Governments were consulted on the proposals of the Committee, and work was begun on a draft text for submission to the General Conference in 1951.

In co-operation with the International Social Security Association, a seminar on social security problems was held at Rome from 16 to 28 October. It brought together more than 40 participants from seven countries.

9. Agricultural Labour Conditions

The ILO's 1950 General Conference recognized the fact that "agriculture is the branch of human activity in which the largest number of people are occupied, but that in many countries the various categories of agricultural workers do not yet enjoy the same measure of protection and advantages as are accorded to workers in other sectors of the economy". The Conference proposed for future international action: the revision and broadening of the scope of international regulations on social security to ensure a better adjustment to the conditions and realities of agricultural life; the special aspects of vocational training that arise in agriculture; regulation of hours of work of wage earners in agriculture; agricultural aspects of manpower and employment problems; safety and hygiene problems arising from mechanization and the use of chemicals in agricultural work and the special problems affecting the life and conditions of employment of agricultural workers in the under-developed countries, which, it suggested, should be considered by regional or other meetings of the ILO.

10. Employment of Women

The most significant action undertaken by the ILO in the field of women's employment during 1950 was the first discussion, under a double-discussion procedure, of equal remuneration for men and women workers for work of equal value. While details as to both the form and content of international regulations on the question remain to be settled, certain basic decisions were taken at the ILO General Conference in 1950, namely, that such international regulations were desirable, that their gradual implementation should be provided for and that all aspects of the question of equal remuneration should be considered.

11. Protection of Young Workers

A report was prepared on the employment of children and young persons in the textile industry. A report was also prepared on the use of vocational guidance in the prevention and treatment of juvenile delinquency, on minimum age for admission to employment in relation to the care and treatment of homeless children and on vocational services in the care and treatment of physically-handicapped children.

12. Industrial Safety

The ILO's industrial safety work in 1950 laid particular emphasis on the petroleum, chemical, textile, metal working, mining and civil engineering industries, and on agriculture.

A Model Code of Safety Regulations for Underground Work in Coal Mines completed during 1949 was published, and a comprehensive study of laws and practices relating to safety in coal mines was continued. Work was also continued on a model code of safety regulations for civil engineering. A series of handbooks to promote safety in the petroleum industry was prepared, and work was begun on a handbook on the prevention of accidents in foundries, and a handbook on safety in the construction and use of ladders.

13. Industrial Hygiene

Activities in the field of industrial health were highlighted by the Third International Conference on Experts on Pneumoconiosis which was held at Sydney, Australia, from 28 February to 10 March 1950. This meeting discussed the cause, symptoms and diagnosis of dust diseases, and suggested preventive measures and minimum international compensation standards. It adopted a list of eight important methods of dust suppression and control for the protection of workers and stressed the fact that general measures for dust suppression must constitute the major effort in prevention, personal respiratory protective devices being only secondary.

A Committee on Industrial Hygiene, organized jointly by the ILO and the World Health Organization, defined the scope of industrial health, and laid down guiding principles for its promotion.

14. Co-operation and Handicrafts

In view of the increasing importance attached by Asian countries to the value of the co-operative movement in their territories, ILO issued reports during 1950 on the establishment of organic working relationships between co-operatives, the training of officers and employees of co-operatives, and the co-operative organization of small-scale, cottage and handicraft industries.

D. BUDGET

The budget of ILO is approved by a two-thirds vote of the General Conference. The thirty-third session of the Conference in 1950 approved a budget totalling $5,973,789 to cover expenses of ILO during 1951. The main details of the expenditures covered by this budget are given in the table on the following page.

The contributions due from Member States for 1951 are given in the second table on the following page.

II. The Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations (FAO)¹

The Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations was the first of the permanent United Nations organizations to be launched after the war. At the United Nations Conference on Food and Agriculture, in May 1943 at Hot Springs, Virginia, 44 nations agreed to work together to banish hunger and establish a stable world agriculture. On its recommendation, the United Nations Interim Commission on Food and Agriculture was set up in July 1943 to plan a permanent organization concerned with food and agriculture, and forestry and fisheries as well. The Commission prepared a Constitution for FAO² and submitted it to Governments.

FAO officially came into being with the signing of its Constitution on 16 October 1945 at the first session of the Conference, in Quebec. Subsequent regular sessions of the Conference were held in Copenhagen, September 1946; Geneva, August-September 1947; and Washington, November 1948 and November 1950. Two special sessions were held in Washington, April 1948 and November-December 1949.

On 14 December 1946, FAO was formally brought into relationship with the United Nations as a specialized agency, with the approval of an agreement³ between the two organizations by the United Nations General Assembly.

To deal with the emergency world food shortage, FAO's first Director-General, Lord Boyd Orr, called a Special Meeting on Urgent Food Problems, in Washington, May 1946. Consequently, an International Emergency Food Council (IEFC) was established to carry on the work of the wartime Combined Food Board by recommending the allocation of agricultural commodities in short supply. The IEFC functioned until 1 January 1948, when it was reconstituted as the International Emergency Food Committee, a committee of the FAO Council. The committee was dissolved as of 30 June 1949. The Special Meeting on Urgent Food Problems also recognized the need for long-term measures to prevent surpluses of agricultural commodities. Specific recommendations were made by an FAO Preparatory Commission on World Food Proposals, which met in Washington, October 1946 to January 1947. The FAO Conference began in 1947 an annual review of the international food and agriculture situation, and replaced the FAO's Executive Committee with the Council of FAO, or World Food Council, to which it assigned broader functions.

In recognition of the urgency and continuing importance of the commodity question, at its 1949 session, the FAO Conference established a fourteen-member Committee on Commodity Problems to try to resolve situations arising from the accumulation in certain countries of commodity surpluses caused by lack of purchasing power in the food deficit areas.

Recommendations to minimize the 1947-48 deficit of grains were made by a special conference on cereals, in the summer of 1947. The problem of food loss through infestation was discussed by an international meeting in London in August 1947 and later dealt with regionally. Programmes for the expansion of rice production were reviewed by an International Rice Conference at Baguio, Philippines, early in 1948. This Conference drew up a constitution for an International Rice Commission, which met first in Bangkok in March 1949.

A Fisheries Conference at Baguio early in 1948 led to the establishment in March 1949 of an Indo-Pacific Fisheries Council. This was the first of a series of regional councils set up to encourage Government co-operation in developing production and utilizing fisheries products. A General Fisheries Council for the Mediterranean was approved by the FAO Conference in 1949, following an international meeting on the subject at Rome.

Measures for overcoming the European timber shortage were considered by an International Timber Conference in Czechoslovakia early in 1947. At its recommendation, European timber production was increased 10 per cent during 1947. The European Forestry and Forest Products Commission was subsequently established. Similar Commissions for Latin America and for Asia and the Pacific were established following conferences in Brazil in 1948 and India in 1949.

Special FAO missions to help solve food and agricultural problems were sent, at the Government's request, to Greece in 1946, Poland in 1947, and Thailand and Venezuela in January 1948. An UNRRA grant to FAO of more than $1,000,000 served to finance agricultural advisory services in countries that had received aid from UNRRA, including Austria, China, Czechoslovakia, Ethiopia, Greece, Hungary, Italy, Poland and Yugoslavia. During 1947 and 1948 UNRRA funds also financed technical demonstration meetings in Europe on maize breeding, artificial insemination of cattle, vaccines and sera, food freezing and refrigeration, soil conservation, grain infestation control and grain storage.

In 1949, FAO's programme for training statisticians of member governments was expanded with a view to solving problems of the 1950 world census of agriculture. Some other instances of FAO field work and technical aid to member countries follow.

In Thailand, a mission reported that freshwater fisheries production there could be developed. Work on rinderpest control in the Far East expanded; at a meeting at Nairobi, Kenya, experts agreed that, with new vaccines FAO has helped develop, rinderpest could be wiped out. Soil fertility practices in the Far East were studied. Experts at the Allahabad Institute in India made a study of farm implements, and an engineer appraised farm-machine problems in Thailand, the Philippines and other Far Eastern countries. FAO's hybrid corn work, hitherto confined mainly to Europe, was extended to the Near East and India. Technicians not only distributed improved vegetable seed but collected seeds and plants of potential value in other countries. Co-operatives in the Far East were discussed at a meeting at Lucknow, India, in late 1949.

Near East countries worked with FAO on control of locusts, a chief threat to food production. The Ethiopian Government was aided in manufacturing rinderpest vaccine and other veterinary biologicals, and obtained advice on selecting cotton-growing areas and improving other crops. FAO made a field study of methods of processing agricultural products in the Near East.

At a meeting in Colombia in February, technicians of eighteen countries discussed control of infestation in stored grain, and later there was a demonstration of control measures in Costa Rica, guided by an FAO expert. FAO entomologists lent their services in anti-locust campaigns in Guatemala and Costa Rica and in fighting a grasshopper outbreak in western United States and Canada; in June 1949, an anti-locust conference, called by the Mexican Government and attended by representatives of Central American countries, resulted in an agreement providing for co-operation in combating this pest. In Guatemala, FAO advised on programmes to improve beef cattle production and to further farm mechanization. In Bolivia, an FAO agronomist recommended specific improvements in livestock and crop production methods in that country's high lands which could lead to dietary self-sufficiency. The Costa Rican, Haitian and other Governments obtained advice on fisheries development.

An FAO nutritionist trained local nutrition workers in Greece and organized a supplementary feeding programme for children, the aged, and other vulnerable groups; this work led to the Government's establishing a national nutrition service. FAO convened a meeting on agricultural extension services in European countries at Brussels and The Hague. A specialist studied extension services for farm women in various countries and assisted on home economics extension problems in Italy, Greece and Poland. Livestock feeding problems were discussed at a meeting at Zurich.

A. PURPOSES AND FUNCTIONS

The preamble to the Constitution of FAO tells the reason for its existence in a few words:

The Nations accepting this Constitution, being determined to promote the common welfare by furthering separate and collective action on their part for the purposes of:

raising levels of nutrition and standards of living of the peoples under their respective jurisdictions, securing improvements in the efficiency of the production and distribution of all food and agricultural products, bettering the condition of rural populations, and thus contributing toward an expanding world economy, hereby establish the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations through which the Members will report to one another on the measures taken and the progress achieved in the fields of action set forth above.

Its functions are described in article 1 of the Constitution:

1. The Organization shall collect, analyse, interpret, and disseminate information relating to nutrition, food and agriculture.

2. The Organization shall promote and, where appropriate, shall recommend national and international action with respect to

- (a) scientific, technological, social, and economic research relating to nutrition, food and agriculture;
- (b) the improvement of education and administration relating to nutrition, food and agriculture, and the spread of public knowledge of nutritional and agricultural science and practice;
- (c) the conservation of natural resources and the adoption of improved methods of agricultural production;

- (d) the improvement of the processing, marketing and distribution of food and agricultural products;
- (e) the adoption of policies for the provision of adequate agricultural credit, national and international;
- (f) the adoption of international policies with respect to agricultural commodity arrangements.

3. It shall also be the function of the Organization

- (a) to furnish such technical assistance as governments may request;
- (b) to organize, in cooperation with the governments concerned, such missions as may be needed to assist them to fulfil the obligations arising from their acceptance of the recommendations of the United Nations Conference on Food and Agriculture; and
- (c) generally to take all necessary and appropriate action to implement the purposes of the Organization as set forth in the Preamble.

B. ORGANIZATION

FAO consists of a Conference, a Council of FAO and a staff headed by a Director-General.

The Conference is composed of representatives from each member nation. Each member has one vote. The Conference meets at least once every two years. It reviews FAO's work, determines its policy and approves the budget; it reviews the food and agriculture situation and the programmes and plans of member Governments, and recommends national and international action. Decisions of the Conference are taken by a simple majority vote, except in instances such as the admission of new members, when a two-thirds majority of all members of the organization is required.

Between sessions of the Conference, the Council of FAO, comprising representatives of eighteen member nations and an independent chairman elected by the Conference, exercises powers delegated to it. The Council keeps the world food and agriculture situation under constant review and makes recommendations to member Governments, international commodity authorities and other international agencies.

The Director-General of FAO, elected by the Conference, has full power and authority to direct the work of the organization, subject to the general supervision of the Conference and the Council. He appoints the staff and directs its work.

Standing advisory committees of world experts on agriculture, economics and statistics, fisheries, forestry and forest products, nutrition and rural welfare advise the Director-General. National FAO committees, established in 4g) member countries, serve as contacts between FAO and governmental and non-governmental agencies. The temporary headquarters of FAO were established in 1945 at Washington. The Conference in December 1949 voted to establish permanent headquarters at Rome.⁴

A special session of the Conference, at Washington in November 1950, planned the transfer of headquarters, dealt with budget matters, admitted new members and re-appointed Director-General Norris E. Dodd, who had been first elected in April 1948. The new members were Cambodia, the Federal Republic of Germany, Jordan, Spain and Vietnam, which brought the membership of FAO at the end of 1950 to 67 nations.⁵

1. Agriculture

Under this heading FAO is concerned mainly with agricultural technology: crop production, former International Institute of Agriculture in Rome, became a part of headquarters. The International Institute had been liquidated in 1948, its assets and liabilities passing to FAO.

⁵ Inclusive of Hungary and Poland (see Annex I, footnotes 8 and 9) but exclusive of Czechoslovakia, which withdrew from FAO on 27 Dec. 1950.

⁴ On 1 Apr. 1951, FAO headquarters moved from Washington to Rome. A North American Regional Office was then set up in Washington, and the former European regional office, as well as the library of the animal husbandry, management of soil and water, pest and disease control, and the development of government services in extension, professional training, and other fields. The following activities were included in the 1950 programme.

A rice hybridization project, recommended by the International Rice Commission at its second session, at Rangoon, Burma, in February, was begun at the Central Rice Research Institute at Cuttack, Orissa, India. The Commission also established a working party to consider fertilizers in rice production. Rice problems received particular attention in agricultural improvement programmes which Asian and Far Eastern governments undertook with FAO aid.

At the second meeting of the European Committee on Agricultural Technology, at Geneva in March, co-ordination of FAO work with that of other international organizations was discussed.

Toward developing government services in agriculture, FAO agricultural specialists participated in missions organized by the United Nations and other agencies to Afghanistan, Uruguay and the Near East, including Turkey. The Afghanistan mission dealt also with soil and livestock problems. In Europe, FAO, OEEC and ECA co-operated in making a study of advisory services in member countries. FAO itself made a similar study in Finland, and another in Pakistan.

An FAO mission spent two months in Nicaragua inspecting farm and forestry areas and holding discussions with government officials and experts from other international organizations.

FAO took part in an International Congress of Animal Production, at Paris in November, and helped to set up a European Association of Animal Production. At Lucknow, India, in February, specialists from southern Europe, the Near East, Africa, Asia and the Far East met to discuss ways of increasing livestock production in the tropics and subtropics; and in Latin America livestock breeding problems were considered at a meeting which FAO and the Inter-American Institute of Agricultural Sciences held in October. In the Caribbean area, livestock workers met in Trinidad in February and March to discuss the improvement of livestock rations, and FAO specialists surveyed pasture conditions in the Belize River Valley of British Honduras and in Guatemala. Turkey was assisted with problems involving grazing and forage seeds. An expert committee began to study indigenous breeds and types of cattle in Africa. In July, FAO and the British Council held a meeting on dairy technology at Reading, England. During the year three documents on animal husbandry were distributed: an outline draft of a catalogue of cattle breeds and types, and, for Europe, a report on more uniform milk and butter-fat recording and one on artificial insemination of livestock.

FAO continued to co-operate with UNICEF on problems of handling and processing milk in the UNICEF programme in Europe.

Work on rinderpest control moved ahead in 1950. By midyear more than 150,000 cattle in Ethiopia had been vaccinated. An FAO veterinarian helped in the production in Japan of a newer type of vaccine, and discussed vaccine production also in Hong Kong, where the mass immunization of cattle against rinderpest has been completed. FAO arranged for the employment of a veterinarian by the Thai Government to carry on the work begun by an FAO veterinarian. This included a research programme and an immunization programme that has resulted in the control of rinderpest in Thailand. FAO helped fight a rinderpest outbreak in Taiwan (Formosa) and sent veterinarians to Iran and Afghanistan. Foot-and-mouth disease came under study. FAO and the International Office of Epizootics sponsored a meeting on the disease at Paris in May, and the United Kingdom offered to make available a centre for typing strains of the virus, at Pirbright. FAO sent an expert to Taiwan to help produce hog cholera vaccine and, jointly with WHO, convened a meeting in Washington in November to study mastitis and brucellosis. WHO and FAO arranged to act jointly wherever possible in animal disease problems, as for instance in the production of biologicals in Yugoslavia and in rabies control in the Far East. FAO worked jointly also with the Organization for European Economic Co-operation (OEEC), on a survey of economic losses in Europe owing to livestock disease and of control procedures.

Delegates from twelve countries met in Cyprus in April and May to study improved practices in soil conservation, range management, and related matters. The Government of Cyprus invited other Governments to send personnel for a training course in the island's practices. Two FAO soil classification specialists worked with United Nations missions to Bolivia and Afghanistan. The first draft of a list of 620 soil terms was discussed at the Fourth International Congress of Soil Science, at Amsterdam; national committees, it was agreed, would review it and suggest changes for the final draft, which FAO would publish. Owing to co-operation by United States, Canadian and Mexican agencies, the North American section of a world survey of soil erosion was brought near completion. Preliminary arrangements for the survey were initiated in South and Central America and in Europe.

FAO irrigation engineers accompanied United Nations missions to Bolivia and Haiti, and other irrigation specialists assisted in Saudi Arabia. The mission to Bolivia also included specialists in crops and soils. In Pakistan, an FAO irrigation officer advised government engineers on preparing land for irrigation. In India, a soil conservation expert advised on the Pallikaranai Swamp Project. Fourteen Governments were represented at a meeting at Amsterdam in July, to assess the progress made on land and water utilization and conservation in Europe since an earlier meeting in 1948. At a Conference of Soil Scientists, in Puerto Rico in March and April, in which FAO participated, a co-ordinated land improvement programme for the Caribbean area was recommended. An FAO specialist made recommendations in Pakistan for setting up farm-machinery centres, training programmes and parts distribution systems. Japanese types of small farm machines were studied as to their usefulness throughout the Far East. In the Philippines, FAO was called to recommend equipment, repair facilities and personnel training to the Government. An FAO report on Europe's farm machinery situation was submitted to Governments for suggestions.

Latin American countries joined, under FAO guidance, for further study of infestation control in stored grain. A locust control expert worked with the International Committee of Co-ordination for Locust Control in Central America and Mexico, and aided representatives of six countries in controlling a severe locust outbreak in Nicaragua and preventing its spread.

The Hague Conference on Plant Protection, convened by the Netherlands Government and FAO in April-May, recommended that FAO establish a world-wide reporting service on animal diseases, plant diseases and insect pests, and endorsed the establishment of the European Plant Protection Organization, which was to gather information on pests and diseases and report to FAO. The conference accepted in principle a draft revision of the international plant protection convention and submitted it to member Governments for review and consideration at the next FAO Conference. The convention would furnish the administrative basis for the world-wide reporting service and for more efficient plant quarantine measures. Meanwhile FAO issued a digest of plant quarantine regulations, summarizing in non-legal language the official documents of 22 member countries.

Continuing its hybrid maize programme, FAO shipped seed to Austria, Belgium, Denmark, Egypt, France, Greece, Italy, Netherlands, Portugal, Spain, Switzerland, the United Kingdom and Yugoslavia; and for the first time Cyprus, Germany, India, Israel, Morocco, Sweden and Turkey. A third annual research meeting on the programme was held in Rome.

FAO continued to help member Governments obtain new or improved varieties of seed for experimental purposes, and participated in the ninth congress of the International Seed Testing Association, at Washington in May, where a resolution was passed looking to co-operation of the two bodies.

2. Distribution

The FAO Committee on Commodity Problems kept under review during 1950 the effect of currency difficulties upon commodity distribution. It notified "surplus" nations of needs reported by "deficit" countries, and in addition assisted member Governments to arrange for sales of surpluses at concessional prices. It listed and assisted the sale of supplies of dried skim milk, butter, cheese, canned meat, dried eggs, beans and peas.

A major effort of the FAO secretariat was "commodity intelligence"—assembling and analysing current information on commodity situations. This information was transmitted to Governments mainly in two forms: commodity bulletins, rather comprehensive documents bringing together a great deal of basic reference information; and reports; somewhat shorter, more frequently published "highlight" appraisals of the current commodity situation, with some indications of trends.

3. Economics

FAO's work in economics, marketing and statistics has involved five main lines of effort: regional meetings; evaluations of the food and agriculture position in member countries and reviews of general prospects for demand and prices of agricultural products prepared as an aid to government planning; technical assistance to Governments in planning the economic aspects of agricultural development (enlarged under the United Nations Expanded Technical Assistance Programme; see below); basic statistical data, collected regularly and presented through yearbooks and monthly bulletins; direct technical aid to Governments in improving their current statistics.

Among the specific projects undertaken were the following:

A document dealing with the basic principles of internationally comparable index numbers for production, trade, and consumption of agricultural products was completed. A report on international investment was presented to the 1949 Conference of FAO and the preparation of another report in 1950 was requested. In April 1950, inquiries were sent to 36 member Governments requesting data with respect to the nature of each development project planned or under execution, its present technical status, methods of domestic and foreign financing, and the need for foreign investment funds; these inquiries took into account suggestions made by the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development. A special study was begun of major aspects, national and international, of agricultural price relationships and measures affecting them. A new set of 44 food balance sheets was issued covering, for 35 countries, all the principal food commodities classified in eleven food groups. Work began on a detailed second World Food Survey, to show the present world food position compared to prewar, past and expected future rates of progress and comparisons with the rates required for achievement of 1960 goals for improved nutrition.

To assist the economic growth of under-developed areas of Asia by offering their official training in preparing well-supported project plans, the Asian Centre on Agricultural and Allied Development Projects was held at Lahore, Pakistan, October-December 1950, under the joint sponsorship of Pakistan, the United Nations (including ECAFE), the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development and FAO, with WHO co-operating. The first training centre of this type, its aim was to help officials to plan, appraise and present projects so as to facilitate their adequate consideration by the agencies responsible for carrying them out.

Direct assistance was given to a number of member countries in developing census schedules, conducting trial enumerations and aiding general census organization. FAO was informed that 63 countries and dependencies would have taken agricultural censuses in 1949 or 1950 or would take them in 1951.

4. Fisheries

During 1950, FAO's Indo-Pacific Fisheries Council held its second conference; prospects seemed good for early establishment of the Mediterranean Council, and the possibilities of forming a Latin-American Council were being actively explored. Assistance was given to a number of Governments in organizing fisheries services.

In its programme of helping Governments meet technical problems of the fisheries industry, FAO paid special attention to encouraging and advancing fish-culture practices, particularly pond culture, which in many countries would supply badly needed protein food and also strengthen the economy of the small-scale farmer. FAO worked in Thailand and in Haiti, and prepared a handbook on pond culture in the Far East.

The bi-monthly World Fisheries Abstracts, started in 1950, aims at spreading knowledge of improved technology, the economic and statistical reporting in such publications as the bimonthly Fisheries Bulletin, a herring commodity study and the Yearbook of Fisheries Statistics assist Governments in dealing with economic aspects. During 1950, FAO compiled a catalogue of federal Government, state and private fisheries research and educational institutions in North and South America. The locations and activities of such institutions are not well known, especially in the less developed areas. The catalogue provides such information partly as a guide to educational institutions in the field of fisheries for prospective students, and is designed also to encourage exchange of information and publications among them. Similar catalogues for Europe and other areas are planned.

With a view to assessing the world's present and potential fisheries resources, assisting Governments in planning fisheries programmes and providing background information for organizing regional fisheries councils, FAO makes regional surveys of known fisheries on the basis of existing scattered literature on the subject, interviews with specialists, and on-the-spot reconnaissance. In 1950, preliminary surveys were completed for Latin America and for the Mediterranean Area and Near East and given limited distribution. Toward standardizing the names of fishes, which are extremely confused among various countries and languages, and clarifying their use in statistics and trade, FAO began compiling the names now in use.

The FAO Conference requested that the secretariat prepare recommendations for minimum standards for certain fisheries commodities entering international trade. A prerequisite in the form of a summary of existing laws, regulations and inspection practices now applied was prepared during 1950; it gives exporting countries information on the requirements of importing coun tries, and may be of use to countries preparing or revising laws and inspection services.

5. Forestry and forest Products

Consumer needs for forest products of every kind, from building material to paper, are now far from being adequately met in most parts of the world. An objective of FAO is that of increasing the output of forest products; at the same time FAO aims at protecting, renewing and extending the forests of the world in order that they may check soil erosion, protect watersheds and water supplies, facilitate flood control, act as wind-breaks and offer recreational values and shelter for wildlife. FAO works through regional forestry and forest products commissions serviced by regional working groups, missions to carry out technical assistance projects, technical consultations by experts and at special conferences, statistical reports and publication of basic international studies.

Of special importance was the initiation during 1950 of a new series of international forestry studies, which will provide fundamental documentation for the Expanded Technical Assistance Programme. Two were published: Planning a National Forest Inventory and Forest Policy, Law, and Administration. Extensive information was assembled on equipment for logging, extraction, transport, sawmills, nurseries, reforestation and fire fighting.

The 1950 yearbook entitled Forest Products Statistics was published, and regular commodity reports were issued. An analysis of timber consumption trends in selected countries was begun in co-operation with ECE, backed by the Economic and Social Council.

International co-operation for development in the field was fostered through technical consultations and regional meetings in the Far East, the Near East, Europe and Latin America. The European Commission accepted a basic statement of forestry principles drawn up by FAO following a recommendation of the Third World Forestry Congress in 1949.

An FAO mission to Austria outlined an investment programme of about $80,000,000 and recommended fundamental changes in the administration of forests and forest industries; a mission to Nicaragua made recommendations for far-reaching changes there.

6. Nutrition

FAO's fundamental task in the field of nutrition is to encourage and enable Governments to base their food policies and programmes on the nutritional needs of their people. FAO in 1950 issued three publications designed to enable member Governments to obtain basic information on nutrition: Calorie Requirements: Report of the Committee on Calorie Requirements; Food Composition Tables for International Use; and Dietary Surveys: Their Technique and Interpretation. A study was undertaken of successful school feeding programmes in various countries, to be published as a guide to Governments. FAO prepared a handbook on nutrition education, Teaching Better Nutrition: a Study of Approaches and Techniques.

Contacts with nutrition workers were broadened considerably through regional nutrition meetings in the Far East and Latin America, technical committees, such as the Calorie Requirements Committee, and visits to various countries by FAO nutrition representatives. Though financial limitations in general made it impossible to assign staff members for long periods to one country, a three-year assignment was completed in Greece, one was started in Turkey and a nutrition officer was assigned to Thailand during the latter half of 1950. Earlier in the year, officers of FAO and WHO visited Egypt and advised on the Government's nutrition policy and programme. There has been effective collaboration with WHO on a number of other projects.

In Guatemala, FAO began working closely with the Institute of Nutrition for Central America and Panama and with UNICEF. Much attention was given to the problem of international action to meet the continuing needs of children.

7. Activities under the United Nations Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance

While continuing its regular programme, FAO during the latter part of 1950 began operation under the Expanded Technical Assistance Programme in co-operation with the United Nations and other specialized agencies. Although FAO has given technical assistance to its member countries since its inception, under the new Programme such work can be greatly increased in scope and in the tenure of its experts in the field. Improvement in agriculture and nutrition is basic to economic development, and FAO was allocated 29 per cent of the new technical assistance funds, the largest share given to any of the participating agencies. Funds became available in October 1950. Among the first FAO projects were the Asian Training Centre on Appraisal of Development Projects, held in Pakistan, and the Latin American Statistics Training Centre in Costa Rica. In both projects the United Nations and other international agencies were co-sponsors. It was estimated that from 1 July 1950 to 31 December 1951, FAO's technical assistance programme would require 405 experts and 388 fellowships. The types of assistance requested by Governments represented practically every one of the activities with which FAO is concerned.

8. Publications

FAO publications appear in English, French and Spanish editions and are available in depository libraries and through sales agents in the various countries. In many cases the FAO sales agents are the same as those of the United Nations.⁶ A Catalogue of Publications issued in December 1950 listed all the FAO publications issued up to that time.

FAO's publications are closely linked to its programme, as their titles illustrate. The regular series include agricultural studies, nutrition studies, statistics bulletins and commodity bulletins.

Major documents published during 1950 were two: World Outlook and State of Food and Agriculture—1950, an analysis of the world food situation based on reports from member Governments; and The Work of FAO—1949/50, the report of the Director-General to the Conference. Other official records included reports of the seventh, eighth, ninth, tenth and eleventh sessions of the Council of FAO, the Fifth Session of the Conference and the second session of the International Rice Commission, and the Report of the FAO Mission for Nicaragua.

Periodicals included the Monthly Bulletin of Food and Agricultural Statistics; the bi-monthly Fisheries Bulletin and World Fisheries Abstracts; the quarterly Unasylva, a review of forestry and forest products; Timber Statistics, a quarterly bulletin; the FAO Bulletin, a popular publication for free distribution; and Food and Agriculture: The European Bulletin, published quarterly.

Three statistical yearbooks are issued by FAO. During 1950, the first volume of the 1949 Yearbook of Food and Agricultural Statistics, dealing with production, the second volume of the 1948 Yearbook of Food and Agricultural Statistics, dealing with trade, the Forest Products Statistics yearbook for 1950 and the Yearbook of Fisheries Statistics—1948—49 were published.

Among the technical publications issued during 1950 were the following: AGRICULTURE—Some Important Animal Diseases in Europe; Consolidation of Fragmented Agricultural Holdings; Some Aspects of Food Refrigeration and Freezing; List of Plant Breeders in the United States and Canada. DISTRIBUTION—Commodity bulletins on dairy products, commercial fertilizers, grain, and dried fruits; commodity reports on sugar, wool, rice, hard fibres, fats and oils, jute, cocoa, fertilizers, poultry and eggs. FISHERIES—Report of the FAO Fisheries Mission for Thailand. NUTRITION—Report of the Nutrition Committee for South and East Asia, Second Meeting; Report of the Second Conference on Nutrition Problems in Latin America. FAO DEVELOPMENT SERIES PAPERS—"Fertilizer Manufacturing Projects, Their Planning and Financing", "Water Laws in the United States of America", "Essential Steps in National Agricultural Improvement", "Agriculture in the Altiplano of Bolivia", "Essential Considerations in Mechanization of Farming" and "Improving Livestock under Tropical and Subtropical Conditions".⁷

The special session of the Conference, which met at Washington in November 1950, adopted a budget of $5,025,000 to meet the expenses of FAO during 1951, as follows:

BUDGET (1951)

Conference and Council	$ 111,000
Office of the Director General	293,156

III. The United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO)

The Conference for the establishment of an educational, scientific and cultural organization of the United Nations, convened by the Government of the United Kingdom in association with the Government of France, met in London from 1 to 16 November 1945. It was attended by representatives of 44 Governments and by observers from a number of international organizations. The Conference drew up the Constitution of UNESCO.¹ It also established a Preparatory Educational, Scientific and Cultural Commission to function until UNESCO came into being.

The Preparatory Commission, during its one year of existence, prepared a programme for submission to the first session of the General Conference. It also took steps to meet some of the most urgent needs of educational, scientific and cultural reconstruction in war-devastated areas.

UNESCO came into being on 4 November 1946, when the Instrument of Acceptance of twenty signatories of its Constitution had been deposited with the Government of the United Kingdom.

The first session of the General Conference was held in Paris in November 1946. The Conference approved the Agreement establishing the relationship between the United Nations and UNESCO.² This Agreement came into force on 14 December 1946, with its approval by the General Assembly of the United Nations. The Conference elected Dr. Julian Huxley (United Kingdom) as the first Director-General of UNESCO.

Prior to 1950, three further sessions of the General Conference were held: in Mexico City, November 1947; in Beirut, November 1948; in Paris, September 1949.

At the third session, Dr. Jaime Torres Bodet, former Minister of Foreign Affairs in Mexico, was elected Director-General of UNESCO for a period of six years, to succeed Dr. Julian Huxley, whose term of office expired at the end of 1948.

During the first three years of work, in order to carry out the purposes of its Constitution, the programme of UNESCO became stabilized in seven main areas of activity: education, natural sciences, social sciences, cultural activities, exchange of persons, mass communication and relief assistance services.

In education, UNESCO's main tasks are the improvement and extension of education, and a programme of education for international understanding or the devising of a system of training in world citizenship.

In the natural sciences, UNESCO seeks to promote international scientific co-operation; it helps in the teaching and popularization of science and encourages research designed to improve the living conditions of mankind.

In the social sciences, UNESCO similarly fosters international scientific co-operation; it studies social tensions and the means for bettering international co-operation.

UNESCO's programme of cultural activities seeks to create, as in science, favourable conditions for international co-operation among artists, philosophers and men of letters. In addition, UNESCO endeavours to protect creative work and its authors, and it assists member States in their efforts to disseminate culture.

The aim of the exchange of persons programme is to facilitate the increase of international travel for educational purposes.

In mass communication, UNESCO strives to improve the technical media of communication and to reduce obstacles to the flow of information. In addition, material is supplied to Press, film and radio to help promote the organization's aim of advancing international understanding.

The relief assistance services work to reconstruct education, science and culture in devastated countries by assembling information on the nature and extent of needs and by co-ordinating the efforts of voluntary organizations which work in this field.

To carry out this programme UNESCO has evolved a number of methods: meetings of experts, missions, seminars, pilot projects; the calling of international conferences and the submission of recommendations; international conventions to Member States.

Special methods have been devised to deal with certain situations—for example, the "Coupon Scheme" which enables institutions and individuals in soft currency countries to obtain books, scientific equipment and educational film material from hard currency countries.

As a means to ensure the dissemination of scientific information, field science offices have been set up in Uruguay, Egypt, Turkey, India, Indonesia and the Philippines.

To enable scientists and teachers to meet and exchange views, subventions are granted to the main international educational, scientific and cultural associations.

Some examples of UNESCO's work during the first three years of its existence follow:

Seminars on such subjects as "Education for International Understanding", "Education of Children", "Teaching About the United Nations", "Illiteracy in the Americas", "Rural Education" and "Public Libraries Expansion" have been held in France, Czechoslovakia, the United Kingdom, the United States, Brazil and India. In the Marbial Valley (Haiti) a pilot project in Fundamental Education was begun early in 1948. Educational missions were sent to the Philippines, Thailand and Afghanistan. International Conferences were called on adult education (Denmark, 1949), vagrant children (France, 1949), the establishment of an international federation of children's communities (Switzerland, 1948), the establishment of an international universities bureau (Netherlands, 1948). A long-term programme for the improvement of textbooks and teaching materials was begun in 1947 and a model plan was sent to member States in 1948 to assist them to make a critical analysis of such material.

To further international co-operation in the natural sciences, UNESCO made grants totalling over $600,000 up to 31 December 1949 to international scientific and technological organizations. Various new international non-governmental organizations have been created: the International Union for the Protection of Nature, the Council for the Co-ordination of International Congresses of Medical Sciences (together with WHO), the International Political Science Association, the International Sociological Association and the International Economic Association.

The social tensions programme resulted in the publication of two books, Tensions Affecting International Understanding and Tensions that Cause War.

Three new international organizations in the cultural field were set up: the International Theatre Institute, the International Music Council and the International Council for Philosophy and Humanistic Studies. In 1948 work was started on the framing of a Universal Copyright Convention to unify the international legal systems now in force. At the request of the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations, a project was begun in 1947 on the "Translation of the Classics" project; in the early stages UNESCO concentrated on two cultural and linguistic regions, Latin America and Arabic-speaking areas.

Surveys of the technical facilities in Press, radio and film in war-devastated and certain under-developed countries were begun in 1947. This work resulted in the publication of the surveys, under the title The Book of Needs, and recommendations to member States to meet the needs. In 1948 an Agreement to Facilitate the International Circulation of Visual and Auditory Materials was approved by the General Conference and opened for signature at United Nations Headquarters. The Agreement provides for the abolition of customs duties, quota restrictions and import licences on educational films and other audio-visual materials.

By late 1949 UNESCO's campaign for educational reconstruction in war-devastated countries, together with the efforts of voluntary agencies and Governments, had succeeded in raising some $160,000,000 in money, supplies and services. In 1949, educational aid to refugee children in the Middle East resulted in the opening of 39 UNESCO schools in Lebanon, Syria, Palestine and Jordan.

A. PURPOSES AND FUNCTIONS

The preamble to the UNESCO Constitution recognizes that "since wars begin in the minds of men, it is in the minds of men that the defences of peace must be constructed".

The purpose of UNESCO, as stated in article 1 of the Constitution, "is to contribute to peace and security by promoting collaboration among the nations through education, science and culture in order to further universal respect for justice, for the rule of law and for the human rights and fundamental freedoms which are affirmed for the peoples of the world, without distinction of race, sex, language or religion, by the Charter of the United Nations".

To achieve its purpose, UNESCO is to:

(a) collaborate in the work of advancing the mutual knowledge and understanding of peoples, through all means of mass communication and to that end recommend such international agreements as may be necessary to promote the free flow of ideas by word and image;

(b) give fresh impulse to popular education and to the spread of culture:

by collaborating with Members, at their request, in the development of educational activities;

by instituting collaboration among the nations to advance the ideal of equality of educational opportunity without regard to race, sex or any distinction, economic or social;

by suggesting educational methods best suited to prepare the children of the world for the responsibilities of freedom;

(c) maintain, increase and diffuse knowledge;

by assuring the conservation and protection of the world's inheritance of books, works of art and monuments of history and science, and recommending to the nations concerned the necessary international conventions;

by encouraging co-operation among the nations in all branches of intellectual activity, including the international exchange of persons active in the fields of education, science and culture and the exchange of publications, objects of artistic and scientific interest and other materials of information;

by initiating methods of international co-operation calculated to give the people of all countries access to the printed and published materials produced by any of them.

B. ORGANIZATION

UNESCO consists of a General Conference, an Executive Board and a secretariat.

The General Conference, which meets at least once each year, is composed of representatives of the States members of UNESCO. It determines the policies and the main lines of work of the organization, and it may summon international conferences on education, the sciences and humanities and the dissemination of knowledge.

Each member is entitled to one vote in the Conference. Decisions of the Conference are made by a majority of the members present and voting, except in cases in which the Constitution requires a two-thirds majority. The adoption by the Conference of international conventions, or of amendments to the Constitution, for example, requires a two-thirds majority vote.

New members may be admitted into UNESCO, if they are Members of the United Nations, by signing the Constitution and depositing an instrument of acceptance. Other States, to become members, require, in addition, a favourable recommendation of the Executive Board and a two-thirds majority vote of the General Conference, and their applications are subject to the approval of the United Nations.

The Executive Board consists of eighteen members elected for three-year terms by the General Conference from among the delegates appointed by member States. Each year the General Conference elects six members of the Board, endeavouring to select persons competent in the arts, humanities, sciences and education. The Board, which meets at least twice each year, is responsible for the execution of the programme adopted by the Conference and exercises any powers delegated to it by the Conference.

The secretariat consists of the Director-General and the staff. The Director-General, appointed by the General Conference on the nomination of the Executive Board, is the chief administrative officer of UNESCO.

Under Article 7 of the Constitution each member State is required to make arrangements for the establishment of a National Commission or Co-operating Body. These National Commissions act in an advisory capacity to their respective delegations to the General Conference and serve as liaison groups between UNESCO and the educational, scientific and cultural life of their own countries.

C. ACTIVITIES DURING 1950

The fifth session of the General Conference was held in Florence, Italy, 22 May-17 June 1950.

Two significant events marked this session. First, the range of tasks to which the organization devotes its efforts became stabilized through the adoption of a basic programme in which no great change is to be made for a period of some years. On the basis of this programme, an annual selection is made of specific tasks to be initiated, carried on or completed during the following twelve months. Secondly, the Conference authorized the Director-General and the Executive Board to put forward special projects of a character likely to make an effective contribution to UNESCO's aims to be financed apart from the regular budget. One such project was devised at the end of 1950 for the establishment of a world network of regional fundamental education centres.

The chief tasks of UNESCO, as defined in the few basic programme are as follows:

- (1) To eliminate illiteracy and encourage fundamental education;
- (2) To obtain for each person an education conforming to his aptitudes and to the needs of society, including technological training and higher education;
- (3) To promote through education respect for human rights throughout all nations;
- (4) To overcome the obstacles to the free flow of persons, ideas and knowledge between the countries of the world;
- (5) To promote the progress and utilization of science for mankind;
- (6) To study the causes of tensions that may lead to war and to fight them through education;
- (7) To demonstrate world cultural interdependence;
- (8) To advance through the Press, radio and motion pictures the cause of truth, freedom and peace;
- (9) To bring about better understanding among the peoples of the world and to convince them of the necessity of co-operating loyally with one another in the framework of the United Nations;
- (10) To render clearing-house and exchange services in all its fields of action, together with services in reconstruction and relief assistance.

The fifth session of the General Conference also reiterated its approval of UNESCO's participation in the United Nations Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance for Economic development.³ UNESCO's first ventures in this field were begun in the latter part of the year. In this way an eighth area of activities was added to the other seven areas listed in the Introduction.

Strong support was also given by the Conference to UNESCO's determination to make known, and encourage the implementation of, the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. Various parts of the total programme have now been directed to this end.

During 1950 the first regional meeting of National Commissions took place at Havana, Cuba, in December, and the first conference of representatives of international non-governmental organizations approved for consultative status took place in Florence, prior to the opening of the General Conference. International non-governmental organizations were assisted during 1950 by grants totalling $548,030 in the form of subventions or working contracts. This sum brought the total financial assistance of this type granted by UNESCO since 1947 up to $2,099,224.

The number of member States rose from 52 at the end of 1949 to 59 at the end of 1950. The new member States are Costa Rica, Honduras, Indonesia, Jordan, the Republic of Korea, Sweden and Yugoslavia.

At the end of the period under review, 49 of UNESCO's 59 member States had established National Commissions.

It should be noted that the fifth session of the General Conference took place in the early summer rather than in the autumn in order to conform with the policy arrangements whereby all specialized agencies should hold their annual conferences prior to the annual session of the General Assembly of the United Nations.⁴ It was decided that the sixth General Conference should be held in June 1951.

The activities of UNESCO during 1950 are described below under the eight broad headings of its programme.

1. Education

a. IMPROVEMENT OF EDUCATION THROUGH EXCHANGE OF INFORMATION

Three educational missions were dispatched: the first to Bolivia, to co-operate in a campaign to eradicate illiteracy; the second to Burma, to study conditions for developing fundamental education there; and the third to India, to take part in an experiment in rural education. As a result of the three missions organized in 1949, the Government of Thailand drew up a ten-year plan for education; in Afghanistan an institute of education was to be established, and in the Philippines many of the UNESCO recommendations were given legal effect by the Government.

As a result of a conference held at Nice, France, in December and attended by representatives of 164 universities in 51 countries, an international association of universities was created. This association maintains an inquiry service on all university matters, including documentation and preparation of statistics on higher education.

The educational clearing house in Paris continued to collect and diffuse information and to make studies of specific questions, with a common aim of assisting member States to improve their educational systems. The clearing house carried out preparatory work for the thirteenth session of the International Conference on Public Education, jointly convened by UNESCO and the International Bureau of Education; this Conference discussed two special topics: the teaching of mathematics in primary education and the UNESCO report on exchange of teachers. The clearing house continued to issue, during 1950, the quarterly bulletin on fundamental education, fundamental education abstracts and a series of occasional papers on education. In addition, the following monographs on fundamental education were issued: "Fundamental Education: A Description and Programme"; "Co-operatives and Fundamental Education", and the "Mexican Cultural Mission Programme".

⁴ See pp. 641.

b. EXTENSION OF EDUCATION

Under this heading falls UNESCO's work in fundamental education. The pilot project in Haiti which, after being launched in 1948, encountered difficulties owing to local causes, developed satisfactorily in 1950. The Marbial Valley now possesses schools and a clinic; illustrated teaching books in the Creole language have been produced; hillsides have been terraced and a sisal crop, which provides raw material for a local industry, has been sown.

Another pilot project, the audio-visual field experiment at Pehpei, China, was suspended owing to circumstances outside the organization's control. This project was undertaken in co-operation with the Chinese Mass Education Movement. In 1950 useful results were obtained in the form of filmstrips, cartoons and posters.

The system of associated projects in fundamental education developed notably during the year. Under this system, a limited number of schemes of a type likely to be of interest to other countries is selected on the proposal of Governments concerned, and UNESCO gives advice and technical help and receives regular reports and documentation, which it publicizes.

At the end of 1950 preparations were completed for the opening of a training and production centre for fundamental education at Patzcuaro, Mexico. The project was jointly organized by the Government of Mexico, the Organization of American States and UNESCO. The first group of students was scheduled to arrive in the spring of 1951. Three other specialized agencies were taking part in this work: ILO, FAO and WHO.

In the field of adult education, a seminar was held at Kreutzstein, Austria, in June and July. Topics under discussion were the administrative problems in adult education, training of adult students and methods and techniques of education in the arts. An expert committee, meeting at UNESCO headquarters in December, decided to concentrate this work on the education of industrial workers.

UNESCO prepared a preliminary study for the United Nations Commission on the Status of Women on the problem of educational opportunities for women in various countries, and was requested by the Commission to continue its inquiries, with emphasis on methods for improving the social status of women in under-developed regions through fundamental and adult education, and on the professional education of women.

During 1950 UNESCO's work on behalf of children was concentrated on the education of maladjusted children. The programme in future will be directed towards the general needs of children, with emphasis on the relationships between education and mental health, physical health and social and technical change. The promotion of international understanding at the pre-school and early school ages will be stressed.

c. EDUCATION FOR INTERNATIONAL UNDERSTANDING

Four seminars, all centering in the idea of mutual understanding, took place in 1950: in Canada, on the teaching of geography; in Belgium, on the improvement of school textbooks; in Sweden, on the role of public libraries in adult education; and at Montevideo, under the auspices of the Organization of American States and the Government of Uruguay, on the inter-relationship between primary and fundamental education.

As a direct result of the seminar held in Belgium, ten of the leading textbook publishers in that country agreed to revise or improve their history texts in line with UNESCO recommendations that more emphasis be placed on cultural and social questions. In November, a meeting of Belgian history teachers agreed to form an association for history textbooks: agreement was reached for exchange of textbooks between Belgium, France, Germany, the Netherlands and the United Kingdom.

Three seminars on teaching about the United Nations and specialized agencies were organized by the World Federation of United Nations Associations with UNESCO's assistance, and held in the early part of the year in Cuba, Iran and France.

UNESCO started a new project in 1950 in response to a request to the specialized agencies from the Economic and Social Council "to assist in developing . . . the fullest possible understanding . . . of the action of the United Nations in Korea".⁵ Special efforts were made to develop the teaching of the principles of collective security. Work was begun on the preparation of wall charts, illustrating how the United Nations system works as regards collective security, and three series of educational brochures on the same subject were planned for publication in 1951.

2. Natural Sciences

a. DEVELOPMENT OF SCIENTIFIC CO-OPERATION

The International Council of Scientific Unions received UNESCO grants-in-aid amounting to $190,000 for distribution to the various Unions under its aegis. Financial help was also given to the Council for the Co-ordination of International Congresses of Medical Sciences. This grant enabled 22 congresses to meet and aided ten to publish their proceedings.

These two organizations facilitate contacts and co-ordinate activities in the fields of pure science and of the medical sciences. At a conference in October 1950, the creation of a Union of International Engineering Organizations to perform similar functions in the applied sciences was agreed upon by delegates from 21 international organizations.

The work already begun on science abstracting was furthered by the creation of a network of national committees which published a number of studies in association with UNESCO. Of particular interest is the series entitled "Inventories of Apparatus and Materials for Science Teaching", the first volume of which describes the curricula and equipment required for teaching science in primary, secondary and vocational schools.

The Field Science Offices have continued their work of promoting the exchange of scientific information. They organized lecture tours by scientists visiting their areas and were responsible for a number of publications, including, in particular, lists of scientific papers published within their respective regions, and lists of institutions and scientists.

b. ASSISTANCE TO RESEARCH

The creation and encouragement of international research laboratories, the subject of the Economic and Social Council Resolution 318(XI),⁶ was carried a stage further in 1950. In December, a meeting of experts revised the plans to adapt them to the Council resolution and agreed on the work to be started. Particular attention is to be paid to the creation of an International Computation Centre. A Turkish mathematician joined the UNESCO staff to take charge of the project and Governments were invited to designate experts in applied mathematics to serve as corresponding consultants.

As regards Arid Zone Research, action was taken on Economic and Social Council resolution 324 D (XI).⁷ An International Arid Zone Research Council met in Paris in November and decided to establish an Advisory Committee on Arid Zone Research to work out UNESCO's research programme and proposals to be submitted to other national and international organizations concerned with the scientific problems which must be solved if the desert areas are to be put to economic use.

c. TEACHING AND POPULARIZATION OF SCIENCE

A travelling science exhibition, built in Boston, was opened at Lima, in September. It visited two cities in Ecuador and also was seen at Havana in conjunction with the first Regional Conference of National Commissions.

In September, representatives of associations for the advancement of science from fourteen countries met in Paris and adopted a number of plans for the reciprocal rise of facilities, better contacts with the Press, and free exchange of publications.

The science club movement was further expanded and new clubs were formed in Austria, France, India and Pakistan. Associations of scientific writers were created in Austria, Denmark and France.

Discussions on the scientific theme "Food and People" were pursued in 1950 and plans for a second theme—"Energy in the Service of Man"—were put into operation. Publication of the quarterly, Impact of Science on Society, was continued, and work was begun on the publication, in collaboration with the Oxford University Press, of a series of handbooks for science teachers. Nine reports were issued on the role of science and general education, each dealing with a particular branch of science.

⁶ See pp. 638-39.

⁷ See p. 640.

3. Social Sciences

a. AID TO INTERNATIONAL SCIENTIFIC CO-OPERATION

Since the field of social sciences is far less organized than that of the natural sciences, UNESCO's first effort is to foster international contacts by the creation of international associations in the various disciplines. In the absence of a body corresponding to the International Council of Scientific Unions in the natural sciences, UNESCO must also act as a liaison organ between these various associations. The following were the principal events in this context.

The International Sociological, Political Science and Economic Associations, which UNESCO had been working for some years to set up, successfully held their first congresses. A preparatory committee of the International Committee of Comparative Law met in London in July. Nine national bodies indicated their wish to form part of the permanent international body.

A Co-ordinating Committee for Social Science Documentation was created in November to assist the newer international associations to publish their findings. In particular, a survey of the teaching of the social sciences in a number of countries is to be undertaken. Discussions took place in December on the creation of international social science institutes with particular reference to Economic and Social Council Resolution 318 (XI) on this subject.

A series of lectureships was organized for countries in which the social sciences have not reached an advanced stage of evolution, to stimulate the creation of local social science associations and to acquaint local social scientists with the latest developments. Such missions were sent to Pakistan, Indonesia and to several countries in Latin America.

Publication of the International Social Science Bulletin has continued, each issue concentrating on a general theme, such as "The Social Sciences in Italy". A major publication, completed after three years' work, was Contemporary Political Science, a survey of methods, research and teaching in 23 countries and areas.

b. STUDIES OF SOCIAL TENSIONS

Concrete studies of practical problems were begun in 1950. A study of social tensions in India was initiated in September under the direction of a United States expert and with the help of Indian universities and students. Six teams investigated various areas and a preliminary report has been written, outlining the problems and recommending further action. As a first step in connexion with the inquiry into the impact of technology upon cultural life and social attitudes, "factory studies" have been made in six European countries. These studies will be issued in a general report which examines the influence of management in promoting a sense of community in a labour force. Meanwhile the International African Institute began an inquiry into the most appropriate methods for introducing modern technology in non-industrialized regions in Africa. UNESCO also studied population questions, in particular, problems affecting cultural assimilation of immigrants into new and frequently under-developed societies. A meeting was held in Paris in July, together with several members of the United Nations Population Commission, to guide UNESCO on the inquiries it might fruitfully undertake.

During 1950, special attention was paid to the problem of racial discrimination, in response to Economic and Social Council resolution 116 B (VI). The short Statement on Race drafted by experts in December 1949 was later amended by distinguished scientists and published in July. This document was welcomed in innumerable editorials and press articles. Certain parts of the Statement, especially those dealing with physical anthropology and genetics, will be re-examined in more detail in 1951.

c. STUDIES OF INTERNATIONAL CO-OPERATION

Certain specific studies of the actual functioning of international co-operation were undertaken. The study of the technique of international conferences, launched in 1949, resulted in a meeting held in New York in May to consider the reports of the conference observers who had followed the work of a number of international gatherings in the preceding months. Observers armed with the conclusions of this meeting followed the work of the International Federation for Mental Health in the summer and a further scrutiny of results took place in New York in October.

Fourteen reports on national administrative structure and arrangements for ensuring the countries' participation in international activities were received from the International Institute of Administrative Sciences. These have been analysed and a general report is to be issued.

4. Cultural Activities

a. DEVELOPMENT OF INTERNATIONAL CO-OPERATION

There are already well-organized bodies in some arts and cultural disciplines, but in others there is a complete absence of contacts across frontiers. UNESCO's task has therefore been to fill gaps and to improve the mechanisms by which thinkers and artists may enrich their knowledge through the interchange of ideas and experience.

The International Council for Philosophy and Humanistic Studies, set up in 1949, has grown in stature. It now numbers ten learned international bodies in its membership. Meetings held in 1950, with UNESCO's assistance, included the following: Ninth International Congress of Historical Sciences, First International Congress of Classical Studies, Fourth International Congress on the History of Religions and the Silver Jubilee of the Indian Philosophers' Congress. As a result of these meetings, a considerable number of publications and bibliographies in the field of philosophy and the humanities were issued during the year.

The International Theatre Institute now comprises 26 national theatre centres. The Third International Theatre Congress was held in Paris in June; a new topic introduced on that occasion concerned theatre architecture. The International Theatre Institute now issues, in addition to a monthly bulletin, an illustrated quarterly, World Theatre.

The International Music Council incorporates seven international societies, and a network of national committees is being established. Attention was given in 1950 to the encouragement of young composers, both by grants from the International Music Fund and by public performances organized at Unesco House, the organization's headquarters, in collaboration with the Radio-diffusion Française. Information concerning good quality recordings of Western and Eastern music and of folk music was supplied: a catalogue of Chopins recorded works was published, to be followed by one for J. S. Bach and another for traditional Indian music.

The International Council of Museums which dates from 1946, now has 37 national committees. It held its second Biennial Conference in London in July. Subsidiary meetings were held during the year on such subjects as lighting in museums and the treatment of oil paintings. The Council also undertook investigations on exhibition techniques, and an inquiry was launched to determine the possibility of adopting an international standard in the matter of travelling exhibitions of original works. The quarterly Museum continued to be published.

In November, a Conference was held in Paris on the improvement of bibliographical services, which marked the culmination of preparatory work spread over several years. With financial assistance from UNESCO, the first International Congress of Archivists was held in August and the International Council on Archives held its constituent Assembly at Unesco House.

b. PROTECTION OF CREATIVE WORK AND ITS AUTHORS

To a questionnaire on the timeliness of a universal copyright convention, addressed to member States in January, 41 Governments replied in a favourable sense; only three were doubtful or negative. An expert conference met at Washington in October to examine the replies of Governments and the secretariat's proposals for the future stages of this project. The Conference was unanimous as to the practicability of a Universal Copyright Convention, and plans were laid for work in 1951. The result of the work and surveys concerning copyright, together with a bibliography and other documentary material, were published in the four issues of the Copyright Bulletin brought out during the year.

In the archeological field, efforts were made to ensure the preservation of ancient monuments and works of art for posterity. This work has many aspects: the preservation of monuments and works of art in times of armed conflict, the building up of collections of microfilm reproductions of the most representative and most vulnerable works, the technique of preservation itself, the cost of maintenance and of excavation and the possibility of instituting a tourist tax to defray these costs.

A Draft Convention for the Protection of Cultural Treasures in the event of war and draft regulations for its execution were transmitted to Member States in March. Submitted by the Mexican Government, the scheme for the introduction of a special tourist tax to be used for the preservation of museums and monuments was studied and a report circulated to member States in December. With the assistance of the International Council of Museums, a preliminary scheme has been prepared for the establishment of a number of international repositories in which microfilm reproductions might be assembled.

c. DISSEMINATION OF CULTURE

As a sequel to the Catalogue of Fine Colour Reproductions of Contemporary Paintings, a second catalogue, Masterpieces of Paintings Prior to 1860, was published in July. This catalogue contains a list of 418 reproductions selected by an international committee. In May, UNESCO also published an International Directory of Photographic Archives of Works of Art containing information about 1,225 photographic collections belonging to 67 different countries.

The travelling exhibitions of reproductions of modern paintings visited fifteen countries and a number of dependent territories; they were displayed in museums, schools and workers' institutions. Five sets were purchased for permanent display in Australia, Brazil, Egypt and the United Kingdom.

A new album of very fine colour reproductions of Raphael's frescoes was printed at the end of the year by the Vatican authorities. It is similar to an album previously published, of Masaccio's frescoes.

Steps were taken to carry out a scheme under the title of "Crusade for Museums". The purpose of this undertaking is to make all teachers aware of the resources available in all types of museums as an aid to teaching, to determine how far museums can play a part in school syllabuses and how the educational influences of museums may be extended.

In the field of letters, the first volume of the revived Index Translationum was published in June. It gives bibliographical details of 8,570 translations published in 26 countries.

The project for the translation of the classics, recommended by the Economic and Social Council in 1947, advanced a step further after protracted preparation. Works by Al Ghazali will appear in English, French and Spanish, and a work by Avicenna in French. Works by Aristotle, Descartes, Shakespeare and Cervantes are being translated into Arabic. An anthology of Mexican poetry in English and French translation was completed.

Two major publications in 1950 were Freedom and Culture, a collection of essays on those human rights which are of particular interest to UNESCO; and Democracy in a World of Tensions, a series of papers on the modern concept of democracy.

An international seminar on the role of libraries in adult education was held at Malmo, Sweden, during July and August; 45 participants from 21 countries took part. The seminar dealt with three topics: the principles of adult education work in libraries; audio-visual materials and the various methods employed by libraries; and the part played by libraries in fundamental education in under-developed areas. A report on the meeting will be published as the fourth volume in UNESCO's collection of public library manuals.

The international clearing house for publications has continued its activities. Seventy-five lists of publications available for free distribution were published. The Bulletin for Libraries, editions of which run to 8,000 copies, was published regularly in French and English.

During 1950, an International Commission of nine eminent scholars was constituted to take charge of the preparation of a scientific and cultural history of mankind. The Commission held its first meeting in December and drew up a list of 80 corresponding members to participate in the drafting of the work. A period of five years is envisaged for the completion of the task.

5. Exchange of Persons

To encourage the exchange of persons, UNESCO publishes an annual volume, Study Abroad, which outlines fellowships and scholarships for study, research, training and observation abroad: 1950 saw the issue of the third edition of this publication, containing information on over 30,000 scholarships and fellowships awarded by international and national authorities and private institutions. A Vacation Study Supplement, published in the spring, contains information on some 500 vacation courses, study tours, seminars, work camps and holiday centres in 37 countries and territories.

As regards direct administration of fellowships, UNESCO offered 46 fellowships during 1950, including four United Nations-UNESCO fellowships which were awarded to educators from Brazil, Canada, India and Norway in pursuance of Economic and Social Council resolutions 203 (VIII) and 314 (XI).⁸ In addition, 30 UNESCO-sponsored fellowships were awarded, the donor countries being France, the Netherlands and the United States. In these cases UNESCO provides no finances but the subject of study is selected from topics proposed by UNESCO.

⁸ See Y.U.N., 1948-49, p. 662, and the present vol., pp. 636-37.

A third area of activities in the exchange of persons programme seeks to encourage group travel schemes of an educational character designed for particular categories: teachers, adult workers and youth groups. Activities in this area consisted of a meeting of experts on the international exchange of teachers, held in July, at which a number of recommendations were made on the promotion of programmes for the interchange of teachers between countries, non-permanent appointments abroad, the reduction of obstacles impeding the movement of teaching personnel and the recruitment of advanced specialized staff for less developed areas of the world. In addition, UNESCO conducted inquiries on the movement of young persons across frontiers for educational purposes: much information was collected on the situation in 75 different countries regarding passport, visa and frontier formalities, currency regulations and reduced fares for young people travelling in groups. A manual on this subject will be published in 1951. Lastly, attention was given to workers' educational exchange programmes. A meeting of experts was jointly convened by ILO and UNESCO in February, and its recommendations were circulated to 2,500 workers' and employers' organizations in member States.

6. Mass Communication

a. IMPROVEMENT OF THE MEANS AND TECHNIQUES OF INFORMATION

UNESCO has set up an Information Clearing House to deal with all the problems concerning mass communication, including professional and technical training and the techniques and influence of the Press, radio and film. In this connexion, exact information was collected by field surveys. These surveys were started in 1947, and Volume IV appeared at the end of 1950. A total of 44 countries and territories are surveyed in this volume, bringing the total up to 87. Supplements were also issued to keep the early volumes up to date, and a card index has been formed to make this a permanent service. It is already being used by governments, professional bodies and individuals, and by specialized agencies and other international organs. In addition to these general surveys, a number of technical pamphlets were issued in 1950, such as "The Problem of Newsprint and Other Printing Matter", "Education by Radio—School Broadcasting" and "The Use of Mobile Cinema and Radio Vans in Fundamental Education".

The project for establishing an International Institute of the Press and Information, recommended by Economic and Social Council resolution 241 M (IX),⁹ was given renewed approval by the General Conference, which invited the Director-General to consult national organizations and institutions and international professional organizations on the proposal.

To permit less advanced countries to profit by the technical experience of others, expert missions are sent to train specialists in mass communication techniques. Two such missions were dispatched to Turkey in 1950. One was to introduce the use of audio-visual materials in schools, and consequently the Turkish Education Ministry decided to establish a visual aid centre in Ankara. The second was a two-man radio mission sent to organize courses in Ankara for the training of sound engineers and programme directors.

In 1950 UNESCO began a highly specialized technical service with the aim of promoting the unification of braille script throughout the world. A conference met in Paris in March to define the various problems and formulate recommendations.

b. REDUCTION OF OBSTACLES TO THE FREE FLOW OF INFORMATION

Progress in the field of mass communication requires the reduction and, if possible, the removal of certain obstacles. Means of overcoming them must be investigated and adequate measures recommended to member States. After lengthy preparation, UNESCO began the publication of studies designed to focus public attention on the present world obstacles to the flow of information. The first such study, World Communication, a popular graphic assessment of Press, radio and film facilities throughout the world, was published in May. Advance copies of two further studies, Trade Barriers to Knowledge and Newsreels Across the World, were submitted in May to the Montevideo session of the United Nations Sub-Commission on Freedom of Information and of the Press. Close collaboration with this body has continued.

An Agreement on the Importation of Educational, Scientific and Cultural Materials was adopted by the General Conference at Florence and was open for signature at United Nations Headquarters on 22 November. By the end of 1950 it had been signed by 22 countries. The preceding ⁹ See Y.U.N., 1948-49, p. 572.

Agreement on Visual and Auditory Materials had been signed by eighteen countries by the end of 1950 and ratified by four: Canada, Norway, Pakistan and Yugoslavia.

A series of eleven recommendations adopted by the General Conference was submitted to member States in 1950. Reports indicated that Bolivia, Canada and Colombia have already altered their tariff regulations to facilitate the entry of publications, educational films and recordings. Eight other countries have reduced postal charges on publications sent abroad or have indicated their willingness to extend the scheme initiated by the Universal Postal Union, under which readers are enabled to subscribe to foreign newspapers and periodicals through payments in their own national currency at local post offices.

Mixed working parties were established with the regional economic commissions of the Economic and Social Council to increase the availability of educational and scientific material in countries poorly equipped in this respect, by encouraging production and exchanges.

c. ACTION THROUGH PRESS, FILM AND RADIO

UNESCO enlists the support of national Press, film and radio organizations to assist the United Nations and specialized agencies by creating a broader public understanding of their problems and the work being undertaken. Accordingly, directors and producers are encouraged, through discussion and the supply of background material, to take due account of the services to be rendered to world understanding in the fields of education, science and culture. Material for immediate use is also supplied to information outlets.

In 1950 the weekly radio script, "Unesco World Review", was issued in three languages to 106 countries or territories, and returns showed that this material was used by a large majority of the broadcast organizations which received it. The UNESCO broadcasting studio in Paris dispatched over 400 programmes in 26 languages. A bi-monthly service for the Press, "Unesco Features", continued to be published in three languages and was sent regularly to some 3,000 newspapers and periodicals in 55 countries or territories. Evidence has shown that this material was used by publications reaching some thirty million readers. The monthly Courier was published in English (30,000 copies), French (20,000), and Spanish (13,000).

Agreements with film companies resulted in an increasing number of news features being produced on such subjects as the unification of braille, the Haiti Pilot Project and emergency schools for Arab refugee children. Numerous discussions took place with cinema producers on the possibility of making full-length feature films on appropriate topics.

During the year a large volume of publicity material was issued in UNESCO's regular output on the subject of human rights, and member States were encouraged to celebrate the commemorative day of 10 December. Six filmstrips on this subject were produced and made available to National Commissions and a Human Rights Exhibition Album, containing 110 photographic plates describing various phases of the world struggle to attain these rights, was published.

7. Relief Assistance Services

In the immediate post-war years, UNESCO had undertaken, largely with the help of voluntary organizations, to remedy the effects of war devastation in the educational, cultural and scientific fields. From this general effort, UNESCO moved, in 1950, to a more selective, specific and technical form of assistance. The procedure now is to obtain precise information on definite and limited needs present among groups of war victims or in under-developed areas, and on the basis of this information to mobilize the exact assistance needed. In this connexion, representatives of eighteen countries in which voluntary funds had been raised in the past met during the General Conference to discuss plans and campaigns and agree on priorities among needs, such as adult education and illiteracy, scientific material for universities, and audio-visual aids to education. TICER (the Temporary International Council for Educational Reconstruction) was dissolved in 1950, in view of this new approach to reconstruction problems.

As in past years, a small part of this relief work is paid out of UNESCO's own budget, and the bulk from such voluntary means as can be mobilized.

The educational needs of Palestinian Arab refugee children in the Arab countries of the Middle East continued to be a major care of UNESCO, acting in close co-operation with the United Nations Relief and Work Agency (UNRWA). A UNESCO official was attached to UNRWA to assure liaison and an agreement was signed in August to govern the relations between the two organizations. During 1950 the number of schools rose from 39 to 96, distributed over the Gaza area, Jordan, Lebanon and Syria. School buildings or tents were improved, furniture provided—often made by the pupils themselves—and scholastic material purchased by UNESCO and also donated by several member States.

A sum of $182,000 was set aside as an emergency relief fund from UNESCO's own budget. This sum was allocated to meet strictly technical needs such as equipment for science teaching, books, paper for textbooks, library and museum equipment. Apart from the schools in the Middle East, which were allocated $63,000, the beneficiary countries were Austria, Burma, China, Czechoslovakia, Ecuador, France, Greece, Hungary, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, the Philippines, Poland and Yugoslavia.

As regards Korea, following the Economic and Social Council resolution 323(XI),¹⁰ the Executive Board of UNESCO instructed the Director-General to relieve the needs of the civilian population in Korea within the fields of education, science and culture, by means of emergency relief, and at the appropriate time by reconstruction projects. The Director-General was also authorized to send a mission to Korea, upon the request of the Secretary-General of the United Nations, to investigate the needs in Korea; to provide educational supplies on an emergency basis, and to prepare a campaign for educational, scientific and cultural relief and reconstruction, in co-operation with National Commissions and voluntary organizations. In addition, the Executive Board decided to establish a special relief fund in the amount of $100,000.

The "Coupon Scheme", launched in 1948, continued to develop in 1950. Originally limited to books, the scheme was extended to include films and scientific material, and by the end of the year the number of countries participating had grown from eleven to 21. Coupons to the value of $684,682 were issued, bringing the total number of coupons brought into circulation since the inception of the scheme to $973,857.

8. Technical Assistance

On 1 October 1950, UNESCO put into operation the first part of its technical assistance programme for economic development in under-developed countries. By the end of the year twelve countries had signed agreements to receive assistance under this programme: Ceylon, Ecuador, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Lebanon, Liberia, Libya, Mexico, Pakistan and Thailand.

This UNESCO programme is financed by the broad United Nations scheme of Technical Assistance for Under-Developed Areas, which calls for an expenditure of $20,000,000 up to the end of 1951. Of this sum, UNESCO's share is 14 per cent, or $2,300,000.

D. BUDGET

The fifth session of the UNESCO General Conference, meeting in May and June 1950, approved a budget in the amount of $8,300,000 to carry out the programme of activities during 1951, as follows:

BUDGET (1951)
PART I. General Policy	$ 235,219
PART II. General-Administration	1,035,745
PART III. Programme operations and Services:
Education	$1,113,556
Natural sciences	857,439
Social sciences	414,824
Cultural activities	856,023
Exchange of persons	305,707
Mass communications	978,129
Relief assistance services ..	333,870
External relations service ..	647,205
Documents and publications service	787,796

Statistical service	$62,271	$6,356,820
PART IV. Common Service
Costs		672,216
		$8,300,000
Deduct savings due to institution of local salary system and other changes in salary and allowance system		100,000
TOTAL APPROPRIATIONS ...		$8,200,000

Contributions to the budget are made by members of UNESCO according to the scale adopted for the administrative budget of the United Nations, with adjustments to provide for the difference in membership of the two organizations. The scale of contributions for 1951, as approved for 59 member States of UNESCO by the fifth session of the General Conference in 1950, is given in the table on the next page.

IV. The International Civil Aviation Organization (ICAO)¹

Representatives of 52 States attending the International Civil Aviation Conference, which met in Chicago from 1 November to 7 December 1944, at the invitation of the Government of the United States, adopted a Convention providing for the establishment of the International Civil Aviation Organization (ICAO).² The Conference also drew up an Interim Agreement providing for a Provisional International Civil Aviation Organization (PICAO) to operate until the formal establishment of the permanent organization. PICAO came into being on 6 June 1945, after 26 States had adhered to the Interim Agreement. ICAO came formally into existence on 4 April 1947, 30 days after the Convention on International Civil Aviation had been ratified by the required 26 States. The Convention superseded, as between contracting States, the provisions of two earlier agreements: the Paris Convention of 1919 establishing the International Commission for Air Navigation, and the Pan-American Convention on Commercial Aviation, drawn up in Havana in 1928.

An Agreement establishing the relationship between the United Nations and ICAO came into force on 13 May 1947 with its approval by the Assembly of ICAO.³ The Agreement, negotiated by PICAO, had previously been approved by the United Nations General Assembly on 14 December 1946.

From 15 August 1945, when the PICAO Interim Council met for the first time, until the formal establishment of ICAO, the provisional organization secured concerted action from its members to provide and maintain the facilities and services necessary for air transport across national borders. Patterns for meteorological services, traffic control, communications, radio beacons and ranges, search and rescue organizations and other facilities required for safe international flight were developed. Much of PICAO's work involved the drafting of recommendations for standards, practices and procedures, designed to ensure the safety, regularity and efficiency of international air transport. One of the most important activities of the permanent organization in the technical field was the review of these recommendations with a view to the adoption by the ICAO Council of international standards and recommended practices to regulate civil aviation in member States. By the end of 1949 ten sets of standards⁴ and recommended practices⁵ had been approved by the Council. Six of these, for Personnel Licensing, Rules of the Air, Meteorological Codes, Aeronautical Charts, Dimensional Units to Be Used in Air-Ground Communications, and Airworthiness of Aircraft, came into force during 1949 as, respectively, Annexes 1, 2, 3, 4, 5 and 8 to the Convention.

As required by article 38 of the Convention, contracting States notified ICAO of the differences between their national regulations or practices and the international standards contained in the annexes adopted by the Council. The differences filed were communicated to all contracting States and their implications were studied by ICAO's Air Navigation Commission.

As a result of work begun in 1948 at the request of ITU, the Council, in June 1949, approved a Draft Frequency Allotment Plan for the allocation of aeronautical frequencies to the international services of contracting States.

PICAO and, later, ICAO held regional air navigation meetings to examine the air navigation requirements and specify particular procedures to ¹ For further information concerning the origin and early activities of PICAO and ICAO, see Y.U.N., 1946-47, pp. 723-45; 1947-48, pp. 855-63; 1948-49, pp. 1024-32. See also Memorandum on ICAO, 1 May 1951; reports of the Council to the Assembly on the activities of the organization; ICAO budget estimates, 1950; and the ICAO Monthly Bulletin, July 1947 et seq.

⁵ A recommended practice, by definition of the first Assembly, is "any specification for physical characteristics, configuration, material, performance, personnel or procedure, the uniform application of which is recognized as desirable in the interest of safety, regularity or efficiency of international air navigation, and to which Member States will endeavor to conform in accordance with the Convention".

be followed in each region of the world in which a particular type of flying operation predominates. There are ten such regions. By 31 December 1949, air navigation meetings had been held in all regions and had examined the existing facilities for airports, navigational aids, communications, air traffic control, meteorology, operations of search and rescue, and determined what additional facilities and operating procedures were required to make flying in their respective regions safer, more economical and more regular.

In accordance with a proposal by the first regional air navigation meeting for the North Atlantic, ten member States of ICAO, attending a special conference in September 1946, agreed to maintain thirteen ocean weather stations at specified points in the North Atlantic. A subsequent meeting in May 1949 renewed this agreement, but reduced the number of ocean stations to ten.

ICAO arranged for the co-operative maintenance of other air transport, navigation and meteorological facilities required by aircraft flying over sparsely populated regions or regions of uncertain sovereignty. By agreements concluded in May 1947 and on 16 September 1948, respectively, ICAO arranged for the joint maintenance, through the financial support or technical assistance of member States whose airlines used the facilities, of a Loran (long-range radio aid to navigation) station at Vik, Iceland, and of weather reporting and forecasting stations, area traffic control and telecommunication networks, also located in Iceland. The May 1949 meeting also provided for the joint financing of a Loran station in the Faeroes Islands and of meteorological stations and communications facilities in Greenland.

The principal achievement of ICAO in the legal field up to 1950 was the adoption by the Assembly of a Convention on the International Recognition of Rights in Aircraft, opened for signature on 19 June 1948.

In addition to the above activities, ICAO began a number of long-term studies related to air transport and air navigation, as directed by various sessions of the Assembly.

A. PURPOSES AND FUNCTIONS

The Convention on International Civil Aviation, according to its preamble, lays down "certain principles and arrangements in order that international civil aviation may be developed in a safe and orderly manner and that international air transport services may be established on the basis of equality of opportunity and operated soundly and economically".

The aims and objectives of ICAO, as stated in article 44 of the Convention, are:

... to develop the principles and techniques of international air navigation and to foster the planning and development of international air transport so as to:

(a) Insure the safe and orderly growth of international civil aviation throughout the world;

(b) Encourage the arts of aircraft design and operation for peaceful purposes;

(c) Encourage the development of airways, airports, and air navigation facilities for international civil aviation;

(d) Meet the needs of the peoples of the world for safe, regular, efficient and economical air transport;

(e) Prevent economic waste caused by unreasonable competition;

(f) Insure that the rights of contracting States are fully respected and that every contracting State has a fair opportunity to operate international airlines;

(g) Avoid discrimination between contracting States;

(h) Promote safety of flight in international air navigation;

(i) Promote generally the development of all aspects of international civil aeronautics.

B. ORGANIZATION

The governing bodies of ICAO are the Assembly and the Council.

The Assembly, comprising representatives of member States, is convened by the Council and meets annually. The Assembly determines its own rules of procedure and is responsible for the financial arrangements of the organization, including the approval of an annual budget. It examines and takes action on matters referred to it by the Council and may, at its discretion, refer to the Council specific matters for the consideration of the latter body. Finally, the Assembly deals with such other matters as come within the sphere of action of the organization but are not specifically assigned to the Council.

Each member State is entitled to one vote in the Assembly. Decisions of the Assembly and the Council are made, with few exceptions, by a simple majority of the votes cast. Exceptions include adoption by the Assembly of amendments to the Convention, and the adoption by the Council of international standards and recommended practices regulating air navigation, both of which require a two-thirds majority vote.

Members may be admitted into the organization, provided they are signatories to the Convention. Members of the United Nations or Allied States or States which remained neutral during the Second World War, by notifying adherence or depositing an instrument of ratification of the Convention. Former Axis States, to become members of ICAO, require an affirmative four-fifths vote by the ICAO Assembly, the assent of any State invaded or attacked by the State seeking admission, and approval by the General Assembly of the United Nations.

The Council, which meets in virtually continuous session, is the executive body of the organization and derives its powers and authority from the Assembly and from the Convention itself. It is composed of 21 member States elected by the Assembly for a period of three years. In electing these States, the Assembly must give adequate representation to: (1) those member States of major importance in air transport; (2) those member States not otherwise included which make the largest contribution to the provision of facilities for international civil air navigation; and (3) those member States not otherwise included, the election of which will ensure that all major geographical areas of the world are represented. The Council creates standards for international air navigation and collects, examines and publishes information concerning air navigation. It administers the finances of the organization and carries out the directives of the Assembly. It may conduct research into all aspects of air transport and air navigation which are of international importance. The Council is empowered by the Convention to act as an arbiter between two or more members of ICAO in any dispute concerning the interpretation or application of the Convention and its Annexes. The first Assembly further authorized the Council to act, when expressly requested by all the parties concerned, as an arbitral body in any dispute arising among members relating to international civil aviation.

Among other duties, the Council is charged with providing for the establishment of subsidiary bodies and with supervising and co-ordinating their work. Three main bodies have been established: the Air Navigation Commission, the Air Transport Committee and the Legal Committee. The Air Navigation Commission assigns its technical work to the following divisions: Aerodromes, Air Routes and Ground Aids; Aeronautical Information Services; Accident Investigation; Airworthiness; Aeronautical Telecommunications; Aeronautical Maps and Charts; Meteorology; Operating Practices; Personnel Licensing; Rules of the Air and Air Traffic Control; and Search and Rescue. The Air Transport Committee is assisted by the Facilitation of Air Transport Division and the Statistics Division. Two additional committees, the Committee on Joint Support of Air Navigation Services and the Finance Committee, are composed of representatives elected by the Council from its own members.

The Council elects its President and appoints the Secretary-General of ICAO. The President of the Council convenes and presides at meetings of the Council and acts as its permanent representative. The Secretary-General is the chief executive officer of the organization. He is responsible to the Council for carrying out duties assigned to him by that body.

The organization maintains five offices in the field to deal with the regional aspects of international civil aviation, particularly with air navigation problems: the North American Office, in Montreal; the European and African Office, in Paris; the South American Office, in Lima; the Middle East Office, in Cairo; and the Far East and Pacific Office, in Melbourne.

C. ACTIVITIES DURING 1950

During 1950 the fourth session of the ICAO Assembly was held in Montreal from 30 May to 20 June. This session elected twenty member States to membership on the ICAO Council for a three-year term and the newly elected Council re-elected Dr. Edward Warner as Council President for the same term.

By 31 December 1950 the membership of the organization had increased to 58 with the addition of Indonesia and Iran. The Nationalist Government of China, in 1950, notified its withdrawal, effective 31 May 1951, one year from receipt of the notification, as provided in the Convention. The United Nations General Assembly revoked its decision on the participation by the Franco Government of Spain in the work of the specialized agencies, and Spain again began to participate fully in the work of ICAO.

ICAO began in 1950 to participate in the United Nations Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance for Economic Development. Technical assistance in civil aviation is designed to prepare the way for improved transportation within a country; to facilitate the movement of persons and goods on international routes, thus making possible increased national participation in international commerce; and to train nationals of the assisted countries in new skills. By the end of the year ICAO had received requests for technical assistance from fifteen States. These requests covered a wide range. Some sought ICAO participation in comprehensive United Nations missions concerned with a State's general economy. Others asked for the provision of: fellowships to aid in training persons for the many types of specialized skill and knowledge required in civil aviation; technical advice in the building of airports; the organization of civil aviation administrations and the operation of air transportation; and missions to assist in actual training in requesting countries.

ICAO had already taken action on several of these requests by the end of 1950. It decided to provide assistance to five States, as follows: for Colombia, an expert on civil aviation to advise the Government on general civil aviation policy and its implementation, as well as on specific policy and programmes relating to air transport and on economic problems; for Nicaragua, four fellowships on administration and regulation of civil aviation, control tower operations, and airline flight inspection procedures; for Thailand, an expert on civil aviation to assist the Civil Aviation Board of Thailand in general civil aviation planning and policy, and two fellowships for advanced flying training; for Indonesia, one senior technical expert; and for Iran, two aeronautical meteorologists.

Activities of the organization during 1950 in the air navigation, air transport, joint support and legal fields are summarized below.

1. Air Navigation Questions

Among the technical matters dealt with by ICAO during 1950, the further development of Standards, Recommended Practices and Procedures has continued to occupy a prominent place.

Standards and recommended practices, adopted in 1949, for Operation of Aircraft: Scheduled International Air Services and for Aeronautical Telecommunications, came into force, respectively, on 1 January and 1 April 1950, as Annexes 6 and 10 to the Convention. Amendments 2 to 22 to Annex 4—Standards and Recommended Practices for Aeronautical Charts—also adopted in 1949, came into force on 1 September 1950. In connexion with Annex 4, ICAO published, during 1950, two issues of a new series of annual reports on the progress of contracting States in producing aeronautical charts according to the ICAO Standards (Aeronautical Charts, Production Progress Report—Nos. 1 and 2).

Two new Annexes were adopted by the Council in 1950:

Annex 11—Standards and Recommended Practices for Air Traffic Services—adopted 18 May, became effective on 1 October, for implementation on 1 June 1951;

Annex 12—Standards and Recommended Practices for Search and Rescue—adopted 25 May, became effective on 1 December, for implementation on 1 March 1951.

Drafts of two further annexes, proposing standards and recommended practices for accident investigation and for aerodromes, air routes and ground aids, were circulated to contracting States for comment prior to adoption by the Council.

The scope of three existing Annexes were substantially expanded and improved by the adoption of amendments resulting from recommendations made by the Air Navigation Commission and its Divisions.

One hundred and twenty-three amendments to Annex 1 (Standards and Recommended Practices for Personnel Licensing) were adopted by the Council on 22 March and became effective on 1 September 1950. Those representing new Standards for licences of the senior commercial pilot, the private glider pilot, the free-balloon pilot, and the aircraft maintenance engineer (aircraft maintenance mechanic) Class I, were scheduled to be implemented on 1 April 1951; those representing amendments to the existing Standards, and new Standards for the specifications for personnel licences in Chapter 5 of the Annex were to be implemented on 1 October 1951. At the time these amendments were adopted, the Council referred to the Air Navigation Commission for further study the questions of the right of a private pilot to receive remuneration for his flying and of the privileges of the commercial pilot. As a result of this study six additional amendments, numbered 124—129, were submitted by the Commission and adopted by the Council on 27 June, became effective on 1 December, and, it was provided, would come into force on 1 October 1951.

To promote the uniform application of Annex I, the Council authorized the publication of Parts I (General) and III (Commercial Pilot Licence) of an ICAO Training Manual for the information and guidance of contracting States. Together, Parts I and III provide a training guide for the commercial pilot licence. It was decided that other parts, each of which will deal with one specific licence in detail, should be published as they become available.

Sixty-three amendments to Annex 8 (Standards and Recommended Practices for Airworthiness of Aircraft) were adopted on 26 June, to become effective on 1 January 1951, and to be implemented on 1 February 1951.

On 5 December, 127 amendments to Annex 6 were adopted, to become effective on 1 June 1951, unless disapproved in the meantime by a majority of contracting States, and to be implemented on 1 October 1951.

The organization recognized that the introduction of jet airlines on the world's airways would seriously affect some of the ICAO Standards, and would, among other things, affect aerodrome design, construction and equipment. A secretariat study of the problem was issued to contracting States, as authorized by the Council, in ICAO Circular 17—The Effect of Turbine-Powered Civil Aircraft on the Design, Construction and Equipment of Land Aerodromes.

During 1950 substantial progress was reported in the various regions in the provision of air navigation facilities and services and in the implementation of approved procedures, but in certain parts of the world serious deficiencies still existed because of economic difficulties and the lack of trained personnel. It was hoped that correction of the latter condition would be accelerated through the United Nations Technical Assistance Programme.

Two full-scale regional air navigation meetings were held (Second Caribbean in Havana from 11 April to 2 May; Second Middle East in Istanbul from 2 to 17 October). Divisional meetings for Meteorology and Rules of the Air and Air Traffic Control were also held, together with a number of special meetings of more limited scope—on climb requirements, fixed telecommunications services, regional frequency assignment planning and regional meteorological procedures.

2. Air Transport Questions

In response to a request from the Universal Postal Union, the Council approved a comprehensive statement of ICAO's views on certain economic aspects of international air mail. This statement discusses the cost of carrying air mail and the principles of categorizing air mail services, as requested by UPU, and also the general level of air mail transportation charges and the principles according to which such charges should be set. Attached to the statement were statistical tables, with explanatory notes, presenting selected operating and financial statistics for 1947, 1948 and part of 1949 relevant to the transportation of air mail.

Another major task undertaken by ICAO in the air transport field during 1950 was a study of the commercial rights conferred by articles 5 and 6 of the Convention, giving priority to the definition of a "scheduled international air service" referred to in these articles. The Air Transport Committee, in November, reached agreement on the necessity for expressing in this definition the concept of regularity, a fixed route identified by the places served, operation for remuneration and the concept that a scheduled international air service is one that is operated for the public and is a transport service. The secretariat was instructed to incorporate these elements in a draft definition and to prepare an accompanying commentary to guide Governments in construing and applying the definition.

Standards and Recommended Practices for the Facilitation of International Air Transport, adopted in 1949 as Annex 9 to the Convention, came into force on 1 March 1950, and ICAO indicated that, on the basis of information received, about two thirds of its member States were implementing the Annex with only minor deviations. In other member States progress was slower, but there was evidence that the Annex was being carefully studied. In this connexion it was noted by ICAO that the obstacles in the way of the facilitation programme differed greatly in different parts of the world, ease of implementation being directly related to the flexibility of the customs, immigration, public health and other regulations of any given country. The Assembly in June adopted a resolution which, among other things, urged contracting States to impress upon the interested departments of their Governments the importance of making national laws and practices conform to the provisions of Annex 9, and called their attention to the successful results achieved by some States through the creation of Facilitation Committees to co-ordinate efforts to implement the facilitation standards. By the end of 1950 eight contracting States had notified ICAO that they had established such Committees.

The statistical work programme of ICAO was further expanded during 1950. ICAO continued to be responsible for collecting all air transport statistics from States able to make such data available. It published six Statistical Summaries during 1950: No. 8, giving traffic statistics received up to June 1949, and No. 10, giving statistics received up to 30 June 1950, including data covering approximately 90 per cent of the world's scheduled air transport operations; No. 9, including profit and loss statements for 35 airlines in eighteen contracting States; No. 11, containing data for 1948 on aircraft fleets and personnel; and Nos. 12 and 13, giving data on taxes and subsidies for 1947 and for 1948, respectively.

In connexion with its special study of burdensome insurance requirements, the Council recommended to contracting States a course of action which would obviate the possibility that persons engaged in international aircraft operation might have to insure the same risks more than once.

Work also continued during the year on the following air transport subjects: multiple discriminatory and unfairly burdensome taxation; problems of registration and certification arising from the delivery of aircraft by air; compilation of statistics of international air transport economics and air navigation facilities; international ownership and operation of international air services on trunk routes; and commercial rights for scheduled air services.

3. Joint Support Questions

During 1950, the activities of the organization in this field were confined almost entirely to the administration of the three North Atlantic joint financing arrangements and the continuance of studies initiated in previous years. One long-standing project—the attempt to arrange for the international financing of the rehabilitation of the Ellinikon Airport and meteorological services in Greece—was abandoned upon the Greek Government's withdrawal of its request.

The agreement on North Atlantic ocean weather stations, concluded in London on 12 May 1949, came into effect on 13 January 1950. Under this agreement, six States (Canada, France, Netherlands, Norway, the United Kingdom and the United States) participate in the operation of 25 weather ships, maintaining continuous patrol on ten stations carefully located to give the best possible service to aircraft flying the regular trans-Atlantic routes, and six more States (Belgium, Denmark, Sweden, Switzerland, Ireland and Portugal) contribute toward their cost. All ten of the stations were in operation throughout the year, performing the services required under the agreement to the complete satisfaction of the airlines using them. The value of these stations is recognized to be primarily meteorological, affording aircraft engaged in trans-Atlantic operations essential information regarding wind and weather conditions which will permit them minimum fuel consumption and maximum payload level. The stations also provide search and rescue services and afford substantial benefits to shipping, to the fishing industry, to agriculture and to other non-aviation activities dependent upon weather forecasts for their planning.

On 1 December, as a result of a bilateral agreement concluded on 25 June, the United States assumed entire responsibility for the operation of Station B off the coast of Labrador at 56° 30' N, 51° 00' W, while Canada took over the operation of a station in the North Pacific at 58° 00' N, 145° 00' W. Despite the tragic loss on 17 September of the ocean weather ship Laplace, which hit a floating mine and blew up, killing many of her crew, the French Government managed to carry out fully its obligations in respect of the operation of Station K at 45° 00' N, 16° 00' W.

Old-type transmitters at the Loran station at Vik, Iceland, were replaced in May 1950 by the new type of equipment. Operation of the Vik Loran station and of the air traffic control, communications, and meteorological services in Iceland continued during the year and new equipment was installed where required.

Arrangements made for the financing and operation of air navigation services in Greenland and the Faeroe Islands continued to work satisfactorily during the year, and arrangements were made for the provision of new buildings in several of the outlying meteorological stations in Greenland.

4. Legal Questions

The ICAO Legal Committee, at its fifth session in January 1950, prepared a draft convention on damage caused by aircraft to third parties on the surface, to replace the Rome Convention of 1933. After alteration by the Assembly, the text as revised was referred back to the Legal Committee for further study in 1951. Meanwhile, the revised text was circulated to contracting States, which were asked to communicate their proposals not later than 1 November 1950.

In June, the Legal Committee decided to give priority, after the completion of the above draft convention, to its other studies in the following order: liability for damage from aerial collision, revision of the Warsaw Convention (relating to the liability of carriers to passengers, cargo and baggage), legal status of aircraft and legal status of the aircraft commander.

During 1950, two nations—Iran and Australia—signed the Convention on the International Recognition of Rights in Aircraft adopted by the Assembly in 1948, bringing the total number of signatories to 26. The Government of Mexico deposited its instrument of ratification on 5 April, with a reservation to the effect that the priorities referred to in the Convention should be subject, within Mexican territory, to the priorities accorded by Mexican laws to fiscal claims and claims arising out of work contracts. Article XX of the Convention provides that as soon as two of the signatory States have deposited their instruments of ratification, it will come into force between them on the ninetieth day after the deposit of the second instrument. It should therefore have come into force between Mexico and the United States, the first State to ratify, on 4 July, but the latter Government notified the organization on 1 July that it found the Mexican reservation unacceptable.

5. Publications

During 1950, ICAO continued to compile and issue the following publications, in addition to those mentioned above: proceedings of the Council and the Assembly; reports of the Air Navigation Commission and the Air Transport Committee; minutes and documents of the Legal Committee; reports of ICAO divisional meetings; Procedures for Air Navigation Services; Supplementary Procedures (for regions); regional manuals; regional charts; ICAO Circulars, each of which covers a technical aviation study; and the ICAO Monthly Bulletin, containing a review of the organization's current activities. ICAO also issued, among other publications, Tables of Agreements and Arrangements Registered with the Organization from 1 January 1946 to 31 December 1949 and Proposals for the Detailed Specifications of the ICAO Standard Atmosphere and Extreme Atmospheres, formulated jointly by ICAO and the International Meteorological Organization (IMO).

Most of these publications appear in English, French and Spanish. The ICAO Monthly Bulletin, as well as a complete summary of the aims, history and the work of the organization, entitled Memorandum on ICAO, are available free of charge on request, in these three languages.

D. BUDGET

A budget of $2,810,607 (Canadian) for the calendar year 1950 was approved by the third Assembly of ICAO, held in Montreal from 7 to 20 June 1949. The fourth Assembly of ICAO approved a budget of $2,812,000 (Canadian) for the calendar year 1951 as follows:

PART I.	Meetings	$ 100,000
PART II.	The secretariat	2,210,000
PART III.	General services	550,000
PART IV.	Equipment .	55,000
PART V.	Other budgetary provisions	85,000
		3,000,000
	Less: Casual revenue	188,000
		$2,812,000

In apportioning the expenses of ICAO among member States, the Assembly takes into consideration their relative capacity to pay, relative interest in international civil aviation and the war damage suffered. It follows the principle that in no case should contributions fall below a minimum or exceed a maximum percentage of the total budget. The fourth Assembly, with the agreement of the States concerned, fixed the scale of contributions for the 1951 budget as below.

Between sessions of the Assembly, the Council, on the recommendation of its Finance Committee, fixes the amount of contribution of any new member brought into the organization during that period, and the Council may increase the budget of the organization to the extent of that contribution.

V. The World Health Organization (WHO)¹

The Constitution providing for the establishment of a World Health Organization (WHO)² was adopted on 22 July 1946 by the International Health Conference, called for the purpose by the Economic and Social Council. There were 64 States, the Allied Control Authorities for Germany, Japan and Korea, respectively, and ten international organizations represented at the Conference, which met in New York from 19 June to 22 July 1946.

An Interim Commission, established by the Conference, held its first meeting on 19 July 1946 and for almost two years carried out preparatory work for the permanent World Health Organization, at the same time continuing the functions of former international organizations and rendering assistance in the solution of urgent health problems.

The permanent World Health Organization came officially into being on 7 April 1948, when 26 Members of the United Nations had accepted its Constitution. The Interim Commission continued to function, however, until 31 August 1948, when it was dissolved in accordance with a resolution of the first World Health Assembly. WHO itself assumed the functions and assets of the Interim Commission and began operating on 1 September.

Among the decisions of the first Health Assembly, held in Geneva from 24 June to 24 July 1948, was the approval, on 10 July, of the agreement establishing WHO's relationship with the United Nations. This action brought the agreement into force, since it had previously been approved by the United Nations General Assembly.³

Beginning in 1948, the activities of the Interim Commission and of WHO placed particular emphasis on active measures against three major diseases—malaria, tuberculosis and venereal diseases. In the field, for example, an anti-malaria campaign in Greece was outstandingly successful; consultants on malaria were provided to Governments; technical advice was given to UNICEF for the equipment, supplies and technique needed in various countries for malaria control operations; various institutes of malariology were assisted either with scientific equipment or by the sending of expert lecturers; malaria control demonstration teams were established, seven being in operation at the end of 1949; joint projects were undertaken with FAO to increase world food production and raise standards of health in malaria-infested districts.

In tuberculosis control WHO gave technical guidance to the mass immunization programme (the Joint Enterprise) which was being carried out by UNICEF and the Danish Red Cross with its Scandinavian associates. In February 1949 it established a Tuberculosis Research Office at Copenhagen. It gave advice and assistance in tuberculosis control to China, Greece, Egypt, Turkey, Italy and Poland, and undertook surveys in various countries.

In collaboration with UNICEF, WHO undertook an extensive campaign to help Governments carry out anti-venereal disease programmes; WHO provided advisers, short-term consultants, medical literature and fellowships.

WHO collaborated with UNICEF on projects for improving maternal and child health services and with FAO in steps to improve nutrition. During 1949 it gave technical assistance for improving sanitation, for example in the refugee camps in Syria, Jordan and Lebanon, and began assisting Governments in public health administration. Other activities begun in 1949 included assistance to Governments in developing methods and techniques for health education of the public and in the training of nurses.

Work was also undertaken in the field of health statistics, while the epidemiological services were developed. Other continuing tasks included work on biological standardization and the unification of pharmacopoeias. Many of these essential services were inherited from previous international organizations and were further expanded. Responsibility for the administration and revision of the sanitary conventions previously applied by the Office international d'hygiène publique (OIHP) in Paris was also assumed.

A. PURPOSES AND FUNCTIONS

The objective of WHO, as stated in article 1 of its Constitution, is "the attainment by all peoples of the highest possible level of health". The preamble defines health as "a state of complete physical, mental and social well-being and not merely the absence of disease or infirmity".

The functions of the organization necessary to attain this objective are enumerated in article 2 as follows:

- (a) To act as the directing and co-ordinating authority on international health work;
- (b) To establish and maintain effective collaboration with the United Nations, specialized agencies, governmental health administrations, professional groups and such other organizations as may be deemed appropriate;
- (c) To assist Governments, upon request, in strengthening health services;
- (d) To furnish appropriate technical assistance and, in emergencies, necessary aid upon the request or acceptance of Governments;
- (e) To provide or assist in providing upon the request of the United Nations, health services and facilities to special groups, such as the peoples of Trust Territories;
- (f) To establish and maintain such administrative and technical services as may be required, including epidemiological and statistical services;
- (g) To stimulate and advance work to eradicate epidemic, endemic and other diseases;
- (h) To promote, in co-operation with other specialized agencies where necessary, the prevention of accidental injuries;
- (i) To promote, in co-operation with other specialized agencies where necessary, the improvement of nutrition, housing, sanitation, recreation, economic or working conditions and other aspects of environmental hygiene;
- (j) To promote co-operation among scientific and professional groups which contribute to the advancement of health;
- (k) To propose conventions, agreements and regulations, and make recommendations with respect to international health matters and to perform such duties as may be assigned thereby to the Organization and are consistent with its objective;
- (l) To promote maternal and child health and welfare and to foster the ability to live harmoniously in a changing total environment;
- (m) To foster activities in the field of mental health, especially those affecting the harmony of human relations;
- (n) To promote and conduct research in the field of health;
- (o) To promote improved standards of teaching and training in the health, medical and related professions;
- (p) To study and report on, in co-operation with other specialized agencies where necessary, administrative and social techniques affecting public health and medical care from preventive and curative points of view, including hospital services and social security;
- (q) To provide information, counsel and assistance in the field of health;
- (r) To assist in developing an informed public opinion among all peoples on matters of health;
- (s) To establish and revise as necessary international nomenclatures of diseases, of causes of death and of public health practices;
- (t) To standardize diagnostic procedures as necessary;
- (u) To develop, establish and promote international standards with respect to food, biological, pharmaceutical and similar products;
- (v) Generally to take all necessary action to attain the objective of the Organization.

B. ORGANIZATION

The main organs of WHO, as provided in its Constitution, are the World Health Assembly, the Executive Board and the secretariat.

The World Health Assembly, in which all members may be represented, meets at least once annually. It determines the policies of WHO. It reviews the work of WHO and instructs the Executive Board in regard to matters upon which action, study, investigation or report may be considered desirable. Among its other duties the Assembly is empowered to adopt regulations pertaining to international quarantine and sanitary measures, uniform standards and nomenclatures, and various other questions of international importance in the health field.

New members may be admitted into WHO, if they are Members of the United Nations, by accepting the Constitution. For other States to become members, the approval of their membership applications by a simple majority vote of the Health Assembly is required. The Constitution also provides that territories or groups of territories not responsible for the conduct of their international relations may be admitted as associate members by the Health Assembly upon application by the appropriate authority.

Decisions of WHO on important questions, such as the adoption of conventions or agreements, the approval of agreements bringing WHO into relationship with other international organizations, and amendments to the Constitution, require a two-thirds majority of the members present and voting. Decisions on other questions are taken by a simple majority vote.

The Executive Board consists of eighteen technically qualified persons designated by eighteen member States elected by the Health Assembly. In their election, the Assembly takes into account an equitable geographical distribution. Members are normally elected for a three-year term, and meetings of the Board are held at least twice a year. Its chief function is to implement decisions and policies of the Assembly, but it may also take emergency measures within the functions and financial resources of WHO in order to deal with urgent situations, such as epidemics.

The secretariat is headed by a Director-General, appointed by the Assembly on the nomination of the Executive Board. The Director-General appoints the technical and administrative staff required and supervises its work.

Panels composed of experts have been established to further the work of WHO in special fields. The experts making up these panels may be asked for technical advice by correspondence, and from the panels appropriate specialists are drawn for each session of various expert committees, for which membership varies according to the agenda of the session. Expert Committees on the following subjects met during 1950: Antibiotics, Biological Standardization, Drugs Liable to Produce Addiction, Health Statistics, Insecticides, International Epidemiology and Quarantine, Malaria, Mental Health, Nursing, Prematurity (Expert Group), Professional and Technical Education of Medical and Auxiliary Personnel, Rabies, School Health Services, Tuberculosis, Unification of Pharmacopoeias, Venereal Infections and Treponematoses, Occupational Health (Joint Expert Committee with ILO), African Rickettsioses (Joint Study-Group with the Office international d'hygiène publique), Brucellosis (Joint Expert Panel with FAO), Zoonoses (Joint Expert Group with FAO).

Regional organizations have been or are being established to serve the special needs of six regions throughout the world as delineated by the World Health Assembly. By the end of 1950 regional offices were in existence for the Americas (Washington, Pan American Sanitary Bureau), the Eastern Mediterranean (Alexandria), South East Asia (New Delhi), and the Western Pacific (Hong Kong, temporary location). In addition, special offices for Africa and Europe are located in Geneva, pending the establishment of regional organizations for these regions.

G. ACTIVITIES DURING 1950

During 1950 the membership of the World Health Organization was increased to 74⁴ by the addition of six States—Cambodia, Cuba, Indonesia, Laos, Nicaragua and Vietnam. In addition, Southern Rhodesia became WHO's first associate member. Romania on 20 February, Albania on 25 February, Czechoslovakia on 14 April, the Nationalist Government of China on 7 May, Hungary on 19 May, and Poland on 15 August notified WHO of their withdrawal from the organization.

The third World Health Assembly was held from 8 to 27 May, and the Executive Board held its fifth session from 16 January to 2 February and its sixth session from 1 to 9 June 1950.

Among the decisions taken by the third World Health Assembly were the following:

The Executive Secretary was asked to report to the next Assembly on the arrangements that would be needed if it were decided to replace the annual conference by a biennial conference. After lengthy discussions as to whether the members of the Executive Board, rather than persons designated as "technically qualified in the field of health" should be representatives of member States, the Assembly decided to maintain the present status of the Board.

The Assembly noted the measures decided on by the Office international d'hygiène publique for the winding up of its activities; the library and archives of the Office were transferred to WHO on 15 November 1950.

The Assembly approved a long-term programme covering 1952 to 1955 to serve as a framework for annual programmes and decided that the following should be the criteria for selecting activities: international feasibility and acceptability, universal nature of the problem, possibility of assessing progress and results, financial feasibility, availability of qualified personnel "traditional" international services, and co-operative services.

⁴ This total includes ten States which had, by the end of 1950, notified their withdrawal. See list of members p. 944.

Increased emphasis in WHO regular programmes, as approved by the Assembly, was placed on leprosy, plague, cholera and influenza.

In addition to its regular programmes WHO, as authorized by the third Health Assembly, took part in the United Nations Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance for Economic Development. By 31 December 1950, a total of 32 countries had requested assistance from WHO under this programme.

WHO participated in a consultative mission to Indonesia, in a mission to Turkey, in surveys in El Salvador, Liberia, Libya and Egypt. At the end of the year WHO was collaborating with FAO in joint surveys of areas for food production and Malaria control, and with UNESCO in fundamental education projects.

At the request of the United Nations, WHO also assisted with three special projects:

- (1) the work of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East (UNRWAPRNE);
- 2) relief and rehabilitation of the civilian population in Korea; and
- 3) a general investigation of conditions in Libya.

A brief outline of the work of the organization in 1950, carried out in accordance with the decisions of the Health Assembly and Executive Board, given below.

1. Control of Communicable Diseases

a. MALARIA

At the end of the year, nine WHO demonstration programmes in malaria control were in operation. Four were in different parts of India, and one each in Afghanistan, Pakistan, Thailand, Cambodia and Vietnam.

In addition to these nine projects, an advisory unit was maintained in the Eastern Mediterranean area to supervise the malaria programme conducted among the Palestine refugees receiving assistance under UNRWAPRNE.

During the year, many countries requested consultants to assist with malaria problems and to lecture at national malaria institutes. A consultant as assigned to Ceylon, for example, to advise on the practicability of attempting vector species eradication in that country; another went to the South-East Asia Region and lectured at the Malaria Institute of India.

A Malaria Conference, sponsored jointly by the Commission for Technical Co-operation in Africa

South of the Sahara and WHO, was held in Kampala, Uganda, from 27 November to 9 December. This conference, at which problems associated with malaria in Africa were considered, was attended by experts from all the territories in equatorial and southern Africa where malaria is a major public-health problem and by members of the WHO Expert Committee on Malaria.

In close association with its work on malaria, WHO acted as a clearing house for information on insecticides, their formulations, and the equipment necessary for applying them.

b. TUBERCULOSIS

A working party under the auspices of UNICEF and WHO, with experts from ten countries, met in Paris in February 1950 and compared results in the treatment of tuberculous meningitis by streptomycin. It adopted general recommendations for current treatment of tuberculous meningitis in children and concerning its detection at an early stage; it recommended the combined use of streptomycin and other antibiotics.

An expert group under the joint sponsorship of WHO and FAO met in Geneva in December to study measures for the control of bovine tuberculosis and other animal diseases communicable to man.

Demonstration and training centres in tuberculosis control were established in Turkey and in El Salvador and detailed plans were made, in most cases in collaboration with UNICEF, for the establishment of other centres in Burma, Ecuador, India, Iran, Pakistan, the Philippines and Thailand. A laboratory for BCG ("Bacillus Calmette Guérin") research was set up in Mexico.

A survey of the tuberculosis situation in French Somaliland was carried out, and assistance in tuberculosis nursing was continued during most of the year in China.

In Europe, WHO gave advice on the organization of nursing services to Greece, on BCG vaccination to Ireland, and, in collaboration with UNICEF, on streptomycin therapy or the use of X-ray and laboratory supplies, provided by UNICEF, to other European countries. X-ray equipment was sent to Monaco.

As for BCG vaccination, the Joint Enterprise, with which WHO co-operated in an advisory capacity, accomplished a vast amount of work in tuberculin-testing and in BCG vaccination in Europe, North Africa, the Eastern Mediterranean, parts of Asia and, more recently, in Central America. As the Scandinavian Co-ordination Committee had decided to terminate its responsibilities in the BCG campaign, the third World Health Assembly, in May 1950, authorized the negotiation of an agreement with UNICEF for the integration of the BCG vaccination programme administered by the Joint Enterprise with the relevant WHO services.

Seventeen fellowships in tuberculosis were granted during the year.

In connexion with the BCG vaccination programme, WHO also extended the scientific and investigative work of its special Tuberculosis Research Office in Copenhagen.

The office itself administered pilot stations—usually established in co-operation with local Governments or tuberculosis offices—in Austria, Egypt, Finland, Iceland and India.

During the year work proceeded with the Joint Enterprise, and the compilation of statistics received from many countries concerning the BCG campaign was kept up to date as far as possible, and in some cases published.

As of 31 October 1950, preliminary data received from countries where the campaign had been completed or was still in progress indicated that a total of 31,362,299 persons had been tested and 14,182,207 vaccinated. Approximately 55 per cent of the detailed statistics on testing and 61 per cent of those on vaccination during the campaign were received by the end of the year.

A sampling survey of post-vaccination allergy was set up in Greece.

A programme, of a pilot nature, to evaluate the effect of the mass BCG vaccinations was set up in Finland, and an office was established in Helsinki to make a national roster of the tuberculin-tested and vaccinated during the Finnish campaign, which was completed during 1948-49.

In Denmark, in the spring of 1950, the Danish Tuberculosis Mass Campaign was begun, with a programme of tuberculin testing and BCG vaccination of all persons in the country (except in Copenhagen), between the ages of one to six and fifteen to thirty-four. WHO agreed to assist in the setting up of a national roster for the collection and analysis of statistical data from this campaign.

The Research Office has also carried out a series of studies on BCG vaccine with the Joint Enterprise and the Statens Seruminstitut, Copenhagen.

c. VENEREAL DISEASES AND TREPONEMATOSES

During 1950, WHO continued, consolidated and expanded its activities relating to the control of syphilis and other treponematoses.

The WHO venereal-disease demonstration team, with headquarters in Simla (Himachal Pradesh), India, was in its second year of operation. Other countries of the region (Afghanistan, Burma, Ceylon, Indonesia, Thailand) have also sent specialists to Simla to attend the training courses given by the team.

In the Eastern Mediterranean, pending the Egyptian Government's signing of the agreement concerning the venereal-disease demonstration team at Tanta, the staff attached to this project performed useful services with UNRWAPRNE among the Palestine refugees.

In collaboration with UNICEF, large-scale projects in treponematoses control were started in Haiti, Indonesia, Iraq and Thailand. A control programme was begun in Ecuador; and a co-operative project in maternal and child health and venereal-disease control was started in Afghanistan. Additional experts were appointed to the team in Iraq for the purpose of studying the nature of the disease called bejel.

In Europe, WHO/UNICEF control campaigns were continued. WHO also continued activities in Italy and Greece for the suppression of prenatal and congenital syphilis. It carried out clinical and laboratory demonstrations on penicillin therapy and the use of cardiolipin antigens for serodiagnosis in several university medical centres in Europe and the Eastern Mediterranean Region.

A notable achievement was the establishment in the United States of the International Treponematoses Laboratory Centre (in the School of Hygiene and Public Health of the Johns Hopkins University, Baltimore).

Exchange of scientific information regarding recent advances in the control of venereal diseases was furthered by international symposia held in Helsinki and in Paris.

d. OTHER COMMUNICABLE DISEASES

Expert committees have met to study methods of combating other communicable diseases; studies have been undertaken, research centres established and aided, field studies organized and fellowships awarded. When requested by Governments, consultants have been sent or control activities started. The diseases for which this type of work have been carried out are: plague, cholera, typhus and other rickettsioses, yellow fever, other parasitic and virus diseases, childhood diseases, trachoma, leprosy, and zoonoses, including brucellosis and rabies.

2. Public Health Administration

During 1950, WHO regional advisers and consultants on public-health administration visited many countries. In the Americas, advice on hospital facilities and projects was given in Costa Rica and Surinam; in the African region, a consultant was sent to Liberia for three months; in Europe, consultants went to Luxembourg and Finland. Surveys were made of the public-health services in Lebanon and Syria.

WHO provided a medical director for the health administration of UNRWAPRNE and recruited medical officers and public-health workers for the teams sent by the United Nations for emergency work in Korea.

A three-day conference sponsored by WHO was held in Ceylon at the end of September and was attended by 30 directors of health services from Afghanistan, Burma, Ceylon, India, Indonesia, seventeen Indian States, French India, Portuguese India and Thailand. It considered the development of health services in the region, and emphasized that the greatest obstacles to improvement of health in that area were the shortage of trained personnel and the shortage of supplies and equipment.

Work was also begun on special aspects of public-health administration. For example, WHO's Expert Committee on School Health Services, which met at Geneva from 7 to 12 August, defined basic principles for provision of health care for school-age children. It considered that school services should include provision for: medical supervision and dental hygiene, communicable disease control, nutrition, mental health and health education.

A short-term consultant made a survey of the needs of dental health services in Sweden, Yugoslavia, Egypt and Iran.

3. Environmental Sanitation

Certain experts qualified in general sanitation have been included among the members of WHO's malaria demonstration teams, and their services used for work in sanitation as well as on malaria control in Afghanistan, the Malnad area of India, Pakistan and Thailand. Sanitary engineers were also recruited towards the end of the year for each of the five relief teams attached to the United Nations forces in Korea.

WHO, in co-operation with the Netherlands and the International Health Division of the Rockefeller Foundation, sponsored a seminar, held at The Hague from 27 November to 2 December 1950, for European sanitary engineers, attended by representatives from 15 countries.

The seminar discussed engineering problems and their relation to public health. Special attention was given to the subject of the training and utilization of sanitary engineers.

WHO also provided a grant to the National Institute for Research in Dairying (attached to Reading University) in England to assist it in preparing a brochure on the health aspects of milk sanitation.

Advice on field work was given during two visits made in the year—one to Liberia for discussions with the public-health authorities on future sanitation programmes, the other to Egypt and to refugee camps in Jordan, Syria and Lebanon. As a result of these visits, the services of a full-time sanitary engineer were made available to UNRWAPRNE in the refugee area, on a reimbursable basis, and a consultant was sent to Liberia.

4. Healthy Development of the Child

In 1950, WHO's first demonstration team in maternal and child health, which had gone to India in October 1949, finished its "reconnaissance" phase, and was broadened, with UNICEF assistance, into a combined rural and urban health training centre for workers in maternal and child-health. In the Philippines, a combined UNICEF/WHO training project was started to demonstrate maternal and child health services in a rural area. Similar demonstration and teaching projects were being undertaken in Pakistan, as well as in Afghanistan, as referred to above. During 1949-50, WHO co-operated with UNICEF in over a hundred health projects for the benefit of mothers and children.

Paediatricians were appointed to work with teams on other specialized subjects, such as those on venereal diseases in Indonesia and Rangoon, and on nursing in the Western Pacific.

A group of experts meeting in Geneva from 17 to 21 April 1950 emphasized the need for organizing and encouraging appropriate action with regard to prematurity and for collecting data on the various aspects of the problem. They outlined various preventive measures to reduce the incidence of premature births and measures for the special care of premature infants. Educational and research programmes on the subject were suggested.

A centre of information on prematurity was established at headquarters. In several European countries projects of premature baby care were worked out and implemented jointly with UNICEF.

In February, IRO requested technical advice on the health of children in camps for displaced persons in various countries. A team of five experts from WHO studied the problem and made appropriate recommendations.

In July, Zurich, Switzerland, acted as host to the Sixth International Congress of Paediatrics, at which WHO helped to present a co-operative exhibition on "Social Paediatrics throughout the World". After the congress, a seminar on social paediatrics was held in Geneva under the joint auspices of WHO and the International Congress of Paediatrics.

Technical advice was also given on the development of the Children's Centre in Paris, which was established by the French Government in co-operation with UNICEF and WHO.⁵

Twenty-three fellowships in maternal and child health were awarded during the year, seven in gynaecology and obstetrics, seven in the organization of maternal and child health services, eight in paediatrics and one in school hygiene.

5. Mental Health

The Expert Committee on Mental Health held its second session from 11 to 16 September 1950 in Geneva.

During 1950 this Committee's sub-committee on alcoholism also met, set out principles for developing facilities for the prevention and early treatment of alcoholism by public-health services and put forward recommendations on the way in which WHO could assist in this work.

For the United Nations programme for the welfare of homeless children, a WHO consultant made an extensive study of existing knowledge on the nature of psychological damage caused by the separation of the infant and young child from the mother.

WHO also contributed to the United Nations programme for the prevention of crime and the treatment of offenders, by reviewing and reporting on the existing knowledge and practice on the psychiatric aspects of juvenile delinquency. Both of the above reports have been published in the WHO Bulletin.

A third contribution to the United Nations programmes was in connexion with rehabilitation;

a study of psychiatric rehabilitation was made by WHO and a report was in the process of preparation at the end of 1950.

Several Governments, during the year, requested expert advice on such subjects as the role of psychiatry in industry, child guidance and juvenile delinquency. Consultants were sent, notably, to Finland, Ireland, Italy, Norway, the Philippines, Sweden and Yugoslavia.

Seven fellowships in mental health and psychiatry were awarded during the year.

6. Social and Occupational Health

In co-operation with ILO, WHO set up a Joint Expert Committee on Occupational Health, which met in August and September 1950. The committee reviewed the common areas of activity of ILO and WHO.

WHO also continued to co-operate with ILO in work on the hygiene of professional groups and the improvement of living conditions of workers, in particular, in implementing the recommendations made by the Joint Committee on the Hygiene of Seafarers.

In 1950 one fellowship in occupational medicine and five in physical rehabilitation were granted.

7. Nutrition

WHO supplied a consultant to Ceylon to report on the incidence of endemic goitre on that island and to indicate any factors other than deficiency of iodine that might be associated with it. A survey of endemic goitre was made in Brazil, Colombia, Ecuador, Guatemala and Mexico, and the report was presented at the Nutrition Conference organized by FAO in Rio de Janeiro in June, in which WHO took an active part.

Assistance in nutrition was also given to several national health administrations. An expert from WHO and one from FAO made extensive surveys in Egypt, furnished a joint report to the Egyptian Government and also helped that Government to conduct a three-months' course in nutrition for the countries of the Eastern Mediterranean Region. A survey was also made in the Eastern Mediterranean area by a WHO expert sent to areas in Palestine and Lebanon, to study the nutritional status of the Arab refugees.

At the request of the Government of Yugoslavia, WHO began to assist in creating a nutrition institute at Zagreb. It assisted the Government of India in establishing a training course for hospital dietitians by providing the services of an experienced hospital dietitian, who worked with the dietitian at the Calcutta Medical College Hospital in organizing this course. WHO also provided two short-term lecturers to the Institute of Nutrition of Central America and Panama.

To stimulate enquiries into the epidemiology of kwashiorkor (malignant malnutrition), a WHO consultant, with a member of the staff of FAO, made a survey of the incidence, clinical characteristics and the various ecological factors of this condition in Africa.

Of great importance during the year were the Infant Metabolism Seminars organized by WHO in Leyden from 15 to 30 October and in Stockholm from 1 to 15 November. They were attended by representatives from the host countries and from Belgium, Denmark, Finland, France, Norway and the United States, as well as WHO staff members. Paediatricians, physiologists, biochemists, isotope research physicists, internists, endocrinologists, obstetricians, ophthalmologists and nutritionists participated in the seminars. The subjects discussed fell roughly under three main headings: new methods and techniques; subjects of mutual interest in which participants were already actively engaged; and fields of study which had not yet engaged the intensive attention of the scientists of one or more of the countries represented.

8. Health Education of the Public

WHO assisted in a survey of health education in Sweden, and plans were made for giving similar assistance to other countries in 1951. Full-time health educators were assigned to the demonstration project in venereal-disease control in Simla, India, and to the joint WHO/UNICEF teacher-training demonstration begun in Sarawak in 1949.

WHO added a full-time health educator to the team assigned to the UNESCO/WHO project in fundamental education in Haiti and assigned a short-term consultant in health education to a UNESCO team conducting a survey of fundamental education needs in the Arab States.

Other joint activities of WHO and UNESCO included participation in the International Seminar on Methods and Techniques of Adult Education held in Austria during June and July, and representation at the International Conference on Public Education sponsored by the International Bureau of Education in co-operation with UNESCO.

WHO awarded one fellowship in health education during the year.

9. Nursing

WHO's Expert Committee on Nursing held its first session in February in Geneva. It stressed the necessity for studying the real health needs of people in various communities and the nursing services required to meet them, and made a study of the problems of nursing education.

A pilot study of the types of community workers employed in national health services was planned. A committee on the subject met at the end of the year, with representatives of France, the United Kingdom, WHO, the Rockefeller Foundation and the United Nations Department of Social Affairs.

Public health nurses continued to work with the malaria control demonstration teams in India, Pakistan and Thailand.

In the Western Pacific, teams of nurses were assigned to teaching centres and hospitals in connexion with WHO/UNICEF projects in Brunei, Sarawak, Malaya and North Borneo, where they helped to establish facilities for training nurses, midwives and other auxiliary workers.

WHO assisted the Netherlands Government and the Institute of Preventive Medicine at Leyden in organizing a two-weeks working conference for public-health nurses, held at Noordwyck in October and attended by 43 public-health nurses from ten countries. Twenty-seven nurses were granted short-term fellowships to enable them to attend this conference and six short-term fellowships were granted for a conference on the psychology of hospitalization, organized at the Cassel Hospital in London.

Twelve fellowships in nursing were also awarded during the year.

10. Improved Standards of Teaching and Training

The first session of the Expert Committee on Professional and Technical Education of Medical and Auxiliary Personnel was held at Geneva from 6 to 10 February 1950. Among other things it expressed the view that medical curricula should be revised to give more emphasis to preventive and social aspects of medicine and health; considered that basic public health training as well as training in specialties should be given and that a high priority should be given to the training of teaching personnel. It decided that WHO's role in the matter should be to stimulate and co-ordinate the work of Governments and international agencies.

During 1950, WHO helped to strengthen facilities for teaching and training by (1) providing direct assistance in organizing training courses and seminars and stressing the training aspects of other WHO activities; (2) awarding and administering an increasing number of fellowships and (3) providing medical literature and teaching equipment.

a. TRAINING COURSES

Examples of assistance to governments for the training of personnel included:

- (1) The holding of short discussion groups and symposia, jointly sponsored by WHO and the Governments concerned, e.g. on child health (India) and on nutrition (Egypt).
- (2) The provision of long courses at special demonstration centres, such as those in tuberculosis in Turkey and in anaesthesiology (Copenhagen).
- (3) The sending of demonstration teams in special subjects, e.g. on congenital heart diseases (to Austria and Yugoslavia) and on thoracic surgery (to Israel and Turkey).
- (4) The establishment, with UNICEF, of demonstration and training projects with chief emphasis on maternal and child health, e.g. in Afghanistan (combined with the control of venereal diseases).
- (5) The provision of consultants, who made surveys and lecture tours, gave lectures at courses in national institutes, and advised on the organization of training, for example in India, Afghanistan and Finland.
- (6) The use of field demonstration teams for training.
- (7) The encouragement, through UNESCO and the Council for the Co-ordination of International Congresses of Medical Sciences, of the organization of courses in conjunction with international congresses on social paediatrics (the International Congress of Paediatrics) and on cancer (the Congress of the International Union against Cancer) and of symposia on the geographic pathology of cancer and the biology of muscles.
- (8) The participation in courses sponsored by other organizations.
- (9) The provision of technical assistance or grants to universities, training schools and other institutes to help them to organize, strengthen or extend their courses.

b. FELLOWSHIPS

During the year, fellowships were provided for group-training courses, seminars, symposia and study-groups. For these, WHO established special fellowships lasting not more than 30 days, which could be awarded quickly and with the minimum administrative formality.

Besides the fellowships financed by WHO, additional funds for fellowships became available under the Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance. WHO also continued to administer fellowships awarded by UNICEF.

The total number of WHO fellowships awarded during 1950 was 345, of which 107 were of the short-term type.

c. MEDICAL LITERATURE, SUPPLIES AND TEACHING EQUIPMENT

During 1950, WHO continued to provide Governments with medical literature and teaching equipment. Because budgetary provisions for this service were smaller than for previous years ($75,000, against $115,000 in 1949), only the most essential material was furnished, all of which went to assist medical and health institutions.

11. Availability of Essential Drugs and Equipment

One hundred thousand dollars worth of medical supplies were furnished to Governments for specific projects either to help them to continue programmes after WHO demonstration teams had finished their task, or to further health projects carried out by governmental administrations. In many cases the member States concerned reimbursed WHO for these supplies in local currency. WHO also continued to provide medical supplies, literature and equipment for consultants and teams in the field.

WHO allotted $4,000 for emergency services and supplies such as sulfa drugs and chloride of lime in connexion with the earthquake disaster in Assam, India. Each medical officer detailed for duty under the Unified Command in Korea was supplied with a kit for all minor medical and surgical emergencies.

WHO also advised Governments, at their request, in the production of antibiotics and insecticides.

WHO's expert committee on antibiotics held its first session in Geneva from 11 to 15 April 1950 and studied ways and means of giving assistance to countries requiring it in connexion with the drawing up of plans and the installation and operation of antibiotic plants. It recommended among other things that WHO should assist countries which for financial reasons were unable to purchase plans or blueprints, that WHO should assist members to obtain equipment, stimulate opportunities for research and itself allocate fellowships for training in the production of antibiotics; it also recommended that clinical research under WHO auspices should be undertaken in countries where antibiotics were in short supply. The World Health Assembly decided that the Executive Board and the Director-General should take any necessary action on the Committee's report commensurate with WHO resources. The Istituto Superiore di Sanita, Rome, was approved as a training centre for the production of and research on antibiotics and two fellowships on this subject were awarded during the year.

On insecticides, also, advice was provided to countries on request. The third World Health Assembly invited Governments to call on WHO for information and advice on phases of insecticide production which they might undertake domestically, and attention was called to the recommendations of the Expert Committee on Insecticides that manufacturers be required to label insecticides properly. Member States were urged to ensure the freer flow of insecticides and their ingredients to countries where they are needed and supplies are not sufficient.

Iran announced to WHO's Eastern Mediterranean Regional Meeting in September its abolition of customs duties on insecticides and certain vital drugs.

12. International Conventions, Agreements and Regulations on Health

In 1950, WHO's main contribution to new international legislation on health matters was in continuing the preparation for adoption by the Fourth Health Assembly of the draft International Sanitary Regulations to replace the existing Sanitary Conventions. As a result of international medical and sanitary measures promoted by WHO, the Mecca Pilgrimage of 1950 was declared "free from infection". Out of the 500,000 travellers to Mecca fewer than 120 deaths were recorded, and these were caused by sunstroke, general debility and old age; no case of epidemic disease was ascertained.

WHO also advised the United Nations regarding administration of the Paris Protocol of 19 November 1948⁶ and the preparation of a new unified convention on narcotic drugs.⁷ The Expert Committee on Drugs Liable to Produce Addiction, at its second session in January, confirmed its previous recommendations on the addiction-producing character of the new synthetic substances and gave special consideration to other substances.

Information was also supplied to Governments on the status of WHO Regulations No. 1 regarding disease nomenclature, which for the vast majority of member States came into force on 1 January 1950. These Regulations, the first international health legislation, require members to conform to the Manual of the International Statistical Classification of Diseases, Inquiries and Causes of Death.

13. Epidemiological Information

WHO continued its application of the International Sanitary Conventions in force by the collection and notification of information on the presence or movement of the pestilential diseases in various territories of the world, and more particularly in seaports and airports. It continued to make full use of the most modern means of distributing this information, not only by telegrams but by radio broadcasts.

Telegraphic and radio-telegraphic messages were confirmed and complemented by information published in weekly epidemiological publications issued from Geneva, Washington, Alexandria and Singapore. Some fifty short notes on epidemics of influenza and poliomyelitis were also published in the Weekly Epidemiological Record in 1950.

In addition to receiving and distributing notifications relating to pestilential diseases, WHO collected, studied and published information on the more important communicable diseases. In all, some 6,500 documents covering 170 countries or territories and relating to 12 to 15 diseases each were examined and abstracted during the year. WHO also dealt with 28 international disputes arising out of the application of the Sanitary Conventions.

14. Health Statistics

During 1950, many important recommendations were made at the meetings of the Expert Committee on Health Statistics and its subcommittees. Its suggested definitions of "live birth" and "foetal death", of a directive for the registration and tabulation of live births and infant deaths, and of a statistical definition of cancer were adopted by the Third Health Assembly as recommendations (under article 23 of the Constitution and article 17 of WHO Regulations No. 1) and were transmitted to Governments.

Volume 1 of the Manual of the International Statistical Classification of Diseases, Injuries and Causes of Death, which had been published in English in January 1949, was published in Spanish and French in 1950; the Spanish edition appeared in February and the French, prepared in collaboration with the Institut National d'Hygiene of France, followed in May. Both the French and Spanish editions of Volume 2, the alphabetical index of which had been published in English at the end of 1949, were in preparation during 1950.

Vital statistics continued to be published regularly in the Epidemiological and Vital Statistics Report.

Two tabulations of mortality statistics were prepared: one giving statistics for fifteen selected European countries and the other for countries outside Europe.

The first part of the volume, Annual Epidemiological and Vital Statistics 1939-1946, dealing with vital statistics for the period, was prepared for publication.

A conference on health statistics, the first WHO regional conference on health statistics, was held at Istanbul in September, following the meeting of the WHO Regional Committee for the Eastern Mediterranean. This conference, attended by delegates from countries in the region, recommended the establishment of national committees and training courses. Before the conference, a preliminary survey of vital and health statistics was made in several countries of the region.

Three fellowships in vital statistics were awarded during the year.

15. International Standards and Pharmacopoeia

a. BIOLOGICAL STANDARDIZATION

In biological standardization subjects of special note which were worked on by the Expert Committee and the WHO secretariat were: cholera vaccine, smallpox vaccine, pertussis vaccine, diphtheria toxoid; the ACTH and other hormones; streptomycin, aureomycin, and terramycin; BCG vaccine, tubercle baccilli, cardiolipin, lecithin, chloramphenicol, bacitracin; the establishment of an international blood-grouping reference laboratory; and a co-ordinating centre for the rarer blood-grouping sera.

By the end of the year, the World Salmonella Centre in Copenhagen, maintained by WHO, had established 37 salmonella centres all over the world. Laboratories were supplied with 780 salmonella test strains and 248 ampoules of salmonella test sera; 459 strains, mostly strains of the salmonella group, were received from other laboratories for diagnosis. Among these strains were several new types which were analysed, and the results of these analyses were published.

b. UNIFICATION OF PHARMOCOPOEIAS

The Third Health Assembly approved the publication of the Pharmacopoeia Internationalis and recommended that after its provisions had been adopted by the appropriate authorities of member Governments, they should be included in the national pharmacopaeias.

In preparing definitive texts of the monographs and appendices to be published in Volume I of the first edition, special attention was given to the unification of symbols, nomenclature, expressions, structural formulae and general arrangements. The final text of the Table of Usual and Maximal Doses for Adults was also prepared in collaboration with the World Medical Association. Both the English and French texts will be issued together during 1951. Arrangements were also made for the translation of the Pharmacopoeia Internationalis into Spanish.

By correspondence with members of the Expert Committee preparatory work was also carried out on the draft monographs and appendices for Volume II of the first edition of the Pharmacopoeia. Besides covering the new important drugs, particularly antibiotics, Volume II will include monographs and appendices on injections, tablets and tinctures, as well as on cardiolipin and purified lecithin, used for the serological test of syphilis.

Following negotiations with the Belgian Government, the Permanent International Pharmacopoeia secretariat was placed under the aegis of WHO.

16. Technical Publications

The regular publications of the organization have been: the Bulletin of the World Health Organization; supplements to the Bulletin, (including the Manual of the International Statistical Classification of Diseases, Injuries and Causes of Death and the Pharmacopoeia Internationalis); a new Monograph Series (designed to include reprints and, where necessary, complete translations of important studies initially published in the Bulletin); the International Digest of Health Legislation; the Chronicle of the World Health Organization; the World Health Organization Technical Report Series (containing the reports of WHO expert committees); and the Official Records of the World Health Organization.

In addition to the regular publications, a new edition of the International List of Venereal-Disease Treatment Centres had been prepared by the end of 1950. WHO also published during 1950, jointly with UNESCO, Child Welfare Films, an index of films and filmstrips, and Periodica Medica Mundi, an alphabetical list of current medical and medico-biological periodicals.

D. BUDGET

The budget for 1950 was approved by the Second Health Assembly at $7,500,000, to cover the regular administrative and operational expenses of the organization. A supplemental fund of $10,500,000, to be raised by voluntary contributions from member States wishing to participate in the raising of health standards in under-developed countries (prior to the United Nations Technical Assistance Programme) was also approved. Later, because of the financial situation created by the fact that many non-participating member States had not paid their full contributions to the 1948 and 1949 budgets, an expenditure ceiling of $6,300,000 was placed on the regular budget.

For 1951, the approved budget estimates were $7,300,000, the expenditure level later being fixed by the Executive Board at $6,232,057. Details of the budget appropriations for 1951 are as follows:

BUDGET (1951)

VI. The International Bank for Reconstruction and Development (Bank)¹

The Articles of Agreement establishing the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development were drawn up at the United Nations Monetary and Financial Conference, which met at Bretton Woods, New Hampshire, in July 1944, at the invitation of the United States Government. The Bank came into existence on 27 December 1945 when its Articles of Agreement had been signed by 29 Governments.² At the inaugural meeting of the Bank's Board of Governors, held at Savannah, Georgia, in March 1946, the first Executive Directors were elected, and the Bank officially began operations in Washington on 25 June 1946. The first annual meeting of the Board of Governors was held in Washington from 27 September to 3 October 1946; the second annual meeting in London in September 1947. One of the decisions of the second meeting was the approval of a draft agreement to establish the relationship between the Bank and the United Nations.³ The Agreement came into force on 15 November 1947, when it was approved by the General Assembly of the United Nations. The third and fourth annual meetings were held in Washington in September 1948 and 1949, respectively.

The Bank's first loans were made in 1947 to assist in financing general programmes of reconstruction in Europe. By 1949, however, emphasis in the Bank's lending had shifted to development loans—loans to assist in the development of productive facilities and resources, particularly in the Bank's economically less developed member countries. These loans were for such purposes as electric power development, railway improvement, mechanization of agriculture, and expansion and modernization of industrial plants. By the end of 1949, the Bank had made 24 loans totalling approximately $744,000,000 for reconstruction or development of thirteen of its member countries, namely, Belgium, Brazil, Chile, Colombia, Denmark, El Salvador, Finland, France, India, Luxembourg, Mexico, the Netherlands and Yugoslavia.

To augment its supply of loanable funds, between 1947 and 1949, the Bank borrowed in the private capital market and obtained the permission of some of its member countries to use all or part of their paid-in local currency capital subscription for lending purposes. In 1947, the Bank publicly sold two bond issues totalling $250,000,000 on the United States market. One issue comprised $100,000,000 in 2¼% Ten Year Bonds maturing in 1957; the other, $150,000,000 in 3% Twenty-five Year Bonds maturing in 1972. In 1948, the Bank sold to the Bank for International Settlements of Basle, Switzerland, an issue of 2½% Swiss Franc Serial Bonds due 1953-54, in the amount of 17,000,000 Swiss francs, equivalent to about $4,000,000. By the end of 1949, five countries had consented to the use of their currencies in the Bank's lending operations: the United States, which agreed to the lending of all of its 18% subscription; Belgium, Canada and Denmark, which had released an aggregate of their currencies equivalent to $10,125,000; and the United Kingdom, which had consented to the use of £500,000.

As part of its lending procedure, the Bank investigates all conditions which might affect its loans. Much of this work is done by Bank field missions. Bank missions also assist member countries in analysing their economic problems and in designing measures for improving their financial stability and credit standing. By 31 December 1949, missions of various types had visited 27 member countries in Latin America, Europe, the Middle East and Asia. Technical assistance on a more comprehensive scale was undertaken for the first time in 1949 by a Bank mission to Colombia, which examined all important sectors in Colombia's economy in order to make recommendations designed to increase the wealth of the country and improve the standard of living of its people.

A. PURPOSES AND FUNCTIONS

The purposes of the Bank, as stated in Article I of its Articles of Agreement are:

(i) To assist in the reconstruction and development of territories of members by facilitating the investment of capital for productive purposes, including the restoration of economies destroyed or disrupted by war, the reconversion of productive facilities to peacetime needs and the encouragement of the development of productive facilities and resources in less developed countries.

(ii) To promote private foreign investment by means of guarantees or participation in loans and other investments made by private investors; and when private capital is not available on reasonable terms, to supplement private investment by providing, on suitable conditions, finance for productive purposes out of its own capital, funds raised by it and its other resources.

(iii) To promote the long-range balanced growth of international trade and the maintenance of equilibrium in balances of payments by encouraging international investment for the development of the productive resources of members, thereby assisting in raising productivity, the standard of living and conditions of labor in their territories.

(iv) To arrange the loans made or guaranteed by it in relation to international loans through other channels so that the more useful and urgent projects, large and small alike, will be dealt with first.

(v) To conduct its operations with due regard to the effect of international investment on business conditions in the territories of members and, in the immediate post-war years, to assist in bringing about a smooth transition from a wartime to a peacetime economy.

The Bank may lend funds directly, either from its capital funds or from funds which it borrows in the investment markets. It may guarantee loans made by others, or it may participate in such loans. Loans may be made to member countries directly, or to any of their political sub-divisions, or to private business or agricultural enterprises in the territories of members. When the member Government in whose territory the project is located is not itself the borrower this Government, its central bank or a comparable agency acceptable to the Bank must guarantee the loan.

B. ORGANIZATION

The administrative organization of the Bank consists of a Board of Governors, Executive Directors, a President and staff.

All powers of the Bank are vested in the Board of Governors, which consists, of one Governor and one alternate appointed by each member. The Board of Governors meets annually; additional meetings may be held, if required.

A new member may be admitted to the Bank by approval of a majority of the voting power of the Board of Governors, provided that it accepts the conditions laid down by the Board and that it first becomes a member of the International Monetary Fund. If a member of the Bank ceases to be a member of the Fund, it will automatically cease, after a period of three months, to be a member of the Bank unless the Bank by three fourths of the voting power decides to allow it to remain a member.

Each member of the Bank has 250 votes plus one additional vote for each share of stock held. Each Governor casts all the votes allotted to that member State which he represents; a quorum of the Board of Governors consists of a majority of the members, exercising at least two thirds of the voting power.

The Board of Governors has delegated most of its powers to the Executive Directors, who normally meet once a month at the Bank's headquarters, in Washington. There are fourteen Executive Directors, each of whom normally has an alternate. Five of the Executive Directors are appointed by the five members having the largest number of shares of stock (United States, United Kingdom, China, France and India), and nine are elected by the Governors of the remaining members. Each appointed Executive Director has the same number of votes as the country that appointed him, and each elected Executive Director has the same total number of votes as the countries that elected him. The votes of each Executive Director must be cast as a unit.

Decisions of the Bank are made by a simple majority vote, except as otherwise provided by the Articles of Agreement.

The President is the chief executive officer of the Bank and is selected by the Executive Directors. He is ex officio chairman of the Executive Directors. Subject to their general direction on questions of policy, he is responsible for the conduct of the business of the Bank and for the organization of its staff. A loan is made only after the amount, terms and conditions of the loan have been recommended by the President to the Executive Directors and his recommendations have been approved by them.

The Bank's operating staff is organized into the following departments: Loan, Economic, Treasurer's, Secretary's, Legal, Public Relations, Administration, Marketing; the Staff Office.

C. ACTIVITIES DURING 1950

The Board of Governors of the Bank held its fifth annual meeting in Paris from 6 to 14 September 1950. The third regular election of Executive Directors took place at this meeting and nine Executive Directors were elected to the regular two-year term of office.

Poland withdrew from membership in the Bank on 14 March 1950. Membership, however, was increased to 49 countries with the admission of Pakistan on 11 July 1950 and Ceylon on 29 August 1950. Formal applications for membership had been received from the Governments of Burma, Indonesia, Jordan and Sweden and were pending at the end of the year.

1. Lending Operations

More loans were made in the year 1950 than in any comparable period in the Bank's history. Seventeen loans totalling $279,230,000 brought the Bank's total loan commitments to $1,023,375,000 on 31 December 1950. A brief description of the loans made during 1950 is given below.

On 18 April, the Bank made its third loan to India: $18,500,000 to finance part of the cost of the Bokaro-Konar project, which will include the largest steam electric plant in India. The project is situated in the Damodar River Valley, the country's most important industrial area, located to the northwest of Calcutta. In 1949, the Bank had made loans to India aggregating $44,000,000 for railway rehabilitation and for the purchase of agricultural machinery.

Two loans were made in Mexico during the year, both of which were guaranteed by the Mexican Government. On 28 April, the Mexican Light and Power Company, Ltd., received a loan of $26,000,000, of which $10,000,000 was to refund a short-term loan made in January 1949. The balance of $16,000,000 was to finance additional materials and equipment needed for the company's four-year programme for the expansion of its electric power generating, transmission and distribution facilities in the Mexico City area. On 18 October, the Bank extended a $10,000,000 line of credit to a consortium of eight Mexican commercial banks, together with Nacional Financiera, the official financing agency of the Mexican Government. Members of the consortium will obtain loans under the line of credit in order to enable them to finance the cost of imports required for specific development projects submitted by private Mexican firms and approved by both the consortium and the International Bank.

On 26 May, a loan of $15,000,000 was made to the Sao Francisco Hydroelectric Company of Brazil for the development of hydro-electric power at Paulo Alfonso Falls on the Sao Francisco River. The loan will finance practically the entire foreign exchange cost of the project, which is to provide power for distribution in the north-east area of Brazil.

Bank lending was extended for the first time to a country in the Middle East through a loan of $12,800,000 to Iraq on 15 June. The loan will help finance the construction on the Tigris River of a flood control system urgently needed to prevent recurrent flooding of large areas of cultivated land and urban property, notably in the city of Baghdad. It is hoped that the Wadi Tharthar Flood Control Project will result in the protection of crops and urban property from destructive floods, in improvements in health and sanitation, and consequently in increased economic security for large sections of the population.

Three loans were made in Turkey in 1950; two directly to the Government, on 7 July, and one, on 19 October, to the newly established Industrial Development Bank of Turkey. A loan of $12,500,000 to be used for the development of Turkey's major ports is expected to increase their operational efficiency and to stimulate trade and production by increasing the country's capacity to handle shipping. A loan of $3,900,000 is to help finance the cost of improving grain storage facilities, an important factor in Turkey's agricultural development. The loan of $9,000,000 to the privately-owned Industrial Development Bank, guaranteed by the Turkish Government, is to finance the cost of imports for industrial development projects undertaken by private enterprises in Turkey. The objective of this loan is the improvement of credit facilities available to small and medium-sized enterprise. The Industrial Development Bank was founded 2 June 1950 by private interests, assisted by advice from representatives of the International Bank.

The largest loan made by the Bank since its first loans in 1947 was that to Australia on 22 August. One hundred million dollars was made available for capital goods and equipment needed for private and governmental development projects during the next two years. The Bank's loan will help provide equipment to be used in mechanizing Australia's agriculture and land development, railway electrification, power development, the mining of coal and non-ferrous metals and a variety of other industries.

On 25 August, the Bank made a loan of $33,000,000 for the expansion of Uruguay's power and telephone facilities. The loan, which was guaranteed by the Government of Uruguay, was made to the General Administration of State Electric Power Plants and Telephones (U.T.E.), an autonomous government-owned agency. The loan will enable U.T.E. to import materials and equipment necessary in a four- to five-year expansion programme. Increased availability of electric power will make possible further growth and improvement of the country's industries, and promote rural electrification. Similarly, expansion of communication facilities will contribute materially to the country's increasing industrial and commercial development.

Two loans totalling $7,000,000 were made to Ethiopia on 13 September—the first the Bank made to any country in Africa. Five million dollars was for the rehabilitation and maintenance of the country's road system, a project vital to the country's internal and foreign trade. The other loan of $2,000,000 will provide foreign exchange for projects to be financed by a new Ethiopian development bank. This institution is designed to advance adequate loans on reasonable terms to agricultural and industrial borrowers.

Thailand received three loans totalling $25,400,000 on 27 October. These were the first Bank loans to a country in South-East Asia. They were granted to help finance projects basic to Thailand's economy: $3,000,000 for the rehabilitation of the railway system damaged during the war; $4,400,000 for the improvement of the Port of Bangkok so that it will become accessible to large ships; and $18,000,000 for an irrigation project to provide assured water supply, controlled and distributed, for the irrigation of approximately 2,260,000 acres, thus helping to increase the country's already large exports of rice.

Two loans were made during the year to publicly-owned electric power companies in Colombia. On 2 November, $3,530,000 was made available to the Central Hidroelectrica del Rio Anchicaya, Limitada, for the construction of a hydro-electric plant on the Anchicaya River. Power from this installation will be supplied to the City of Cali and is expected to aid economic development in the Cauca Valley, a region of considerable agricultural and industrial activity in the western part of Colombia. A loan of $2,600,000 was made on 28 December to the Central Hidroelectrica de Caldas, Limitada, for the construction of La Insula hydro-electric project. This project is expected to satisfy the power needs of Manizales, a city of substantial commercial and industrial importance in western Colombia.

As of 31 December 1950, a total of the equivalent of approximately $642,000,000 had been disbursed under the loan agreements. Principal repayments had all been made according to schedule and at 31 December 1950 amounted to $3,490,270. About $471,000,000 of the total expenditures financed by Bank loans were made in the United States but expenditures amounting to some $170,900,000 were made in other areas. The geographical distribution of the total disbursements made by the Bank up to 31 December 1950, in round numbers by areas of expenditures, was as follows: $471,000,000 in the United States; $56,500,000 in Latin America; $38,600,000 in Canada; $71,000,000 in Europe; $2,200,000 in Africa; $2,500,000 in the Near East; and $100,000 in the Far East.

The Bank does not normally charge the full interest rate on its loans until the proceeds are actually disbursed. Beginning on the effective date of a loan, however, a commitment charge is made on the undisbursed portion of the loan calculated to compensate the Bank, at least in part, for the cost of holding funds at the borrower's disposal. In April 1947, the Executive Directors approved a commitment charge of 1½% on all undisbursed amounts. In January 1948, the Executive Directors increased the commitment charge on amounts remaining undisbursed for a period of more than six months to the full amount of the interest rate on a loan, less a credit based on the rate yielded by U. S. Treasury 90-day bills. An examination of the Bank's commitment charge policy during the summer of 1950 led to the conclusion that the commitment charge of $1\frac{1}{2}\%$ could be reduced under present conditions. Accordingly, the Executive Directors on 15 August approved a recommendation that, with effect from that date, a flat commitment charge of $\frac{1}{2}\%$ of 1% should be made from the effective date of future loans and on all undisbursed amounts of existing loans.

2. Technical Assistance

During the year under review, the Bank continued to expand its program of technical assistance to member countries. In addition to a wide variety of advice and aid rendered in the normal course of its loan operations, the Bank provides technical assistance of a broader nature. As a result of discussions with the Bank, several countries have asked it to organize missions to make comprehensive surveys of their economies. The precise terms of reference of these missions have varied in each case. Broadly, however, their objectives are: to help the country formulate a programme of investment which will indicate priorities among the important sectors of the economy and among types of undertakings within each such sector; to suggest methods and measures, other than investment, to improve productive efficiency in existing enterprises; and to recommend improvements in the government's economic and financial policies and organization in order to facilitate and encourage further development. These missions are composed of specialists recruited from outside the Bank on an international basis and of members of the Bank's regular staff. Other international organizations, including FAO and WHO, have provided specialists in their fields of activity for the missions. The expenses of these missions are shared by the Bank and the country concerned.

The Bank's Fifth Annual Report commented on these missions as follows:

The Bank believes it appropriate that it should provide this type of assistance to its member countries. As a co-operative international institution it maintains a continuing and close association with its members. This promotes mutual understanding and frees the Bank from the suspicion of being influenced by political or commercial motives. In addition, member countries are aware that, by the very nature of its activities, the Bank is unlikely to make or to sponsor recommendations that are unrealistic or beyond their capabilities. They know, too, that if they formulate a well-balanced development program based on the mission's recommendations, the Bank will stand ready to help them carry out the program by financing appropriate projects.

The report of the first comprehensive survey mission, which was sent to Colombia in 1949,⁴ was published in October 1950. A non-partisan committee was appointed shortly thereafter by the Colombian Government to study the mission's recommendations and prepare plans for their implementation. During 1950, similar comprehensive survey missions were sent to Turkey, Guatemala and Cuba and at the end of the year were preparing their reports. A mission sponsored jointly by the Bank and FAO was in Uruguay from October to December 1950 to make a survey of the country's agricultural economy and to formulate recommendations as to methods by which agricultural production could be increased and improved.

There have been an increasing number of cases where member countries have asked the Bank for other types of assistance, such as advice on particular projects or industries or the services of financial or economic experts to serve as government advisers, etc. In some instances the Bank has been able to fill these requests from its own staff; in most cases, however, it has recommended outside consultants. In order to comply with these requests efficiently, the Bank is building up a roster of experts in various fields in which technical advice is likely to be required. It has been assisted in this task by many organizations, international and national, public and private.

An outstanding example of this type of assistance rendered during 1950 was in El Salvador. After the Bank had made a loan of $12,545,000 to the Lempa River Hydroelectric Commission of El Salvador in December 1949 to meet the foreign exchange costs of a hydro-electric project, the Commission sought the advice of the Bank's Marketing Director on the sale of a bond issue in Salvadorean currency to raise additional funds for the local currency costs of the project. The Marketing Director visited El Salvador several times to discuss the preparation of the issue with officials of the Commission and of the Government. The bond issue, amounting to the equivalent of $5,200,000, was successfully placed in July 1950. This was the first time this method of raising capital funds had been utilized in El Salvador.

Other instances of such assistance rendered in 1950 were the technical advice given by Bank representatives in the establishment of the Industrial Development Bank of Turkey and the development bank of Ethiopia.

⁴ See Y.U.N., 1948-49, p. 1051.

3. Resources of the Bank and Marketing Operations

The authorized capital of the Bank is $10,000 million. This capital stock is divided into shares of $100,000 each, purchasable only by members and transferable only to the Bank. As of 31 December 1950, the total subscribed capital amounted to the equivalent of $8,338,500,000.

Only 20 per cent of the total subscribed capital is paid-in capital, and this is the only part of the subscribed capital which may be used for loans. The remaining 80 per cent of the subscribed capital is subject to call by the Bank only when required to meet the Bank's own obligations on its borrowings or guarantees.

Of the 20 per cent paid-in capital, 2 per cent is in the form of gold or United States dollars immediately available for lending. The remaining 18 per cent is paid to the Bank in the currencies of the various member countries, and cannot be used for loans without the consent of the particular nation whose currency is to be used.

During 1950, 22 members made all or part of their currency contributions to the Bank's paid-in capital available for lending purposes, bringing the total of such countries to 27. These countries include Belgium, Canada, Colombia, Costa Rica, Denmark, Ecuador, El Salvador, Finland, France, Greece, Guatemala, Honduras, Iceland, India, Italy, Lebanon, Mexico, the Netherlands, Norway, Pakistan, Paraguay, the Philippines, Syria, the Union of South Africa, the United Kingdom, the United States and Yugoslavia. The Bank's fifth annual report comments:

The Bank has been greatly encouraged by the increasing amounts of such funds that have been made available during the past year [June 1949-June 1950] and by the evidence that there are likely to be substantial further additions to its loanable resources as a result of additional consents in the future.

In order to obtain loanable resources in excess of the amount made available by members, the Bank sells its own obligations in the investment markets. As operations of the Bank continue, it is expected that such borrowings in the private market will constitute the major source of its loanable funds.

In January 1950, the Bank retired its outstanding 2¼% bonds due in 1957 by refunding them with a $100,000,000 issue of 2% serial bonds due 1953 to 1962. In March 1950, it sold a second issue of Swiss franc bonds in Switzerland amounting to 28,500,000 Swiss francs ($6,600,000) principal amount of 2½% serial bonds due 1953 to 1956.

During the year, Bank bonds were listed for trading on the Paris Bourse and the Amsterdam Exchange. Banking and other institutions in a number of Latin American countries have been authorized to purchase Bank bonds.

Apart from direct borrowing, the Bank has engaged in another type of marketing operation by selling to private investors securities held in its loan portfolio. During 1950, the Bank sold for the first time without its guarantee bonds totalling the equivalent of $1,215,000 from its loan portfolio, both in Europe and in the United States. The obligations so disposed of had been received by the Bank in connexion with loans to the Netherlands Herstelbank, Luxembourg, Credit National of France, and the Netherlands Government. Previous sales of obligations of borrowers which bore the guarantee of the Bank comprise $28,000,000 of securities received in connexion with its loans to four Dutch shipping companies and to Belgium.

From the time it began operations until 31 December 1950, the Bank has had a total of approximately $1,047,226,000 available for lending. As of 31 December 1950, funds still uncommitted amounted to $71,251,174. The sources of the Bank's lending funds at 31 December 1950 were as follows:

2% paid-in portion of subscriptions of all members	$	162,480,000

At the annual meeting of the Board of Governors in September 1950, action was taken affecting the disposition of the earnings of the Bank. The Governors approved a measure to credit all past and current earnings of the Bank to a general reserve for losses on loans and guarantees. Until such time as the Executive Directors or the Board should decide otherwise, future earnings also will be credited to this account. On 31 December 1950, this reserve amounted to $34,572,901, which, added to the Special Reserve provided for in the Bank's Articles of Agreement, brought the Bank's total reserves to $51,424,808 on the same date.

D. ADMINISTRATIVE BUDGET

As reflected in the Statement of Income and Expenses given in the next column, the Bank's operations during the fiscal year ended 30 June 1950 resulted in a net income of $13,698,398. In addition, loan commissions of $5,663,064 were set aside in the Special Reserve, which is kept available for meeting obligations of the Bank created by its borrowings or guarantees. The total net income for the entire period of the Bank's operations up to 31 December 1950 amounted to $34,572,901. As of 31 December 1950, the total amount credited to the Special Reserve was $16,851,907. (All amounts are expressed in United States currency.)

An administrative budget for the fiscal year ending 30 June 1951, prepared by the President of the Bank, has been approved by the Executive Directors and the Board of Governors. These estimated expenses are given in the following table:

VII. The International Monetary Fund (Fund)¹

The Articles of Agreement of the International Monetary Fund were drawn up at the United Nations Monetary and Financial Conference at Bretton Woods, New Hampshire, 1 to 22 July 1944. Representatives of 44 countries participated. The Fund came into existence on 27 December 1945 when 29 governments, representing 80 per cent of the quotas accepted at Bretton Woods, signed the Articles of Agreement in Washington.²

An inaugural meeting of the Board of Governors was convened at Savannah, Georgia, on 8 March 1946 to adopt by-laws, Select a headquarters site and elect a Board of Executive Directors. The Governors' subsequent annual meetings have customarily been held in; September; in September 1946 the Governors met in Washington, in 1947 they met in London, in 1948 and 1949 in Washington, and in 1950 in Paris. One of the decisions in the second annual meeting in September 1947 was the approval of a draft agreement to establish the relationship between the International Monetary Fund and the United Nations.³

The Fund's Executive Board held its first meeting 6 May 1946, electing Camille Gutt,⁴ of Belgium, to be Chairman of the Board and Managing Director. With some changes in membership, the Board has been in continuous session ever since. Andrew N. Overby, of the United States, was appointed Deputy Managing Director in February 1949.

On 18 December 1946 the Fund announced its agreement to the establishment of par values in gold and U. S. dollars for the currencies of 32 member countries. At the same time the Fund indicated that these parities might require changes, but that this could be done in an orderly way through the Fund's consultative procedures. It cautioned that premature revisions in response to abnormal conditions might stimulate further inflation.

In a first annual report, released in September 1947, the Fund saw inflation already undermining some par values. As post-war payments deficits persisted, the Fund in its 1948 report advocated strong governmental efforts to increase exports to dollar markets. It emphasized the need for anti-inflationary measures and noted indications that in some countries the exchange rate was becoming a restraining factor on exports. On 13 September 1949, the Fund urged deficit countries to face the risks and difficulties of rate changes, stating that they could no longer afford to forego any suitable instrument, including any necessary exchange adjustment, that could expand their dollar exports.

Up to this time only three countries—France, Colombia and Mexico—had proposed changes in their exchange parities. There began on 18 September 1949 a wave of devaluations that involved within a few months the currencies of 22 Fund members and eight other countries. In a co-operative procedure which had not existed prior to the Fund's establishment, the members' proposals were submitted for approval to the Fund's Executive Board, which discussed them against the background of earlier studies and in the light of their relationship to one another. Some further revisions have taken place in consultation with the Fund as members adjusted their exchange systems to changing conditions. In numerous instances the Fund has sent missions to confer with individual Governments or to give them technical assistance. In administering the Articles of Agreement, the Executive Board has been called upon by the members to make decisions on questions of discriminatory and multiple exchange rates, gold policy and other problems important to harmonious international monetary relations.

Foreign exchange transactions by the Fund are governed by the relevant provisions of the Articles of Agreement, as applied by the Executive Board.

It was agreed in April 1948 that members receiving aid from the Economic Co-operation Administration should request a purchase of U. S. dollars only in exceptional or unforeseen circumstances. Sales of currencies from the Fund's holdings to member countries totalled the equivalent of $777,283,000 on 31 December 1949, by which time the process of repurchase also had begun. Approximately $759,830,000 of the transactions represented sales by the Fund of U. S. dollars, $11,408,000 were sales of Belgian francs and $6,045,000 of British pounds sterling.

A. PURPOSES AND FUNCTIONS

The purposes of the Fund, as stated in article I of the Articles of Agreement, are:

- (i) To promote international monetary cooperation through a permanent institution which provides the machinery for consultation and collaboration on international monetary problems.
- (ii) To facilitate the expansion and balanced growth of international trade, and to contribute thereby to the promotion and maintenance of high levels of employment and real income and to the development of the productive resources of all members as primary objectives of economic policy.
- (iii) To promote exchange stability, to maintain orderly exchange arrangements among members, and to avoid competitive exchange depreciation.

(iv) To assist in the establishment of a multilateral system of payments in respect of current transactions between members and in the elimination of foreign exchange restrictions which hamper the growth of world trade.

(v) To give confidence to members by making the Fund's resources available to them under adequate safeguards, thus providing them with opportunity to correct maladjustments in their balance of payments without resorting to measures destructive of national or international prosperity.

(vi) In accordance with the above, to shorten the duration and lessen the degree of disequilibrium in the international balances of payments of members.

B. ORGANIZATION

The Fund consists of a Board of Governors, Executive Directors and a Managing Director and staff.

All powers of the Fund are vested in the Board of Governors, consisting of one Governor and one alternate appointed by each member. The Board of Governors has delegated most of its powers to the Executive Directors. It has retained, as required by article XII, section 2, of the Articles of Agreement, the power to:

- (i) Admit new members and determine the conditions of their admission.
- (ii) Approve a revision of quotas.
- (iii) Approve a uniform change in the par value of the currencies of all members.
- (iv) Make arrangements to cooperate with other international organizations (other than informal arrangements of a temporary or administrative character).
- (v) Determine the distribution of the net income of the Fund.
- (vi) Require a member to withdraw.
- (vii) Decide to liquidate the Fund.
- (viii) Decide appeals from interpretations of this agreement given by the Executive Directors.

Each member of the Fund has 250 votes plus one additional vote for each $100,000 of its quota.⁵ Each Governor casts as a unit all votes allotted to that member State which he represents; a quorum of the Board of Governors consists of a majority of the Governors exercising at least two thirds of the total voting power.

Decisions of the Fund are made by a simple majority of the votes cast, except as otherwise provided by the Articles of Agreement. For example, to change the quota of a member requires, in addition to the consent of that member, approval by four fifths of the voting power of the Board of Governors; four fifths of the voting power is also required to increase the number of Executive Directors. Amendments to the Articles of Agreement may be adopted by three fifths of the members having four fifths of the total voting power, and in a few instances require acceptance by all members. In voting on certain matters, such as the question of waiving conditions governing the use of the Fund's resources or declaring a member ineligible to use the Fund's resources, the voting power of each member is adjusted by the addition of one vote for each $400,000 of sales of its currency and by the subtraction of one vote for each $400,000 of its purchases of other currency.

The Executive Directors, meeting in continuous session, are responsible for the conduct of the general operations of the Fund and exercise powers delegated to them by the Board of Governors.

There are fourteen Executive Directors, five of whom are appointed by the five members having the largest quotas. The remaining Executive Directors are elected by the Governors representing the other members of the Fund, as follows: seven by members other than the American Republics, and two by the American Republics. Each appointed Executive Director casts as a unit all the votes allotted to the member which appointed him, and each elected Director casts as a unit the total number of votes allotted to those countries which elected him. A quorum of the Executive Directors consists of a majority of Directors representing at least one half of the total voting power.

The Managing Director of the Fund, who may not be a Governor or an Executive Director, is elected by the Executive Directors, and under their direction is responsible for the conduct of the ordinary business of the Fund, and for the organization, appointment and dismissal of its officers and staff. He also serves as Chairman of the Executive Directors, without the right to vote except in the case of a tie.

C. RESOURCES OF THE FUND

To carry out its operations, the Fund uses the resources subscribed by its member Governments. The quotas of those members which attended the Bretton Woods Conference were fixed by the Articles of Agreement, but may be revised by the Fund. The quotas of other members are fixed by the Board of Governors at the time of approval of their membership applications. Each of the original members must pay in gold 25 per cent of its quota or 10 per cent of its net official gold and dollar holdings, whichever is the smaller; the gold contribution of new members is fixed by the Board of Governors. The balance is paid in the member's own currency, normally after the establishment of the par value for that currency. Non-negotiable, non-interest-bearing demand notes may be accepted from any member whose currency is not needed for the Fund's operations in place of that member's currency.

Total quotas in the Fund, as of 31 December 1950, amounted to $8,032,000,000, with approximately $1,494,000,000 held in gold and $5,533,000,000 in members' currencies; the balance of $1,003,000,000 in currencies was not yet due from members whose par values had still to be agreed upon.

D. ACTIVITIES DURING 1950

Membership increased to 49 countries during the year following the admission of Pakistan and Ceylon and the resignation of Poland.

The fifth annual meeting of the Board of Governors was held in Paris from 6 to 14 September 1950 under the Chairmanship of the Governor of India, Sir Chintaman Deshmukh. Biennial elections were held to name nine Executive Directors for a two-year term, the other five posts on the Executive Board being filled by appointment of the five countries having the largest quotas in the Fund, in accordance with the Articles of Agreement.

The fifth annual report, published at the outset of the meeting, outlined improvements in the positions of most of the countries that had devalued their currencies during the year 1949-50.

It stressed that these benefits might be lost, however, unless members beginning large defence programmes pursued effective anti-inflation policies.

During 1950, the Fund agreed to par value changes for the Icelandic krona and the Ecuadorian peso and to various foreign exchange modifications involving the currencies of Austria, Bolivia, Canada, Chile, Iran and Nicaragua. At the end of 1950, 38 countries maintained par values with the Fund for their currencies. It also considered proposals by Canada and the Union of South Africa concerning its gold policy.

The Contracting Parties to the General Agreements on Tariffs and Trade consulted the Fund regarding discriminatory import restrictions which had been imposed in 1949 by Australia, Ceylon, Chile, India, New Zealand, Pakistan, Southern Rhodesia and the United Kingdom. The Fund gave its view that a gradual relaxation of these restrictions was justified for Australia, Ceylon, New Zealand and the United Kingdom but not for the other countries cited.

There were no sales of currency by the Fund during 1950. Three countries repurchased amounts of their own currency with payments of gold and U. S. dollars: Belgium ($12,100,000 in U. S. dollars and $8,500,000 in gold), Egypt ($7,678,163 in U. S. dollars and $829,766 in gold) and Ethiopia ($300,000 in U. S. dollars), bringing the total of repurchases by 31 December 1950 to $33,017,000.

1. Consultations

a. PAR VALUES

(1) Ecuador

The Fund announced on 2 December 1950 that it concurred in a change proposed by Ecuador in the par value of the sucre from 13.50 Sucres per U. S. dollar to 15.00 Sucres per U. S. dollar.

(2) Iceland

The Fund announced on 20 March 1950 its concurrence in a change in the par value of the Icelandic krona, the new rate being 16.2857 kronur per U. S. dollar. This was the second change in the par value of the krona since the announcement by the Fund on 18 December 1946 of an initial par value. The rate then established was 6.48885 kronur per U. S. dollar. This par value was changed with the agreement of the Fund on 20 September 1949 to 9.34107 kronur per U. S. dollar to 15.00 Sucres per U. S. dollar, valuation represented an aggregate 60.2 per cent change from the initial par value.

b. CHANGES IN EXCHANGE SYSTEM

The foreign exchange modifications described below were put into effect by member countries during 1950, in consultation with the Fund.

(1) Austria

Following consultations with Austria the Fund approved on 17 October certain changes in that country's exchange rates, including the following:

- (a) Replacement of the basic rate of 14.40 schillings per U.S. dollar and the premium rate of 26 schillings per U.S. dollar for commercial transactions by a single rate of 21.36 schillings per U.S. dollar
- (b) Maintenance of the premium rate of 26 schillings to the U.S. dollar for certain invisible transactions—mainly tourist expenditures

(c) Abolition in principle of private barter and compensation arrangements

The Fund stated that consultations with Austria would continue with a view to complete unification of the effective rate.

(2) Bolivia

The Fund announced on 27 February that Bolivia had proposed certain temporary and partial measures to deal with exchange and financial problems pending development of a more complete programme.

Although stating that it considered that further study was advisable to work out a more adequate solution of Bolivia's exchange problems, the Fund took note of the intention of the Bolivian Government to move toward unification of its multiple rate structure while revising its financial system and taking other measures.

In recognition of this, and of the fact that the proposal represented a first step toward simplification of Bolivia's foreign exchange practices, the Fund raised no formal objection to the temporary measures which were as follows:

(a) Export rates. A rate of 60 bolivianos per U.S. dollar was established for tin exports. Minor exports would continue to receive different effective rates derived from selling certain percentages at 42 and 60 bolivianos per dollar and at the free market rate. The system under which exporters turned in part of their foreign exchange proceeds to the exchange authorities and retained a part for private disposition was continued for tin and other exports.

(b) Import rates. For a minimum number of essential imports (approximately 19 per cent of 1949 total imports) the rate of 42 bolivianos per dollar would continue to apply, but for the bulk of imports the new rate of 60 bolivianos per dollar was to be introduced. Certain listed non-essential imports were to be permitted to enter at the free market rate. Importation of certain luxury items was prohibited.

(3) Canada

On 30 September 1950 the Fund announced that Canada had informed it of its decision for the time being to allow the foreign exchange value of the Canadian dollar to fluctuate, in order to cope with large inflows of capital. The Fund recognized the exigencies of the situation which led Canada to the proposed plan and took note of the intention of the Canadian Government to remain in consultation with the Fund and to re-establish an effective par value as soon as circumstances warranted.

(4) Chile

On 10 January 1950 the Fund approved the temporary establishment of a rate of exchange of 60 pesos per U. S. dollar, as proposed by Chile, on the understanding that Chile would soon undertake a general plan of stabilization unifying the rates of exchange in a new par value at about the level of the new rate proposed. The rate of 60 pesos was applied to all exports except those which in the general plan would be subject to export taxes and to copper, nitrates and other products of the large mining companies, as well as to all imports except those which in the general plan would be subject to a lowering of customs duties or subsidies.

(5) Ecuador

Simultaneously with its proposal to change the par value of the sucre from 13.50 to 15 Sucres per dollar (see above) Ecuador proposed a series of related foreign exchange measures. These included:

- (a) Unification of exchange rates at the new parity for most imports and all but minor exports.
- (b) Taxes of 33 and 34 per cent on import permits for two categories of non-essential imports; these taxes would remain until transferred to the customs tariff system.
- (c) Continued maintenance of the free market for most invisible transactions and the transfer to that market of insurance receipts and payments previously dealt with in the official market.
- (d) Maintenance of a compensation system for minor exports for a maximum period of one year; during this period articles would be eliminated from the system and its scope would not, in any case, be increased.

The Fund commended the efforts made by Ecuador toward the unification of exchange rates. It said that it did not object to the changes as temporary measures pending further simplification and unification of the system. The Fund approved the intention of Ecuador to eliminate the taxes on two categories of non-essential imports but declined to express any view regarding the transfer of these taxes to the customs tariff system. It expressed serious doubts concerning the maintenance of the compensation system for minor exports, but noted the intention of Ecuador not to increase the scope of the system and progressively to eliminate it within a one-year period.

The Fund said that consultations would continue with a view to further unification of Ecuador's exchange system.

(6) Iran

The Fund agreed on 20 November to changes proposed by Iran as a step toward exchange stabilization and the future establishment of a unitary rate.

Iran had maintained three exchange rates. An official rate (32.5 rials per U. S. dollar) had been in effect for governmental and oil transactions, and a certificate rate (40 rials per U. S. dollar) for essential imports. A third rate, for exports other than oil and non-essential imports, had been permitted to fluctuate in a free market. This rate was stabilized at 48.75 rials per U. S. dollar and all transactions were required to be directed through authorized banks.

The Fund said that consultations on unification of the Iranian exchange system would continue.

(7) Nicaragua

Modifications in Nicaragua's exchange system, to which the Fund agreed, were published on 20 October.

The Fund noted that Nicaragua's foreign exchange practices had given rise to numerous rates, both for exports and imports.

The Government of Nicaragua had undertaken to establish a uniform effective rate for exports and other receipts set at 6.60 Cordobas to the U. S. dollar.

The basic rate for import transactions and other payments was placed at 7 Cordobas to the dollar. Surcharges of 1 cordoba per dollar on imports of semi-essential goods and 3 Cordobas per dollar on non-essential imports were also established.

The par value of 5 Cordobas to the dollar was not changed, but under the new system its use was limited to government transactions, which were not to exceed 20 per cent of all exchange receipts.

The consultations with Nicaragua would continue, the Fund said, with a view to further simplification of the exchange system.

c. GOLD POLICY

On 18 June 1947 the Executive Board had issued a statement which was communicated to the member countries on the Fund's gold policy. In this, the Fund announced its opposition to external purchases or sales of gold at premium prices which directly or indirectly produce exchange transactions at depreciated rates, and to the granting of any subsidies on gold production which would raise the price of gold, thereby undermining exchange stability.

During the fourth annual meeting of the Board of Governors in September 1949, the Union of South Africa introduced a resolution which sought agreement by the Fund to sales of half of all newly-mined gold at premium prices. The Board of Governors referred this resolution to the Executive Directors for study and report.

On 3 May 1950 the Executive Board issued a statement⁶ reviewing the different aspects of the question. It advised against the proposal of the Union of South Africa and concluded that there was no reason to change the Fund's policy. The Board also studied, together with many other relevant factors, the question of whether there should be a uniform change in the par values of all currencies in relation to gold, and decided that there was no economic justification for recommending such a change.

In reaching its decision to retain the Fund's gold policy, the Executive Board was of the opinion that, at a time when many countries are faced with large international payments deficits which have to be met by inter-governmental grants and credits, any change in the Fund's gold policy that might divert additional amounts of gold from monetary reserves into private hoards would be undesirable. Moreover, as there exist in many parts of the world markets in which foreign exchange is dealt in at off-parity rates, any extension of premium gold transactions would be likely to encourage a greater volume of such exchange dealings. This, it indicated, would not only be unsatisfactory from the point of view of exchange stability, but might affect adversely and unfairly the trade of a number of countries.

The Fund announced on 24 October that it had held consultations with Canada concerning an extension at a reduced rate during 1951 of the Canadian gold mining subsidy programme, instituted in 1948 with the Fund's approval.

Under the proposed modified subsidy both the proportion of output eligible for assistance and the rate of assistance per ounce would be reduced. Payment was to be measured at half the amount by which production costs exceeded $22, with the maximum amount of assistance reduced from $16 to $11.50 per ounce. The subsidy would be paid on one third of the current output of the mine receiving this assistance, or on the excess of current output above two thirds of the 1949 level, whichever was greater.

The Fund's Executive Board decided that the proposed subsidy was not inconsistent with the Fund's policy, and said the Fund would continue to review this programme in consultation with the Canadian authorities.

2. Technical Assistance

The Fund has maintained an extensive programme of technical assistance to help members improve their foreign exchange systems while bringing their international monetary policies into line with those of the Fund. This aid is extended through staff missions to many parts of the world and through studies, reports and publications.

The Fund has advised countries on changes in par values or exchange rates, modifications in multiple currency practices and alterations in the scope or type of exchange controls, as well as on questions of monetary, credit and fiscal policies that have an important bearing on balance of payments developments. Its technicians have assisted members in establishing and perfecting institutional machinery, such as central banking systems and exchange control administration. With some countries the Fund has conferred on techniques for improving their collection and presentation of financial statistics. It has discussed with members the monetary impact of development programmes, levels of monetary reserves, use of Fund resources, gold transactions and gold subsidies.

During the year, technical representatives of the Fund visited 23 countries, some of them several times. The Managing Director and members of the Executive Board took part in some missions, and occasionally outside experts served.

Typical of these activities was the work of several missions which advised the Government of Honduras on the establishment of that country's first central bank. Another mission made a detailed analysis of Chile's financial position. In response to a request from the United Nations, the Fund sent representatives to advise the United Nations Commissioner in Libya on the area's banking and currency problems. The Philippines requested and received the assistance of experts on foreign exchange controls.

The Fund published in 1950 its first annual report on exchange restrictions. A new journal begun during the year, entitled Staff Papers, makes generally available some of the studies originally prepared by staff members for the use of the Fund's officials. The Fund also published International Financial Statistics, a monthly statistical bulletin; the weekly International Financial News Survey and a Balance of Payments Yearbook.

E. ADMINISTRATIVE BUDGET

The Fund does not rely for its annual budget upon contributions from its members, and, accordingly, the appropriate authorities of the Fund enjoy full autonomy in deciding the form and content of the Fund's budget. In its agreement with the Fund, the United Nations has recognized this special situation and takes this factor into consideration in its interpretation of Article 17 of the Charter.

The administrative budget of the Fund for the fiscal year ending 30 April 1951 is as follows:

Personal services	$2,963,315.00
Contributions to staff benefits	270,000.00

VIII. The Universal Postal Union (UPU)¹

The Postal Union was founded in 1874 by the first International Postal Congress held at Berne. Before that date, international exchanges of mail were regulated by numerous special agreements concluded between countries or groups of countries. The great variety of rates and conditions of dispatch and the diversity of scales of charges etc. resulting from that situation caused difficulties, which increased as traffic grew, to the public and the administrative authorities.

On 9 October 1874, the plenipotentiaries of the 22 countries represented at the Congress signed, subject to ratification by their Governments "a treaty concerning the establishment of a General Postal Union", to enter into force on 1 July 1875. The exchange of the instruments of ratification of this treaty took place at Berne on 3 May 1875.

This first International Postal Treaty considerably changed and simplified the existing state of affairs. Its first article declared that the countries concluding the Treaty formed a single postal territory for the reciprocal exchange of mail between their post offices. For well-defined classes of mail (letters, postcards, printed matter, etc.) addressed to any part of the territory of the General Postal Union, each country was to charge uniform rates. All apportionment of such charges between sender and receiver countries was abolished. Each administration was to retain the charges it collected, except that it was obliged to pay, in accordance with fixed rates, intermediary administrations which handled its mail in transit. Freedom of such transit was guaranteed throughout the territory of the Union. The Treaty also introduced arbitration procedure for the settlement of disputes and provided for the establishment of a central office, called the International Bureau of the Union, the expenses of which would be borne by the administrations of all States parties to the Treaty.

Finally, it laid down that a congress of plenipotentiaries of the participating countries should meet periodically with a view to perfecting the machinery of the Union, introducing necessary improvements, and discussing matters of common interest. Twelve such congresses have met, as follows:

Berne	1874	Madrid	1920
Paris	1878	Stockholm	1924
Lisbon	1885	London	1929
Vienna	1891	Cairo	1934
Washington	1897	Buenos Aires	1939
Rome	1906	Paris	1947

In addition, several conferences or committees of representatives of postal administrations have met, under the Union's auspices, to examine and discuss special technical questions referred to them by congresses or to prepare for congresses.

The Paris Congress of 1878 considerably modified and eased the Postal Treaty provisions for the admission of new members. While the first Treaty laid down certain conditions and provided for a waiting period to allow member administrations to submit objections, the revised Paris Convention simply laid down that countries which were not members would be admitted to membership at their request. Accessions were to be notified through diplomatic channels to the Swiss Government, and by that Government to all members of the Union. Members were bound by all the provisions and enjoyed all the benefits specified in the Convention. The Union, the name of which was then changed to "Universal Postal Union", thus became an "open" Union which any country could join by simple, unilateral declaration of adherence, no prior consultation among members being required.

By the time of the London Congress of 1929, the Postal Union comprised the whole world with the exception of a few isolated territories, its members as a whole representing an area of more than 44,000,000 square miles and a population of more than 2,000,000,000.

These conditions and easy terms of adherence existed until 1 July 1948, the date of entry into force of the Universal Postal Convention as revised by the Paris Congress in 1947. This Congress introduced a new article into the Convention providing that the Union would be brought into relationship with the United Nations in accordance with the terms of an agreement, the text of which was annexed to the Convention.² As a result of this agreement, and because of circumstances arising from the Second World War, the article relating to accession to the Convention was modified. Under the new terms, the Swiss Government has been required, since 1 July 1948, to submit each new request for admission to the members of the Union, and the country concerned is considered admitted only if its request is approved by at least two thirds of the members constituting the Union.

A. PURPOSES AND FUNCTIONS

The aim of the Union was laid down in article I of the Berne Treaty mentioned above. The terms of this article have been substantially maintained throughout the successive revisions which have taken place. They are as follows:

"The countries between which the present Convention is concluded form, under the title of the Universal Postal Union, a single postal territory for the reciprocal exchange of correspondence."

The Stockholm Congress of 1924 added the following sentence:

"It is also the aim of the Postal Union to provide for the organization and improvement of the various international postal services."

The Paris Congress in 1947 further added to this sentence the words "and to promote the development of international collaboration in this sphere".

The functions of the Union are determined by the Acts drawn up by the Congresses. These Acts comprise:

(1) a main Convention laying down (a) the statute of the Union and (b) provisions governing the letter-post, which includes letters, postcards, printed matter, samples, commercial papers, small parcels and phonopost articles (e.g. phonograph records);

(2) seven accessory agreements covering insured letters and boxes, parcel post, cash on delivery articles, money orders, debt collection, transfers to and from postal cheque accounts and subscriptions to newspapers and periodicals. (Special provisions annexed to the main Convention and the parcel post agreement govern the optional transport of these articles by air. Similarly, a supplement to the money order agreement regulates the optional exchange of travellers' orders.)

Accession to the main Convention is obligatory for all members, but accession to the other agreements is optional. The performance of certain special services referred to in the Convention is therefore limited to arrangements between countries which have agreed to undertake them. The provisions of these Acts of the Union acquire the status of law in each country which ratifies them, and it is therefore the responsibility of each party to the Convention or to one of the agreements to ensure the application of the respective provisions. Each of these acts is accompanied by executive regulations, which have also been adopted by the Congress but signed by representatives in the name of their respective postal administrations and not, as in the case of the Convention and the agreements, in their capacity as plenipotentiaries of their Governments.

B. ORGANIZATION

UPU is composed of the Universal Postal Congress, the Executive and Liaison Committee and the International Bureau of the UPU. In addition, special sessions of the Congress may be called at the request of two thirds of the members of the Union. Other committees, of a temporary character, may be established by the Congress to study particular questions.

The Universal Postal Congress meets at the latest within five years from the date of entry into force of the Acts of the preceding Congress in order to revise these Acts or to complete them, if necessary. Each member is represented at the Congress by one or more plenipotentiary representatives, who are given the necessary powers by their Governments. A member may also be represented by the delegation of another member, although no delegation may represent more than one country other than its own. Each member has one vote in the Congress. Every Congress fixes the place of meeting of the following Congress, which is convened, after consultation with the International Bureau, by the Government of the country in which it is to meet. This Government is also responsible for notifying all other members of the Union of the decisions taken by the Congress.

² For texts of the Universal Postal Convention of Paris, 1947, the Final Protocol of the Convention and the Agreement between the United Nations and UPU, see Y.U.N., 1947-48, pp. 893-908.

The Executive and Liaison Committee is composed of nineteen member States elected by the Congress to function during the period between Congresses. At least half of the members of the Committee must be re-elected at each Congress, but no country can be elected by three successive Congresses. The Committee normally holds one session a year; its seat is at Berne. Its functions include:

- (1) the maintenance of close relations with members of the Union, with a view to improving the international postal service;
- (2) the study of technical questions affecting that service and the transmission of the results of such studies to the members of the Union;
- (3) the establishment and maintenance of working relations with the United Nations, specialized agencies and other international organizations;
- (4) the control of activities of the International Bureau.

The Committee elects from among its own members its President and four Vice-Presidents, and appoints, on the recommendation of the Swiss Government, the Director and other top-ranking personnel of the International Bureau.

The International Bureau of the UPU, operating at Berne under the supervision of the Swiss Supervisory Authority, serves as the organ of liaison, information and consultation for members of the Union. In particular, it:

- (1) assembles, publishes and distributes information of all kinds which administrations have to communicate to one another in order to carry on the various international postal services;
- (2) gives opinions, at the request of the interested parties, on questions in dispute;
- (3) notifies members of requests for amendments to the Acts of the Congress and of changes adopted;
- (4) makes the necessary preparations for congresses and conferences; and
- (5) in general, undertakes studies, consultations and other matters as requested by members of the Union.

The Bureau also serves postal administrations as a clearing house for the settlement of postal accounts, especially those relating to transit payments and reply coupons.

C. ACTIVITIES DURING 1950

During 1950, the Universal Postal Union continued to fulfil its essential function of ensuring the organization and improvement of the various postal services and of promoting the development of international co-operation in this field.

Among its principal activities was the annual session of the Executive and Liaison Committee at Montreux from 15 to 26 May. The agenda consisted of 48 items.

The Committee decided that in view of the technical character of UPU and the de facto situation existing in China, apart from any political considerations, the representative of the People's Republic of China should be allowed to attend the Montreux session as the sole accredited representative of China. The Committee also decided that, after the United Nations General Assembly had considered the question at its fifth session, the Administrations of UPU would be consulted in a referendum on the question of Chinese representation.

Problems concerning air mail occupied a large part of the Montreux discussions. In this field, the first objective of UPU is to bring about a reduction in the air transport charges paid to the airlines, and to this end numerous negotiations have been undertaken by UPU with the International Air Transport Association (IATA) and with ICAO. As a result of negotiations with

IATA, the latter's fifth General Assembly held at The Hague from 12 to 16 September 1949, had recommended: the reduction of the charges for AO (postal articles other than letters and postcards) and for parcels to a fixed rate of 1.50 gold francs per metric ton (as against the previous rate of from 1.50 to 2 gold francs) and the reduction of the charge for newspapers from 1.50 to a fixed rate of 1 gold franc per metric ton. The Executive and Liaison Committee, advised that the airlines had accepted these recommendations, which could therefore be considered as finally adopted, accordingly decided to notify all postal administrations of the new rates. In view of the upward trend of world prices and of the financial position of the airlines, however, the IATA felt that it could not agree to a reduction in the rates for LC (letters and postcards). These rates therefore remained at a maximum of 3 gold francs per metric ton for mail carried by category A carriers (European airlines and carriers with similar operational expenses), and a maximum of 6 gold francs for mail transported by category B carriers (carriers whose operational costs justify higher rates). UPU had proposed the reduction of these rates to 2 and 5 gold francs, respectively. The air transport companies informed the Executive and Liaison Committee at Montreux that they were not yet in a position to reduce these rates. The Committee decided to convene a joint international conference between IATA and the Executive and Liaison Committee to meet at Cairo in January 1951, at which the points of view both of the postal Administrations and of the airlines could be put forward. The conference would examine and seek conclusions on the question of LC rates primarily, as well as other questions affecting airmail traffic, including questions raised by the Argentine Postal Administration concerning air-mail rates, international air time-tables and fixing of kilometric distances.

The Committee also took note of the provisional results of the work undertaken by ICAO with respect to airmail transport costs and the division of air services into categories A and B. ICAO subsequently completed these studies,³ which were transmitted to UPU in December 1950, in time for appraisal' by the joint conference.

The Committee also considered proposals for revising and editing the Universal Postal Convention and its Executive Regulations submitted to it by a sub-committee consisting of Egypt, France, the Netherlands, Switzerland and Yugoslavia, previously set up for this purpose. After long discussions, the Committee decided to adopt the sub-committee's proposals for presentation to the Universal Postal Congress at Brussels in 1952. The principal change suggested was that all the provisions dealing with letter mail in the Paris Convention of 1947 should be collected in a "letter mail agreement". The new Convention and the new agreement, it was proposed, would both have executive regulations.

With a view to simplifying the international exchange of parcels and enabling a greater number of Administrations to sign the Parcel Post Agreement, the Committee established a sub-committee of France, the United Kingdom, Switzerland and Czechoslovakia to study a revision of the form and content of the Agreement for submission to the Brussels Congress. Administrations which had not signed the Agreement were to be invited to submit suggestions for the drafting of a new text which they would be prepared to accept.

The Committee decided that it was not possible at the present time to establish a standard method of setting up postal statistics to be recommended to the Administrations of UPU. It decided, however, that its sub-committee on the subject should continue its work.

In addition, the Committee examined a number of draft resolutions, proposals and suggestions from the Administrations of the Union concerning questions of detail and dealt with several other questions of a purely internal character, such, for example, as the development of the film library of the International Bureau and the modernization of the review, L'Union Postale.

The working group set up by the Technical Transit Committee at its session at Interlaken in 1949 to consider problems of transit payment rates for correspondence met at Axenstein, Switzerland, from 25 to 29 September. This working group undertook a careful examination of the further information furnished by the Administrations concerning transport charges on the various transit routes and weights of mails transported. The question of transit rates was to be further considered by the next session of the Technical Transit Committee to be held at Pontresina, Switzerland, in June 1951.

The International Bureau of UPU has continued, in accordance with article 26 of the Universal Postal Convention, to serve as the organ of liaison, information and consultation to the countries of the Union with a view to assisting the development of international postal services. The Bureau has continued to collect, co-ordinate, publish and distribute to the Administrations of the Union information of all kinds concerning postal services. The Bureau has continued the publication, in collaboration with certain Administrations, of various brochures dealing with technical postal matters, including: pamphlets on road mail van services; the use of motor vehicles to transport correspondence inside cities; modern methods for washing, cleaning and repairing mail bags; and sorting in railway postal wagons. It was also preparing a general catalogue of all postal documentation in its possession. It also continued the studies and the work of translation and documentation assigned to it by the Acts of the Union. Thus, in 1950, the International Bureau published and sent to Administrations 261 circulars, 129 bulletins, 41 printed letters, 8,969,737 international reply coupons, 136,040 postal identity cards, 121,000 travellers' orders, 12,100 covers for books of travellers' orders, as well as various reports, lists and compilations, including: a general account of the transit charges for the year 1949, general account of the international reply coupons for the year 1949, list of the heads of the postal Administrations, compilation of the reduced rates applying in limited Unions or by virtue of special agreements, equivalents in national currencies of the rates expressed in gold francs in the Convention and the revised Paris Agreements of 1947, supplements to the general list of airmail services, maps of the airlines and statistics on postal services, 1948. The Bureau has also distributed 2,527 series of postage stamps of all types, comprising 2,204 kinds of ordinary stamps, 48 blocks of stamps and 275 stamps printed or embossed on stationery, which brings to 897,464 the total of postage stamps distributed to the Administrations of the Union.

The International Bureau has also carried forward the work of preparing the new dictionary of post offices, to be published in April 1951, the publication and modernization of its monthly review, L'Union Postale, and the development of its film library.

D. BUDGET

Each Congress fixes the maximum figure for the ordinary annual expenses of the International Bureau. These expenses, as well as extraordinary charges resulting from sessions of the Congress, conferences or committees, and the charges which arise from special work entrusted to the Bureau are met in common by all the members of the Union. These are divided, for this purpose, into seven classes, of which each contributes to the expenditures in the following proportion:

First class:	25 units	Fifth class:	5 units
Second class:	20 units	Sixth class:	3 units
Third class:	15 units	Seventh class:	1 unit
Fourth class:	10 units

In case of a new adherence to the Convention, the Government of the Swiss Confederation determines, in agreement with the Government of the member concerned, the class to which it will belong from the point of view of contributing to the expenses of the Bureau.

Pursuant to the decision of the Paris Congress of 1947, the annual ordinary expenses of the International Bureau must not exceed 500,000 gold francs (equivalent to approximately 714,826 Swiss francs), and those of the Executive and Liaison Committee 100,000 gold francs (equivalent to approximately 142,857 Swiss francs). To these sums must be added the expenses resulting from the special work assigned to the Bureau.

The Swiss Administration supervises the expenses of the International Bureau and advances the necessary funds. These sums must be repaid by the debtor Administrations as quickly as possible and at the latest before the end of the year on which the account is rendered. If this time is exceeded, the sums due are charged interest at the rate of 5 per cent per year, from the date of the expiration of the period.

As of 31 December 1950, countries were classified as follows for the apportionment of contributions:

1st class: Argentina, Australia, Brazil, Canada, China, France, India, Italy, Japan, New Zealand, Pakistan, Union of South Africa, USSR, United Kingdom, United States

2nd class: (none)

3rd class: Algeria, Belgium, Czechoslovakia, Egypt, French Overseas Territories and Territories administered as such, Indo-China, Mexico, Netherlands, Indonesia, Poland, Romania, Sweden, Switzerland, Turkey, Ukrainian SSR, United Kingdom Overseas Colonies, Protectorates and Territories under Trusteeship, United States Possessions, Yugoslavia

4th class: Denmark, Finland, Hungary, Ireland, Norway, Portugal, Portuguese Colonies in West Africa, Portuguese Colonies in East Africa, Asia and Oceania

5th class: Austria, Bulgaria, Byelorussian SSR, Ceylon, Chile, Colombia, French Morocco, Greece, Iran, Peru, Tunisia

6th class: Afghanistan, Albania, Bolivia, Burma, Costa Rica, Cuba, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, El Salvador, Ethiopia, Guatemala, Haiti, Honduras, Israel, Luxembourg, Netherlands Antilles and Surinam, Nicaragua, Panama, Paraguay, Thailand, Uruguay, Venezuela.

7th class: Belgian Congo, Iceland, Iraq, Jordan, Lebanon, Liberia, Philippines, San Marino, Saudi Arabia, Syria, Vatican City, Yemen

Contributory shares covering the ordinary and extraordinary expenses for the year 1950 were fixed as follows:

CLASS OF CONTRIBUTION		CONTRIBUTORY SHARES
		(gold francs)	(Swiss francs)
1st class:	25 units	23,362.50	33,375
2nd class:	20 units	18,690.00	26,700
3rd class:	15 units	14,017.50	20,025
4th class:	10 units	9,345.00	13,350
5th class:	5 units	4,672.50	6,675
6th class:	3 units	2,803.50	4,005
7th class:	1 unit	934.50	1,335

Receipts and expenditures for the year 1950 may be summarized as follows:

RECEIPTS		Expenses of the Executive and Liaison Committee
Ordinary:	Swiss francs
Sale of documents and other receipts (including surplus of contributions for 1949)	56,625.97	Surplus of contributions for 1950 (to be added to the receipts for 1951)	335.17

IX. The International Telecommunication Union (ITU)¹

The Convention establishing an International Telegraph Union was signed at Paris on 17 May 1865 by the plenipotentiaries of twenty founding States. In 1885, at Berlin, the first regulations relating to international telephone services were inserted in the Telegraph Regulations annexed to this Convention.

At the first International Radiotelegraph Conference, held at Berlin, 27 States signed the International Radiotelegraph Convention of 3 November 1906 establishing the principle of compulsory intercommunication between vessels at sea and the land.

In 1932, the International Telegraph Convention and the International Radiotelegraph Convention were merged to form the International Telecommunication Convention, which was signed at Madrid on 9 December 1932. Under this Convention, which came into force on 1 January 1934, the International Telecommunication Union replaced the International Telegraph Union.

Following is a list of the principal conferences held to date by the agency now known as the International Telecommunication Union:

Telegraph Conferences: Paris, 1865; Vienna, 1868; Rome, 1872; St. Petersburg, 1875; London, 1879; Berlin, 1885; Paris, 1890; Budapest, 1896; London, 1903; Lisbon, 1908; Paris, 1925; Brussels, 1928; Madrid, 1932;

Telegraph and Telephone Conferences: Cairo, 1938; Paris, 1949;

Radio Conferences: Berlin, 1906; London, 1912; Washington, 1927; Madrid, 1932; Cairo, 1938; Atlantic City, 1947.

From the outset, ITU was an agency which, by means of conferences meeting normally every five years (except during the two world wars), revised and kept up to date the basic Convention and the regulations governing international telegraph, telephone and radio communications. By means of a permanent secretariat, known as the Bureau of the Union, it circulated information furnished by member countries as necessary for the smooth functioning of the international telecommunication services, and published a monthly journal. After the Second World War, in view of post-war political changes and of recent scientific advances it became necessary to expand the structure of the organization. The Plenipotentiary Conference, held at Atlantic City in 1947, drafted a new Convention,² which was signed in October 1947 by 72 of the 78 States, territories or groups of territories which, according to Annex I of this Convention, can become members of the Union with full rights upon signature and ratification of or accession to the Convention. The new Convention reorganized the Union and established new permanent organs, including the Administrative Council and the International Frequency Registration Board (IFRB).

The Atlantic City Convention came into effect on 1 January 1949 but certain of its provisions were applied beginning 1 January 1948.

An agreement establishing the relationship between ITU and the United Nations was also approved by the Atlantic City Plenipotentiary Conference and later approved, on 15 November 1947, by the United Nations General Assembly. The agreement, annexed to the revised Convention, came into force on 1 January 1949 at the same time as the Convention.

The Administrative Radio Conference, held concurrently with the Plenipotentiary Conference at Atlantic City in 1947, established a new table of frequency allocation, allocating the revised frequency bands to the various services, such as fixed, maritime, aeronautical and broadcasting. It established a Provisional Frequency Board (PFB) to prepare, with the assistance of the IFRB, a draft new International Frequency List. The PFB was to assign frequencies to fixed stations, tropical broadcasting stations and land stations within the frequency band between 10 kc/s and 30 mc/s. It was to incorporate in the draft new International Frequency List the assignment plans which it prepared, together with assignment plans prepared by various conferences for the regional or exclusive service bands. Several such conferences had been held by the end of 1949. They included: the European Broadcasting Conference, held in Copenhagen from 25 June to 15 September 1948; the Maritime Regional Radio Conference, also held in Copenhagen, from 25 June to 17 September 1948; the Aeronautical Radio Conference, the first session of which was held in Geneva from 15 May to 25 September 1948 and the second session, also in Geneva, from 1 August to 14 October 1949; the first session of the third North American Regional Broadcasting Conference, held in Montreal from 12 September to 8 December 1949; the Special Administrative Conference for the North East Atlantic (Loran Conference), held in Geneva from 17 January to 15 February 1949; and the International High Frequency Broadcasting Conference, held at Mexico City from 22 October 1948 to 10 April 1949, which drew up an International High Frequency Broadcasting Agreement. In addition Administrative Radio Conferences were held for three ITU regions: for Region 1 (Europe, including the USSR, Africa and the territories excepted from Region 3, below) in Geneva from 18 May to 17 September 1949; for Region 2 (the American continent and Greenland) in Washington from 25 April to 9 July 1949; and for Region 3 (roughly, Australasia and Asia except the USSR, the Mongolian People's Republic, Turkey, Israel, Saudi Arabia, Iran, Iraq, Lebanon, Syria and Yemen) in Geneva from 18 May to 4 November 1949.

The International Telegraph and Telephone Regulations, revised at Cairo in 1938, were amended by the International Administrative Telegraph and Telephone Conference, held in Paris from 20 May to 5 August 1949.

A. PURPOSES AND FUNCTIONS

The purposes of ITU, as set forth in article 3 of the International Telecommunication Convention, Atlantic City, 1947, are:

- (a) to maintain and extend international cooperation for the improvement and rational use of telecommunication of all kinds;
- (b) to promote the development of technical facilities and their most efficient operation with a view to improving the efficiency of telecommunication services, increasing their usefulness and making them, so far as possible, generally available to the public;
- (c) to harmonize the actions of nations in the attainment of those common ends.

To achieve these purposes, the Union undertakes to:

- (a) effect allocation of the radio frequency spectrum and registration of radio frequency assignments in order to avoid harmful interference between radio stations of different countries;
- (b) foster collaboration among its Members and Associate Members with a view to the establishment of rates at levels as low as possible consistent with an efficient service and taking into account the necessity for maintaining independent financial administration of telecommunication on a sound basis;
- (c) promote the adoption of measures for ensuring the safety of life through the cooperation of telecommunication service;
- (d) undertake studies, formulate recommendations, and collect and publish information on telecommunication matters for the benefit of all Members and Associate Members.

B. ORGANIZATION

As provided by the Atlantic City Convention, the structure of ITU consists of a Plenipotentiary Conference, Administrative Conferences and the permanent organs of the Union: the Administrative Council, the General Secretariat, the International Frequency Registration Board (IFRB), the International Telegraph Consultative Committee (CCIT), the International Telephone Consultative Committee (CCIF) and the International Radio Consultative Committee (CCIR).³

The supreme organ of the Union is the Plenipotentiary Conference, at which all members of the Union may be represented. It considers the report of the Administrative Council on the activities of the Union; establishes the basis for the ITU budget for a five-year period; approves the accounts; elects the members whose representatives constitute the Administrative Council; revises the Convention if it considers this necessary; enters into and revises formal agreements with other international bodies; and deals with such telecommunication questions as may be necessary. This Conference normally meets once every five years, at a place and date fixed by the preceding Conference. Each member has one vote in the Union.

³ The official abbreviations, CCIT, CCIF and CCIR, derive from the French titles of these consultative committees: Comité consultatif international télégraphique, Comité consultatif international téléphonique and Comité consultatif international des radiocommunications.

Decisions on the admission of a new member to ITU require a two-thirds majority. All other decisions of ITU are taken by majority vote.

Administrative Conferences, at which all members may be represented, generally meet at the same time and place as the Plenipotentiary Conference. The Administrative Telegraph and Telephone Conference and the Administrative Radio Conference revise the Administrative Regulations with which they are respectively concerned. The Administrative Radio Conference, moreover, elects the members of the IFRB and reviews its activities. Extraordinary administrative conferences may be convened by a decision of the Plenipotentiary Conference, or when at least twenty members of the Union have made known to the Administrative Council their desire that such a conference shall be held to consider agenda proposed by them, or on the proposal of the Administrative Council. Regional administrative conferences and special international administrative conferences, to deal with special telecommunication questions, are also held.

The Administrative Council is composed of a representative of each of eighteen members of ITU elected by the Plenipotentiary Conference. The Council supervises the Union's administrative functions between sessions of the Plenipotentiary Conference, reviews and approves the annual budget, appoints the Secretary General of the Union, and co-ordinates the work of ITU with that of other international organizations. The Council normally meets at the seat of the Union once a year and at such other times as it thinks necessary, or at the request of six of its members. The Secretary General of the Union acts as Secretary of the Administrative Council.

In the new organization decided on at Atlantic City, the General Secretariat succeeds the Bureau of the International Telecommunication Union, which had been located at Berne since 1868; Geneva was chosen by the Atlantic City Plenipotentiary Conference as the new headquarters of ITU, and the General Secretariat was officially transferred there on 26 October 1948. Under the direction of the Secretary General of ITU the General Secretariat carries out the secretariat work preparatory to and following conferences of the Union; it publishes the recommendations and principal reports of the permanent organs of the Union, international or regional telecommunication agreements, a journal of general information and documentation concerning telecommunication (Telecommunication Journal), general data and other official documents of the Union. The General Secretariat also prepares, for submission to the Administrative Council, an annual budget, and draws up an annual financial operating account.

The International Frequency Registration Board (IFRB) consists of eleven members, appointed by as many members of the ITU elected on a regional basis by the Administrative Radio Conference. Each regular session of the Administrative Radio Conference determines the number of members of the IFRB. The Atlantic City Radio Conference elected the first members. Members serve, as stated in article 6 of the Convention, not as representatives of their countries, or of a region, but "as custodians of an international public trust". The IFRB records all frequency assignments and furnishes advice to members of ITU with a view to the operation of the maximum practicable number of radio channels in those portions of the spectrum where harmful interference may occur.

The International Telegraph Consultative Committee (CCIT) studies technical, operating and tariff questions relating to telegraphy and facsimile,⁴ and issues recommendations on them. The International Telephone Consultative Committee (CCIF) has the same duties in relation to telephony. The International Radio Consultative Committee (CCIR) studies and issues recommendations concerning technical and operating questions relating to radio, the solution of which depends principally on considerations of a technical radio character. The work of each consultative committee is reviewed by its Plenary Assembly, which normally meets once every two years. The Plenary Assembly appoints the director of the consultative committee concerned and establishes study groups to deal with particular questions. The CCIR has a vice-director who is a specialist in the technical aspects of broadcasting. Each committee is served by a specialized secretariat and may have the use of a laboratory and of technical installations. In 1950, however, the CCIF was the only consultative committee with a laboratory.

C. ACTIVITIES DURING 1950

The year 1950 saw the entry into force of the International Telegraph and Telephone Regulations (Paris Revision, 1949) and of the European Broadcasting Convention and the European Radiomarine Convention, signed at Copenhagen in 1948.

In 1950, the Administrative Council held its fifth session, from 1 September to 11 October. The agenda comprised 59 items, among which were the various major problems arising from the postponement of the Extraordinary Administrative Radio Conference (see below).

According to article 1 of the Atlantic City Convention, the 72 signatories listed in Annex I to the Convention could become members of ITU upon ratification of the Convention; the other six countries listed in Annex I, being non-signatories, could become members upon accession to the Convention. States not listed in Annex I could become members, if they were Members of the United Nations or if their applications were approved by two thirds of the members of ITU, by acceding to the Convention.

Certain countries or territories listed in Annex I had not ratified or acceded to the Convention by the time of the Administrative Council's fifth session. In the interest of the universality of the telecommunication services, the Council resolved that, pending decision by the forthcoming Plenipotentiary Conference, all countries and territories listed in Annex I, whether members or not, could participate on equal terms in administrative conferences or consultative committee meetings and in reaching decisions on any questions, with one exception—only members, i.e. parties to the Convention by ratification or accession, could vote on the admission of new members.

During 1950, Austria, Chile, the Dominican Republic, El Salvador, the French Protectorates of Morocco and Tunisia, Greece, Guatemala, Hungary, Iraq, Nicaragua, Peru, Turkey and Venezuela deposited their instruments of ratification of the Convention. These ratifications brought to 64 the number of signatories which had deposited their instruments of ratification with the General Secretariat, which, since 1948, had been the depository of the instruments of ratification and accession. Of the six non-signatory countries listed in Annex I to the Convention, Bolivia, Liberia and Paraguay deposited their instruments of accession during 1950. In addition, Jordan, which was not included in Annex I, became a member by acceding to the Convention on 25 September 1950.

On the proposal of the Council, the majority of Administrations agreed to postpone the Administrative Telegraph and Telephone Conference from 1952 to 1954, and of the Plenary Assembly of the CCIT, which was to have met at The Hague in 1951, until 1953, on the understanding that this would not involve any interruption in the work of the CCIT study groups.

The Council considered numerous questions, such as finance, personnel, the activities of permanent organs of ITU, and relations with the United Nations, specialized agencies and other international organizations. It decided to accept, on behalf of the ITU, the Convention on the Privileges and Immunities of the Specialized Agencies, but recommended that Members of the Union, in acceding to this Convention, should make an observation regarding the impracticability of complying fully with the provisions of article 4, section 11, of the Convention, which grants government privileges to the telecommunication services of the specialized agencies.

The Council, to facilitate the work of the next Plenipotentiary Conference, invited its members to propose amendments to certain provisions of the Convention and the General Regulations which it had found difficult to interpret and apply.

In order that the United Nations may receive the Union's budget estimates in good time, the Council decided that instead of meeting in the autumn, it would in the future meet in the spring, and that its next session should begin on 16 April 1951.

1. ITU's International Consultative Committees

The International Telegraph Consultative Committee (CCIT), received during 1950 a steady flow of comments from Administrations on questions under study. Upon approval by the Administrations of postponement of the Plenary Assembly of the CCIT from 1951 until 1953, the Council recommended that the CCIT should nevertheless actively pursue its work, and that, in case of need, meetings of several study groups might be held to agree on recommendations which could then be forwarded to the Administrations for adoption as they saw fit.

The CCIT Sub-Committee for Telegraph Maintenance met at Geneva from 2 to 7 October 1950 at the same time as the International Telephone Consultative Committee's (CCIF) Sub-Committee for Telephone Maintenance. As a result, the CCIF recommendations relating to voice frequency telegraph circuits were revised.

Study Group No. XI (international service of telegraph subscribers and rates relating thereto) met in Geneva from 2 to 11 November 1950, and new draft regulations for the Telex service and several draft recommendations were submitted, for approval as provisional recommendations, to Administrations participating in the work of the CCIT.

The International Telephone Consultative Committee (CCIF) study groups were very active during 1950. In February 1950 at Algiers, and in October 1950 at Geneva, meetings were held by the Sub-Committee for the Mediterranean Basin of the joint committee for the general switching programme in Europe and in the Mediterranean Basin. Meetings of the committee for the international field trials of semi-automatic telephone operation were held in May 1950 at London and in October 1950 at Geneva. This Committee took important decisions concerning the constitution and operation of two trial networks, one in Western Europe and the other in Scandinavia. In these networks international calls will be made, using the services of but a single operator and automatic remote-control switching. In October 1950, at Geneva, the meeting of the permanent maintenance sub-committee drew up, inter alia, a programme for periodical maintenance of international circuits in Europe for 1951. The drafting committee on recommendations concerning the protection of underground cables against the action of stray currents from electric traction networks (CRE) met in June 1950, at Paris, and in October 1950, at Geneva. This committee is to recommend measures to facilitate the co-existence of underground cables and electric tramways or electric railways, without corrosion to the sheaths of underground cables. In September and October 1950, the following study groups and sub-committees held meetings in Geneva:

Study Group 1, on protection of telephone lines against disturbance from electric power installations;

Sub-committee on urgent transmission questions, including plans for constructing and maintaining lines between the two terminal trunk offices in an international call, for telephony, telegraphy, relay of programme broadcast transmissions, or television;

Sub-committee for the specification of quality of transmission, which drew up a programme for the experiments in progress in the CCIF laboratory designed to lay a new foundation for the specification of telephone transmission quality in the chain of lines and devices linking either the calling or called subscriber to the terminal trunk exchange on which he depends;

Study Group 5, on co-ordination of radio and wire transmission in long-distance telecommunication;

Study Groups 6 and 7, on telephone operation and tariff questions;

Study Group 8, on telephone signalling and switching; International telephone vocabulary committee.

The International Radio Consultative Committee (CCIR) during 1950 was primarily concerned with preparing for its Plenary Assembly, to be held in June 1951 at Geneva. Study Group 6 (ionospheric propagation) and Study Group 10 (broadcasting) met from 13 to 25 March 1950. Study Group 11 (television) held a meeting from 27 March to 5 May 1950, which took the form of visits to the television stations in operation or planned for the near future in the United States, France, the Netherlands and the United Kingdom. This Study Group, which met afterwards in London from 8 to 13 May 1950, reached unanimous agreement on five points of a technical character, but was unable to recommend television standards of world-wide application, in view of the fact that television services in various parts of the world are based on different standards and cannot be modified for economic reasons. However, seven European countries agreed to the adoption of a common standard (625 lines per picture and 25 pictures a second). This is also the fundamental standard recommended by various other countries, either in Europe or elsewhere, which were not represented at that particular meeting. To settle certain outstanding details relative to this standard a further meeting of the Group was held in Geneva in July 1950, and attended by representatives of Austria, Belgium, Denmark, the United States, France, Italy, the United Kingdom, Sweden and Switzerland. Those European countries in favour of a 625-line definition reached unanimous agreement regarding certain technical details of the system, and the United States acceded to an agreement for the adoption of a common line frequency, as proposed by the Director of the CCIR at the London meeting. Although these recommendations were subject to approval by the next Plenary Assembly, they were favourably received in a number of countries, and were already being put into practice in 1950.

2. Preparation of the New International frequency List

The International Frequency Registration Board (IFRB) was unable, during 1950, to take up all the duties laid down for it in the International Telecommunication Convention and the Radio Regulations, because the new International Frequency List envisaged by the Administrative Radio Conference of Atlantic City had not yet been produced. Since they assumed office in January 1948, the eleven Members of the IFRB have been busy with the preparation of the new international frequency list, either in the Provisional Frequency Board (PFB) or in the various frequency assignment conferences which have been held during the last three years. Only two such conferences were held in 1950: the International High Frequency Broadcasting Conference at Florence and Rapallo, 1 April-19 August 1950, and the second session of the North American Regional Broadcasting Conference (NARBA) at Washington, 6 September-15 November 1950. The first of these conferences reached no positive result, but the second ended with the signature of an agreement on the apportionment and use of broadcasting frequencies in North America.

The PFB, which began its work at Geneva on 15 January 1948, continued without interruption until 28 February 1950. The prolongation of its activities was decided by the Administrative Council at its fourth session in September 1949. At the same time, the Council decided to transform into an Extraordinary Administrative Radio Conference the Special Conference envisaged at Atlantic City in order to co-ordinate all the draft plans prepared, both by the PFB and by the other world-wide or regional conferences, and to combine them into a single, uninterrupted frequency list: the new International Frequency List.

This change implied a broadening of the conference's terms of reference, designed to make it competent to solve difficulties with which the PFB appeared unable to cope. With the agreement of a majority of ITU members, it was decided that the Extraordinary Administrative Conference should begin at The Hague on 25 September 1950. Preparations were accordingly being made when, in a telegram dated 28 July 1950, the United States proposed that, because of the existing situation, the Extraordinary Administrative Radio Conference should be postponed until a later date to be decided on by the Administrative Council or by "any other conventional procedure". This proposal was approved by a large majority of Union Members, and the conference was accordingly postponed to 16 August 1951.

It was decided that it should have a substantially different agenda from that proposed for The Hague conference, and that the opening date should be subject to confirmation by the Council at its sixth session in April 1951.

In the meantime, the Council urged members to act on the resolution adopted by the Economic and Social Council at its session of July-August 1950 and "to take steps to ensure that, without unnecessary delay, the Conference shall reach a successful conclusion, which can only be brought about by a broad, co-operative, and realistic approach to the problem".

On 28 February 1950, the IFRB took over from the PFB responsibility for the outstanding work which had to be completed prior to the convening of the Extraordinary Administrative Radio Conference. This work included assembling the observations and proposals made by members of ITU on the draft Frequency List prepared by the PFB, and on the plans and lists prepared by the regional and service conferences, and also the preparation of all necessary documentation for the conference.

Other work undertaken by the IFRB in conformity with directives given by the Administrative Council included:

- (a) assembling monitoring data which have been received from Administrations or other agencies in order to establish as comprehensive a picture as possible of present frequency usage;
- (b) study of the existing Frequency List between 3.9 mc/s and 27.5 mc/s and establishment of lists of those frequency notifications which are outside the bands provided for the service concerned under the Atlantic City frequency allocation table.

In addition, the Board was engaged, in collaboration with the Secretary General, in preparing preliminary documentation to enable it to undertake the tasks assigned to it by the Administrative Council concerning the notification of frequencies above 27.5 mc/s.

3. Publications

During 1950, in addition to the documentation of conferences and meetings held by the Union, of the fifth session of the Administrative Council, and the Secretary-General's annual report the General Secretariat issued, generally in separate English, French and Spanish editions, a large number of technical publications. These include:

Financial Operating Report; Provisional Financial Regulations; Telegraph Regulations (Paris, 1949); Telephone Regulations (Paris, 1949); Telegraph Statistics, 1948; Telephone Statistics, 1949; Radio Statistics, 1949; Table A (Telegraph Rates in European System); Table B (Telegraph rates in the extra-European System); Table C (Charges in the European System); Preliminary List of International Monitoring Stations; Frequency List, 15th edition, 1st and 2nd reprints; List of Fixed Stations, 12th edition (reprint); List of Broadcasting Stations, 12th edition; List of Coast and Ship Stations, 20th edition; List of Radiolocation Stations, 1st edition; Alphabetical List of Call Signs, 13th edition (reprint); Coloured Chart showing frequency allocation;

Maps of Land Stations open to public correspondence; and numerous annexes or supplements to other lists. The CCIF documents issued by the General Secretariat are: Instructions for Telephone Operators; Recommendations on the Protection of Cables against corrosion; Yellow Book (five volumes and two annexes); General Switching Programme for Europe and the Mediterranean Basin; Maintenance Instructions. ITU publishes regularly a trilingual monthly Telecommunication Journal containing general information and documentation on telecommunication.

The ordinary expenses of the Union include the expenses pertaining to: the meetings of the Administrative Council; the salaries of the staff; and other ordinary expenses of the General Secretariat, the International Frequency Registration Board, the international consultative committees, and the laboratories and technical installations created by the Union. These expenses are borne by all members.

The extraordinary expenses include all expenses pertaining to plenipotentiary conferences, administrative conferences, and meetings of the international consultative committees. They are borne by the members which have agreed to participate in these conferences and meetings. Private operating agencies and international organizations contribute to the extraordinary expenses of the administrative conferences and the meetings of the international consultative committees in which they participate, in proportion to the number of units corresponding to the class chosen by them. The Administrative Council may, nevertheless, excuse certain international organizations from contributing to these expenses.

The Atlantic City Plenipotentiary Conference authorized the Administrative Council to approve, for the period 1949 to 1952, inclusive, annual provisions for ordinary expenses up to 4,000,000 Swiss francs per annum. Excess expenditure may be authorized after having been approved by the majority of the members of the Union.

At its fifth session, held in Geneva beginning 1 September 1950, the Council adopted for 1950 the budget given in the next column.

The table of classes of contribution is as follows: 1st class, 30 units; 2nd class, 25 units; 3rd class, 20 units; 4th class, 15 units; 5th class, 10 units; 6th class, 5 units; 7th class, 3 units; and 8th class, 1 unit. Each member or associate member chooses the class in which it wishes to be included and pays in advance its annual contributory share, calculated on the basis of the budgetary provisions. Members of ITU have chosen for the year 1950 the classes of contribution given in the table below.

X. The International Refugee Organization(IRO)¹

On 15 December 1946, the General Assembly of the United Nations approved a Constitution² providing for the establishment of the International Refugee Organization (IRO). The Assembly also approved an Agreement on Interim Measures³ under which a Preparatory Commission for IRO (PCIRO) was to be established pending the entry into force of the Constitution.

The Preparatory Commission came into being on 31 December 1946, when the requisite eight Governments had signed the Constitution.

In accordance with the terms of the Agreement establishing it and in order to avoid any breach in the continuity of operations after 30 June 1947, when both UNRRA and the Intergovernmental Committee on Refugees were to terminate their activities on behalf of refugees and displaced persons, PCIRO decided to assume, on 1 July 1947, operational responsibility for the refugees and displaced persons eligible for assistance under the terms of the IRO Constitution.

IRO itself was officially established on 20 August 1948, when fifteen States, with contributions amounting to 75 per cent of Part I of its operational budget, had become parties to the Constitution. Subsequently Denmark, Italy and Switzerland became members of the organization, bringing the total membership to eighteen States.

On 18 November 1948, the United Nations General Assembly approved an Agreement⁴ bringing IRO into relationship with the United Nations as a specialized agency.

When PCIRO assumed responsibility for refugees and displaced persons within its mandate, it took over the direct care and maintenance of a total of over 719,000 persons and responsibility for protecting the interests of approximately 900,000 others.

The care and maintenance programme comprised the whole field of assistance including housing, feeding, clothing, health services, employment and vocational training, education, child welfare services, etc. At the end of December 1949, the number of refugees and displaced persons receiving these services had declined to approximately 318,000 with a corresponding reduction in the number of IRO installations.

During the 30 months of operation from 1 July 1947 to 31 December 1949, a total of 68,778 persons had been repatriated to their former homelands and 688,284 refugees had been resettled in the following countries:

United States . .	149,971	Argentina . .	28,045
Israel . .	116,580	Brazil . .	23,305
Australia . .	105,352	Belgium . .	22,183
United Kingdom	82,474	Venezuela . .	13,276
Canada . . .	77,500	Other countries	32,727
France	36,871

For transportation of refugees resettling in overseas countries, IRO maintained a chartered fleet of approximately 36 vessels and, in addition, booked space on commercial vessels and aircraft, and operated a monthly average of 35 trains.

In order to assist in the re-establishment of refugees who, because of physical handicaps, could not be accepted under normal immigration regulations, the General Council set aside an amount of $22,000,000 to provide for permanent care for this group.

In carrying out its functions of protecting the legal and political rights of refugees and displaced persons, the IRO collaborated with the Secretariat of the United Nations in the preparation of a Convention on the Status of Refugees⁵ and a draft Convention on the Declaration of Death of Missing Persons.⁶ Special attention was paid to securing widespread adoption of the system of travel documents issued under the London Agreement of 1946. By the end of 1949 eighteen Governments had acceded to this Agreement, two Governments had signed it ad referendum and nine further Governments had undertaken to recognize it.

and refugees in Germany, IRO co-operated closely with the Allied High Commission and assisted in the establishment of ordinances for the restitution of property and for indemnification for the loss of life, health, liberty and property. In other countries, IRO efforts were directed to the creation of a sufficient legal basis for the integration of refugees into the social and economic life of the country.

On 1 July 1947, PCIRO took over from UNRRA the work of the Central Tracing Bureau, which had been engaged in tracing the millions of persons who had disappeared during the Second World War. The operations of the UNRRA Tracing Bureau were limited to Germany. To replace this Bureau, PCIRO created an International Tracing Service (ITS) to operate on a world-wide scale and to co-ordinate the activities of national tracing bureaux. In May 1948, PCIRO added to the mandate of the ITS the task of searching for children kidnapped by the Nazis in support of their Germanization programme. In October 1949, the General Council instructed the Director-General to negotiate for the transfer to Governments or to another international or intergovernmental organization of the functions of the ITS remaining after 30 June 1950, the date on which IRO was originally scheduled to terminate its activities.

When, in 1949, it appeared that IRO would be unable to accomplish its assigned task prior to 30 June 1950, the General Council, at its fourth session in October 1949, adopted a budget for a supplementary period of six to nine months. The General Council asked the United Nations to assume responsibility for refugees and displaced persons after IRO's termination and submitted a memorandum to the General Assembly suggesting that any machinery which the United Nations might decide to establish to deal with the problem of refugees and stateless persons should be established by 1 January 1951.

A. PURPOSES AND FUNCTIONS

In the preamble to the Constitution of IRO, the Governments accepting the Constitution recognize:

that as regards displaced persons, the main task to be performed is to encourage and assist in every way possible their early return to their country of origin; that genuine refugees and displaced persons should be assisted by international action either to return to their countries of nationality or former habitual residence, or to find new homes elsewhere, under the conditions provided for in this Constitution; or in the case of Spanish Republicans, to establish themselves temporarily in order to enable them to return to Spain when the present Falangist regime is succeeded by a democratic regime

According to article 2 of the IRO Constitution, the functions of IRO, to be carried out in accordance with the purposes and the principles of the Charter of the United Nations, are the repatriation; the identification, registration and classification; the care and assistance; the legal and political protection; the transport; and the resettlement and re-establishment, in countries able and willing to receive them, of persons who are the concern of the Organization

These functions are to be exercised with a view to:

- (1) encouraging and assisting the repatriation of persons who are the concern of the organization, having regard to the principle that no person shall be compulsorily repatriated;
- (2) promoting repatriation by all possible means, especially by providing repatriated persons with adequate food for a period of three months, provided that they are returning to a country suffering as a result of enemy occupation during the war, and provided such food is distributed under the auspices of IRO;

(3) facilitating the re-establishment in new homelands of non-repatriated refugees and investigating, promoting or carrying out group resettlement or large-scale resettlement projects.

Part I of Annex I of the Constitution of IRO defines the categories of refugees for whom IRO will be responsible. These categories are as follows:

1. Any person outside his country of nationality or former habitual residence who has valid objections to returning to that country and has not acquired a new nationality, or been repatriated, or become firmly established, and who falls in one of the following categories:

(a) Victims of the Nazi or Fascist regime;

(b) Spanish Republicans;

(c) Persons who were considered refugees before the outbreak of the Second World War.

2. Persons who, as a result of events subsequent to the outbreak of the Second World War, are unwilling or unable to avail themselves of the protection of the Government of their country of nationality or former nationality.

3. Unaccompanied children who are orphans, or whose parents have disappeared, and who are outside their country of origin.

4. Displaced persons, i.e. persons who were deported from, or were obliged to leave, their country of nationality or former habitual residence, such as persons who were compelled to undertake forced labour or were deported for racial, religious or political reasons.

5. Persons who resided in Germany or Austria and who were of Jewish origin, or foreigners, or stateless persons who were victims of the Nazi persecution and were detained in, or were obliged to flee from, one of these countries and who have not been firmly resettled therein.

All of the above categories of persons, with the exception of refugees from the Falangist regime, and those persons of Jewish origin or foreigners or stateless persons formerly resident in Germany or Austria, must give valid objections to returning to their country of habitual residence or former nationality, in accordance with section C of part I of Annex I of the Constitution, in order to fall within the mandate of IRO.

Section D of part I of Annex I of the Constitution gives the circumstances in which refugees and displaced persons will cease to become the concern of IRO. Some of these circumstances are: when a person has returned to his country of nationality, when a refugee has acquired a new nationality, or when he has become firmly established.

Part II of Annex I of the Constitution states which persons will not be the concern of the organization. These include quislings, traitors, war criminals, persons who voluntarily assisted the enemy, Volksdeutsche and others.

B. ORGANIZATION

Under the terms of the Constitution, the principal organs of IRO are a General Council, an Executive Committee and a secretariat headed by a Director-General.

The General Council is the ultimate policy-making body of IRO. Each member Government of IRO has one vote in the General Council, which meets not less than twice a year. Decisions in the Council and in the Executive Committee are made by a majority of the votes cast, unless otherwise provided by the Constitution or the General Council. Adoption of an amendment to the Constitution, for example, requires a two-thirds vote of the General Council and ratification by two thirds of the members.

New members are admitted into the organization, if they are Members of the United Nations, by accepting the Constitution. Other States require in addition a two-thirds vote of the General Council, taken on the recommendation of the Executive Committee. On certain conditions, States may be admitted to membership without signing or depositing an instrument of acceptance of the Constitution.

The Executive Committee, composed of nine members of IRO elected by the General Council, meets as often as necessary. It performs the functions necessary to give effect to the policy decisions of the General Council, and has the power to make policy decisions of an emergency nature subject to reconsideration by the General Council. It may investigate situations in the field by visiting camps, hostels or assembly centres under the control of IRO, and give instructions to the Director-General on the basis of such investigations.

The Director-General, nominated by the Executive Committee and appointed by the General Council, is the chief administrative officer of IRO. He carries out the administrative and executive functions of IRO in accordance with decisions of the General Council and the Executive Committee, and is responsible for appointing the secretariat under regulations established by the General Council.

A Review Board of Eligibility Appeals and an International Tracing Service also work within the framework of IRO. The Review Board is composed of a Chairman and four other persons appointed by the Director-General, subject to the approval of the Executive Committee. It hears and determines individual appeals of eligibility decisions taken by IRO field officers, and advises the Director-General on any eligibility matter which he may refer to the Board.

The International Tracing Service (ITS), headed by a Director, has its central headquarters at Arolsen, in the United States Zone of Germany. The ITS seeks to determine the fate of all persons who disappeared between September 1939 and May 1945 and to assemble, at its central headquarters, all documents and other information concerning such persons. The ITS is also charged with tracing children kidnapped by the Nazis in support of their Germanization programme, determining their nationality and arranging for their return to their families, where possible.

In addition to its headquarters in Geneva, IRO maintains 28 principal offices and numerous sub-offices throughout Europe, the western hemisphere, the Middle and Far East areas.

C. ACTIVITIES DURING 1950

The fifth session of the General Council of IRO met at Geneva from 14 to 22 March 1950 and the sixth session from 9 to 13 October 1950.

Two notable events affecting the organization took place during the year. One was the implementation on 1 July of the resolution of the General Council of IRO by which responsibility for the care and maintenance of all refugees, except those in process of resettlement and those belonging to the "Institutional Hard Core" group, was transferred to the local authorities of the areas and countries in which the refugees lived. The other was the signing, in June 1950, by the President of the United States of an amendment to the Displaced Persons Act by which the stipulations of the Act were liberalized and it was made possible for an additional 108,000 IRO eligible refugees to obtain immigration visas, bringing the total admissible under the Act to 313,000.

During 1950, however, there occurred a marked reduction in the number of refugees repatriated and resettled as compared with the previous year. This was mainly due to technical difficulties in the implementation of the amendment to the United States Displaced Persons Act and to the fact that the Australian programme, which, by the end of the year, had absorbed a total of 170,543 refugees since the beginning of IRO operations, was almost completed.

Following the slow-down in resettlement movements, it was found that IRO still had sufficient resources to continue its activities without the need for additional contributions from member Governments. At its sixth session, therefore, the General Council resolved, on 12 October 1950, to authorize the Director-General to carry on the approved operational programmes of the organization, within the limits of existing resources, until 30 September 1951. (Originally IRO's existence had been limited to three years, but the General Council in October 1949 decided to extend the life of the organization to 31 March 1951.)

On 11 October 1950 the General Council authorized the Director-General to extend resettlement assistance to those refugees who arrived in areas of IRO operations in Europe and the Middle East before 1 October 1950, with the understanding that their resettlement be carried out within existing resources. Previously resettlement assistance had been given only to those refugees who had arrived in IRO areas of operation prior to 15 October 1949.

The following is an outline of IRO operations during 1950.

1. Care and Maintenance

As a consequence of the decision taken by the General Council at its fifth session in March 1950 to transfer to the local authorities the responsibility for refugees who did not belong to the "Institutional Hard Core" group and who were not in the process of being re-established, the care and maintenance case-load of IRO declined from 318,323 on 1 January 1950 to 80,905 on 31 December. Over 111,000 refugees, on 1 July 1950, became the responsibility of the local authorities in Western Europe, in Germany and Austria.

During the year, 247 field installations were closed, reducing the number of such installations from 335 on 1 January 1950 to 88 on 31 December. Nevertheless, the health services were continued in all areas, and the general health of the refugees remained good. Dietary allowances in Germany and Italy remained at 2,350 calories per day, and in Austria these allowances, which had been at a lower standard, were raised to the same level. A baby feeding programme was instituted in all areas of operation, and special food was supplied for all children from birth to one year of age in IRO camps, and for children from birth to three years in transit centres and on board ship. Increased emphasis was placed upon the improvement of health conditions during both land and sea transit. Programmes for the control of tuberculosis and venereal diseases were continued, and statistics showed a steady diminution of tuberculosis. The programme of medical rehabilitation was also continued and was integrated into the programme of occupational therapy and vocational training. All three aspects of this programme are designed to assist those refugees who are handicapped by disease or physical disability to become self-supporting again. Throughout the year, the rehabilitation and training centres provided courses in 50 different subjects, including motor mechanics, machine-shop work, farming, needlework, bricklaying, carpentry and plumbing.

The IRO welfare services were faced with a particularly heavy task, since the proportion of "difficult" cases increased with the diminishing size of the case load. The individual case work included the adjustment of problems which are a handicap to repatriation or resettlement, assistance to refugees in specialized IRO installations such as homes for the aged and the chronically ill, work in youth centres, assistance in problems of adoption and legal guardianship, the reuniting of families, and general counselling towards assisting individuals and families in planning for their ultimate re-establishment. Summary case histories were prepared for all persons for whom the local authorities had taken over the responsibility and these histories were made available to voluntary agencies which had undertaken to follow up on individual case work initiated by the IRO.

2. Repatriation and Resettlement

While 1949 had been a peak year in the repatriation and resettlement activities of IRO, 1950 brought a marked reduction in these movements: 2,917 displaced persons were repatriated to their countries of origin, and 191,119 were resettled in new homelands throughout the world. The monthly average of movements was 16,170 in 1950 as against 29,166 in 1949.

a. REPATRIATION

With the decline in the number of refugees repatriated, it became increasingly clear that the vast majority of those who wished to return to their countries of origin had done so before IRO began its operations or in the early years of the organization's activities.

In 1949 various Eastern European countries had closed their repatriation offices in IRO's major area of operation, and in February 1950 the IRO office in Prague was closed at the request of the Czechoslovak Government. The Czechoslovak Government also refused to accept certain categories of applicants seeking repatriation, and approaches made to the Hungarian and Romanian Governments to secure papers for groups of repatriation candidates remained without effect.

In view of the political situation in the Far East, the repatriation of overseas Chinese to Indonesia and Burma and other countries where they had formerly resided also declined considerably as compared with previous years.

Of the 2,917 persons repatriated during the year, 972 were Poles, 432 Yugoslavs, and 607 were overseas Chinese returning to Burma, Indonesia, Indochina and Singapore.

b. RESETTLEMENT

The resettlement of 191,119 refugees during 1950 brought the total of those resettled since 1 July 1947 to 879,403. The main countries of reception during 1950 were the following:

United States	88,035	Venezuela	2,719
Australia	65,191	Brazil	1,340
Canada	16,615	France	1,236
Israel	4,186	New Zealand	1,066
Argentina	2,926	Other countries	4,916
United Kingdom	2,889
TOTAL			191,119

By the end of 1950, the difficulties inherent in implementing the United States amended Displaced Persons Act were being overcome, but the interpretation of the new Security Act continued to prevent a marked increase in resettlement to the United States.

In the course of the year, the Canadian Government liberalized its immigration policy for refugees and the resulting increase, IRO anticipated, would help to offset the decline in movements to Australia. Shortly before the end of the year, the New Zealand Government, which had already accepted 1,000 refugees in 1949 and another 1,000 in 1950, announced that a further quota of 2,000 to 3,000 refugees would be admitted in 1951.

The movement to Israel, which had reached its peak in 1949, slowed down very considerably during 1950, since the vast majority of refugees who wanted to emigrate to Israel had already done so following the establishment of an independent State in 1948. A large proportion of the 4,186 refugees who entered Israel during 1950 belonged to the "Institutional Hard Core" group, since this country had agreed to accept all Jewish immigrants irrespective of their health or age.

Venezuela was the only Latin American country which maintained a Selection Mission in Europe throughout the year, and it accepted 2,719 immigrants. Although the other Latin American countries did not select refugees through the intermediary of Government missions, a steady flow of individual immigrants, on the basis of personal sponsorship or individual work contracts, brought the immigration figure for the other Latin American Republics to 6,900.

Among the Western European countries, the United Kingdom accepted some 2,000 refugees from the Lebanon and East Africa, bringing to 2,882 the total number of refugees accepted by the United Kingdom during the year. Individually nominated refugees, relatives and work contract holders continued to be admitted to all Western European countries and all these countries made a combined effort to assist IRO in solving the problem of the aged and sick refugees who could not be admitted by overseas resettlement countries under existing immigration legislation.

With the co-operation of these Governments and of numerous individuals, voluntary societies and public and private organizations throughout the world, considerable progress was made towards the solution of the difficult problem of the "Institutional Hard Core". When the transfer of IRO responsibilities for care and maintenance of eligible refugees took place on 1 July 1950, the known number of "Institutional Hard Core" cases amounted to 15,319 individuals in need of permanent care, together with 7,509 members of their families. On 31 December the number had been reduced to 7,833 persons requiring permanent care and 3,469 family members. France, Belgium, the Netherlands, Denmark and Luxembourg took over the responsibility for permanent care of 7,272 such persons and the same countries received 800 further persons in this category from Germany, Austria and Italy.

In addition to these, Norway accepted 34 blind refugees with their dependents, and Sweden accepted 148 refugees suffering from pulmonary tuberculosis, and their family members. To facilitate the provision of permanent care for the refugees belonging to the "Hard Core" group, a substantial part of the $22,000,000 fund which the General Council had ear-marked for this purpose was used. Plans were being implemented during 1950 for the satisfactory settlement "sur place" of those "Institutional Hard Core" cases not wishing to leave their present countries of residence and those for whom immigration opportunities cannot be found.

c. TRANSPORTATION

Following the decline in resettlement to overseas countries, the IRO fleet, which had consisted of 36 vessels in the peak months of 1949, was reduced to 29 vessels in the beginning of 1950 and to 15 by the end of the year. However, the system of air-flights of large groups of refugees who, for health or other reasons, could not be transported by sea, was continued throughout the year, and a total of 5,336 refugees were thus transported by air. The air operations of the organization constituted the first experience in the mass transportation of civilians, including women and children, by air.

3. Local Settlement

IRO found during the year that an increasing number of refugees wished to remain permanently in countries where, earlier, they were considered to be residing provisionally or in transit. On the other hand, it appeared that, by the end of IRO operations, approximately 40,000 refugees, for whom no possibilities of emigration could be found, would have to remain in those countries in spite of their desire to move. IRO's efforts on behalf of "this group were therefore devoted to ensuring that the best conditions possible are established for them in the countries where they will remain. This includes the provision of legal and political protection, the establishment of suitable institutions for the aged, handicapped and chronically ill, and the provision, through the intermediary of voluntary societies or local authorities, of adequate welfare facilities for all.

In Germany, where the greatest difficulties were anticipated, both the Federal Government and the local authorities did their utmost to ensure the maintenance of an adequate standard of care for those who had now become their responsibility. In all areas, the main object was to provide the refugees with private accommodation. An instance of the success of these efforts was the undertaking by the German authorities to provide at their own expense individual housing for 1,000 refugee families comprising 4,500 persons in Land Nord-Rhein-Westfalen. Although work on this project was only begun in November, 140 houses were completed and occupied by the end of the year.

By the end of the year, legislation was about to be enacted in Germany, establishing the legal, political, social and economic status of refugees (see below).

4. Voluntary Societies

Throughout its existence, IRO has been assisted by voluntary agencies, and their work has assumed an increasing importance, as IRO winds up its operations.

In Germany and Austria, international voluntary agencies, through their local national counterparts, have progressively assumed responsibility for many basic services hitherto maintained by IRO. International or national agencies have, for example, taken over institutions for the aged, children's and youth centres, vocational training and rehabilitation activities, trade testing, teaching of languages and welfare and counselling services.

Resettlement agencies have substantially assisted in procuring individual assurances for refugees emigrating to the United States, and they have been instrumental in initiating new resettlement projects for the "Institutional Hard Core" group and for persons and families with limited opportunities for resettlement.

In resettlement countries, the agencies have formed representative committees or councils to promote the successful integration of immigrant refugees. In some countries, refugee service committees have been formed in co-operation with voluntary agencies to deal with individual problems of refugee immigrants when IRO ceases, and to assist the refugees to adjust themselves to their new environment.

5. Eligibility and Review Board

The eligibility of a refugee for IRO assistance must be established in accordance with the definitions contained in Annex I of the IRO Constitution. A refugee judged ineligible may appeal for the reconsideration of the case to the Review Board provided for in the Constitution which may consider any additional evidence produced in support of the appeal. The decisions of the Board or of its representatives on any petition for review is final, so far as its immediate implementation is concerned. However, the Board is not precluded from rectifying errors, or from reopening cases when new evidence has been produced by appellants or when there has been a change in the organization's policy after appellants have been heard by the Board. Special machinery has been set up to deal with second appeals.

During 1950, the Board gave 12,175 decisions, 2,651 being reversals of previous decisions made by eligibility officers to the effect that the appellant was outside the mandate of IRO.

6. Legal and Political Protection

Under its Constitution, IRO gives legal and political protection to refugees to assist them in overcoming legal difficulties inherent in their status as people who are not protected by national Governments. Refugees are assisted to overcome legal difficulties in matters of resettlement and to obtain a firm civil status in their countries of residence. Measures are also taken to protect them against economic or social discrimination, and to ensure their freedom of movement within and outside their country of residence.

During the year Denmark and Liberia signed the London Agreement of 1946 providing for the issue of the IRO Travel Document, and the Governments of Denmark, India and Pakistan had made arrangements for issuing it. The Federal Government of Western Germany was authorized to sign the London Agreement; in the meantime, however, documentation for refugees emigrating from Germany under IRO sponsorship continued to be provided, under existing arrangements, by the Combined Travel Board of the Allied High Commission. By the end of 1950 twenty Governments had acceded to the London Agreement, two had signed it ad referendum and twelve non-signatory Governments had officially undertaken to recognize the Travel Document de facto.

With the gradual transfer of responsibilities from the Allied High Commission to the German Federal Government, it was necessary to ensure that refugees and displaced persons be granted a satisfactory status by the German authorities. The Federal Government agreed to present to the Bundesrat and Bundestag a draft law on Homeless Aliens, to apply to all persons within the mandate of IRO who were in Germany on 1 July 1950. The law will give refugees the same rights as nationals in matters of social security, public assistance, education, and the right to work.

A large number of claims for refugees for indemnification and restitution were filed with the competent authorities on the basis of existing legislation of the German Länder. Negotiations were initiated by IRO to obtain the promulgation of a General Federal Claims Law valid in the whole territory of the Federal Republic.

In Austria, IRO continued to assist individual refugees with their problems of admission, right of residence, civil status, social security, and expulsion.

In Italy, IRO was responsible for the issuing of an identity and protection document which assists the refugees to obtain any required documentation and certificates from the national authorities.

In France and in Belgium, IRO continued to provide refugees with certificates establishing their identity and status, enabling them to regularize their position with the authorities. During 1950, 64,000 documents were issued by the IRO Mission in France.

Late in 1950 the Greek Government agreed to integrate into the Greek economy all refugees in Greece whom IRQ could not resettle, by granting them residence and work permits and the benefits of national social insurance and welfare services.

7. Reparations

The Reparations Fund for the rehabilitation and resettlement of victims of Nazi persecution was established under article 8, part I, of the Final Act of the Paris Conference on Reparations adopted by 18 Allied Powers in December 1945, and under the Five Power Agreement of 14 June 1946, in which the five Powers (Czechoslovakia, France, the United Kingdom, the United States and Yugoslavia) agreed on instructions for the administration of the fund. Responsibility for the administration of this fund was transferred in July 1947 from the Director of the Intergovernmental Committee on Refugees to the Director-General of IRO.

As of 31 December 1950, the fund's total receipts from the sale of non-monetary gold amounted to the equivalent of $2,963,858.46, after deduction of authorized liquidation expenses. As for the $25,000,000 fund referred to in the Five Power Agreement, the Governments of Sweden and Switzerland had contributed, respectively, 50,000,000 kroner and 20,000,000 Swiss francs, representing a nominal dollar equivalent of $18,540,051.67. The total income of the fund from all sources, i.e. proceeds from the sale of non-monetary gold and from German assets stood, on 31 December 1950, at $21,505,496.69. By the same date, $19,354,844.75 had been disbursed to the American Joint Distribution Committee and the Jewish Agency for Palestine, and $1,180,979.15 had been disbursed to non-Jewish agencies.

The following Agencies took an active part in the individual case work involving refugees entitled to benefits from the Reparations Fund: Jewish Agency for Palestine; American Joint Distribution Committee; Comité International d'Aide aux Intellectuels; International Rescue Committee; International Social Service; Lutheran World Federation; Vatican Migration Bureau; St. Raphaels Verein; Caritas; National Catholic Welfare Committee; Committee for the Care of European Children; World Council of Churches; American Friends Service Committee.

The Merchandising Advisory Committee, working on a voluntary basis under the Chairmanship of Colonel R. G. Kramer, completed the liquidation of large quantities of non-monetary gold of a highly diversified character yielding net proceeds of $1,636,688.97.

8. International Tracing Service

The International Tracing Service (ITS) was established by IRO to help reunite families by finding lost relatives, and to provide evidence of proof of death (a necessary requisite for legal purposes such as succession, indemnification, re-marriage and adoption).

At its fifth session, the General Council of IRO resolved that the ITS should gradually reduce its activities, and that negotiations should be initiated for the transfer of its operations and its master card index to the Allied High Commission by March 1951. The collection and processing of records was therefore accelerated so that this work, as well as the checking of graves, could be completed, as planned, by the end of March 1951. Registration of new cases by the Child Search Branch ceased on 1 April 1950, but work in connexion with the identification and documentation of children already found continued until 31 August. In September, the Child Search Headquarters at Esslingen, in the United States Zone of Germany, was closed, and the records transferred to the ITS Headquarters at Arolsen, where a small Child Tracing Unit was retained to handle incoming inquiries for missing children. The bulk photostatting of concentration camp records for distribution and preservation was completed. Of the 722,000 copies made; 261,660 were distributed to the five Western European countries.

The second volume of the Catalogue of Camps and Prisons in Germany and German-Occupied Territories, September 1939 to May 1945 was completed and a Supplement was prepared. This compilation contains information on hitherto undocumented camps, and involved a considerable amount of independent research into the subject of deportations and slave labour brought to Germany during the Second World War.

Certificates of incarceration and notifications of death continued to be issued, and the German Registry Office (Sonderstandesamt) was supplied with information to complete the records of death, on the basis of which 5,452 death certificates were prepared.

A total of over 4,000,000 new insertions was made in the master card index which, at the beginning of 1948 had contained 1,976,499 cards and by the end of 1950 contained 10,538,358 cards. Some 28,000 new cards were inserted daily. Nearly 81,000 tracing requests were received by ITS during 1950 from over 35 countries, the majority of inquiries coming from the Netherlands, Poland, Germany and the United States. ITS sent out nearly 64,000 positive replies during the year. Information was secured during the latter half of the year on 9,363 persons, of whom 1,888 were living. Among the living, were number for whom emigration agencies held emigration assurances. The identification was established of 2,000 concentration camp prisoners who died during the 1945 death marches and who are buried in twenty cemeteries in Bavaria.

As of 31 December 1950, all contributions for the fiscal year 1947/48 had been received; for the fiscal year 1948/49 an amount of $2,821,156 was still outstanding; and for the fiscal year 1949/50 the balance of outstanding contributions was $6,635,083. The total budget for 1949/50 was $145,432,118.

Contributions in the amount of $43,672,717 were due for the supplementary period beginning 1 July 1950 toward an anticipated budget of $100,356,962, the balance to be met by other assets. The unpaid balance of the contribution due from the Nationalist Government of China, which was not in a position to contribute to IRO since 1948/49, totalled $8,210,469, including its assessment for the supplementary period beginning 1 July 1950, as shown in the table of contributions below. Although included in the contribution figures, this assessment was not included by IRO in its calculations of resources available for expenditure subsequent to 1948/49.

The estimated value of equipment of supplies on hand as of 31 December 1950 was $4,651,284. Donations to other United Nations agencies of surplus supplies and equipment totalled $1,075,136 and sales under sealed tender of surplus supplies and equipment amounted to $2,729,446.

Details of the plan of expenditures adopted by the General Council for the period beginning 1 July 1950 are given in the table in the next column.

The percentages of contributions to meet the organization's expenses are set forth for 54 anticipated member States in Annex II of the Constitution of IRO. Contributions due from actual members of IRO toward the administrative and operational budgets for the supplementary period beginning 1 July 1950 are given in the second table in the next column.

XI. The World Meteorological Organization (WMO)

International co-operation in the field of meteorology was first established by an international conference held in Brussels in 1853 primarily for the purpose of dealing with the weather and climate of the oceans. In 1872, an unofficial Conference of Directors of Meteorological Institutes was held at Leipzig, followed by an official International Meteorological Congress in Vienna in 1873. This Congress established a permanent International Meteorological Committee which, in 1878, prepared a scheme for the establishment of an International Meteorological Organization (IMO) to study the atmosphere as a unit and to secure, through international co-operation, uniformity and accuracy in meteorological observations and calculations.

The members of IMO since 1878 have been the directors (97 as of 31 December 1950) of independent official meteorological services of various States and territories. The structure of the organization comprises the Conference of Directors, meeting at least every six years; the International Meteorological Committee, meeting at least every three years; the secretariat, the work of which is directed by an Executive Council; and various technical and regional commissions.

The first Conference of Directors of IMO met in Rome in 1879. Including the preliminary conferences of 1872 and 1873, twelve Conferences of Directors have been held up to December 1950. The organization is governed by Statutes adopted in Paris in 1919 by the Conference of Directors, and revised in Utrecht in 1923, Copenhagen in 1929, Locarno in 1931, Warsaw in 1935, Paris in 1946 and Washington in 1947.

To strengthen the position of the organization with the Governments which maintain meteorological services, as well as its authority in its relations with other international organizations, IMO decided in 1939 to create an inter-governmental organization, to be known as the World Meteorological Organization (WMO), whose members would consist of States and territories maintaining independent meteorological services rather than, as in the case of IMO, the directors of such services. The twelfth Conference of Directors, meeting in Washington from 22 September to 11 October 1947, drew up and adopted a Convention creating WMO.¹

As provided in the Convention, WMO was to come into being 30 days after the deposit with the Government of the United States of the thirtieth instrument of ratification or accession to the Convention. The Conference directed the President of the International Meteorological Committee of IMO to convene the first session of the Congress of WMO as soon as practicable after that date. It decided that an extraordinary session of the Conference of Directors of IMO would be held concurrently with the Congress, in order to dissolve IMO and ensure the transfer of its functions and assets to WMO. The Executive Council of IMO was directed to prepare the necessary documentation, including a draft agreement with the United Nations, for circulation to the members of WMO at least six months prior to the first Congress of the new organization.

The Conference resolved that IMO would continue to function until WMO came into existence, which was on 23 March 1950.²

A. PURPOSES

As stated in article 2 of the Convention of WMO, the purposes of the organization will be as follows:

- (a) To facilitate worldwide co-operation in the establishment of networks of stations for the making of meteorological observations or other geophysical observations related to meteorology and to promote the establishment and maintenance of meteorological centers charged with the provision of meteorological services;
- (b) To promote the establishment and maintenance of systems for the rapid exchange of weather information;
- (c) To promote standardization of meteorological observations and to ensure the uniform publication of observations and statistics;

- (d) To further the application of meteorology to aviation, shipping, agriculture, and other human activities; and

- (e) To encourage research and training in meteorology and to assist in coordinating the international aspects of such research and training.

² The extraordinary session of the Conference of Directors of the IMO was convened in Paris on 15 Mar. 1951 and the first session of the Congress of WMO was convened in Paris on 19 Mar. 1951, at which time WMO became formally established.

B. ORGANIZATION

As provided by the Convention, WMO consists of a World Meteorological Congress, an Executive Committee, regional meteorological associations and technical commissions set up by the Congress, and a permanent secretariat under the direction of a Secretary-General. The organization is to be headed by a President and two Vice-Presidents, who will be the President and Vice-Presidents of the Congress and the Executive Committee.

The World Meteorological Congress, in which all members may be represented, is to meet at least once every four years. Each member is to designate as its principal delegate to the Congress the director of its meteorological service. The Congress is to be the policy-making body of the organization. It is to adopt technical regulations covering meteorological practices and procedures, and to determine the general policies for the fulfilment of the organization's purposes. Decisions of the Congress are to be taken by a two-thirds majority of the votes cast, except that in the election of officers of the organization, a simple majority is sufficient. Only members which are States will be entitled to vote on certain categories of questions, such as amendments to the Convention, membership in the organization or relations with the United Nations.

The Executive Committee is to be composed of the presidents of regional associations and an equal number of directors of the meteorological services of members, in addition to the President and Vice-Presidents of WMO. It will meet at least once a year. As the executive body of the organization, the Committee supervises the carrying out of Congress resolutions. Among its duties are to make studies and recommendations and provide members with technical information, counsel and assistance in the field of meteorology.

The regional meteorological associations, to be established by the Congress, will be composed of members of WMO whose networks lie in or extend into the respective regions. The geographical limits of the various regions are to be defined by the Congress. Meeting as often as necessary, the regional associations will promote the execution of Congress and Executive Committee resolutions in their respective regions. They will consider and make recommendations to the Congress and the Executive Committee on matters of general meteorological interest, and will co-ordinate meteorological and associated activities in their respective regions. Six regional commissions were established in IMO: for Europe, for Asia, for Africa, for North and Central America, for South America, and for the South-West Pacific.

Various technical commissions, to be established by the Congress, will be composed of experts. They will study and make recommendations in their respective fields to the Congress and the Executive Committee. The following Technical Commissions have operated under IMO: Aerological Commission (CAe), Commission for Agricultural Meteorology (CAgM), Commission for Bibliography and Publications (CBP), Climatological Commission (CC1), Hydrological Commission (CHy), Commission for Instruments and Methods of Observation (CIMO), Commission for Aeronautical Meteorology (CMAe), Commission for Maritime Meteorology (CMM), Commission for Polar Meteorology (CPM), Commission for Radio-Electric Meteorology (CREM), Commission for Synoptic Weather Information (CSWI).³

The secretariat will act as the documentary and information centre. Among other duties, it will assist in organizing and conducting meetings, administer the finances of WMO and issue the official publications of the organization.

ANNEX III. CONVENTION OF THE WORLD METEOROLOGICAL ORGANIZATION

With a view to coordinating, standardizing, and improving world meteorological activities and to encouraging an efficient exchange of meteorological information between countries in the aid of human activities the contracting States agree to the present Convention, as follows:

PART I

ESTABLISHMENT

ARTICLE 1

The World Meteorological Organization (hereinafter called the Organization) is hereby established.

PART II

ARTICLE 2

Purposes

The purposes of the Organization shall be:

(a) To facilitate worldwide cooperation in the establishment of networks of stations for the making of meteorological observations or other geophysical observations related to meteorology and to promote the establishment and maintenance of meteorological centers charged with the provision of meteorological services;

(b) To promote the establishment and maintenance of systems for the rapid exchange of weather information;

(c) To promote standardization of meteorological observations and to ensure the uniform publication of observations and statistics;

(d) To further the application of meteorology to aviation, shipping, agriculture, and other human activities; and

(e) To encourage research and training in meteorology and to assist in coordinating the international aspects of such research and training.

PART III

MEMBERSHIP

ARTICLE 3

Members

The following may become Members of the Organization by the procedure set forth in the present Convention:

(a) Any State represented at the Conference of Directors of the International Meteorological Organization convened at Washington D. C., on September 22, 1947, as listed in Annex I attached hereto, and which signs the present Convention and ratifies it in accordance with Article 32, or which accedes thereto, in accordance with Article 33;

(b) Any Member of the United Nations having a meteorological service by acceding to the present Convention in accordance with Article 33;

(c) Any State, fully responsible for the conduct of its international relations and having a meteorological service, not listed in Annex I of the present Convention and not a Member of the United Nations, after the submission of a request for membership to the Secretariat of the Organization and after its approval by two-thirds of the Members of the Organization as specified in paragraphs (a), (b) and (c) of this Article by acceding to the present Convention in accordance with Article 33;

(d) Any territory or group of territories maintaining its own meteorological service and listed in Annex II attached hereto, upon application of the present Convention on its behalf, in accordance with paragraph (a) of Article 34, by the State or States responsible for its international relations and represented at the Conference of Directors of the International Meteorological Organization convened at Washington, D.C., on September 22, 1947, as listed in Annex I of the present Convention;

(e) Any territory or group of territories, not listed in Annex II of the present Convention, maintaining its own meteorological service but not responsible for the conduct of its international relations, on behalf of which the present Convention is applied in accordance with paragraph (b) of Article 34, provided that the request for membership is presented by the Member responsible for its international relations, and secures approval by two-thirds of the Members of the Organization as specified in paragraphs (a), (b) and (c) of this Article:

(f) Any trust territory or group of trust territories maintaining its own meteorological service and administered by the United Nations to which the United Nations applies the present Convention in accordance with Article 34.

Any request for membership in the Organization shall state in accordance with which paragraph of this Article membership is sought.

PART IV ORGANIZATION

ARTICLE 4

(a) The Organization shall comprise:

- (1) The World Meteorological Congress (hereinafter called the Congress);
- (2) The Executive Committee;
- (3) Regional Meteorological Associations (hereinafter called the Regional Associations);
- (4) Technical Commissions;
- (5) The Secretariat.

(b) There shall be a President and two Vice-Presidents of the Organization who shall also be President and Vice-Presidents of the Congress and of the Executive Committee.

PART V ELIGIBILITY

ARTICLE 5

(a) Eligibility for election to the offices of President and Vice-President of the Organization, of President and Vice-President of the Regional Associations, and for membership, subject to the provisions of Article 13 (c) of the present Convention, on the Executive Committee should be confined to the Directors of Meteorological Services of Members of the Organization.

(b) In the performance of their duties, the officers of the Organization and the members of the Executive Committee should regard themselves as representatives of the Organization rather than as representatives of particular Members thereof.

PART VI THE WORLD METEOROLOGICAL CONGRESS

ARTICLE 6

Composition

(a) The Congress is the supreme body of the Organization and shall be composed of delegates representing Members. Each Member shall designate one of its delegates, who should be the director of its meteorological service, as its principal delegate.

(b) With a view to securing the widest possible technical representation, any director of a meteorological service or any other individual may be invited by the President to be present at and participate in the discussions of the Congress.

ARTICLE 7

Functions

The functions of the Congress shall be:

(a) To determine general regulations, subject to the provisions of the present Convention, prescribing the constitution and the functions of the various bodies of the Organization;

(b) To determine its own rules of procedure;

(c) To elect the President and Vice-Presidents of the Organization, and other Members of the Executive Committee, in accordance with the provisions of Article 10 (a) (4) of the present Convention. Presidents and Vice-Presidents of Regional Associations and Technical Commissions shall be elected in accordance with the provisions of Articles 18 (e) and 19 (c), respectively, of the present Convention;

(d) To adopt technical regulations covering meteorological practices and procedures;

(e) To determine general policies for the fulfilment of the purposes of the Organization as set forth in Article 2 of the present Convention;

(f) To make recommendations to members on matters within the purposes of the Organization;

(g) To refer to any other body of the Organization any matter within the provisions of the present Convention upon which such body is empowered to act;

(h) To consider the reports and activities of the Executive Committee and to take such action in regard thereto as the Congress may determine;

(i) To establish Regional Associations in accordance with the provisions of Article 18; to determine their geographical limits, coordinate their activities, and consider their recommendations;

(j) To establish Technical Commissions in accordance with the provisions of Article 19; to define their terms of reference, coordinate their activities, and consider their recommendations;

(k) To determine the location of the Secretariat of the Organization;

(l) To take any other appropriate action to further the purposes of the Organization.

ARTICLE 8

Execution of Congress Decisions

(a) All Members shall do their utmost to implement the decisions of the Congress.

(b) If, however, any Member finds it impracticable to give effect to some requirement in a technical resolution adopted by Congress, such Member shall inform the Secretary General of the Organization whether its inability to give effect to it is provisional or final, and state its reasons therefore.

ARTICLE 9

Meetings

Meetings of the Congress shall be convened by decision of the Congress or of the Executive Committee at intervals not exceeding four years.

ARTICLE 10

Voting

(a) Each Member shall have one vote in decisions of the Congress, except that only Members of the Organization which are States, as specified in paragraphs (a), (b) and (c) of Article 3 of the present Convention (hereinafter referred to as "Members which are States"), shall be entitled to vote on any of the following subjects:

- (1) Amendment or interpretation of the present Convention or proposals for a new Convention;
- (2) Membership of the Organization;
- (3) Relations with the United Nations and other intergovernmental organizations;
- (4) Election of the President and Vice-Presidents of the Organization and of the members of the Executive Committee other than the Presidents and Vice-Presidents of the Regional Associations.

(b) Decisions of the Congress shall be by two-thirds majority of the votes cast for and against, except that elections of individuals to serve in any capacity in the Organization shall be by simple majority of the votes cast. The provisions of this paragraph, however, shall not apply to decisions taken in accordance with Articles 3, 25, 26, and 28 of the present Convention.

ARTICLE 11

Quorum

A majority of the Members shall be required to constitute a quorum for meetings of the Congress. For those meetings of the Congress at which decisions are taken on the subjects enumerated in paragraph (a) of Article 10, a majority of the Members which are States shall be required to constitute a quorum.

ARTICLE 12

First Meeting of the Congress

The first meeting of the Congress shall be convened by the President of the International Meteorological Committee of the International Meteorological Organization as soon as practicable after the coming into force of the present Convention.

PART VII

THE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE

ARTICLE 13

Composition

The Executive Committee shall consist of:

- (a) The President and Vice-Presidents of the Organization;
- (b) The Presidents of Regional Associations, or in the event that Presidents cannot attend, alternates as provided for in the general regulations;
- (c) Directors of Meteorological Services of Members of the Organization or their alternates, equal in number to the number of Regions, provided that not more than one-third of the members of the Executive Committee, including the President and Vice-Presidents of the Organization, shall come from one region.

ARTICLE 14

Functions

The Executive Committee is the executive body of the Congress and its functions shall be:

- (a) To supervise the execution of the resolutions of the Congress;
- (b) To adopt resolutions arising out of recommendations of the Technical Commissions on matters of urgency affecting the technical regulations, provided that all Regional Associations concerned are given an opportunity to express their approval or disapproval before adoption by the Executive Committee;
- (c) To provide technical information, counsel, and assistance in the field of meteorology;
- (d) To study and make recommendations on any matter affecting international meteorology and the operation of meteorological services;
- (e) To prepare the agenda for the Congress and to give guidance to the Regional Associations and Technical Commissions in the preparation of their agenda;
- (f) To report on its activities to each session of the Congress;
- (g) To administer the finances of the Organization in accordance with the provisions of Part XI of the present Convention;
- (h) To perform such other functions as may be conferred on it by the Congress or by the present Convention.

ARTICLE 15

Meetings

The Executive Committee shall meet at least once a year. The time and place of the meeting shall be determined by the President of the Organization, taking account of the views of the other members of the Committee.

ARTICLE 16

Voting

Decisions of the Executive Committee shall be by two-thirds majority of the votes cast for and against. Each member of the Executive Committee shall have only one vote, notwithstanding that he may be a member in more than one capacity.

ARTICLE 17

The quorum shall consist of a majority of the members of the Executive Committee.

PART VIII

REGIONAL ASSOCIATIONS

ARTICLE 18

- (a) Regional Associations shall be composed of the Members of the Organization, the networks of which lie in or extend into the Region.
- (b) Members of the Organization shall be entitled to attend the meetings of Regional Associations to which they do not belong, take part in the discussions, present their views upon questions affecting their own Meteorological Service, but shall not have the right to vote.

c) Regional Associations shall meet as often as necessary. The time and place of the meeting shall be determined by the Presidents of the Regional Associations in agreement with the President of the Organization.

(d) The functions of the Regional Associations shall be:

- (i) To promote the execution of the resolutions of the Congress and the Executive Committee in their respective regions;
- (ii) To consider matters brought to their attention by the Executive Committee;
- (iii) To discuss matters of general meteorological interest and to coordinate meteorological and associated activities in their respective regions;
- (iv) To make recommendations to Congress and the Executive Committee on matters within the purposes of the Organization;
- (v) To perform such other functions as may be conferred on them by the Congress.

(e) Each Regional Association shall elect its President and Vice-President.

PART IX

TECHNICAL COMMISSIONS

ARTICLE 19

(a) Commissions consisting of technical experts may be established by the Congress to study and make recommendations to the Congress and the Executive Committee on any subject within the purposes of the Organization.

(b) Members of the Organization have the right to be represented on the Technical Commissions.

(c) Each Technical Commission shall elect its President and Vice-President.

(d) Presidents of Technical Commissions may participate without vote in the meetings of the Congress and of the Executive Committee.

PART X

THE SECRETARIAT

ARTICLE 20

The permanent Secretariat of the Organization shall be composed of a Secretary General and such technical and clerical staff as may be required for the work of the Organization.

ARTICLE 21

(a) The Secretary General shall be appointed by the Congress on such terms as the Congress may approve.

(b) The staff of the Secretariat shall be appointed by the Secretary General with the approval of the Executive Committee in accordance with regulations established by the Congress.

ARTICLE 22

(a) The Secretary General is responsible to the President of the Organization for the technical and administrative work of the Secretariat.

(b) In the performance of their duties, the Secretary General and the staff shall not seek or receive instructions from any authority external to the Organization. They shall refrain from any action which might reflect on their position as international officers. Each Member of the Organization on its part shall respect the exclusively international character of the responsibilities of the Secretary General and the staff and not seek to influence them in the discharge of their responsibilities to the Organization.

PART XI

FINANCES

ARTICLE 23

(a) The Congress shall determine the maximum expenditures which may be incurred by the Organization on the basis of estimates submitted by the Secretary General and recommended by the Executive Committee.

(b) The Congress shall delegate to the Executive Committee such authority as may be required to approve the annual expenditures of the Organization within the limitations determined by the Congress.

ARTICLE 24

The expenditures of the Organization shall be apportioned among the Members of the Organization in the proportions determined by the Congress.

PART XII

RELATIONS WITH THE UNITED NATIONS

ARTICLE 25

The Organization shall be brought into relationship with the United Nations pursuant to Article 57 of the Charter of the United Nations, subject to the approval of the terms of the agreement by two-thirds of the Members which are States.

PART XIII

RELATIONS WITH OTHER ORGANIZATIONS

ARTICLE 26

(a) The Organization shall establish effective relations and co-operate closely with such other inter-governmental organizations as may be desirable. Any formal agreement entered into with such organizations shall be made by the Executive Committee, subject to approval by two-thirds of the Members which are States.

(b) The Organization may on matters within its purposes make suitable arrangements for consultation and co-operation with non-governmental international organizations and, with the consent of the government concerned, with national organizations, governmental or non-governmental.

(c) Subject to approval by two-thirds of the Members which are States, the Organization may take over from any other international organization or agency, the purpose and activities of which lie within the purposes of the Organization, such functions, resources, and obligations as may be transferred to the Organization by international agreement or by mutually acceptable arrangements entered into between competent authorities of the respective organizations.

PART XIV

LEGAL STATUS, PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES

ARTICLE 27

(a) The Organization shall enjoy in the territory of each Member such legal capacity as may be necessary for the fulfilment of its purposes and for the exercise of its functions.

(b) (i) The Organization shall enjoy in the territory of each Member to which the present Convention applies such privileges and immunities as may be necessary for the fulfilment of its purposes and for the exercise of its functions.

(b) (ii) Representatives of Members and officials of the Organization shall similarly enjoy such privileges and immunities as are necessary for the independent exercise of their functions in connection with the Organization.

(c) Such legal capacity, privileges, and immunities shall be defined in a separate agreement to be prepared by the Organization in consultation with the Secretary General of the United Nations and concluded between the Members which are States.

PART XV AMENDMENTS ARTICLE 28

(a) The text of any proposed amendment to the present Convention shall be communicated by the Secretary General to the Members of the Organization at least six months in advance of its consideration by the Congress.

(b) Amendments to the present Convention involving new obligations for Members shall require the approval by the Congress, in accordance with the provisions of Article 10 of the present Convention, by a two-thirds majority vote, and shall come into force on acceptance by two-thirds of the Members which are States for each such Member accepting the amendment and thereafter for each remaining such Member on acceptance by it. Such amendments shall come into force for any Member not responsible for its own international relations upon the acceptance on behalf of such a Member by the Member responsible for the conduct of its international relations.

(c) Other amendments shall come into force upon approval by two-thirds of the Members which are States.

PART XVI INTERPRETATION AND DISPUTES ARTICLE 29

Any question or dispute concerning the interpretation or application of the present Convention which is not settled by negotiation or by the Congress shall be referred to an independent arbitrator appointed by the President of the International Court of Justice, unless the parties concerned agree on another mode of settlement.

PART XVII WITHDRAWAL ARTICLE 30

(a) Any Member may withdraw from the Organization on twelve months' notice in writing given by it to the Secretary General of the Organization, who shall at once inform all the Members of the Organization of such notice of withdrawal.

(b) Any Member of the Organization not responsible for its own international relations may be withdrawn from the Organization on twelve months' notice in writing given by the Member or other authority responsible for its international relations to the Secretary General of the Organization, who shall at once inform all the Members of the Organization of such notice of withdrawal.

PART XVIII SUSPENSION ARTICLE 31

If any Member fails to meet its financial obligations to the Organization or otherwise fails in its obligations under the present Convention, the Congress may by resolution suspend it from exercising its rights and enjoying privileges as a Member of the Organization until it has met such financial or other obligations.

PART XIX RATIFICATION AND ACCESSION ARTICLE 32

The present Convention shall be ratified by the signatory States and the instruments of ratification shall be deposited with the Government of the United States of America, which will notify each signatory and acceding State of the date of deposit thereof.

ARTICLE 33

Subject to the provisions of Article 3 of the present Convention, accession shall be effected by the deposit with the Government of the United States of America of an instrument of accession, which shall take effect on the date of its receipt by the Government of the United States of America, which will notify each signatory and acceding State thereof.

ARTICLE 34

Subject to the provisions of Article 3 of the present Convention,

(a) Any contracting State may declare that its ratification of, or accession to, the present Convention includes any territory or group of territories for the international relations of which it is responsible.

(b) The present Convention may at any time thereafter be applied to any such territory or group of territories upon a notification in writing to the Government of the United States of America and the present Convention shall apply to the territory or group of territories on the date of the receipt of the notification by the Government of the United States of America, which will notify each signatory and acceding State thereof.

(c) The United Nations may apply the present Convention to any trust territory or group of trust territories for which it is the administering authority. The Government of the United States of America will notify all signatory and acceding States of any such application.

PART XX ENTRY INTO FORCE ARTICLE 35

The present Convention shall come into force on the thirtieth day after the date of deposit of the thirtieth instrument of ratification or accession. The present Convention shall come into force for each State ratifying or acceding after that date on the thirtieth day after the deposit of its instrument of ratification or accession.

The present Convention shall bear the date on which it is opened for signature and shall remain open for signature for a period of 120 days thereafter.

In Witness Whereof the undersigned, having been duly authorized by their respective Governments, have signed the present Convention.

Done at Washington this eleventh day of October 1947, in the English and French languages, each equally authentic, the original of which shall be deposited in the archives of the Government of the United States of America. The Government of the United States of America shall transmit certified copies thereof to all the signatory and acceding States.

XII. The International Trade Organization (ITO)¹

(Not yet established)

On 18 February 1946, the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations resolved to convene an International Conference on Trade and Employment to devise ways and means for the expansion of the production, exchange and consumption of goods. The Council, at the same time, established a Preparatory Committee to prepare for the consideration of the Conference an agenda and a draft convention for an international trade organization.

The Preparatory Committee held its first session in London from 15 October to 26 November 1946, and prepared a first draft Charter for the International Trade Organization (ITO).

Following further work on the draft by a drafting committee and by the Preparatory Committee at its second session held in Geneva from 10 April to 22 August 1947, a draft Charter was adopted by the Preparatory Committee. This draft formed the basis for the work of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Employment (Havana Conference). The Conference, which met in Havana from 21 November 1947 to 24 March 1948, drew up a Charter for an International Trade Organization (to be officially known as the Havana Charter) to be submitted to the 56 Governments represented, authenticated the text of the Charter in a Final Act, and adopted six resolutions, including a resolution² establishing an Interim Commission for the International Trade Organization.

The Interim Commission for the International Trade Organization (ICITO), composed of 52 countries which approved the resolution establishing it, held its first meeting in Havana on 20 March 1948 and elected and delegated its powers to an Executive Committee of eighteen members. The Executive Committee met in Havana on 24 March 1948, and again at its seat in Geneva from 25 August to 15 September 1948.

The main task of the Interim Commission was to prepare the ground for the first session of ITO, including a plan of work for the first year of the organization, the budget, the site for ITO headquarters, relations with the United Nations, the specialized agencies and other inter- and non-governmental organizations. The bulk of this task—so far as events could be foreseen—was completed in 1949, and since that time the Secretariat of ICITO has been mainly occupied with the performance of duties for the Contracting Parties to the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT).

In view of the delay in receiving acceptances of the Havana Charter, the Executive Committee, at a special session held at Annecy, France, in August 1949, agreed to postpone its third meeting, scheduled for September 1949, until a date when the entry into force of the Charter and the holding of the first ITO Conference were more imminent. At this meeting a proposal was made by the United Kingdom to bring into operation chapter VI of the Havana Charter in advance of the Charter as a whole. This proposal was referred to the fourth session of the Contracting Parties to GATT, but found no support and was withdrawn.

By the end of 1950 the Havana Charter had been accepted by Liberia and—conditional upon acceptances by the United Kingdom and the United States—by Australia. The Swedish Riksdag authorized Sweden's adherence at the discretion of the Foreign Minister. No acceptances had been deposited with the Secretary-General of the United Nations. On 6 December 1950 the United States Department of State issued a statement of policy indicating that the Havana Charter would not be submitted again to the United States Congress. It subsequently became evident that the establishment of ITO would be indefinitely postponed.

1. Purposes and Functions

ITO is a proposed specialized agency of the United Nations to administer and implement a code of principles or rules of fair dealing in international trade. This code is contained in the Havana Charter.

¹ For more detailed information on activities prior to 31 Dec. 1950, see Y.U.N., 1946-47, pp. 821-24; 1947-48, pp. 973-79; 1948-49, pp. 1106-12.

² For text, see Y.U.N., 1947-48, pp. 978-79.

The broad purpose of the Charter is to promote the expansion of international trade, to encourage the economic development of the backward areas and to improve standards of living throughout the world. The Charter seeks to achieve this goal (a) by establishing a code of fair dealing in international trade that will preclude economic warfare, and (b) by encouraging countries to reduce artificial trade barriers and to establish a multi-lateral, non-discriminatory trading system.

The Charter covers a very wide range of international economic relationships: tariffs, quotas, export subsidies, exchange matters, customs formalities, cartels, commodity agreements, state-trading, the international aspects of foreign investments and of employment and economic development, and a procedure for the settlement of trade disputes.

The Havana Charter groups its 106 articles in nine chapters. In its first chapter, the Charter sets out the purpose and objectives behind the creation of ITO as follows:

1. To assure a large and steadily growing volume of real income and effective demand, to increase the production, consumption and exchange of goods, and thus to contribute to a balanced and expanding world economy.
2. To foster and assist industrial and general economic development, particularly of those countries which are still in the early stages of industrial development, and to encourage the international flow of capital for productive investment.
3. To further the enjoyment of all countries, on equal terms, of access to the markets, products and productive facilities which are needed for their economic prosperity and development.
4. To promote on a reciprocal and mutually advantageous basis the reduction of tariffs and other barriers to trade and the elimination of discriminatory treatment in international commerce.
5. To enable countries, by increasing the opportunities for their trade and economic development, to abstain from measures which would disrupt world commerce, reduce productive employment or retard economic progress.
6. To facilitate through the promotion of mutual understanding, consultation and co-operation the solution of problems relating to international trade in the fields of employment, economic development, commercial policy, business practices and commodity policy.

The remaining eight chapters of the Charter deal with:

- (1) maintaining high levels of employment and economic activity;
- (2) promoting economic development, especially in economically backward countries, and reconstructing war-devastated countries;
- (3) commercial policy as it affects tariffs and other barriers to trade, and the numerous aspects of commercial relations between countries;
- (4) restrictive business practices, such as some practices of international cartels;

- (5) inter-governmental commodity agreements;
- (6) the structure and functions of ITO;
- (7) the procedures for settlement of differences between ITO members;
- (8) general provisions affecting ITO members, such as their trading relations with non-members and security exceptions.

2. Organization

The main governing body of ITO, as provided in the Charter, will be the Conference, which is to include all members, each having one vote. Decisions will be by majority (in certain cases by a two-thirds or three-fourths) vote.

Some functions of the Conference are granted, and others may be delegated, to an eighteen-member Executive Board, on which the United States will have permanent representation by reason of its economic importance. Here also each member will have one vote.

Members must agree, under the Charter, to settle trade disputes in accordance with the procedures of the Charter and the decisions of ITO. If a country does not wish to follow a decision of ITO, it may leave the organization (on sixty days' notice) but will no longer be entitled to the benefits that ITO members extend to each other.

3. Financial Arrangements

The Interim Commission for ITO has been financed by advances from the Working Capital Fund of the United Nations. These advances, which were authorized from time to time by resolutions of the General Assembly, amounted to $346,490. The Executive Committee met on 25 November 1950 at Torquay to consider the repayment of loans which had been advanced to ICITO from the United Nations Working Capital Fund. As decided by the Executive Committee, ICITO advised the Secretary-General of the United Nations that it would not ask for further advances from the Working Capital Fund and would repay in July 1951 a substantial part of the advances made.

The secretariat of ICITO in its capacity of undertaking duties for the Contracting Parties to the GATT, is financed through contributions of the participating Governments which are assessed on their share of foreign trade. The estimated expenditure for 1951 amounts to $403,281, to be covered by Government contributions and casual income.

THE GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE (GATT)

While the charter for ITO was in course of preparation, the members of the Preparatory Committee decided to proceed with tariff negotiations among themselves instead of waiting for the Organization to come into existence, thereby promoting one of the most important objectives of ITO. The Preparatory Committee also sponsored the discussions which led to the formulation of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT). The tariff negotiations were held from 10 April 1947 to 30 October 1947 when the 23 participating countries signed a Final Act which authenticated the text of the GATT.

The countries which completed tariff negotiations at Geneva in 1947 and subsequently became Contracting Parties to the GATT were: Australia, Belgium, Brazil, Burma, Canada, Ceylon, Chile, China, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, France, India, Lebanon, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Pakistan, Southern Rhodesia, Syria, the Union of South Africa, the United Kingdom and the United States. Although Pakistan, Syria, Burma, Ceylon and Southern Rhodesia were not members of the Preparatory Committee, these countries participated in the tariff negotiations, owing to their close economic connexion with certain members of the Committee. In the tariff negotiations, Benelux (Belgium, Netherlands, Luxembourg), took part as a Customs Union, as did also Lebanon-Syria.

1. Tariff Conferences

The tariff negotiations undertaken at Geneva in 1947, Annecy in 1949 and Torquay beginning in 1950 are recognized as constituting an achievement without parallel in the history of tariffs. In the first series of tariff negotiations at Geneva in 1947, a total of 123 bilateral sets of negotiations were completed among the 23 participating countries. They covered more than 45,000 tariff items.

The second series of tariff negotiations, held at Annecy from 11 April to 27 August 1949, resulted in the completion of 147 bilateral agreements covering some 5,000 items and the accession to the GATT during 1950 of a further nine countries: Denmark, the Dominican Republic, Finland, Greece, Haiti, Italy, Liberia, Nicaragua and Sweden.

The third series of tariff negotiations was held at Torquay beginning 28 September 1950.³

During 1950, Indonesia became a contracting party in its own right; Lebanon withdrew; the Nationalist Government of China notified its withdrawal effective 5 May 1950; the Central People's Government of China had not yet defined its position by the end of 1950.

The concessions negotiated at the three tariff conferences will remain firm until 1954. The countries adhering to GATT account for over four fifths of world trade.

2. Structure and Functions of GATT

GATT is an international trade agreement. The tariff concessions resulting from the three tariff conferences are incorporated in the Schedules of GATT. The Agreement also contains provisions to protect the tariff concessions: that is, for preventing them from being nullified by trade restrictions imposed by Governments to protect their national trade and payments. These provisions include rules regulating the use by the parties to the Agreement of quantitative import and export restrictions, internal taxes, customs administration and so on, as well as arrangements for consultation and for joint discussion and settlement of differences arising out of the administration of the Agreement. The obligations accepted by the contracting parties to the Agreement provide an agreed set of rules governing their commercial relations and the sessions attended by their representatives provide a forum for the discussion and settlement of complaints and other problems in the commercial field.

The Governments which have become contracting parties are applying the Agreement provisionally either under the Protocol of Provisional Application or under the Annecy Protocol of Terms of Accession⁴ which specifies arrangements for additional Governments to become contracting parties. These legal instruments enabled the contracting parties to bring the new tariff rates into effect, to establish most-favoured-nation treatment among themselves, and to follow the commercial policy rules laid down in the general provisions of the Agreement. Contracting Parties, which apply the Agreement provisionally, are not required to amend existing legislation or to promulgate new legislation in order to adhere more closely to the Agreement. They are expected, however, not to enact any new legislation that is inconsistent with it. In signing the Protocol of Provisional Application or the Protocol of Terms of Accession, a contracting party accepts a commitment to apply part II of the Agreement (which represents approximately the commercial policy chapter of the Havana Charter) "to the fullest extent not inconsistent with existing legislation", and, in addition, undertakes to observe the principles of the Havana Charter "to the fullest extent of their executive authority".

From time to time the Contracting Parties amended the GATT by means of Protocols, designed primarily to bring the commercial policy and economic development articles of the Agreement into line with the final text of the Havana Charter. The Contracting Parties also adopted Protocols of Rectifications, containing detailed changes in the Schedules of the Agreement necessitated by such factors as inaccurate descriptions of products or inadvertent errors, and Protocols of Modifications, comprising renegotiations among certain Contracting Parties.⁵

3. Sessions of the Contracting Parties

The Agreement requires representatives of the Contracting Parties to meet from time to time for the purpose of giving effect to those provisions which require joint action. In accordance with this arrangement, five sessions of the Contracting Parties had been held up to the end of 1950: the first session took place at Havana in March 1948, during the closing weeks of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Employment; the second session at Geneva from 16 August to 14 September 1948; the third session at Annecy from 8 to 13 August 1949; the fourth session at Geneva from 23 February to 3 April 1950; and the fifth session at Torquay from 2 November to 16 December 1950.

During 1950 the scope of the sessions of the Contracting Parties was broadened: the number and complexity of the trade problems submitted by Contracting Parties increased, as did also the length of the sessions.

At the fourth session the Contracting Parties completed plans for the third tariff conference which opened at Torquay in September 1950 and reviewed the position of low tariff countries in relation to the Torquay negotiations, agreeing on a formula designed to enable low-tariff countries to negotiate with high-tariff countries. They recommended that the life of the Geneva and Annecy tariff concessions should be prolonged beyond 1 January 1951. The fourth session adopted two reports relating to trade practices. The first of these examined the types of import and export restrictions in current use and made a series of firm suggestions to Governments to minimize the harmful effects of such protective restrictions imposed for balance of payments reasons.

The other report, namely the First Report on the Discriminatory Application of Import Restrictions, explored the import procedures of some 20 Contracting Parties which are using quantitative import restrictions because of balance of payments difficulties, during the postwar transitional period.

During the fourth session arrangement was made for a consultation as provided for in the Agreement between the Contracting Parties and certain countries which had recently found it necessary to change their import programmes or intensify their import restrictions recently in order to help correct their balance of payments situation. It was agreed that consultations should be undertaken at the fifth session with Australia, Ceylon, Chile, India, New Zealand, Pakistan, Southern Rhodesia and the United Kingdom.

The fourth session also examined a complaint by Chile arising from the removal by Australia of nitrate of soda from the pool of nitrogenous fertilizers which is subsidized by the Australian Government, while continuing to subsidize domestic ammonium sulphate. A working party of the session found that, although Australia had not contravened any provision of the General Agreement, it was possible that the value of tariff concessions granted to Chile by Australia had been impaired. The working party recommended that Australia find a way to remove the competitive inequality between ammonium sulphate and Chilean nitrate and, after consulting Chile, report back at the next session of the Contracting Parties. Australia and ⁵ For list of Protocols amending GATT adopted at the first three sessions, see Y.U.N., 1948-49, p. 1110. For an analysis of the various Protocols see United Nations Bulletin, VIII:6 (15 Mar. 1950) and X:4 (15 Feb. 1951); for action on the Protocols in 1950, see ibid., X:4 (15 Feb. 1951).

Chile reported to the fifth session that they had reached a satisfactory agreement.

At the fifth session, which was held during the tariff conference at Torquay, legal instruments were drawn up to bring into force the tariff concessions negotiated at Torquay and to prolong the assured life of the Geneva and Annecy schedules of tariff concessions to 1 January 1954, including such limited re-negotiations of these concessions as would be undertaken, and to provide for accession to the General Agreement of further Governments negotiating at Torquay, including Uruguay, which undertook negotiations at Annecy in 1949 but did not subsequently accede.

Consultations on import restrictions referred to above were completed with the eight countries concerned and the International Monetary Fund. The view was expressed by certain representatives that circumstances justified a progressive relaxation of the hard currency import restrictions of Australia, Ceylon, New Zealand, Southern Rhodesia and the United Kingdom, and the Fund expressed the opinion that such relaxation would be feasible in these cases but should be undertaken with due caution, having regard to present uncertainties. The representatives of these countries considered that these views gave too much weight to favourable developments in the past twelve months and insufficient weight to current adverse factors (in particular to new responsibilities under the rearmament programme), the full force of which would not be felt until 1951. There was general agreement with the view expressed by the Fund that it would not be possible in current circumstances for Chile, India or Pakistan to relax further their restrictions on imports from the dollar area.

At the suggestion of the Netherlands, the Contracting Parties considered how far the United Kingdom utility system, by exempting from purchase tax a wide range of consumer goods manufactured in the United Kingdom, discriminated against imported goods of a similar quality and price. The United Kingdom stated that certain classes of imported goods comparable with domestic utility products were now exempted from purchase tax and it was hoped that it would be possible to remove the discrimination before long. It was agreed to place the matter on the agenda of the next session.

Belgium requested examination of actual cases of quantitative restrictions applied for protective purposes by the United Kingdom and France, stating that these restrictions were causing unnecessary damage to the Belgian economy. Following consultations, a bilateral agreement was arranged between Belgium and the United Kingdom, and formal assurances were given by the representatives of France that they would seek a satisfactory settlement of the question before the end of 1950.

Consultations were held among Czechoslovakia, France, Italy and the United States regarding the withdrawal by the United States of a concession—on women's hats and hat bodies made of fur felt—which had been negotiated in 1947.

A committee of experts in consultation with the representatives of WHO examined the feasibility of a draft agreement to reduce trade barriers affecting the importation of insecticides and certain apparatus and materials necessary for campaigns against insect pests. The views of the committee and an amended draft agreement were to be transmitted to WHO.

At the fifth session the Contracting Parties also formulated and published a code of standard practices for import and export restrictions and exchange controls with the object of reducing the uncertainties and hardships to merchants. Among other matters dealt with, preliminary consideration was given to the establishment of a standing committee to deal with certain business between the regular sessions of the Contracting Parties.

XIII. The Inter-Governmental Maritime Consultative Organization (MICO)¹

(Not Yet Established)

1. The United Nations Maritime Conference

The United Nations Maritime Conference, called at the request of the Economic and Social Council, met in Geneva from 19 February to 6 March 1948. It was attended by representatives from 32 countries and by observers from four other countries and nine international organizations. The Conference drew up and opened for signature and acceptance on 6 March 1948 the Convention on the Inter-Governmental Maritime Consultative Organization (IMCO).²

As provided by the Convention, Members of the United Nations and other States invited to the Conference may become members of IMCO by becoming parties to the Convention. States other than these may become members, subject to the prior approval of their applications by two thirds of the States members of IMCO. Territories or groups of territories may, under certain conditions, become associate members of the organization.

IMCO will come into being when 21 States, of which seven must each have a total tonnage of at least one million gross tons of shipping, have become parties to the Convention. As of 31 December 1950, five acceptances of the Convention had been received—from Canada, Greece, the Netherlands, the United Kingdom and the United States.

To make the necessary preparations for the first session of the Assembly of IMCO, the Conference established a Preparatory Committee, which will cease to exist upon resolution of the first session of that Assembly.

An agreement to establish the relationship between the United Nations and IMCO was approved by the General Assembly on 18 November 1948; to become effective it now requires the approval of the IMCO Assembly.³

2. The Preparatory Committee

The Preparatory Committee of IMCO held its first session on 6 March 1948 and its second on 30 November and 1 December 1948. It drew up a provisional agenda for the first session of the IMCO Assembly and prepared a proposed budget for the first two years of IMCO.

The Committee invited interested Governments to take the necessary steps to become parties to the Convention as soon as possible.

The next meeting of the Preparatory Committee will be called prior to the first session of the IMCO Assembly, unless some important questions arise which make it necessary for the Committee to meet earlier.

3. Purposes and Functions

The purposes and functions of IMCO are laid down in parts I and II of the Convention. Briefly, the organization is to:

- (1) provide machinery for co-operation among Governments in the field of governmental regulation and practices relating to technical matters, including those concerning safety at sea;
- (2) encourage the removal of discriminatory action and of unnecessary restrictions by Governments;
- (3) consider matters concerning unfair restrictive practices by shipping concerns;
- (4) consider any matters concerning shipping that might be referred to it by any organ or specialized agency of the United Nations;
- (5) provide for the exchange of information among Governments on matters under consideration by the organization.

IMCO is also to provide for the drafting of conventions and agreements, to recommend these to Governments and to inter-governmental organizations, and to convene such conferences as may be necessary. The organization is to function in a consultative and advisory capacity.

¹ For further information, see the Final Act and Related Documents of the United Nations Maritime Conference (U. N. P., Sales No. 1948.VIII.2), and the following documents which were before the Conference: E/CONF.4/1 & 4. See also Y.U.N., 1947-48, pp. 969-72, and doc. IMCO.PC/3.

² The text of the Convention will be reproduced in a forthcoming volume of the Y.U.N., after the organization has come formally into existence.

4. Organization

As provided by its Convention, IMCO will comprise an Assembly, a Council, a Maritime Safety Committee and a secretariat.

The Assembly, which is to consist of representatives of all members of the organization, is to meet at least once every two years. Among its duties as the policy-making body of IMCO, the Assembly is to adopt the budget of the organization and elect the members of the Maritime Safety Committee and four of the members of the Council, and may establish, on recommendation of the Council, permanent subsidiary bodies. It will recommend to members the adoption of maritime safety regulations or amendments to these regulations.

Each member of the organization will have one vote; associate members will not be entitled to vote. Decisions will be taken, as provided by the Convention, by majority vote, with certain exceptions. For example, to assume the duties and resources of another organization or to amend the Convention, will require a two-thirds majority vote of the Assembly, including, in the latter case, the concurring votes of a majority of members of the Council.

The Council is to consist of sixteen members, eight of which must represent countries having an interest in providing international shipping services (six of these countries must have the largest interest in these services), and eight of which must represent countries having an interest in international sea-borne trade (six of these countries must have the largest interest in this field). It will be the Council's function to determine which of the members of IMCO have the largest interest in providing shipping services, and which the largest interest in sea-borne trade. The Council is to appoint, with the approval of the Assembly, the Secretary-General of the organization. It is to perform, between sessions of the Assembly, all functions of the organization except that of recommending to members the adoption of maritime safety regulations.

The Maritime Safety Committee is to consist of fourteen members elected from among those members having an important interest in maritime safety, of which at least eight are to be the largest ship-owning nations. It is to consider such questions as the construction and equipment of vessels, the handling of dangerous cargoes, and maritime safety procedures and requirements. The Committee is to promote the co-ordination of activities in the fields of shipping, aviation, telecommunication and meteorology, as they relate to safety and rescue.

The secretariat is to consist of a Secretary-General, a Secretary of the Maritime Safety Committee and necessary staff. Its duties are to include, inter alia, the provision of any information required for the work of the other organs of IMCO.
